The Treaty for Peace alſo in Hungary, was notwithſtanding the death of Mahomet, by the Baſſa of Buda ſtill continued, who (as he ſaid) by the new Sultan authoriſed, by Letters incited the Governour of Strigonium to repair unto ſome ſuch convenient Place, as wherein the matter might be ſafely concluded. Upon which motion, the Governour, with the reſt of the Commiſſioners, departing from Strigonium, the fourth of February came to Collonitz's Camp, from whence they were by the Souldiers moſt bravely conducted along the Banks of Danubius, unto the Ships which lay ready for them, to carry them down the River to Peſth; during which time of their Paſſage, nothing was to be ſeen or heard, but Fire and Smoak, and the thundering of the great Artillery both from Peſth and Buda, the Chriſtians and the Turks both ſtriving to excell each other in theſe their ſhews of Joy and Tryumph. The Governour, with the reſt of his Company, being happily arrived at Peſth, met there with a number of the better ſort of the Turks, ſent thither by the Baſſa to meet him, and in his Name to greet him; who, with a thouſand Honours again received and ſaluted them. All ſhews of Kindneſs, and ſigns of the happy ſucceſs of the Negotiation begun. And now the Chriſtians, deſirous to excell the Turks, as well in Courteſie as in Valour, appointed a number of them the next day to go to Buda, to invite certain of the chiefeſt and moſt honourable men amongſt the Turks, unto a Banquet at Peſth; who willingly accepted of the offer, and ſo came ſix hundred of the better ſort of them over the Danuby to Peſth, where the feaſt was moſt ſumptuouſly and magnificently prepared for them. There were ten fair and rich Pavillions, ſet up for the Entertainment of them a little diſtant from Peſth, in a fair place, and fit for this purpoſe. In the firſt whereof were placed three very proud and ſtately Tables. At the firſt of which Tables, on the right hand, were ſet the Commiſſioners for the Emperour, with the two Baſſaes, and one Mufti or Arch-Prieſt, with a Mitre upon his Head, a long furred Gown upon his Back, and under that, a Robe of moſt fine and exceeding rich Silk. Upon the left hand, at the ſame Table, were placed certain of the Turks Lords, and other great men. At the other two Tables were ſet other of the beſt ſort of the Turks mingled with the Chriſtians: and ſo at all the other Tables in like order were ſet a Chriſtian and a Turk, until that the ſix hundred Turks were placed, with as many Chriſtians among them; who, by their good Countenance and Behaviour one of them to another, might have ſeemed to have been all of one and the ſame Belief, Nation, and Country. The Turks, after the manner of their Superſtition, would not ſit down before the ſetting of the Sun; which being ſet, they with a thouſand Ceremonies, to the imitation of their Arch-prieſt, ſet themſelves down at the Tables in order as is aforeſaid, and there merrily repoſed themſelves until nine of the Clock at night. At which time, the Tables with great reverence taken away, the Turks, as men well contented, and full of Joy, returned to Buda, the Inſtruments of Muſick, Trumpets, and Drums, on every ſide ſounding about them with much glee, and as it were witneſſing unto Heaven and Earth the great Contentment they had received. And yet was all this fair ſhew nothing elſe but deep Diſſimulation mixt with moſt foul Treachery: for, a little before their departure, they of Peſth were advertiſed, That the Turks in great number well appointed, were come out from Buda to ſurpriſe Peſth, during the time of the Feaſt; being in hope, that the Chriſtians, all buſied in this Action, had left the Walls of the Town unfurniſhed of defence. But they, too well acquainted with their Treacheries to put any truſt or confidence in their fair ſhews, had as well provided for the Defence and Safety of the Town, as for the Magnificence of the Feaſt abroad. By which means the Turks diſappointed of their intended purpoſe, were in the attempting thereof repulſed, and ſo glad to return as they came, back again to Buda.

The Turks by Treachery ſeek to ſurpriſe Peſth.

The next day after, the Commiſſioners for the Emperour complained unto the Baſſa and the reſt of the Turks Commiſſioners of this ſo treacherous dealing; who excuſed themſelves as altogether ignorant thereof, diſavowing the Action for want of Succeſs, which had it been effected, they would to the uttermoſt have ſhamefully maintained. An ordinary courſe among the Great, with Speech and Countenance in ſhew to condemn that for want of effect, which they in Heart and Mind could for their own Profit have wiſhed to have been performed.

The Turks Commiſſioners diſavow the Practice for the ſurpriſing of Peſth.

Nevertheleſs, the Turks the next day (as if no ſuch thing had been meant) requeſted the Chriſtian Commiſſioners to come to Buda, as they had done to Peſth; but they, as well by Proof as by Report, perceiving the evil meaning of the Turks, excuſing themſelves, returned to Strigonium, as loth any more to adventure themſelves into the Power of their faithleſs Enemies; yet left they Geisberg at Peſth, with Commiſſion to continue the Negotiation for Peace with the Baſſa of Buda, if he ſhould find him thereunto diſpoſed, or any hope of bringing the Treaty to good effect or iſſue.

The Commiſſioners for the Emperour refuſe any more to go to Buda.

Mahomet the late Sultan, had a little before his Death (as is before declared) ſet at Liberty the County Yſolan (carried away Priſoner to Conſtantinople after the taking of Alba-Regalis) and ſent him with Letters of Credence to intreat of a Peace to be made with the Emperour; with promiſe to yield himſelf again Priſoner, if he failed to obtain the ſame; for whom, the French Ambaſſador became Pledge. He having now delivered his Letters of Credence unto the Emperour, and commanded to ſay what he had farther in charge, declared, That the Great Sultan offered to deliver unto his Majeſty the ſtrong Towns of Buda, Alba-Regalis, and Caniſia, in exchange of Tranſilvania and Valachia, whereunto he laid claim, promiſing on his part to make a moſt firm and ſure Peace with the Emperour for the time to come, and to give thereof ſuch aſſurance as ſhould of him reaſonably be demanded. The Baſſa of Buda alſo, amongſt other the fair Remonſtrances of Peace, had offered unto the Emperour's Commiſſioners to reſtore Caniſia and Agria for Peſth, Hatwan, and Vacia, together with the Remiſſion of all ſuch Payments and Tributes as were by the Emperour due unto the Great Sultan for the Kingdom of Hungary. All which fair Shews and Offers, though much unreaſonable, were nothing but windy Words to delay the time, and ſubtil Baits to deceive the Chriſtians: for the Event and Iſſue, which giveth life to all Actions, with a form unto them agreeable, hath by Experience taught the Chriſtians, That all the glorious and glozing Proceedings of the Turks in this buſineſs of the Peace, ſo much wiſhed and expected of the Chriſtians, were but Nets and Snares wherewith to intangle them with the vain hope thereof, until that they in the mean time might fortifie their Towns with new Supplies of Men, Munition, Victuals, and whatſoever elſe was needful, the more eaſily afterward to annoy them at their Pleaſure, and ſo to laugh at their Simplicity and light belief: For Mahomet being dead, and Achmat his Son (yet by reaſon of his Minority under the Tuition of his Mother and other the great Baſſaes) ſucceeding in his Place, the Turks aggravated the Conditions of the Peace, and propounded them ſo far from reaſon, as that any man might ſee them now to have no more deſire or regard of Peace, after that they had diſpatched that for which they ſeemed before deſirous thereof; inſomuch, that they ſent a Meſſenger in Poſt from Conſtantinople unto the Baſſa of Buda, to forbid him, upon the pain of his Head, any farther to continue the Treaty of Peace, but forthwith to renew the War. So this Peace, ſo much expected, and now of the People generally holden for as good as concluded, ſuddenly vaniſhed into Smoak, nothing remaining of that Body, compoſed of ſo many Wiſhes, more than a vain Expectation, now diſperſed with the Wind of the Turkiſh Treachery. And yet during the time of this Negotiation for Peace ſought for by the Turks both by often Letters and Meſſengers, many a ſolemn Oath had paſſed both from the Sultan Mahomet, and from the Viſier Baſſa, for their faithful and ſincere dealing in the Treaty thereof; as, By the God of Heaven and Earth; By the Books of Moſes; By the Pſalms of David; and, By the Holy Evangeliſts; Oaths much uſed of Turks, and reſerved for their greateſt Solemnities, and ſtrongeſt Aſſurances of their Leagues and Promiſes; all which, for all that, having ſerved but as Baits and Trains to beguile the ſimple and well-meaning men, lay now neglected and unregarded: ſuch is the faith and aſſurance which men have from faithleſs and untruſty men.

The Meſſage of County Tolan from the Great Sultan to the Emperour.

The Turks in all the Negotiation for Peace did nothing but diſſemble with the Emperour's Commiſſioners.

The Treaty for Peace with the Turks cometh to nothing.

The Treaty of Peace thus broken off, it was forthwith by ſome bruited, That Achmat the Great Sultan, under the Conduct of the Viſier Baſſa, his Governour, was himſelf in Perſon, with a moſt a moſt huge Army about to come into Hungary; ſome others in the mean time reporting, that he was letted ſo to do by reaſon of the Perſian Wars, whereunto he was of neceſſity to ſend the greateſt part of his Forces; ſo that he would but only ſend one of his great Baſſaes, with the remainder of his ſo great an Army, againſt the Chriſtians in Hungary, being before ſworn never to return again unto Conſtantinople, until he had brought the Countries of Tranſilvania and Valachia, with the remainder of Hungary, under the Obeiſance of the great Sultan, together with the Country of Auſtria, and eſpecially the ſtrong City of Vienna, the end of the Turkiſh Emperours Conqueſts; and that to this purpoſe the Grand Seignior had with great rigour in all places levied great ſums of Money upon his Subjects for the maintenance of his ſo great an Army. It was by others reported alſo, That only the Preparations for ſo great an Army ſhould be made this year, the Turks being reſolved to do much therewith the next year, and therefore willing to beſtow much, in hope with ſo great and puiſſant an Army as they were about to raiſe, to make an end of the Wars in Hungary, and not to return until they had conquered all the reſt of that Kingdom, in the rent reliques whereof the Fortune of the Othoman Emperours had ſtayed; ſo that all Handy-crafts men were ſet to work by Day and Night, not only to forge Weapons, to caſt great Ordnance, and to make Powder, but to prepare all other things neceſſary alſo for ſo great an Exploit.

All theſe great Preparations were made for the ſervice of the Viſier Baſſa for the War in Hungary, and of Cicala Baſſa in Perſia, whereof he was appointed General, having before preſumptuouſly promiſed, utterly to ruinate the Perſians Eſtate, and with ſo great a Power even to ſwallow him up. And indeed, theſe Eaſtern Wars greatly troubled the Turks; News coming ſtill concerning the Conqueſts of the Perſian upon his Territories; and that even of late the Perſian King proſecuting his Victories, had taken Babylon, with all the Country thereabout; and that divers other Towns and Cities, more moved with fear than with the Faith wherewith they had bound themſelves unto the Turks, now yielded themſelves unto the Perſian, as weary of the Turks Servitude, and deſirous of their antient Liberty. And yet for all that, the Turks (as they are wiſe to diſſemble their Loſſes, and to ſtrike a fear into their Enemies) had given it out in Conſtantinople, That the Perſian King was near unto Babylon diſcomfited, all his Army overthrown, and he himſelf taken Priſoner; ſo that the Turks Forces, before diſtracted, ſhould now wholly joyn together, to the utter Ruine and Deſtruction of the Chriſtians in Hungary. And the more to confirm this evil News, it was reported, That the Beglerbeg of Grecia had raiſed a great Power to joyn with the Viſier Baſſa's Forces, to the intent to leave nothing unconquered in Hungary. For the better effecting whereof, it was alſo ſaid, That the Viſier Baſſa had cauſed a great number of Veſſels, loaded with Powder and other warlike Proviſion, to be brought by Water out of Egypt to Belgrade, to ruinate the Eſtate of the Chriſtians. All which Reports, were by the Turks given out, to cover their own Miſhaps, and to terrifie their Enemies; as knowing right well, Wars to depend much upon Reports, and that a falſe brute believed, worketh oftentimes the Effect of a thing indeed done. Howſoever it was, thoſe ſo dreadful Reports might well have ſerved to have ſtirred up the Spirits of the Chriſtians to have provided for their own Defence, and to have ſtood upon their Guard; for he that faileth to provide againſt the Preparations of his Enemy, well deſerveth either Bondage or Death, which ſoever ſhall befall him, for having by his Negligence betrayed his own Ability and Power to have withſtood him.

Babylon reported to have been taken by the Perſian King.

The Turks wiſely diſſemble their Loſſes.

The great Report of the Turks Preparations and Forces, had now daſh'd all the Talk of Peace at Conſtantinople, and the hot fire of Ambition had quite ſcorched the ſweet Flowers appearing upon the overture of the late hope of the common Repoſe; ſome perſwading the Great Sultan, that he was able with his Power at the ſame time, both to ſubdue the Perſian King, and to confound the Forces of the Chriſtian Emperour, having ſo many Kingdoms within his Empire, ſo many Armories ſtored for his Service, and ſuch ſtore of Treaſure ready for his Deſigns, promiſing unto him moſt happy and eaſie Succeſs both in the one and the other Expedition, even at one and the ſelf ſame time; ſo that he might vanquiſh the Perſian by Cicala, Chieftain of his Army in Perſia, and conquer the remainder of Hungary, with the Countries of Tranſilvania and Valachia, by the Viſier Baſſa, General of his Forces againſt the Chriſtians; it being (as they ſaid) a thing both honourable and profitable for a Prince to beſtow both Men and Money, thereby to gain Men, Honour, and Empire; ſo that things which with great charge might be done all at once, were more profitable than were thoſe which with leſs charge were done at divers times; for that things ſo done at once, yielded preſent profit, as being in our Power, and recompenſing our Charge; the other in long time putting us to great charge, and yielding little or no profit at all. And indeed men ſtand in great fear of this the Turks young Emperour, being by Nature fierce, haſty, vigilant, cruel, ambitious, and proud; and who, in his Behaviour and Actions, much reſembled Mahomet the ſecond, he which took from the Chriſtians ſo many Kingdoms, Towns, and Cities, and amongſt the reſt, the Imperial City of Conſtantinople. He like unto a young Alexander, occupieth himſelf in all the Exerciſes of War, hateth Idleneſs, his Fathers greateſt Pleaſure; he cauſeth Arms to be made, Cannons to be caſt, Ships and Gallies to be built, and taketh a Pleaſure to diſcourſe, how the ſame are to be imployed againſt his Enemies; ſo that it is greatly to be feared, that he being but a Child in Conſtantinople, will prove a man grown in Chriſtendome, in bringing the ſame under his Power and Obeiſance. He ſpareth no Perſon nor Means which may ſerve to ſatisfie his deſire. So that Strangers are to expect ſmall Courteſies at his hands, when as they ſee him to uſe ſuch bloody Cruelty againſt his Noblemen and domeſtical Servants, of the chiefeſt of whom ſince he was Emperour, he hath already put divers to death, with one of his Baſſaes alſo, who was the Governour of Peſth, when as our men won it. But as Juſtice and Clemency unto good Princes are the ſureſt Bonds to keep their Subject faſt bound unto them in their Obedience and Duties, ſo are Cruelty and Rage Bridles wherewith the Turkiſh Emperours keep their Subjects in awe and ſubjection unto them, and themſelves in their Eſtate.

The Diſpoſition of the young Turkiſh Emperour.

Fury and Tyranny the chief means whereby the Turkiſh Emperours command their Subjects.

But leaving the Turks buſie about their Preparations for the accompliſhing of their young Emperours high Deſigns, let us return into Hungary, taking Tranſilvania in our way, the woful Miſeries of which Country my Mind abhorreth to think upon, and my Pen thereof to write. This Province, ſometime much renowned for the great Victories obtained againſt the Turks by the Inhabitants thereof, under the leading of their Prince Sigiſmund Bator, and others, abounding with plenty of all things, was now, not by any invaſion of the Turks, but by civil Diſcord amongſt themſelves, and Rebellion againſt the Emperour, now their Sovereign, ſo waſted and ſpoiled by the Souldiers on all ſides, that many of the poor Inhabitants, for want of food, fell down dead, as they went in the Streets and Fields: miſerable Wretches, always ſowing, but never reaping; always labouring, but nothing profiting; the mercileſs and greedy Souldier ſtill ſpoiling or devouring all. By long continuance of which daily Outrages, the Fields at length lay now untilled, the Paſtures unſtored and neglected, and all things elſe unmanured and quite out of courſe; by means whereof, the Famine ſo increaſed, that the poor Peaſants of the Country, having eaten up for great Dainties all the Dogs and Cats, Mice and Rats, that they could get, fell to eating of dead Horſes, and the loathſome Carrion of other hunger-ſtarved Beaſts. It is reported alſo, That one man ſhould eat another; and that at Hermanſtat, a Woman having ſix Children, did among them eat one another, until they were at length all ſix devoured; and to the contrary, that two men did eat their own Mother; yea, Thieves and other Malefactors, hanged for their Villanies, were by the poor and miſerable hungry People cut down from the Gallows, and devoured, the People generally living upon nothing but upon the Roots of Weeds, green Herbs, and the leaves of Trees. For remedy of which ſo extream Miſeries, it was on all Parts agreed, That a General Aſſembly of the States of the whole Province ſhould be holden at Dewa; wherein it was accorded, That all Hoſtility ſet apart, the Gentlemen of Tranſilvania, having by their Rebellion forfeited both their Lives and Lands, ſhould be pardoned their Lives, with three fourth Parts of their Lands reſerved unto them, and that for ready Money they might of the Emperour redeem the fourth part alſo. But concerning the Moveables of ſuch as were dead in the time of theſe Troubles, and already confiſcate unto the Emperour, they ſhould ſo remain; and that they ſhould pay their Diſmes, or tenth part of their Wine and Fruits, unto the Emperour. And farther, That there ſhould be no farther exerciſe of Religion permitted unto them, but only the Romiſh Religion: and that the Towns of Cronſtadt and Clauſenburg ſhould within the ſpace of three Weeks, pay, the one twenty thouſand Dollars, and the other eight thouſand; and the Magiſtrates of thoſe Towns ſhould deliver the Keys of their Towns, with all their Power, into the hands of the Emperour's Lieutenant; and that the Gentlemen of theſe Towns which would not be accounted in the number of the Rebels, ſhould, for the ſafety of their Perſons, take Letters of Pardon for their Rebellion, of the General of the Army. This Pacification gave ſome little time of breathing unto this poor diſtreſſed Country, which, bared of all ſtrength, and as it were upon the Graves brink, had now but even the laſt Gaſp to give; and the Country People began again to give themſelves unto their wonted Labours, in hope at length to reap the profit thereof themſelves; but alas, all in vain: for why, the ravening Souldiers, inured to Prey, after their wonted manner made havock and ſpoil of all things, leaving nothing unto the poor Countryman, but his labour for his Pain, and time enough to bewail his manifold and remedileſs Miſeries: the Cauſes whereof were the Nobility and Gentlemen themſelves; who, not liking to be governed, or rather (as they took it) oppreſſed by the Germans, and having, not upon any deſire that they had of Peace, but rather by neceſſity inforced, yielded unto the Pacification aforeſaid, ceaſed not ſtill under-hand to incite the Souldiers (ready enough of themſelves to do miſchief) and in what they might to trouble the Government of the State by the Germans, being unto them, (as they accounted of them) but Strangers. All which their doings Baſta, the Emperour's Lieutenant, well perceiving, cauſed three of the greateſt of the Gentlemen of the Country, and whom he moſt ſuſpected to be the Authors of theſe Troubles, to be apprehended, and faſt mured up betwixt two ſtrong Walls in an old ruinous Monaſtery; whither their Friends afterwards coming to have viſited them, and finding them ſtarved to death, were therewith much abaſhed, as were alſo other their Complices, aſſoon as they heard thereof. But leaving them to work themſelves farther Troubles, let us again return unto the Turks Affairs.

The miſerable eſtate of the Country of Tranſilvania.

An horrible Famine.

An Aſſembly of the States of Tranſilvania for the appeaſing of the Troubles there.

The Troubles of Tranſilvania ſecretly maintained by the Nobility of the Country.

A ſevere and miſerable kind of Puniſhment.

Now was all the hope of Peace betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks become deſperate, the Turks making thereof no more account, ſeeing that according to their Deſire they had provided Alba-Regalis, Agria, and Buda, of their neceſſary Proviſions. They had in four Waggons put into Agria the Pay due unto their Garriſons; ſo that their Affairs being now in good eſtate, and their Courages revived, they began to ſcoff and jeſt at our Credulity, to believe that they had had any purpoſe to conclude upon any thing that was not agreeing with their Profit, how far ſoever it were differing from their Honour or from their Faith: ſo that now theſe faithleſs men began again to renew their wonted Incurſions and Pillages upon the Chriſtians, with all other manner of Hoſtility, and that in more cruel manner than ever before; and our Huſſars on the other ſide well requited them with the like, being as well contented as they with theſe manner of doings, their whole Fortune depending upon the points of their Weapons, and ever ready to the Service of their Prince for their Pay. Now it fortuned, that fourſcore of the Turks going forth to ſeek for Booty, chanced to meet with certain of theſe Huſſars, who finding themſelves too weak to encounter with our men, and betaking themſelves to flight, were certain of them taken Priſoners, and ſo brought unto the General; unto whom, they upon Examination confeſſed, That the Turks much marvelled at the Simplicity and Fooliſhneſs of the Chriſtians, to believe that they were deſirous of Peace, and not to have diſcovered their ſo manifeſt Intentions to the contrary, tending only to the pleaſuring of themſelves, and the annoying of them their Enemies, to the ſtrengthning of themſelves, and deſtruction of the Chriſtians, as by Proof it appeared, ſo ſoon as their Deſires were accompliſhed, unto the prejudice of their Enemies; and that their young Emperour was always againſt this Treaty of Peace, whatſoever ſhew he had made to the contrary, conſtrained thereunto by the Victories and Conqueſts of the Perſian King; all his Wiſhes and Deſires aiming at no other mark, than at the general Ruine of Chriſtendom. Our Garriſons alſo, ſeeing themſelves charged by the Turks, took up Arms likewiſe, and requited them with like Outrages, as they did. They of Pappa and Veſprinium were the firſt which began theſe Broils after the Treaty of the Peace; who, having joyned their Forces together, and making head toward Alba-Regalis, met with a number of Turks driving of Sheep and Cattel thither, whom they ſurpriſed, and together with their Cattel carried them away with them Priſoners. Which good hap was ſeconded with the Liberty of twenty Chriſtian Priſoners from Buda, who one night ſeeing their Keepers oppreſſed with Sleep and with Wine, cut their Throats, and ſo happily eſcaped over the River to Peſth.

The Treaty of Peace betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks quite broken off, and the War again begun.

Booties taken from the Turks by the Chriſtians.

The Chriſtians by the Turks Priſoners informed of their evil meaning in the Treaty of Peace.

Now while theſe Troubles, betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks (after the Treaty of Peace broken off) thus began again in Hungary, the

Turks

Zeffer Baſſa recovereth the Government of Boſna from Zellaly, and ſhortly after dieth.

Zellaly made Governour of Temeſwar.

Turks, beſide the Rebellion in Aſia, were together by the Ears in the Province of Boſna. Zellaly, having by force joyned with Policy driven Zeffer Baſſa (as is aforeſaid) out of Boſna, and poſſeſſed himſelf of that Province, thought himſelf now ſure enough within the ſtrength of his Government, although he being by the great Sultan ſent for to Conſtantinople, had refuſed to come, as knowing himſelf right well to hold that ſo great a Government much againſt his Will and Pleaſure. But Zeffer Baſſa, now ſupported with the Authority of the Great Sultan, and deſirous to be revenged of the great diſhonour and loſs he had before received from Zellaly, his Enemy, with a great Army ſuddenly entered into Boſna, and ſo coming unto Zellaly, fearing as then no ſuch matter, overthrew him with all his Power, and never left purſuing of him, until he had chaſed him quite out of the Province, and ſo again recovered the Government thereof. But ſhort was the Joy the Baſſa received of this ſo pleaſing a Victory; for within few days after he dyed, comforting himſelf only in this, that he died not unrevenged. Of all which things, the great Baſſaes of the Court underſtanding, and loth to loſe ſo great a Souldier as was Zellaly, (who, as a man diſtreſſed, was now making ſhift for himſelf) or by uſing him hardly, to deterr the other Aſian Rebels from coming in, and yet not willing to truſt him with ſo great a Government as was the Province of Boſna; they, to provide for all events, appointed him to be Governour of Temeſwar; and Begedes Baſſa (before Governour there) to ſucceed Zeffer Baſſa in the Government of Boſna; ſo contenting all Parties, to keep their Forces whole and intire againſt the Chriſtians.

The Miſeries of the Hungarians.

The Regiment of Collonel Althem in Mutiny.

But as the Turks were troubled with their Affairs in Boſna, ſo the Chriſtians were no leſs, but rather more buſied with theirs both in Tranſilvania and Hungary. The Eſtates of Hungary had appointed a general meeting at Poſſonium, wherein the Arch-duke Matthias was to ſit as Preſident, there to conſult of the means for the maintenance of this years Wars againſt the Turks. But as the Arch-duke was about to have entred into the City in the midſt of his Souldiers, ſuch a Fire upon the ſudden aroſe in the City, as conſumed the greateſt part thereof; an evil preſage of the Action then in hand, and a woful ſpectacle to behold, with the Terror whereof all mens Minds poſſeſſed, turned them from the magnificent entertaining of the Arch-duke, (as was before determined) to the quenching of the raging fire, as more neceſſary and concerning them than the other. Beſides that, the Miſeries then to be ſeen in the other parts of Hungary yet holden by the Chriſtians, were both great and lamentable; for beſide the harms therein done by the Turks, the Regiment of Collonel Althem had made ſuch ſpoil and havock all over the Country where it lay, that the Towns and People in general ſo grievouſly complained thereof unto the Emperour, that he, moved with their juſt Complaints, cauſed the Authors of theſe ſo great Outrages to be apprehended and brought Priſoners to Vienna, where ſome of them were beheaded, and ſome others of them hanged; beſide whom ſo condemned and executed, there were ſome other Captains and Lieutenants, of whom, ſome denying the Fact, and otherſome ſtanding upon the juſtifying of that they had done, as thereunto by extream Neceſſity inforced, were for their further tryal ſent Priſoners unto Prague, where they were committed unto Priſon into the Caſtle, until their Cauſes might be heard. Among which Captains and Lieutenants, and other ſuch great Officers, was one Genderot, Collonel Althem's Antient, who moſt wickedly but a little before had ſlain Nudercy, a Gentleman of good ſort, and his Fellow-companion in Arms; for which murther he was committed Priſoner into a very high and ſtrong Tower within the Caſtle (wherein County Paradiſer, who ſold Caniſia unto the Turks, lay ſometime Priſoner) until his Tryal might within a few days after be made. The horror of which criminal place, together with the guilt of Conſcience, ſo troubled and wounded the Mind of Genderot, as that all the hope now to ſave his Life, was by making an eſcape, and ſo to avoid the ſtroke of Juſtice. Which he happily brought to paſs by the help of one of his Lacquies, who had found means to bring unto him a long Cord, where, by ſtraining himſelf out at a little Window (whereby it was thought almoſt impoſſible for any man to have got out) he in ſafety got down to the Ground, and there having two good Horſes ready for him, he with his man fled amain, and ſo eſcaped, his Keepers drunken over Night, being in the Morning found yet ſleeping, without perceiving of any thing, whoſe Drunkenneſs and Favour toward the Priſoner had given him means to eſcape. The reſt of the Captains and Lieutenants in Priſon at Prague, were ſome of them beheaded, and ſome of them hanged, and the reſt, at the Interceſſion of the Nobility of Auſtria, and other great men, pardoned; yet with Condition, That they ſhould pay the fines ſet upon them, and ſerve the Emperour in his Wars three Months of their own charge without Pay; ſome few of the common Souldiers, to the Terror of others, had two of the forefingers of their right-hands cut off, and afterward faſt nailed unto Gibbets ſet up by the high-ways ſide.

The Regiment of Collonel Meysberg in Mutiny.

In like manner alſo the Regiment of Collonel Meysberg roſe in Mutiny for their Pay, and came and incamped at Sneche, about a League from Vienna; threatning to deſtroy the Country, and to kill the chief men therein, if they were not paid their Pay. Which rebellious Mutiny the Captains did what they might to appeaſe; they beſought them, but in vain; they intreated them, but to no purpoſe; they promiſed them pay, but prevailed not; yea, the Collonel himſelf thruſt himſelf into the midſt of them, with moſt earneſt Prayers, and his hands caſt up, putting them in mind of their Duty, and laying before them the danger of moſt aſſured Death and Diſhonour, if they continued further to proceed in that their Diſloyalty, whereunto their head-ſtrong Fury ſo diſorderedly led them. But they, as men inraged, carried headlong with their Fury, breathing nothing but Threats and Deſtruction, and by no Prayers or Perſwaſion to be moved, preſently made choice of another Chieftain, under whoſe conduct and leading they reſolved to rifle the Suburbs of Vienna, and with the ſpoil of them to pay themſelves. Upon which Reſolution they marched on, and ſo drew near unto the City; with which their ſo great and dangerous an Inſolency, the Governours of the City moved, (the ſufferance whereof they accounted to be unto themſelves both diſhonourable and harmful) they on the other ſide reſolved by plain force to repreſs them, and by juſt Arms to chaſtiſe them, who were not otherwiſe to be reclaimed. But ſuch be the miſerable Calamities of War, where violent Remedies muſt purge out of the body of the Common-weal the good Humours together with the bad, ſo to recover the health thereof; which Remedies, not but upon Neceſſity to be uſed, are ſo quick and violent in their working, as that they afford not lieſure to diſcern the whole and ſound from the ſick and infected, to ſave the one, and to ſpill the other; but that they muſt altogether run the ſelf-ſame way. For albeit that the whole Regiment was in this mutinous Action, and ſo all in like danger, yet were they not thereof all alike guilty, many of them being even againſt their Wills and good liking carried away head-long, as with the violent courſe of an heady River.

Now the Captains of the Town, with their Troops and Companies, ſtrengthened with ſome other Supply ſent from other Places, were to ſet forward againſt theſe rebellious Mutineers, and to fruſtrate their Deſigns; for the greater ſtrengthening of whom, divers of the Burgeſſes of the Town were inforced to enter into this Action alſo: amongſt whom, there were two, accounted very honeſt religious men, who by all means ſought to excuſe themſelves from going, labouring both by lively Reaſons, and by the Word of God, to prove, that they neither might nor ought of Right to enter into Arms againſt their Chriſtian Brethren, inforced with Extremities, for want of their due Pay, to forget their Duty, and to do that beſeemed them not. But what availeth it to alledge eitther Reaſon or Law amongſt the clattering of Arms; the noiſe whereof is ſo great, as that Reaſon and Law cannot there be heard. Theſe two men ſeeing themſelves inforced to go, and much grieved in Conſcience to do that they were enjoyned to do, and to help to ſhed the guiltleſs Blood of their innocent Brethren (as they accounted them) entred both of them into a moſt ſtrange and woful Reſolution, which was, to dye themſelves, rather than to embrue their hands with the Blood of the guiltleſs; whereupon, one of them, having oftentimes called upon the Name of Jeſus, with his own Sword thruſt himſelf through the Body, and ſo died; the other, upon the like Reſolution, threw himſelf into the River, and ſo periſhed alſo: Men worthy to be pitied for their Conſcience ſake, but juſtly to be condemned for their ſo weak and deſperate a Reſolution. In fine, the rebellious Mutineers ſeeing in what Peril they were, being even now ready to be charged, and withal conſidering the weakneſs of their Power in compariſon of them that came againſt them, thought it beſt, upon the ſight of ſo great a Tempeſt, to ſtrike Sail; and ſo changing their former Determination, and laying down their Arms, craved Pardon of the Arch-duke; who graciouſly granted it them, and ſo took them to his Mercy; yet with Condition, that they ſhould again return unto their Garriſons, and deliver into his hands the Ring-leaders and chief Authors of that Mutiny, to be puniſhed according to their Deſerts, as afterwards they were: the ordinary end of ſuch inſolent and diſordered Actions, which have nothing aſſured unto them but Death, which (all things elſe failing) attendeth only upon them.

A ſtrange Action of two of the Citizens of Vienna.

The Turks in vain ſeek to ſurpriſe Lippa.

But while the Chriſtians, thus divided, were at variance among themſelves, the Turks were ready enough to take advantage of ſuch their dangerous Diſcord. And firſt of all, Zellaly, the old Rebel, but now Governour of Temeſwar, having in his crafty Head plotted the taking of the City of Lippa by ſurpriſe, and to that purpoſe gathering the greateſt Power that he was able to make, in the Evening ſet forward from Temeſwar, and ſo travelling by Night, came to Lippa; unto the Walls whereof he planted ſcaling Ladders, and at the ſame time laboured to have forced the Gates, in hope ſo to haye gained the Town; which was done with ſuch a terrible Noiſe and Outcry as was poſſible by the Turks to be made, after that they were once diſcovered, thereby to have diſmayed the Chriſtians within the Town; who, well acquainted with ſuch Stratagems of their Enemies, and now therewith awaked, came readily to the Walls, and there ſo well defended themſelves and their Town, that the Turks repulſed, were glad to give over the Aſſault, and having loſt a number of their men, with all ſpeed to retire; upon whom, the Chriſtians ſallying out, ſlew many of them in that their diſordered Retreat, little differing from plain flight, and took many more of them Priſoners; yea Zellaly, who not many hours before had thought to have ſurpriſed Lippa, was now glad himſelf to have recovered the Walls of Temeſwar. Some of the Turks that were there taken Priſoners being examined, reported, That the Army that was this Year to come into Hungary, was like to be very great, and that a part thereof was now come to Belgrade, expecting there the coming of the Tartars, who were together with them to enter into Hungary; and that by reaſon of the Wars with the Perſian, which devoured almoſt all the Souldiers in Conſtantinople, and yet could not be therewith ſatisfied, the Great Sultan had commanded, That all ſuch as were able to bear Arms, as well in Boſna, as in that part of Hungary which was ſubject unto him, and in the other Provinces thereunto adjoyning, ſhould be ready to joyn with his Army in Hungary, for the farthering of his Conqueſts there: and that the Perſian King, proſecuting the courſe of his Victories, had overthrown Cicala Baſſa with his Army, and taken his Son Priſoner, almoſt ſlain all his Troops, and entered into Confederacy with Caracaſe, chief of the Rebels in Aſia, a Man of great Power, who had following of him a great number of valiant Men, all reſolutely ſet down for the troubling of the Great Sultan's Eſtate.

Caſſovia in danger to have been burnt by the Turks.

About the ſame time, the Governour of Caſſovia (a great and ſtrong City in the upper part of Hungary) going forth, with ſome good part of his Garriſon, to appeaſe the Souldiers lying about in the Country (but now up in Mutiny for their Pay) and there ſpending ſome few days about this Buſineſs, in ſhewing of them the danger of their Inſolency, and perſuading them, by the evil ſucceſs and end of ſuch-like Actions, to return again unto their Duties; and they again to the contrary obſtinately urging the Payment of their Pay, or elſe to have leave to depart, as being not able longer to continue without the one or the other: and ſo the time paſſing, it fortuned that certain Turks, then Priſoners in Caſſovia, encouraged by the Abſence of the Governour and of the Garriſon Souldiers, to attempt the gaining of their Liberty, brake their Irons, and ſlew their Keepers, in hope ſo to have eſcaped: but being in the doing thereof diſcovered, and ſo again ſurpriſed before they could do any farther harm, and upon Torture examined, By what means they thought to have eſcaped out of the City, the Walls thereof being kept with continual Sentinels? they confeſſed, That their Purpoſe was, the ſame night to have ſet fire upon divers Places of the City (ſo to have drawn the People to the quenching thereof) and at the ſame time to have ſlain the Sentinels upon the Walls, and ſo to have made their Eſcape: for which their ſo miſchievous a Fact and Purpoſe, they were ſome of them executed, and the reſt again committed to Priſon, and more ſtraitly kept and looked unto than before.

The Cittadel of Caniſia by chance burnt.

Now as Caſſovia had, by the Providence of God, eſcaped ſo great an intended Miſchief, Caniſia at the ſame time alone felt the evil hap by the Turks intended both to Caſſovia and Lippa; for a Souldier of the Garriſon, in the Cittadel there, having, through Negligence or Miſhap, caſt Fire into the Powder, provided for the ſtore of the Caſtle; the Powder taking fire, blew up the Cittadel, the Towers, the Houſes, and Walls; and, to be brief, made this poor place like unto another Rome burnt by Nero. So that had any of the Chriſtian Forces been then near unto the place, it had been an eaſie matter to have won the ſame, as well for the ſmall reſiſtance that was therein to have been found in ſo great an aſtoniſhment of the Men, and Deſtruction of the Place. But ſuch accidents have no certain hours limited to their Beginnings, nor aſſurance of their coming, ſo that they oftentimes chance, without any man to make uſe of them; and again fly away, when men make their greateſt Preparations to obtain them.

The Turks of Buda overthrown by the Chriſtians of Peſth.

At the ſame time, the Turks of Buda ſent two hundred of the Souldiers of their Garriſon to fetch in Forrage a little from Peſth, who, as they were in the doing thereof too preſumptuous, ſo were they well puniſhed for their Pride; for the Chriſtians in Peſth, having diſcovered them in this Action, ſallied out upon them and charged them; againſt whom they for a while right valiantly defended themſelves, but at length, oppreſſed with number, and overthrown, they were moſt of them ſlain, and the reſt taken Priſoners; wherewith the Baſſa of Buda was ſo much offended, that in Revenge thereof, he in his Rage threatned with Fire and Sword to do what harm he might unto the Chriſtians. But, as the common Proverb ſaith, Men warned, are half armed; and Enemies Threats bring this Comfort with them, That in receiving of the threatned harms, we are in hope to be revenged thereof, as therefore before provided.

New Tumults in Tranſilvania.

The Rebels in Tranſilvania ſurpriſed and ſlain.

The miſerable eſtate of Tranſilvania.

Captain Horwat's Anſwer in excuſe of the Haiducks.

Unto theſe woful Troubles of Hungary, proceeding as well from the Inſolencies of the Chriſtian Souldiers themſelves, as from the Fury of the Turks, who were their antient and mortal Enemies, were joyned the like, or rather worſe Calamities in Tranſilvania, extream Famine and want of all things ſore raging in both Countries; ſo that hardly hath any Miſery or Extremity been ſeen or read of, even in Countries by the juſt and heavy Judgments of the Almighty God appointed to Deſtruction, which were not in thoſe two Countries to be found, and of many felt. For remedy whereof, George Baſta, the Emperours Lieutenant in Tranſilvania, had there done what he might for the appeaſing of the Tumults and Troubles of that Province, and now of late brought the ſame into ſome good terms, as was thought, and as is before declared. Howbeit, that in proof it fell out far otherwiſe, and that the more he therein laboured, the farther he was off from his intent and purpoſe; for the Nobility of that Province, who were generally inclined unto Rebellion, and deteſting the Germans, together with their Government, rejected the Decrees and Orders which were agreed upon in their late meeting together for the concluding of Peace; inſomuch, that aſſiſted by the Turks, they had taken certain Caſtles and ſtrong Places in that Province; and the better to ſupport their Rebellion and Inſolency, they had appointed a certain Place to meet at, where the Turks and they might conferr together of the means which they intended for the effecting of their Deſigns. Whereof Baſta having by ſecret means got underſtanding, to remedy this pretended Miſchief, he ſent away a great number of Haiducks, to lye in wait to ſurpriſe them upon the way. Which men, who were skilful in the Paſſages of the Country, failed not in this Action, but lay cloſe in ambuſh, very conveniently for the ſurpriſing of their Enemies; who, proceeding in their intended purpoſe, and thinking of nothing leſs than of that which was intended againſt them, were ſuddenly, before they were aware, Turks and Tranſilvanians, altogether ſurpriſed and ſlain. Which Exploit being performed, theſe Haiducks and other Souldiers, deſtitute of their Pay, and inraged with Fury, fell upon the Province, uſing therein all Hoſtility, as if they had been mortal Enemies unto it; puniſhing the guiltleſs for the guilty, and ſeiſing upon all mens Goods in common, to pay themſelves that which was by ſome few in private kept from them. All the whole Province was ſubject unto the Rage and Fury of thoſe and other ſuch mercileſs men of War, who, without any remorſe at all, indifferently ſlew and maſſacred all of them that came in their way; but eſpecially the poor and weak innocent People, who called upon the Almighty God for Remedy and Redreſs of theſe Evils which they ſuſtained, and cried out unto him for Revenge of their ſo great and cruel Wrongs. The high ways were every where ſo full of Thieves, that no man could travel from Place to Place, but that he was in great danger to be ſet upon, and ſpoiled. For the Haiducks (being men that live altogether by Prey, and roaming up and down the Country) made good Priſe and Booty of whatſoever came in their way, ſparing neither Turks nor Chriſtians; inſomuch, that they hearing, how that the Zecclers with a good Convoy were bringing a number of Waggons laden with Victuals, and a great many of Oxen and other Cattel to Claudianople, although they were of the ſame Party, Belief, and Nation, yet they lay in wait for them to ſurpriſe them; againſt whom the Zecclers ſeeking to defend themſelves, were by them cruelly maſſacred, and their Waggons, with their Beeves and other Cattel, all carried quite away. But what ſhould we ſay? Hunger breaketh even the ſtone Walls, and forceth men unto all Extremities; and now the Famine in that Province was ſuch, as that the People were for the moſt part glad to live by feeding upon the Roots of Hearbs and Weeds, and ſuch other unwholeſome things, whereof great Mortality afterward enſued amongſt them; which was the cauſe that Horwat, Captain of theſe Haiducks, being reproved for the Outrages by them committed, and charged to take order, that no more ſuch like ſhould afterward be done; anſwered, That it was not poſſible to keep Souldiers in any order amidſt the extremity of Famine; for that the Belly was an inexorable Uſurer, which took pity upon nothing, but with great Rage exacting that which it thought due for the Nouriſhment of it ſelf.

Two of the Turks Spies of Buda taken.

Amidſt theſe Troubles of Tranſilvania and Hungary, there were two of the Turks Spies of Buda diſcovered and taken; who at Vienna had obſerved all the Actions and Proceedings of the Chriſtians, and to the uttermoſt of their Power had informed themſelves of their Deſigns, as alſo of their Preparations and Forces to be raiſed and levied for this years Wars; of which two Spies, the one was imployed, and the other kept in cloſe and ſtraight Priſon, until that further matter might be drawn out from him.

The Forces of the Chriſtians were now beginning to gather themſelves together, and to make an head in Hungary; a riſe report at that time going, That they would forthwith take the field; whereof the Baſſa of Buda underſtanding, and deſirous in what he might to hinder that their forwardneſs (whereof he doubted the Effects) thought it beſt to betake himſelf to his old and cunning Practiſe, for the treaty and concluding of a Peace with the Chriſtians, whereof he now made ſhew himſelf, together with the reſt of the Turks, to be very deſirous; ſo by putting the Chriſtians in hope thereof, to make them the more remiſs and negligent in their doings, and to gain time of them, until that the Turks great Army (then in preparing) might be brought down into Hungary. To which purpoſe, he in moſt friendly manner thus writ unto the Governour of Strigonium.

The Letters of the Baſſa of Buda to the Governour of Strigonium.

WE know right well (Noble Governour) that you are not ignorant, how that your Brother, the Governour of Strigonium before you, hath moſt earneſtly embraced the Negotiation of Peace, in ſuch ſort, as that we cannot ſo much yield unto our ordinary Quarrels and Diſſention, but that we muſt give you to underſtand the Cauſes which have croſſed and hindered the concluding of ſo great a good the laſt year now paſſed. The firſt Let came by reaſon of the time, choſen too late to be imployed in that Treaty for Peace, when as now both the Armies were already on foot, and even in readineſs to joyn battel, and could not be then ſtayed by that Intreaty, nor be ſent back again without ſome exploit doing; each part had reſolved upon their proper Deſigns, and even choſen their Ground for Battel, and were then hardly to be turned from that whereupon they were before reſolved. And albeit, that during this laſt Winter, the Treaty for the Peace was again begun, and that the men of War on both ſides in hope thereof, reſted unarmed, and free from all Hoſtility; a moſt fit time to have begun and ended this Treaty of Peace, which hath been ſo much wiſhed for of our Sovereign Emperour, deſired of his Subjects, and requeſted by thoſe of your Emperours, with whom my dread Sovereign would confirm and contract a firm and continual Peace; yet for all that, ſince the departure of the Governour from Strigonium, we ſee three Months to have been paſſed without any Letters at all, or Meſſage by word of Mouth brought unto us concerning this matter; ſo that we have not any thing whereof to certifie our Sovereign Emperour. And foraſmuch as the courſe of time hath brought theſe two contrary Armies even unto the point of Battel, and that they are marching one of them to encounter with the other, and ſo enter into the liſts of Honour, we have thought good before to deſire to know of you, what we are to expect concerning the Peace. We therefore requeſt you as our very good Brother and Friend, in what we may to ſtay the coming of our Armies into this Kingdom, and to attend to that which may produce the concluſion of this Treaty, being on our part moſt ready to lend both our care and deſire to whatſoever ſhall be juſt and meet in this Treaty and neceſſary for the common good; beſeeching you to believe us in this Buſineſs, and not to doubt of our good Will, more affected to your good, than is yours to our welfare; whereof we in good time advertiſe you, for that our Army which is now before Belgrade, being once arrived here, and marching in Field, we cannot poſſibly cauſe it to return without ſomething doing, conſidering the great harms, which under the aſſurance of your Faith given, we have received from your People during the time of the Truce, which they have many ways violated. Which their evil dealing hath greatly incenſed us againſt your men in Captivity with us, and cauſed our Souldiers to ſhew great rigour againſt their Slaves; we therefore attend your Anſwer, and the return of your Brother, to the end we may together reſolve according unto Reaſon and Equity, of that which ſhall be needful to be done for the common good and welfare.

Now for all this fair gloſing, it was no hard matter to gueſs at the Baſſaes ſecret meaning; for how deſirous ſoever he ſeemed to be of Peace, and willing to the furtherance thereof, yet nevertheleſs, true it is, that during the time of all theſe fair ſhews, the Turks, having aſſembled their Garriſons on all ſides, had by Night ſurpriſed the Caſtle of Simnin upon the Chriſtians, ſlain part of the Souldiers therein, carried away the reſt Priſoners, and moſt cruelly afterwards burnt the place; ſo manifeſting by their foul deeds the evil meaning of their fair and deceitful Words. But now leaving the Baſſa for a while unto his crafty Devices, and paſſing over many ſmall Skirmiſhes which happened in Hungary and Tranſilvania, as not beſeeming the Gravity of an Hiſtory, let us now out of Europe look over into Aſia, to ſee how the Great Turks Affairs there in the mean time went.

Cicala Baſſa again overthrown.

The Rebellion in Aſia was, by the coming over of Zellaly and his Followers, for a time ſomewhat weakened, but not ſuppreſſed, that peſtilent Humour of Diſloyalty having before infected the Minds of ſo many, as that in ſhort time after the Rebels were much ſtronger, and the Rebellion much more dangerous than before; for the appeaſing and repreſſing whereof, Cicala Baſſa, the old Renegade, a man of great Experience and Service, was as General ſent over with a great and mighty Army into Aſia, where he needed not long to ſeek for his Enemies, they being as ready as he, either to give or to accept of Battel; ſo that for men ſo on both ſides reſolved, it was no hard matter to bring them to the Tryal of Battel; which they with like deſire and equal hope joyning, there made a great and terrible fight, the Baſſa fighting for his Honour, and the Rebel for his Life. Howbeit, that at length the Baſſa, after much bloodſhed and great number on both ſides ſlain, being put to the worſe, fled with his Army altogether diſordered, and in rout, having in that ſo dangerous a confuſion of his People much ado to ſave himſelf. With which ſo ſhameful an overthrow given him by the Rebel, the Baſſa, who was more aſhamed than diſcouraged, again repaired his Army, joyning thereunto great and mighty Supplies, and ſo ſtrengthned, came now again the ſecond time to revenge himſelf of the great diſhonour which he had before received, and utterly to ſuppreſs the Rebels; who, now finding themſelves too weak to encounter with ſo great and mighty a Power, wiſely betime retired, praying Aid of the Perſian King, who ſent unto them his own Son with a great Army of good and valiant Souldiers; which might have given the Baſſa cauſe enough to have ſtayed his haſte, and to have been well adviſed how he joyned Battel with ſuch deſperate and reſolute Enemies, and now back'd with ſuch ſtrong Supplies; but he, being blinded with the Fury of his former loſs, and too much deſirous to be thereof revenged, with more haſte than good ſpeed came on, and joyned Battel with theſe his Enemies, now in readineſs and well provided to receive him. The two Armies were in number equal, but the Rebels of the two, more reſolute and careful of themſelves and of their welfare, as they which had repoſed all their Hope and Confidence in their own Arms and Valour, ſo that the Battel was with great Outcries and Fury begun both on the one ſide and on the other; in the beginning whereof the Turks right furiouſly charged the Rebels, and ſeemed ſomewhat to prevail upon them, until that the Perſian Kings Son with certain Troops of his moſt brave Horſemen charging them in the Rereward, and ſome other of the Rebels with like Fury aſſailing them upon their Flanks, their whole Army was ſo diſordered, that Cicala doing what he could to have put his men again in order, and ſo to have reſtored the battel, nothing therein prevailed, but was glad, together with the reſt of his Army, now all in rout, to betake himſelf to flight. In this Battel were 40000 Men on the one ſide and the other ſlain, whereof thirty thouſand were of the Baſſaes Army, and the reſt of the Rebels; who by this their ſo great a Victory, gained no leſs Honour and Reputation, than had the old Baſſa got of Contempt and Diſgrace. The Succeſs of the Perſian King.

Perſian King alſo after this diſcomfiture of the Turks, continuing his Conqueſts, took in the Country of Siruan (a matter of great importance) being now deſtitute of all relief by the overthrow of Cicala Baſſa, who, had he prevailed againſt the Rebels, ſhould have marched thither againſt the Perſian King, to have ſtayed the courſe of his Victories; who now victorious and out of fear, made head toward Aruſta, a very great and ſtrong Town, near whereunto the River Tigris diſchargeth it ſelf into the great River Euphrates, which City he at laſt won, with all the Places and Countries thereunto adjoyning; and hath ſince, as a moſt happy and victorious Prince, again recovered from the Turks whatſoever they had ſince the time of Sultan Solyman by force of Arms taken from the Perſian Kings his Predeceſſors, two or three ſtrong Places only excepted. Of which moſt notable Wars betwixt theſe two of the moſt mighty Eaſtern Princes, viz. the great Turk and the Perſian King, I can rather wiſh than hope to be better informed, and that, not ſo much for Curioſity (although that the Knowledge of ſuch matters yield unto ſuch as be deſirous thereof much Pleaſure, with no leſs Contentment) as for that they (though far off) in ſome ſort much concern the good and quiet of the Chriſtian Commonweal, the Perſian Wars being the only means whereby the fury of the Great Turkiſh Sultan hath been, and yet is, for a time averted from the Chriſtians in Europe upon the Perſians in Aſia; as it is greatly to be feared, that ſome one or other (if not more) of the Chriſtian Princes neareſt unto him, ſhall to their great coſt and harm feel, ſo ſoon as theſe two great Mahometan Princes ſhall be at Peace between themſelves. But leave we the Baſſa a while to grieve at his overthrows, and the Perſian King to triumph of theſe Victories, and ſee what the Great Sultan himſelf in the mean time doth.

Sultan Achmat ſick of the ſmall Pox.

This young Prince Achmat, now one of the greateſt Monarchs of the World, had not many Months reigned, but that he fell ſick of the ſmall Pox, wherewith, he having a groſs and full Body, was ſo fouly tormented for the ſpace of fourteen days, that oftentimes fainting, it was generally thought he would thereof have died; yea, divers of the great Baſſaes were in ſpeech concerning his younger Brother to be taken out of the Seraglio to ſucceed him; which was thought would have coſt the younger Brother his Life, after that the Sultan his elder Brother was again recovered; as no doubt it had, but that he was the only Heir that was then left of the Othoman Family, if that his Brother the Sultan ſhould have failed. But he again recovered of his foul and childiſh Diſeaſe, to ſhew unto the Janizaries and others (who doubted thereof) that he was ſo recovered, proudly mounted upon a goodly Horſe, moſt ſumptuouſly furniſhed, and in great State and Magnificence rid up and down through moſt of the chief Streets of the Imperial City, the People (as their accuſtomed manner is) in every Place as he went rejoycing to ſee him, and proſecuting him with their moſt joyful Acclamations, wiſhing unto him a moſt long and happy Reign. Neither is it to be marvelled, ſeeing that the Almighty God hath even in the Faces and Countenances of Princes ingraven ſome reſemblance of his own, if they become reſpectuous and admirable in the Eyes and ſight of the common People, who cannot but honour them with their Voices, whom God hath bleſſed with his Power, and other his extraordinary worldly Bleſſings.

This young Prince, ſo recovered of his Sickneſs, and having ſhewed himſelf unto his Subjects, began forthwith to give himſelf (according unto the heat of his youthful Spirit) immoderately unto the Pleaſures of the Field, and other ſuch violent Exerciſes, being in their moderate uſe wholeſome, but in their violences much hurtful, but eſpecially upon the new recovery of his late Sickneſs, the Griefs whereof came in haſte, but were to leave him at leiſure. Whereupon two of his Baſſaes, careful of his Health, were ſo bold, as out of their Love to reprove him for ſuch his violent and immoderate Exerciſes (the day not being long enough for them) and by effectual Reaſons to diſſwade him from the ſame. But ſo far off was he from hearkening unto their wholeſome Perſwaſions, as that to the contrary, he therewith inraged, thruſt them both out of their Places. So dangerous a thing it is, even in Zeal and Love to preſume to controul great Princes in their moſt vain Pleaſures; others, in the mean time not loving them at all, but only for their own profit attending upon their idle Appetites, enjoying the Preferments due unto their more faithful and loyal Subjects, and yet ſecretly in themſelves ſmiling at the Vanity of ſuch as by whom they be ſo unworthily honoured and promoted.

Good Counſel taken in evil part by Sultan Achmat.

But as in the immoderate uſe of all things there is a ſaciety which breedeth a diſliking and diſtaſte of them (Pleaſures being not by any means more commended, than by their novelties and ſeldom uſe) ſo this young Sultan Achmat, having glutted himſelf with his Pleaſures, began now to caſt his Eyes upon his other more neceſſary Affairs of State, but eſpecially upon his Wars both with the Chriſtian Emperour and the Mahometan Perſian King. Now he was not ignorant of the great Valour and Sufficiency of Haſſan, the Viſier Baſſa, for the managing of his Wars in Hungary, wherein he had of long time been exerciſed, and ſo therein beſt experienced. This old Captain pleaſed him beſt, whom, as an old, expert, and politick General, he reſolved to continue in his charge as Lieutenant General of his Wars in Hungary, and by the continuation of him in ſo great and honourable a place, to bind him to all loyal Services in thoſe Wars, even to the uttermoſt of his Power. This Great Baſſa was then at Belgrade, upon the frontier of his Government, in doubtful ſuſpence expecting the Reſolution of his Prince concerning this buſineſs, and yet in hope, longing after a ſecond charge; whoſe longing deſire Achmat quickly ſatisfied, by ſending unto him both a Commiſſion for the continuation of his Charge and Dignity, and certain honourable Preſents, in token of his extraordinary Favour towards him; which were, a Generals Enſign, with an Hungarian Mace of pure Gold. Now whether theſe Preſents, joyned unto the continuation of his Charge, were welcome unto him, or not, ambitious Minds (ſuch as was his) can eaſily tell; and he, to ſhew his Contentment therewith, gave thereof good Teſtimony by the publick Actions of Joy, cauſing all the great Ordnance of the Place in thundering wiſe to be oftentimes diſcharged, and the Trumpets and Drums to be moſt joyfully ſounded.

Haſſan Baſſa appointed Lieutenant General of the Turks Wars in Hungary.

In the mean time, News was brought unto Conſtantinople, how that the Perſian King, having muſtered his Men, was in the Field with above an hundred thouſand good Souldiers, and that Bagages Baſſa, one of the great Rebels in Aſia, had confederated himſelf with him, to the further troubling of the Turks Eſtate. Whereupon Achmat, although he had before given order unto Haſſan, the Viſier Baſſa his Lieutenant in Hungary, for the beſieging and taking of Veradinum, a ſtrong City in the upper Hungary; now by a Meſſenger ſent in haſte, commanded the ſame Baſſa, all other buſineſſes ſet apart, with all the power that he could make, forthwith to return to Conſtantinople, there with him and the reſt of the Baſſaes to conſult and reſolve upon the moſt neceſſary War,and of the readieſt means for the continuing of the ſame. For albeit that the Turks were moſt deſirous to have Wars with the Chriſtians, and ſo (if it were poſſible) to have conquered the remainders of Hungary; yet the danger of the Perſian Wars and of the Rebellion in Aſia daily more and more increaſing, ſuffered them not wholly to attend unto the Wars againſt the Chriſtians in Hungary, but drew them now into a doubtful Conſultation, which way firſt to turn their Forces. But the Baſſa being come to Conſtantinople, the Grand Seignior took the pains and did him the Honour to come unto his Houſe; whither,the Counſel for the State being aſſembled, it was there moſt proudly reſolved upon, even forthwith at one and the ſelf ſame time with equal Forces to make War both upon the Chriſtian Emperour in Hungary, and the Perſian King in Aſia,accounting themſelves ſtrong enough to ſubdue and bring under foot, both the one and the other, no Power upon Earth being, in their proud conceit of themſelves, able to encounter or to withſtand theirs. So for the managing of theſe Wars, and of their ſo proud a Reſolution to be performed in ſo remote Parts of the World, Haſſan Baſſa was continued in his charge, as General of the Army in Hungary; and Cicala Baſſa was appointed to have the command of the Army to be ſent againſt the Perſian; two moſt expert Captains, being to fight againſt their hereditary Enemies, Haſſan againſt the Chriſtians, and Cicala againſt the Perſians, by whom he had not long before been evil uſed. An ordinary Policy of the Othoman Emperours, not to commit the charge of their Armies againſt the Chriſtians, unto Renegades; for fear leſt they, touched with ſome remorſe of Conſcience, might betray the ſame, or otherwiſe deal unfaithfully in their charge; but ſtill to imploy them againſt the Perſians,of whom they have no further Knowledge, but as of their Enemies in the Field. But Cicala Baſſa, well acquainted both with the difficulty and the danger of the Perſian War, (the ſcars whereof he yet bare about with him) made ſhew as if he had been unwilling to take upon him the charge thereof; and ſo begun to excuſe himſelf, until that at length, upon promiſe made unto him, for the furniſhing of him with a ſufficient Army, and all things elſe neceſſary for ſo great a War, with a large and moſt honourable Entertainment for himſelf, and all the Perſian Priſoners being alſo given unto him in reward; he therewith contented, accepted of the honourable charge,whereof in his ambitious mind he was indeed moſt deſirous. And ſo receiving the Generals Enſign, with the other Marks and Cognizances of his Honour, cauſing the Drums to be ſtrucken up, and the Trumpets to be joyfully ſounded, he cheerfully prepared himſelf for that his ſo great an Expedition; expecting but the coming of his Son, who, at the requeſt of the Venetians, was gon forth with a fleet of Gallies, to ſcour the Levant Seas of the Pyrats, who then exceedingly troubled the Traffick of the Venetian Merchants.

Haſſan Baſſa ſent for to come to Conſtantinople.

The Reaſons why the Tartar Cham is ſo ready to ſerve the great Turk in his Wars againſt the Chriſtians.

Amidſt which the Turks ſo great Deſigns, the Tartar Cham, bound for his pay to ſerve the Great Turk in his Wars againſt the Chriſtians; by his Ambaſſador excuſed himſelf unto the Great Sultan, for that he could not himſelf in Perſon come this year with his Forces into Hungary, by reaſon that he was otherwiſe neceſſarily buſied with the moſt urgent Affairs of his own Eſtate; yet promiſing withal, inſtead of himſelf, to ſend his Son with a good power of men. Now whereas many men marvel, why the Tartar Cham, being ſo great a Prince, and not much in danger unto the Turk (being ſeparated from him by the black or Euxine Sea) ſhould be ſtill ſo ready at the Turks call, to do him ſervice in his Wars; the Cauſes thereof are divers, and thoſe not far to ſeek. Firſt, Their near Affinity (as both deſcended from the ſame beginning) by often Marriages ſtill confirmed; then, their likeneſs of Manners and Condition, no ſmall Bonds of Love and Friendſhip; And thirdly, For that the Turkiſh Empire,for want of Heirs males of the Othoman Family, is aſſured, and as it were, entailed unto the Tartar Cham; but moſt of all, for the yearly penſion and great pay which he, being a bare Prince, receiveth from the Turks; his rude and needy People being alſo ever ready, in hope of the ſpoil, to follow him into theſe Wars. But this his excuſe for not coming himſelf this year into Hungary, being by the Great Sultan accepted of, Haſſan Baſſa, reſolved upon his Expedition for Hungary, made great preparation for the good ſucceſs of the War there, gave great hope thereof unto the Great Sultan, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed Lieutenant General of all the Great Sultans Forces againſt the Chriſtians; every man affording unto theſe good hopes a thouſand Wiſhes for his Health and Welfare; but eſpecially the Mahometan Prieſts aſſured him of their help, ſo that he would not fail to do the uttermoſt of his Indeavour againſt the Chriſtians their Enemies. For why, the Turks do account him the beſt and moſt zealous man, which can do the Chriſtians moſt harm. And ſo with theſe ſo great Acclamations of Joy and Honour, Haſſan, the Great Baſſa,ſet forward with his Army from Conſtantinople toward Hungary.

Maximilian the Arch-duke ſent Ambaſſador from the Emperour unto the Pope, to crave his Aid againſt the Turk.

The Chriſtian Emperour, not ignorant of all theſe the Turks great Preparations and haughty Deſigns, ſought by all means how to reſiſt them, ſparing nothing that might any way ſerve or ſtand him in ſtead to that purpoſe. Experience had aſſured him of the Popes readineſs in contributing to this Action, what in his power was; having before received ſo many Teſtimonies of his good Will. Which cauſed him now to diſpatch alſo his Brother Maximilian the Arch-duke, a good and devout Prince, unto him, with expreſs charge in the Emperours Name to yield all Submiſſion unto his Holineſs, to move him to relieve the woful Eſtate of his diſtreſſed Affairs. Maximilian, ſetting forward about this buſineſs, arrived at Venice, where he was by that State right honourably entertained. From Venice he travelling towards Rome, and with a great retinue approaching the City, was there met by a great number of Noblemen, with their Followers, ſent from the Pope, and ſo by them with great Honour was brought into the Vaticane Palace, to the intent that ſo he might the oftener and with more eaſe have acceſs unto the Pope, who then lay there ſick of the Gout. The next day, he being brought into the Popes Preſence, and after uſual Reverence done, having audience given him, in the Preſence of all the Cardinals he began to deliver unto him the Cauſes of his coming; which (as he ſaid) were two; Firſt, to put his Holineſs in remembrance of the manifeſt peril and danger which hung over the heads of the Chriſtians in general, from the Turk, but eſpecially over them of Italy, being ſo near unto the Turkiſh Empire, and a great gap laid open for the Turks thereinto to enter, by the way of Caniſia, the Key of Stiria. And then in the Emperours behalf to requeſt him to ſtretch forth his helping hand againſt this his mortal Enemy, who was now drawing all his Power together into one head, to deſtroy him; having certain underſtanding of the great Preparation by him made throughout all his Dominions, to thruſt him out of his, if in theſe Extremities he were not relieved by ſuch Princes as could not in the end themſelves avoid the laſt Violences of theſe harms, whereof he felt the firſt Aſſaults. Which his Holineſs conſidering, in the zeal of his Devotion, and by the increaſing of the danger, he was in hope to find of it the like Aſſiſtance in this his ſecond need, that he had before received in his former Affairs; the precious balm of his devout Charity being of greater Vertue than to ſerve but for one time, but being of ſufficient Power to ſerve for all Ages, and all times of Neceſſity. And that therefore he beſought his Holineſs to apply the ſame upon the preſent Wound, ſeeing that without his help he was more like to periſh than to live.

The Pope's Anſwer unto the Emperour's Demands.

Whereunto the Pope anſwered, That his former Actions already paſſed, ſpake enough for him in this Action to manifeſt his devout meaning; ſo that it was needleſs for him to uſe farther Words to expreſs the ſame: that the great Supplies both of Men and Money which he had ſent forth for the good of the Chriſtian Commonweal, were the ſure Teſtimonies of his carefulneſs for the ſame, And albeit that theſe evil Haps had ſo far prevailed in Hungary, yet that he for his part nevertheleſs had ſtill done what he might for the remedying of thoſe ſo great Evils. And that now by the Advice of his honourable Counſellors there preſent, he had appointed an hundred and fifty thouſand Crowns to be paid toward the maintenance of the Chriſtian Army in Hungary this Year; in hope to do more than that afterward for the Emperour in his Wars againſt the Turks; whom God had (as he ſaid) ſuffered to prevail upon the Chriſtians, not for any Goodneſs that was in them, but for the chaſtiſing of the Wickedneſs of the Chriſtians themſelves.

Which ſum of an hundred and fifty thouſand Crowns was afterward, according to a Decree made by the Pope and Cardinals, levied and paid of the Tenths of the Clergy throughout all Italy. And ſo Maximilian the Arch-duke, moſt magnificently entertained and feaſted by the Pope, and by him rewarded with four thouſand Crowns, having well diſpached the Buſineſs he came for, returned again unto the Emperour his Brother.

But as the Chriſtian Emperour was thus careful about his Proviſions for the withſtanding of the Turks, they were not any whit behind him in augmenting of their Forces for the invading of him. And now the Tartars in great number being about to come unto their Aid into Hungary, being denied Paſſage by the Polonians, had turned head towards Valachia, with a purpoſe by force and ſtrong-hand to get that of theſe weak People which the Power of the ſtronger had embarred them of. And ſo, preſuming upon their number, they entered into the ſame Province, which they all over rifled and ſpoiled at their Pleaſure. Where, ſuch of the Country-people as could eſcape their Fury, fled into the Towns, leaving their Goods behind them unto their mercileſs Rage, not with any thing to be ſatisfied. Rodolph, the Vayvod himſelf, as a man with Fury diſmayed, fled to Cronſtat to George Baſta; where, he conſidering the danger he was now in, and that he was ſtill to expect the like ſo often as the Tartars were for the Service of the Turk to come into Hungary; before Baſta took a new Oath of Allegiance unto the Emperour, ſolemnly proteſting to dye and live in his Service; Neceſſity now inforcing him to acknowledge his Duty, and to ſeek for the Remedy of his Harms, which he had before oftentimes moſt proudly rejected. Upon which his ſo humble Submiſſion, Baſta received him and his Country into his Protection.

Rodolph the Vayvod ſubmitteth himſelf and his Country to the Emperour's Protection.

In the mean time, two Traitors were brought to Claudinople, who, having by wonderful Craft ſurpriſed a ſtrong Caſtle belonging unto a certain great Lady, a Widow, near unto a Burrough called Caraſebe, and rifled and ſacked the ſame, traiterouſly afterward ſold it unto the Turks, to the great hurt of the Emperour's Subjects near unto the place, and the no leſs advantage of the Turks. Whereof the Haiducks having gotten underſtanding, and cunning in ſuch matters, upon the ſudden ſurpriſed the Turks by the way, as they were coming to have taken Poſſeſſion of the Place; who ſeeing themſelves too weak to withſtand their Enemies, and out of hope to ſave themſelves by flight, were there, as men diſmayed and appointed to the Slaughter, moſt of them by the Haiducks cut in pieces, and the reſt taken Priſoners. The two Traitors being, according to their Deſerts, for their ſhameful Treachery, moſt cruelly put to Death, to the terror of others.

The Turks ſurpriſed by the Haiducks.

The Haiducks, having no Houſes but the Fields, nor other Trade but their Arms, ſpoiled of the one by the Turks, and armed with the other by Neceſſity, are always in readineſs for Service. In hope of Profit, it is to them a Pleaſure to paſs over the Mountains of Ice, to travel through the Storms of Thunder and Lightning, to ſwim over the deep Rivers, and to thruſt themſelves into a thouſand Dangers; which, as it is no commendable kind of Life, ſo is the practiſe of it unjuſt. For as in this, ſo in other their Actions, they ſpare neither Friend nor Foe, all that comes in their way being ſubject, and as it were appointed to their Fury; but eſpecially when they want their Pay, which affordeth unto them a thouſand Excuſes for the robbing and ſpoiling of all men, without reſpect. With which manner of fury they were even at this time enraged for want of their Pay, in ſuch ſort, as that if their right-hands ſpoiled the Turks, their left-hands robbed the Chriſtians; as upon one and the ſelf-ſame day they took from the Turks of Agria a number of Beaſts and Cattel, and rifled divers Villages of the Chriſtians. And not content with theſe Outrages, meeting with an hundred, or ſix ſcore Waggons, laden with great ſtore of Victuals, going toward Alba-Julia, conducted by the Zeclers, ſet upon them, ſlew them that drave them, and carried away the Waggons with them. But theſe Wrongs, by Chriſtians done unto Chriſtians, even the mortal Enemies of the Chriſtians, the Turks themſelves revenged. For the Turks of Temeſwar having been abroad toward Lippa, and found good ſtore of Booty, meeting with theſe Sharkers, were by them charged, not ſo much for that they were their Enemies, or for the Zeal of Chriſtianity, or for the deſire of Honour, as for to have had from them their Prey and Booty. But the Turks, being in number twice as many as they, and withal well acquainted with ſuch Buſineſs, were not ſo eaſily ſpoiled; but knowing their own ſtrength, with their Number oppreſſed their Enemies, moſt of whom they ſlew, and took the reſt Priſoners. God being as juſt in his Puniſhments, as he is in Works powerful, puniſhing the Wicked by the Weapons of others as wicked, or rather worſe than they.

The Haiducks, what manner of men they be, and their outrageous Inſolency.

The Turks in the mean time, whilſt things thus paſſed, began again to fall to their old Practice, for the ſolliciting of a Peace; but ſuch Fantaſies were too ſtale and common for them any more to deceive the Chriſtians with: howbeit that they yet gave ſome ear thereunto, to diſcover in their Policy the Commodities and Inconveniences of the Peace by them in ſhew offered, with a thouſand Proteſtations in their Words, but far differing from their Thoughts and Deeds; who, during the time of the Parle, laboured in what they might to benefit themſelves, and to hurt us. For even in that ſame very time they fortified their Towns and Caſtles with Men and Victuals, but eſpecially the City of Buda, whereinto, by a Convoy of three thouſand Turks come from Belgrade, they put an exceeding quantity of all ſorts of neceſſary Proviſion, ſufficient to ſerve the ſame for a whole Year. Beſides that, it was certainly known, by certain Turks taken Priſoners and brought to Poſconium, that all this Parle and Treaty of Peace was but of purpoſe feigned to put the Chriſtians in ſecurity; for that the Baſſa of Buda, who was the chief Publiſher of the ſame, had no ſuch Commiſſion from the Great Sultan for the concluding of any Peace in the Abſence of the Viſier Baſſa, unto whom the Grand Seignior had given Charge, not to make any Peace with the Emperour, but upon Condition, That he ſhould firſt deliver unto him the City of Strigonium: which if he would not yield, that then he ſhould beſiege it, and by force take it from him; and after the winning thereof, to refuſe all other Treaty of Peace, it being the only Cauſe for which the Turks deſired Peace. Of all which their double dealing and crafty Deſigns the Emperour underſtanding, and wholly reſolved for War, preſently ſent County Sultze with Commiſſion to Vienna, and appointed George Baſta Lieutenant-General of his Army in Hungary; adviſing them carefully to look to their Charge, and not too much to truſt unto the gloſing and flattering Speeches of the Turks.

The Caſtle of Reovin ſurpriſed by the Haiducks.

The Haiducks in the mean time always in Arms, as having no other Inheritance whereon to live, ceaſed not ſtill to look abroad to find that was never loſt. Now it fortuned them, in roaming abroad toward Belgrade, to light upon Reovin, a ſtrong and fair Caſtle of the Turks, wherein eight hundred of the Turks Souldiers, and other of their Country people, had their Abode, together with the greateſt part of their Subſtance. In the Strength of which Caſtle the Turks truſting, and there lying in Security, without farther care of their Safety, were upon the ſudden, before they were aware, by theſe adventurous men ſurpriſed; who for haſte thruſting one another forward, at length carried the Place, ſlew the greateſt part of the Turks, and taking the reſt Priſoners, with a great and rich Booty returned to Lippa. The like Exploit they of the Garriſon of Caniſia attempted upon the Caſtle and Burrough of Lambac, which they took and ſpoiled, and afterwards ſet it on fire; the Flame whereof ſerved for a Signal unto the Troops of County Serin, which, paſſing that way, and lighting upon the Turks over-loaded with the Spoils they had there taken, cut them in pieces, and ſo recovered from them the Booty.

Petrinia in danger to have been betrayed unto the Turks.

About this time, certain of the Garriſon Souldiers of Petrinia, having ſecretly conſpired with the Turks (by whom they were before corrupted) to deliver unto them that ſtrong Caſtle: and being about to have betrayed the ſame, by a Mine which they were in making under a Stable near unto a Store-houſe wherein the Powder for the Store of the Caſtle lay, with a purpoſe by firing of the ſame to have given the Turks entrance by the Ruines thereof, who lay cloſe hidden in a Wood near unto the Place; it fortuned this their wicked Purpoſe to be perceived by certain Offenders then kept Priſoners in the ſame Stable near unto the Mine: who having diſcovered the Traitors whole Purpoſe, and in fear to be burned or blown up by the fury of the Mine ſo near unto them, diſcovered the ſame unto the Goaler, who made the Governour therewith acquainted; by whoſe Commandment they were forthwith apprehended; and being convicted of their ſo foul a Treaſon, were with exemplary Puniſhment executed.

Now as the Turks had oftentimes made ſhew as if they had been deſirous of Peace, ſo ceaſed they not yet with great earneſtneſs to ſollicite the ſame; ſo that the Emperour, although he knew it to be a thing rather to be wiſhed than hoped for, yet, leſt he ſhould ſeem careleſs of the common Quiet of his Subjects and People, and to refuſe ſo great a good ſo oftentimes offered him; now once again appointed certain Perſonages of great Place and Authority to attend the Propoſitions of Peace to be on the Turks behalf propounded. Of which Commiſſioners, Cæſar Gallen, Sheriff of Strigonium, an Italian, and a Man of great experience in matters of State, was one. Whom the Governour of Strigonium had of purpoſe ſent to Peſth, to conſider of ſome good means for the concluding of the Peace, whereof he himſelf in Perſon had laid the firſt Foundation; and underſtood the Turks Demands and Pretenſions, not much differing from thoſe which they had many times before demanded. Whereof the firſt was, That the Emperour ſhould for the time to come, well and truly pay unto the Great Sultan and his Succeſſors, all ſuch Tribute as he was wont to pay unto the Turkiſh Emperours, his Predeceſſors, during the time of his Leagues with them, and that without any Demand to be thereof made. The ſecond, That the Emperour ſhould always have his Ambaſſador Lieger at the Great Sultan's Court, with honourable Preſents, there to ſollicite the Continuation of his Love and Friendſhip toward the Emperour his Maſter. The third, That the Emperour ſhould deliver unto the Turks all the Towns and Caſtles which he had taken from them either by Force or by Surpriſe, during the time of this War, together with the Countries of Tranſilvania and Valachia. Upon which Demands granted, they promiſed to ſend a Meſſenger unto the Great Sultan, in their Names to entreat him to ſurrender Caniſia unto the Emperour, but not Agria, which (as they ſaid) they might in no wiſe deliver, except they were thereunto by force of Arms conſtrained.

The inſolent and unreaſonable Demands of the Turks for the concluding of a Peace with the Chriſtians.

The Anſwer of the Emperour's Deputies unto the Turks proud Demands.

Unto which their ſo proud and unreaſonable Demands, the Commiſſioners for the Emperour anſwered, That the Emperour long before this time had made Peace with Sultan Selym, the Second of that Name, and with Sultan Amurath the Third, this Sultan Achmat's Predeceſſors. An aſſured Peace, ſworn unto and confirmed by all the juſt and ſolemn Oaths that could have been by any man deſired; and for the more aſſurance thereof, into writing conceived, and with the moſt authentick Seals of their Majeſties confirmed; whereby both Parties were moſt ſeverely and ſtraitly forbidden, one of them to attempt any thing againſt the other, or to incroach the one of them upon the other, during the time of ſuch their League: And if ſo be that contrary to the Tenor thereof, either part ſhould undertake to ſurpriſe any Place belonging to the other, and ſo become Maſters thereof, that upon the leaſt Requeſt of the Party ſo wronged, the Places ſurpriſed ſhould be again forthwith reſtored, as uſurped upon, contrary to the Publick Faith; and the Uſurpers to be ſeverely for the ſame puniſhed. And that yet the Turks notwithſtanding, thruſting by heaps, beyond the Bars of this ſo ſtrong and holy a League, had violated and broken the ſame, by ſurpriſing a number of Places both in the high and lower Countries of Hungary, never giving ear unto any Speech or Requeſt that could be made unto them for the Reſtitution thereof. And yet not ſo contented, had alſo taken a number of Places from the Emperour in Sclavonia, between the Rivers of Culpe and Vnna; which Places he had oftentimes by as juſt Right re-demanded, as they were by unjuſt Forces uſurped, before the beginning of theſe Wars. Demands eſteemed juſt and reaſonable even by the Turks themſelves, and yet for all that altogether rejected by the Great Sultans themſelves; of which their ſo great Injuſtice the Emperour had oftentimes moſt juſtly complained, and ſo did even at this day, at the feeling of ſuch his Hurts and Harms. And that the Emperour having by ſo many perfidious dealings made proof of the Untruſtineſs of the Grand Seignior's Predeceſſors, what Aſſurance then can he conceive of his Fidelity? or upon what foundation of Faith can he build the ſure building of Peace, ſo much deſired of him? And yet if he might hope ſo much of the Faith of another Man, as he is aſſured of his own juſt meaning, differing much from that of the Grand Seignior's, which he knew to be never anſwerable unto his, that he for his part could be well content to embrace the Peace; provided always, That he might have Caniſia and Agria delivered unto him; or, That if they would needs ſtill hold thoſe Places, that he might likewiſe in Peace hold the Places that he had before won in that War, the Reaſons being on both ſides alike. And that as concerning Tranſilvania, he could not deliver that without betraying of his own Right, and the Welfare of that Province; having obtained the ſame as well by Agreements and Covenants between him and the Son of the laſt Duke, John, as by the free and voluntary Releaſment which Sigiſmund Bathor, the laſt and immediate Prince thereof, had not long before made unto him: for the defence of which his Rights, he had ſpent many Men, and great Sums of Money, and all for the keeping of that Province by force of Arms, which by ſo good Right belonged unto him. And that for Valachia, he could be content to yield ſome part of his Right unto that Province, ſo that the Turks ſhould ceaſe from thenceforth to demand of him any yearly Tribute, or that he ſhould, as of ordinary Duty, ſend his Ambaſſadors with yearly Preſents to the Grand Seignior, not being able, without need, to conſent unto ſuch a needleſs Servitude; ſeeing that every Prince ought to be at liberty, at his own choice to ſend his Ambaſſadors, and not at the appointment of another Man.

The Turks ſcorn and deride the reaſonable Anſwer of the Emperour's Commiſſioners.

Which Anſwer of the Emperour's Commiſſioners, ſerved to no other purpoſe, but for the Turks to laugh and ſport at, how juſt and reaſonable ſoever they were: ſtill preſſing them to yield unto their unreaſonable Demands; or elſe threatning to advertiſe the Great Sultan thereof, who by force would take that from them, to their farther loſs, which they refuſed to grant him by fair means, to their own good. And ſo the Treaty was for that time broken off, without any thing concluded: which cauſed the Governour of Strigonium to retire himſelf back again unto his Charge; yet for all that, leaving Cæſar Gallen behind him, to entertain it in ſuch ſmall hope as was thereof yet left; who afterwards ſeeing it almoſt deſperate, making a great Feaſt unto certain of the chief of the Turks of Buda, and having in that Merriment drawn from them a Promiſe to live as Friends with them of the Garriſon of Peſth, and of other Places which lay near unto that Town, he retired himſelf afterwards unto Strigonium alſo.

The ſhameful Cowardiſe of Jagenreuter, Governour of Peſth.

Shortly after whoſe Departure, Jagenreuter, Governour of Peſth, notwithſtanding the late Promiſes of the Turks of Buda, for their living by him in Peace and Amity; and the aſſured Promiſe of Cæſar Gallen, at his laſt Departure, for the ſpeedy furniſhing of the Town both with Men and all things elſe neceſſary for the Defence thereof, which he ought with great Aſſurance to have expected, yet, diſmayed with the brute of the coming of Haſſan Baſſa, the Turks General, with his great Army, and that by the ſtrait Commandment of the great Sultan, he was to begin his Conqueſts in Hungary with the winning of Peſth; as a Man afraid of his own ſhadow, thought good betime to provide for himſelf; and upon that Reſolution, having yet ſeen no Enemy at all to force him, truſſing up his Baggage, the fifth of September forſook the Town, with five Companies of Footmen, and ſix Troops of Horſe-men, following him; a ſufficient number to have for a time defended the Town, and endured a Siege, eſpecially in ſo ſtrong a Place, and ſo well provided both of Victuals and Munition. All which, this moſt cowardly Governour (but unworthy that Name) left together with his Honour, for a Prey unto his Enemies; having yet before his Departure out of the Town, cauſed the principal Buildings thereof to be undermined, and Barrels of Gun-powder to be laid under them, wherewith they were ſhortly after all overthrown, and moſt part of the Town burnt. But being gone not paſt half a League from the Place, he met with four hundred Haiducks, all well armed, whom the Governour of Strigonium had ſent for the relief of Peſth, with a number of Boats loaded with Corn, Munition, and other Neceſſaries of all ſorts, for the better aſſurance of the Place, and the performing of the Promiſe before to that end made by the Governour of Strigonium: which Hungarian Haiducks meeting with theſe diſmayed Cowards upon the way, thought it not beſt to go any farther, as thinking themſelves not able to do that with their ſo ſmall a number, which the other durſt not to undertake with their far greater; and ſo joyning themſelves with the other fearful Fugitives, they with them returned to Strigonium, leaving their Veſſels and Munitions unto their Enemies, who immediately after ſeiſed upon them.

Peſth moſt ſhamefully abandoned by the Chriſtians.

Peſth taken by the Turks.

The next day after, the Mines having taken their effect, the Turks wondering to ſee ſo great and terrible a Fire in Peſth, which ſtill more and more increaſed, there being none that went about to quench it, adventured to come over the River from Buda, and to draw near unto the Town, now all on a light fire. Which they finding abandoned and forſaken by the Chriſtians, they with great diligence quenched, repaired the Ruines of the Town, and ſo without any loſs became Maſters of the ſame.

Jagenreuter for his Cowardiſe worthily committed to Priſon.

Jagenreuter, the cowardly late Governour, with his fearful Troops, in the mean time coming to Strigonium, and by the Governour there examined of the Cauſes of his Flight, and of the ſo ſhameful leaving of his Charge, and being able to alledge no other Cauſe or Reaſon, but the great brute and report of the Viſier Baſſa's coming with his Army to beſiege the Town, was therefore committed to Priſon, and there reſerved to be afterward juſtly puniſhed for his Diſloyalty and Cowardiſe.

The Baſſa of Buda excuſeth himſelf for the taking of Peſth.

The Baſſa of Buda, by the Cowardiſe of the Governour, thus poſſeſſed of Peſth, by Letters excuſed himſelf unto the Governour of Strigonium, for the taking thereof, the Treaty of Peace being not as yet quite broken off; alledging for himſelf (as the truth was) That he had taken it as a Place by the Chriſtians upon a vain fear forſaken, and deſperately ſet on fire, without any ſuch cauſe given them ſo to do by the Turks, or on his behalf. And farther, offered unto the Governour, if he ſo pleaſed, to deal with him for the exchange of Priſoners on both ſides taken, offering to exchange one of them for another. And as for the concluding of the Peace ſo oftentimes treated of, and even yet in hand, that he for his part was wonderful deſirous that it might be fully concluded and ended, before the Arrival of Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa with his Army in Hungary; for that he being once come, there would then be no time amidſt the noiſe of ſo many Weapons, and ſo many men of War, to talk of Peace.

Haſſan Baſſa cometh into Hungary.

Haſſan, the Viſier Baſſa, was now for all that already entered into Hungary, drawing after him a world of men, and was come towards Sexart; for the viewing of which Army, the Governour of Pallantwar going forth with an hundred Horſemen, by evil hap chanced, before he was aware, upon the ſudden to meet with five hundred Turks, by the Baſſa himſelf likewiſe ſent forth to diſcover the Country, and the Paſſages thereof: by whom he charged, and with the multitude of his Enemies oppreſſed, was himſelf taken Priſoner, moſt of his men being in that Conflict ſlain, ſome few of them that were left alive by ſpeedy flight hardly eſcaping. Which evil hap on the Chriſtians ſide, was forthwith recompenced with the better Succeſs of the County Serin, who falling upon three hundred Turks near unto Sigeth, being in number ſcarce half ſo many as they, yet ſet upon them with ſuch Courage, that giving them no leiſure to conſider of the Weakneſs of his Forces, they were by them overthrown and cut in pieces, before they were well aware of him.

Strigonium beſieged by the Turks.

The Chriſtians ſally forth upon the Turks.

But, together with the time of the Year, to come unto the main point of theſe preſent Wars in Hungary; The Turks, finding themſelves out of hope by any Capitulations or Treaties of Peace to regain the ſtrong Town of Strigonium out of the hands of the Chriſtians, were now reſolved to imploy the uttermoſt of their Forces for the obtaining of the ſame; with a thouſand Proteſtations, That if by force of Arms and ſtrong-hand they ſhould gain the Place, they would never more have Peace with the Chriſtians: At which their vain Threats and Speeches, the Chriſtians, before reſolutely ſet down for the defending of the Place by them ſo much deſired, and well acquainted with their great Brags, could not but with ſcorn ſmile, as men nothing therewith diſmayed, nor ſo to be removed: nevertheleſs, the Baſſa, conſtant in his Reſolution for the regaining Strigonium, with all his Forces came the eighteenth day of September, and laid Siege unto it. Now unto this Siege, the Turks, in hope of Spoil and Booty, came flocking from all Places, as it had been to ſome great Mart; and the Fields in all the Country thereabout were covered and ſwarmed with Arms, Men, Horſes, and Tents. They incamped near unto Charles's Hill, taking up with their Tents half a League of the Country round about; and at their firſt coming moſt bravely advanced their Enſigns with their Half Moons, the Arms of their ſtill encreaſing Empire. Whom the Beſieged in this Action imitated, bravely advancing their Enſigns upon their Walls, as did the Turks in the Fields; and farther braving and provoking them with a thouſand thundring Shot, diſcharged out of the Town amongſt them. All the Walls round about the Town gliſtered with Arms and flames of Fire, out of which the deadly Bullets flew, carrying with them Death and Terror into the midſt of theſe new-come Enemies, for their Welcome. The Turks nevertheleſs came ſtill reſolutely on, and as men prodigal of their Lives even in the midſt of ſo many dangers, began to make their Approaches. Upon whom, the Chriſtians with great Courage ſallied forth, to diſturb them in their Works; and ſo for the ſpace of certain hours having had with them an hot and ſharp Skirmiſh, without any great hurt received, retired again into the Town, leaving unto their Enemies, by that they had done, a good Teſtimony of their Valour and Reſolution. The Turks for all that lodged themſelves, made their Trenches, and ſo incamped before the Mount of Saint Thomas, where, by the placing of their Cannon, they well declared their meaning for the battering of that Fort.

The careful Endeavours of Baſta, the Emperor's Lieutenant General, for the Preſervation of Strigonium.

Againſt which their Deſigns, George Baſta, Lieutenant-General of the Imperial Army, right reſolutely oppoſed himſelf, having near unto Strigonium caſt up a ſtrong Fort, well furniſhed with Men and great Artillery; from which, he greatly annoyed the Turks with his great Ordnance, and with the fury thereof inforced them to remove farther off with their Approaches; his Army upon the River of Danubius, in the mean time lying betwixt the Iſle of Strigonium, and the old Town of the Raſcians, to keep the Enemy from entring either into the one place or the other.

The comfortable Speech of County Sultze, Governour of Strigonium, to his Garriſon.

County Sultze, Governour of the Place, alſo having taken a general Muſter of his Men, and with comfortable and cheerful Speeches encouraged his Souldiers, putting them in mind of their Duty, and of the honourableneſs of the Action now in hand, as undertaken for the Maintenance of the Chriſtian Religion, for the Service of the Emperour, and the Safeguard of their own Lives; perſuading them withal, not to put any Truſt or Confidence in the Turks Faith, or fair Promiſes, conſidering, that their Weapons were even yet wet with the Blood of their Chriſtian Brethren, moſt perfidiouſly by them of late maſſacred and ſlain at the taking of Alba-Regalis: encouraging them alſo with the Goodneſs of their Cauſe, with the carefulneſs of their Friends abroad for their Relief, with the regard of their own Valour, and Cowardiſe of their barbarous Enemies, whoſe only Hope and Truſt was in their Multitude: and withal comforting them, That holding out but ſome few Months, the very Elements themſelves, and the time of the Year, would as it were fight for them, and afford them Aid, their Enemies being not able with their great Army, in the Extremity of Winter Weather, without their irreparable loſſes to hold the Field. And that as for himſelf, his Honour, together with his Life, were ſo bound unto his Grave and Sepulchre, at the foot of the Walls of that Place, as that they could not be from the ſame ſeparated; having propoſed the Glory of the Preſervation of that Place, or elſe of an honourable Death, as the end of all his Actions, and conſummation of all his Hopes. And that therefore he moſt earneſtly beſought them to follow his ſo honourable a purpoſe, in aſſiſting him in that Action, ſo much concerning their Lives and Honour, and wholly depending on their Courage and Reſolution. And that for Teſtimony of his earneſt deſire to the furthering of this Service, he was willing to depart with a good part of his Subſtance and Treaſure, to be beſtowed upon them, amidſt theſe the Trophies of his Honour, having commanded them to have certain Months Pay payed before-hand unto them, which was accordingly done.

The Chriſtians falling into an Ambuſh of the Turks, loſe one of their chief Commanders.

Now the Turks having a purpoſe eaſily to begin the Conqueſt of Strigonium by the taking of the ſtrong Fort of St. Thomas, came the 24*th* day of September to aſſault and batter the ſame; upon whom 500 Horſe-men and 2000 Foot-men ſallying out of the Fort, cauſed them, after a ſharp and bloody Conflict, and not without ſome loſs on both ſides, to retire back again, and to forſake the Mount whereupon they were incamped. But in purſuing of them too far, they fell into a great Ambuſh, before by the Turks for that purpoſe laid to intrap them; where, betwixt them was fought a moſt ſharp and bloody Fight; the Turks preſuming upon their Multitude, and the Chriſtians ſtanding upon their Valour and Honour. Until that in fine, Valour by Number being oppreſſed, ſeven hundred of the Turks being ſlain, the Chriſtians were inforced to retire, having loſt about an hundred of their Men, and amongſt them the valiant County Caſimir of Holenloth; for whoſe Body there was a notable Fight betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, not much unlike unto that which the Poet Homer deſcribeth, to have been fought betwixt the Trojans and the Greeks, for the Body of Patroclus. Howbeit that at length the Chriſtians, being over-charged with the coming on of the whole Army of the Turks, were glad (as I ſaid) to retire, and ſo to leave the dead Body of the County Caſimir in the power of their mercileſs Enemies; who as Dogs which revenge themſelves upon the Stones which are caſt at them, being not able to bite the hands of them that threw them, ſo did they upon the Body of this gentle Knight, by cutting off his Noſe and Ears, and afterwards his Head. But within ſome few days after, this Body ſo disfigured was again delivered unto the Chriſtians for a Turk of good account, who was about that time by them taken Priſoner. At which time the Turks ſeemed to be very deſirous of Peace, moſt earneſtly requeſting County Frederick of Holenloth (the ſlain County's Brother) not to be an hinderer thereof. Howbeit that this was but one of their old Practices, depending ſtill upon unreaſonable Conditions, whereof the yielding up of Strigonium was one of the chiefeſt, as the Place by them moſt deſired.

More than beaſtly Cruelty exerciſed by the Turks upon the dead Body of County Holenloth.

But if this Siege of the Turks availed them not againſt the Place beſieged, yet was it profitable for them againſt another Place, by them not attempted, which was the ſtrong Town of Hatwan, more ſubject unto fear, without any danger, than was Strigonium unto the Bullets and Battery of the Turks, with juſt cauſe of diſtruſt. For the Souldiers which lay there in Garriſon, terrified with the Siege of Strigonium, and doubting leſt the Turks leaving that Siege, ſhould come and beſiege them, truſſing up their Bag and Baggage, the Nineteenth of September abandoned the Place, and carrying away with them the beſt of the Great Ordnance, left the reſt altogether with the Place, and great ſtore of Proviſion, unto the Enemy, not in hope of any ſuch matter.

Hatwan moſt ſhamefully forſaken by the Chriſtians.

The bruit of the Siege of Strigonium had called thither all the Forces of both Parties in Hungary, and the Countries thereabouts, on the one ſide for the winning thereof, and on the other for the defence of the ſame. Amongſt others, the County of Tambier, Governour of Lippa, was about to have gone thither with certain of his Troops to have aided his General for the Preſervation of the Place. But in the mean time, Bethlin Habor, chief of the Rebels in Tranſilvania, aſſiſted by Beckheres Baſſa, with four thouſand Turks entred into the Province to have made himſelf Maſter thereof, under the Protection of the Turk. Whereof the County having got knowledge, reſolved to go and meet him, and to encounter him at the very firſt Entrance of him into the Province. This old Rebel, knowing that George Baſta was, by the Emperour's Appointment, gone out of the Country with the beſt Troops of his Horſe-men, the greateſt Strength of the Province, came on in great Security, thinking of nothing but of Victory, and of performing his intended Exploit, without fear of any to let him: ſo that caſting no farther Peril, he was ſurpriſed by the County before he was aware, and put to flight. Neither was the Fight long betwixt men accuſtomed to vanquiſh, reſolutely ſet down, and well armed, againſt men diſmayed, half naked, and ſurpriſed. In which Conflict, above a thouſand of them being ſlain, and a thouſand of Horſes of Service taken, the reſt fled; amongſt whom, Bethlin himſelf, with his Baſſa flying, were glad by ſwimming to ſave themſelves amidſt a thouſand Chances and Dangers of their Lives.

Bethlin Habor the Rebel ſurpriſed and overthrown by the County Tambier.

The Baſſa of Temeſwar advertiſed of this Overthrow by one of them that was fled from the ſame, preſently he ſent forth his Lieutenant with a good number of men, to relieve the vanquiſhed Turks: who, by the way underſtanding of the general Overthrow of them whom he was ſent forth to relieve, as alſo of the Strength of his Enemies, and that he was come too late to the relief of his Friends, retired as faſt as he could with his men back again homeward toward Temeſwar. But being in their Retreat diſcovered, and hotly purſued by theſe men, imbrued with the Blood of their Enemies, and yet breathing with Victory, they were by them overtaken even almoſt at the Gates of their City, and there (as men before overcome with fear, and overwhelmed with deſpair) cut in pieces, without any Fight or Reſiſtance by them made, beſeeming men of their ſort; the Lieutenant himſelf being there ſlain alſo.

Succours ſent to the Rebel by the Baſſa of Temeſwar, defeated by the County Tambier, and the Baſſa's Lieutenant ſlain.

After which Exploits done, the County turning towards Jula, chanced to light upon certain Companies of Turks loaded with Booty, which they had got in roaming abroad into the Country thereabout, whom he purſued even unto the Gates of the Town, which they found ſhut againſt them; for that they within the Town, ſeeing the Chriſtians even at the heels of their Companions, had ſhut their Gates, neither durſt now open the ſame, for fear leſt the Chriſtians ſhould, together with them, enter the Town, and ſo become Maſters thereof. Who, ſo ſhut out by their own Friends, were there all by the Chriſtians ſlain, even in the ſight of their Companions, not daring to let them in, nor able to relieve them. After which Maſſacre done, the Chriſtians not yet ſo contented, burnt the Suburbs of the Town, and ſo, loaded with the Spoils of their Enemies, departed. The County, after ſo many honourable Exploits in a ſmall time by him performed, returned to Lippa, where he arrived the five and twentieth of September, and from thence afterward advertiſing Baſta, the Emperour's Lieutenant General, of theſe his Exploits done, cauſed ten of the Turks Enſigns, all ſtained with their own Blood, to be preſented unto him, as the ſure Tokens of his good Service done.

The Viſier Baſſa ſeeketh to gain Strigonium by offering of the Chriſtians Peace.

But to return again unto the Siege of Strigonium, the greateſt Exploit by the Turks intended for this Year, from which we have from the occurrent of the ſame time a little ſtrayed. The Viſier Baſſa, perceiving by the valiant and reſolute Defence of our men, how little he prevailed in this Siege, and that it was like enough to tend at length to his Diſhonour, thought it good once again to prove, if he might by Compoſition gain that which he was now almoſt out of hope by Force to obtain. And to that purpoſe cauſed a motion to be made unto the beſieged, for a Treaty to be had concerning a Peace, and a Day appointed for the ſame. Unto which motion for Peace the Imperials (although they had no hope at all of any Peace to be concluded) eaſily yielded, leſt they might be thought obſtinately to have rejected the ſame. Whereupon, Commiſſioners were on both ſides appointed to meet together, to conferr of the matter. And ſo for the Emperour, Althem himſelf, with Ferdinand Collonitz, and Frederick of Hohenlo, County of Rhene, were appointed near unto the Raſcian Town to meet with the Turks Commiſſimiſſioners, to hear what they would ſay. Howbeit, the Commiſſioners on both ſides being met at the Place aforeſaid, all their Conference was but vain and to no purpoſe; the Turks ſtill urging the yielding up of Strigonium, and the Imperials as earneſtly refuſing the ſame. So that the Treaty for Peace being broken off, and the Commiſſioners departing, the Siege was more cruelly by the Turks continued than before.

Deputies appointed to entreat with the Turks of Peace.

The Treaty for Peace broken off.

The Coſſacks depart out of the Turks Camp unto the Chriſtians.

Now there were in the Turks Army lying at the Siege, certain Companies of Coſſacks, Men for their Pay indifferent to ſerve any Prince, of what Religion ſoever. Which ſerviceable Men, in Number ſeven hundred, had agreed together the 28*th* of September, by night to forſake the Turks Camp, and to come unto the Chriſtians. Of which their Purpoſe and Deſign, the Viſier Baſſa having, by ſome untruſty amongſt them, got knowledge, cauſed the Foot-men of theſe Companies to be apprehended and ſlain; the Horſe-men in the mean time making themſelves way over the Bellies of ſuch as would have ſtayed them, fled, and eſcaped, ſome of them to Komara, and ſome to Dotis. Threeſcore of theſe Coſſacks being by the Turks hardly purſued, adventured to ſwim over Danubius, and ſo all naked came to Collonitz, by whom they were courteouſly entertained and apparelled. And within three days after, two hundred Horſe-men more of the ſame Coſſacks came unto Collonitz alſo; who, marching in good order unto the head of the Chriſtian Camp, were there ſworn unto the Emperour's Service; and in token of their Loyalty, there diſcharged their Piſtols thrice. Which Horſe-men Collonitz divided among the reſt of his Troops, as having before time had good experience of the Courage and good Service of divers ſuch others of their Fellows.

The Janizaries in Mutiny againſt the Viſier Baſſa. The Reaſon of the Mutiny of the Janizaries againſt the Baſſa their General.

By theſe fugitive Souldiers it was underſtood, that the Janizaries, in great number up in Mutiny againſt the Viſier Baſſa, would have inforced him to have raiſed the Siege, and ſo to have departed. The cauſe of their ſo great Diſcontentment (as they pretended) was the manifeſt and aſſured danger of their Lives, with little or no hope at all for the gaining of the Place; they themſelves being ſtill expoſed to the Dangers both of the Siege and of the Field, having the beſieged on head of them armed with an aſſured Reſolution, and the Chriſtian Army at their Backs, of known Valour and Experience: beſides that, the Place it ſelf was (as they ſaid) impregnable, being at all times to be relieved, by reaſon that it commanded over the Danuby, which might always relieve it both with Men and Victuals: and that therefore, after that they had ſatisfied their Honour, by giving of an Aſſault or two unto the Fort of St. Thomas, they had reſolved to ariſe, and to be gone. And much about this time, viz. the Nine and twentieth of September, in the night time, was a moſt dreadful fiery Impreſſion ſeen in faſhion much like a Rain-bow, of a fiery red colour; which beginning over Cockera, and riſing higher over Strigonium, at length vaniſhed away over the Fort of St. Thomas. The ſight whereof much troubled the Beholders thereof, as well the Chriſtians as the Turks; ſuch ſtrange Meteors and Apparitions being oftentimes the Preſages of the ruine of them to whom they appear.

In the mean time, whilſt the Turks thus lay before Strigonium, at the Siege of Saint Thomas's Fort, the Lord Baſta, Lieutenant-General of the Emperour's Forces, to give the Turks to underſtand, How that he was always in readineſs to attend upon their doings, and to take hold of all ſuch Opportunities as ſhould by them be offered, and ſo to keep them in ſuſpence, came with ſeven thouſand brave Horſe-men, and ſhewed himſelf in the plain Field in order of Battel; ſo, as it were, braving the Turks even unto their own Trenches; where, having diſcharged their Piſtols thrice, they returned as victorious, always keeping themſelves in order, as men ready either to give or to accept of Battel. Howbeit, the Turks for the preſent keeping themſelves cloſe within their Trenches, moved not; but afterwards, being deſirous to counter-brave this the Chriſtians Preſumption, the third day of October they came forth of their Trenches, and gave a ſecond Aſſault unto Saint Thomas Fort, imploying the uttermoſt of their Power in this Action, whereupon they well knew a great part both of their Honour and of their Safety to depend. But in aſſailing the Fort, they met with them as reſolutely ſet down for the Defence thereof, and for the Maintenance of their Honour, as were they for the winning of the ſame. So the Aſſault was begun with great Fury and Adventure, as was the other before; howbeit, that it endured not long, for that the Turks fought rather for the diſcharge of their Duty, and to have ſome juſt cauſe to raiſe their Siege, than for any hope they had to prevail, or to carry the Place. For it befell them according as they had expected, ſo that after that the Fight had endured little more than half an hour, amidſt the Tempeſts of Arms and Fury, in fine, the Turks, out of hope to prevail, gave over the Siege, and retired, having in that Conflict loſt five hundred of their beſt Souldiers.

The Fort of St. Thomas the ſecond time aſſaulted by the Turks.

The ſhameful Treaſon of the Haiducks of Strigonium.

The Governour of Strigonium had in the City under his charge ſix thouſand Haiducks, who, attainted with Treaſon and Fear, all forſook the Place excepting five hundred, preferring their Lives, unworthy the ſaving, before their Duty, and the Life and Honour of their General. With which ſhameful Treaſon, and the Reſolution of the Great Baſſa for forcing of the Place, the Germans there left, ſeeing their Captains diſmayed, gathered themſelves together, promiſing, by their own Valour to ſupply what wanted by reaſon of the Treachery of the others; offering themſelves to be ſworn again unto the Service of the Emperour, and rather to dye all in the Place, than to yield it up unto the Turks, or to leave it unto their Enemies: where, by their general Conſent, a ſolemn Decree was made, That whoſoever he were which ſhould ſpeak or once make mention of yielding the Town, ſhould forthwith therefore be hanged upon a Gibbet. The Turks, although they had now in two Aſſaults been twice repulſed, came yet forth once again the fifth day of October, and aſſaulted Saint Thomas Fort the third time; wherein, they failed not to do what they might, but were by the Chriſtians therein ſo received, that deſpairing of the winning thereof, they with great Loſs and Shame retired. Which Diſgrace cauſed them to return to their old Practices, for the taking of Places by Policy. For having in many Places undermined the Walls, and filled them with Gun-powder, they were in hope by that means to have opened themſelves a way unto their Conqueſt. Of which their hope, for all that, they were deceived; for the Chriſtians, having perceived their meaning, did, by countermining, not only fruſtrate their Endeavour, but carried away the Powder alſo, which they had before layed in the Mines, reſerving it to their own farther neceſſity and uſe. Wherefore the Turks ſeeing themſelves of their hope deceived, returned again unto their old Practices, to come to a Parle for Peace. Of which their Motion the Chriſtians nothing diſliked. But the Commiſſioners on both ſides being met together for that purpoſe, in a little Iſland beneath Strigonium, when as the Turks had offered unto the Chriſtians the City of Agria for Strigonium; or if ſo be that that exchange pleaſed them not, but that they would needs keep the City of Strigonium ſtill, that then in conſideration of the Peace, they ſhould deliver unto them the ſtrong Towns of Fileck, Saint Setſchin, Pallank, and Novigrade; both of which demands were very unreaſonable; the Commiſſioners thereupon again departed without concluding of any thing.

The Treaty broken off, and nothing concluded.

Now the Army of the Turks was in it ſelf diverſly divided with quite contrary deſires, the Viſier Baſſa, with ſome other of the Commanders, ſtood ſtifly for the taking of the place, as men willing either to return from thence with Victory, or elſe there to end their days; but the Janizaries to the contrary, were as earneſt to be gon, and to raiſe the ſiege, deeming it impoſſible as then to prevail againſt a place ſo ſtrong, ſo well manned, and ſo eaſily to be ſtill relieved. With which their Reſolution ſo contrary unto his, the Baſſa enraged, and yet propoſing before his departure to prove the uttermoſt of his Forces againſt the Fort, now already by him thrice before aſſaulted, the tenth of October gave thereunto ſix great aſſaults, but with like ſucceſs as before, finding there ſtill the ſame Defendants, no whit diſcouraged, but armed with their accuſtomed Reſolution. For the Defendants, incouraged by their moſt valiant Commanders, with ſuch fury repulſed the Turks, that they were glad to give over aſſault upon aſſault, and with great loſs of their men to retire. Their often retreats alſo being unto them no leſs hurtful than were their aſſaults, the [illegible]dly Bullets being out of the Fort diſcharged upon them like ſhowers of hail. So that the Baſſa now, after ſo many aſſaults, out of all hope to gain the Fort, and ſtill preſſed by the Janizaries for the raiſing of the ſiege, immediately after roſe with his Army, quitted his Trenches, and retired with his Camp near unto a Caſtle about a League diſtant from Strigonium. From whence the Turks, the better to cover their diſhonour, and to hinder the Chriſtians from purſuing of them in their retreat, the next day after came into the Field with a good part of their Army, and ſhewed themſelves before the Raſcian Town, and there skirmiſhed with the Chriſtian Haiducks. Which manner of skirmiſhing for all that, was more in ſhew than in effect, neither Party therein receiving any great loſs or hurt. In the mean time, the beſieged which were in Strigonium, having gotten certain knowledge, that the Enemy had already removed his Cannon and other Proviſion for the ſiege back again into Buda, in token of Joy diſcharged all their great Ordnance out of the City and the Fort; by the report thereof giving Knowledge unto the other Towns and Caſtles of the Chriſtians, of their deliverance. Of which ſo common a Joy every one of them were Partakers, as delivered from ſome part of the fear which the ſiege of ſo great a City as was Strigonium, had brought upon them. And ſo the ſiege of Strigonium, begun the eighteenth day of September, was by the Turks given over the thirteenth of October; the Janizaries inſolently threatning to have ſlain the great Baſſa their General, if he had there any longer ſtayed.

The Janizaries unwilling to continue the ſiege of Strigonium.

The Fort of Saint Thomas ſix times in one day aſſaulted by the Turks.

The ſiege of Strigonium given over by the Turks.

Baſta, the Emperour's Lieutenant, in the mean time awaiting all Opportunities, failed not to take hold of ſo fit an Occaſion, but with his Horſemen following after the Turks Army, ſlew of them a great number, and took ſome other of them Priſoners. And afterward returning unto their Camp, found it void of men, but full of Bullets, with certain pieces of great Ordnance, which the Turks had left there, having not time to remove the ſame to Buda. Upon this riſing of the Turks Army, the Commanders thereof were diverſly affected unto the ſervice that was further to be done, as they had before been in the time of the ſiege. Such of them as lay in Hungary, or near thereunto, deſiring ſtill to hold the field, in hope of the ſpoil of the Country; but they which dwelt farther off, eſpecially ſuch as were come out of Aſia, deſiring as much to be diſcharged, their Horſes being almoſt all dead with faintneſs and travel, and they themſelves weary of the ſervice.

Shortly after the riſing of the Turks Army from Strigonium, two Fugitives of the Turks, moſt bravely mounted, came unto Baſta, the Emperours Lieutenant, and preſenting him with a Ring of great value, and a moſt fair Turkiſh Enſign, told him, moſt part of the Turks Army to lye then incamped in the Country near unto Peſth; and the great Cham, a young Prince of about twenty years old, to be come thither with a great Power of Tartars, to aid the Baſſa; and that the Turks, by their coming incouraged, were determined yet to make a great excurſion for the ſpoiling of the Country. All which ſhortly after was certainly known to be true, the plain Country of the upper Hungary about Palanka, Setſchin, and Villecamp, being by them, but eſpecially by theſe new come Tartars, all ſpoiled and burnt. For remedy whereof, Sigefride Collonitz oppoſing himſelf with his Hungarian Horſemen, againſt theſe inſolent Forragers, ſo daunted them, that ceaſing further to ſpoil the Country, they departed, carrying away with them ſuch Priſoners and ſpoil as they had there taken, and leaving behind them a ſtrong Garriſon of three thouſand good Souldiers, for the repairing and keeping of Peſth, but a little before cowardly (as we ſaid) forſaken by the Chriſtians. But within ſome few days after, viz. the four and twentieth of October, the Viſier Baſſa, by his Letters written unto County Althem, Governour of Strigonium, made a mention for a Treaty of Peace to be had for the comfort of the diſtreſſed People of that ſpoiled Country, ſolemnly proteſting, moſt religiouſly on his part to keep the ſame, if it ſhould be once concluded; and yet in the mean time with Fire and Sword ſpoiling all the Country by the way as he departed out of Hungary.

The upper Hungary by the Turks and Tartars ſpoiled and burnt.

The Viſier Baſſa by his Letters maketh a motion for the Treaty of Peace.

But now, as this poor Country began to feel Relief by the departure of the great Baſſa with his Army out thereof, ſo the Country of Tranſilvania joyning thereunto, was at the ſame time as much with Rebellion and Diſcord diſtreſſed. Bethlin Habor the Rebel, with his Baſſa overthrown and driven out of Tranſilvania (as is aforeſaid) the Lord Belgioſa, Baſta's Lieutenant in this Province, thinking all things now at quiet, was making himſelf ready with his Troops, to have gone to aid the Lord Baſta, his General, then incamped in the Plains of Strigonium, to hinder the Turks Deſigns for the taking of this Town. But as he was about ſo to have done, behold, even at the ſame time when he leaſt feared, a ſecond Rebel there ſtarted up, far worſe than the firſt, namely, the Lord Iſtivan, (otherwiſe ſirnamed Botſcay, or more truly * Potſcay) who, accompanied with great Troops of Men of War under the Protection of the Turk, and ſtiling himſelf by the Name of the Prince of Tranſilvania, entering that Province, miſerably burnt and ſpoiled the ſame. For the repreſſing of which ſo ſudden a Rebellion, Belgioſa with a thouſand Horſe, under the leading of Roſcovitz and Peter Laſti, marched toward Veradin; and with his Troop coming to Ador, a Country Village about a League diſtant from Veradin, and meaning thither to aſſemble together his Army, he ſent to Petſie Governour of Veradin, to put him in mind of his Duty, and to crave his aid. Which valiant Captain, always preſt and ready to do his Prince Service, failed not now of his Duty, calling together ſix Companies of Footmen out of Romoſa, and joyning unto them four Companies out of Veradin, together with the Sileſian Horſe-men of Schuet-Kenhut's Regiment (whom by reaſon of his Sickneſs he was not able to lead) and with them the Haiducks of County Tambier, came unto the Place of the Rendezvous, bringing with him all warlike Proviſion in token of his Fidelity. With this Army Belgioſa marched againſt the Rebels, who, as reſolute men, attended his coming; for why, Botſcay knowing the Haiducks of County Tambier ſecretly to favour him and his Rebellion more than they did Belgioſa and his juſt Quarrels, ſtood in no fear of them, but aſſured himſelf of them as of his Friends; who failed not of his hope and expectation, but even at the firſt joyning of the Battel turned themſelves to his part; with the going over of whom, the number of the Rebels was much increaſed, and Belgioſa's Power both in Force and Courage much weakned, ſeeing themſelves at once expoſed both unto the force of their Enemies, and to the Treachery of their Fellows, who now with conjoyned Forces moſt fiercely aſſailed them; who finding themſelves now on all ſides invironed with ſo great a multitude, and not able, with ſo ſmall a number as was left, to withſtand the violence of their Enemies, and the Treaſon of their Companions; after they had to the uttermoſt of their Power performed all the parts of valiant and courageous men, were there almoſt all cut in pieces, and there buried in the Field of their Loyalty, honoured with their own Blood, and altogether embrued with the Blood of their Enemies. In this unlucky and diſloyal Fight were divers good and faithful Captains ſlain; Petſie, Governour of Veradin, and Pallas Lippa, both great Captains, and grievouſly wounded, were there taken Priſoners. The Lieutenant of Petſie alſo, having retired himſelf with ſome of his Troops into a place of good Strength, there ſo valiantly defended themſelves, that Botſcay, out of hope to overcome them by force, to get them into his Power, promiſed them upon his Oath, if they would yield themſelves, to ſuffer them in ſafety to depart. But what Truſt or Credit is to be given to him who hath before broken his Faith and Loyalty to his Prince, this Rebel well ſhewed, by the Death of theſe valiant and warlike men, who, after that they had upon his Faith and Promiſe yielded themſelves, were by his appointment cruelly ſlain and cut in pieces. The Sileſian Horſemen were there alſo all overthrown, and buried in the midſt of their Enemies; and as for Belgioſa himſelf, he ſtrangely eſcaped out of the Battel, and ſaved himſelf by flying to Veradin. The victorious Rebel after the Battel, inſtead of praiſing God, ſacrificed to the Devil, by ſending a great part of the Enſigns by him gained unto the Viſier Baſſa, with a thouſand Praiſes of his Glory, for ſupporting of him in his Rebellion; and vaunting much of this his Victory, gave him withal to underſtand, That he had ſlain above ſix thouſand of his Enemies.

Belgioſa goeth againſt the Rebels of Tranſilvania.

Belgioſa in a great Battel overthrown by Botſcay the Rebel.

Botſcay dealeth unfaithfully with ſuch as upon his faith given them yielded unto him.

This Victory gotten, together with the humble Submiſſion of Botſcay, obtained of the Great Sultan, That from thenceforth he ſhould be ſtiled by the Name of the Prince of Tranſilvania, with a farther Charge from him, to do the uttermoſt of his endeavour for the ſubduing unto his Obeiſance the reſt of Tranſilvania; promiſing, plentifully to ſupply his Wants both with Men and Money, and out of hand to ſend him three thouſand Tartars to his Aid. And indeed, this was a very great and bloody Battel, fought from the firſt break of the Day, until eleven a clock at Noon; but, whether ſo many were ſlain there or no, it cannot certainly be told, for that divers of them who were ſaid to be ſlain, and ſo accounted among the dead, had hid themſelves in the Wood there by, and ſome others of them by ſome other means eſcaped Death alſo. Petſie himſelf had with him when he was taken, two Monks, whom the Souldiers in deſpight cut into many pieces, and carried him faſt bound in Chains to Derritza, to be there cured of the dangerous Wounds by him in the Battel received.

Botſcay in his Rebellion countenanced by the Great Sultan, and called Prince of Tranſilvania.

But as for Pallas Lippa, who, being wounded, was taken Priſoner with Petſie, he was afterwards by Botſcay appointed his Lieutenant General, and ſo by his Commandment was publickly proclaimed; as he which was deſirous to take upon him the defence of the reformed Religion, and of ſuch as were willing to profeſs the ſame; who forthwith made a general Proclamation, That all they which were deſirous of the liberty of Conſcience, and to live free from the Superſtitions of the Roman Church, ſhould repair unto him, as unto their Head and Chieftain, ready to entertain them, and to allow to every one of them five Dollars a Month for their Pay. Upon which Proclamation made, a great Multitude of Men upon the ſudden reſorted unto him; ſo that in a ſhort time he had following of him ten thouſand Haiducks, beſide a number of other of the common raſcal People; yea, almoſt all the Gentlemen of the Country repairing unto him, bound themſelves by Oath to him, and one of them to another, That as they would not take up Arms to fight againſt the Chriſtian Emperour, ſo they would not ſubmit themſelves unto the Turk, but only ſtand upon the defence of their Religion, and the liberty of Conſcience.

Pallas Lippa, Botſcay's Lieutenant, pretendeth the defence of Religion for the ſtrengthening of Botſcay in his Rebellion.

The Rebel Botſcay thus wonderfully increaſed in Strength and Number, beſet almoſt all the Paſſages of the Country, and with the Sword of Rebellion in his hand, and his Souldiers following him, commanded the Cities ſtill as he went, to yield unto him: but, hearing that Belgioſa was after the late Overthrow gone from Veradin to Caſſovia, where his Wife lay; and being come thither, to have been by the Citizens rejected, who would not only not receive him into their City, but turned his Wife alſo out of the City unto him; he with a great Army coming thither, took the City without reſiſtance, the Citizens for the moſt part enclining unto him: of which City being poſſeſſed, he forthwith changed both the Religion and Civil Government thereof, ſlew part of ſuch as were of the Romiſh Religion, and thruſt the reſt out of the City, with all the Church-men; took the Biſhop and the Emperour's Treaſurer Priſoners, and ſo changed the whole Government of the Town up-ſide down. The only man he ſtood in fear of, was Belgioſa, for whom he laid wait by all means he could to have taken him, with a purpoſe to have uſed him moſt hardly if he had fallen into his hands.

The great City of Caſſovia yielded to the Rebel Botſcay.

Theſe things thus done in Tranſilvania and in Hungary, the Viſier Baſſa being about to return to Conſtantinople, to grace that little which he had done this Year in Hungary, and to avoid the ſuſpicion of his evil Succeſs in that Province, borrowed of Botſcay the reſt of the Enſigns, together with Petſie and other the noble Chriſtian Captives which he had taken in the late Battel with Belgioſa; which Enſigns and Priſoners he confidently afterwards cauſed to be preſented unto the Great Sultan Achmat, as taken by himſelf; and in recompence thereof, left three thouſand Turks and Tartars with the Rebel, to aid him in his Wars both in Tranſilvania and Hungary.

Belgioſa in the Caſtle of Zipze beſieged by the Rebels.

Baſta, the Emperour's Lieutenant in Hungary, and Governour of Tranſilvania, hearing of the Stirs and Troubles of late raiſed in both thoſe Countries by Botſcay and his rebellious Followers, and having as he thought beſt ſet all things in order again at Strigonium, marched thence with his Army, being fourteen thouſand ſtrong, towards Caſſovia, with a purpoſe to have ſuppreſſed the Rebellion in the upper Hungary, before it ſhould have ſpread farther, to the endangering of the whole State of both thoſe Countries, as afterward it did. Howbeit, before he could come thither, the Rebels, after the taking of Caſſovia, being wonderfully increaſed both in Strength and Number, had taken in moſt of the ſtrong Towns and Places in the upper Hungary, the People almoſt generally now favouring their Quarrel, carrying with it the Face of Religion, with the ſuppreſſing of the German Government, both things unto them much pleaſing. And now hearing that Belgioſa (a man of them moſt hated, being, as we ſaid, ſhut out of Caſſovia) was fled into the Caſtle of Zipze, they by Letters required of Turſon, Captain of the Caſtle, to have him delivered unto them, to be according to his Deſerts puniſhed; promiſing withal, to do Turſon himſelf no harm, ſo that he would take part with them in the defence of their Religion, and of the liberty of Conſcience; which if he ſhould refuſe to do, yet that they would give him free liberty to depart whither he would, out of his Caſtle, and in ſafety to conduct him thither, ſo that he would forthwith reſolve what courſe he would take: but if he ſhould of this his Offer miſlike alſo, then they threatned to ſpoil his Country, to kill his People, to raze his Caſtle, and to make himſelf an Example unto others. Wherewith, for all that, he nothing moved, refuſed to deliver unto them Belgioſa, the Man whom they ſo much deſired, or yet to accept of any of their other Offers. Whereupon the Rebels with great labour repairing the broken way betwixt Caſſovia and the Caſtle, and bringing certain Pieces of great Ordnance from Caſſovia, in great number came and ſtraitly beſieged the Caſtle. With whoſe Attempts the valiant Captain nothing moved, with his thundring Shot out of the Caſtle ſo welcomed them, that having thereby received great harm, they thought it not their beſt courſe to ſtay any longer there with ſo great a Power, but with the greateſt part thereof to go to Presburg, to reform that City and ſome other Places by the way; perſuading themſelves, That the Captain of this Caſtle ſo ſhut up, and on every ſide beſet with his Enemies, would at length of himſelf yield up the Caſtle.

The Prieſts and Jeſuits for fear of the Haiducks fly from Presburg to Vienna.

But while the Rebels thus lay at the Siege of this Caſtle, certain Companies of them went to have taken the Spoil of a Religious Houſe there by; but coming thither, and breaking open the Doors, and ſearching every ſecret Corner of the Houſe, they found therein nothing worth the reckoning of, but ſo returned almoſt empty handed; for the Prieſts had for fear of them before carried away with them all the beſt of their Goods and Subſtance into the beſieged Caſtle. And ſo likewiſe the riſe Report of their coming to Preſburg flying abroad, almoſt all the Prieſts and Jeſuits in Presburg and the Country thereabout, leaving their Churches and Colledges, fled with their Subſtance to Vienna, ſcarcely accounting themſelves ſafe there, until that the Garriſon of that ſtrong City was increaſed with a new ſupply of ſix hundred good Souldiers.

And now the Rebels, their Number ſtill more and more increaſing, and having ſet all the upper part of Hungary on a Broil, were beſieging divers other Caſtles and ſtrong Places, yet holden for the Emperour; when as Baſta, in the mean time coming from the Siege of Strigonium, came, and with his Army incamped about three miles from Filek. Of whoſe coming the Rebels hearing, and thereupon retiring, he forthwith followed after them toward Budnoc, which Caſtle they alſo left, and ſo near unto Ramoſambat, the place of their Rendezvous, gathered together in great number, with an intent to have given Baſta Battel: whereof Baſta having knowledge, to ſpare the effuſion of more Chriſtian-blood, by an Herald ſent unto them in friendly and courteous manner, adviſed them to change their Minds, and to return again unto their former Allegiance: but finding them obſtinately ſet down in their former purpoſe, for the maintaining of their Rebellion, and the giving of him Battel, he marching forward with his Army, with great Force charged certain Companies of the Rebels, appointed to keep the Paſſage of Filek; who at the firſt right valiantly received the Charge, and defended the Paſſage, until that at length with number oppreſſed, and above four hundred of them ſlain, they were put to the worſe, and inforced to fly; in which flight, amongſt others there taken Priſoners, Blaſe Nemet their Captain was taken alſo, whom Baſta cauſed to be hanged up by the heels, with the Enſigns ſet up about him which he had taken from the Rebels in the late Fight; and after he had for a time ſo hung, made him to be taken down, and his Head to be ſtruck off from his Shoulders. In this Conflict fifty of Baſta's Men were ſlain alſo, and many more hurt, and amongſt them Collonitz, hurt in his Shoulder and his Foot with a ſmall Shot.

The Rebels by Baſta overthrown.

Baſta, after this Victory, marching on with his Army, by the way met with certain other Companies of the rebellious Haiducks, as he was going to St. Peters, with whom he had many an hot Skirmiſh for the ſpace of three days together, being by them ſtill put to the worſe; inſomuch, that having burnt many of his Carriages, Tents, and other Luggage, he was of nothing more careful, than how well to get out of their hands. Nevertheleſs, ſeeing no other remedy, he with great Courage not only endured the often and fierce Aſſaults of his Enemies, ſtill more and more increaſing upon him, but the fourth day, after ſo many unfortunate Skirmiſhes, (being the eight and twentieth of November) putting his Men in order of Battel, right valiantly again charged the Rebels; who, by reaſon of the darkneſs of the Weather, it being then a very thick Miſt, being not able to perceive where the Enemies Attempts were moſt to be feared, or what way to turn their own Forces; as men diſmayed, were eaſily by them overthrown and put to flight; whom ſo flying, Baſta with his Souldiers fiercely purſuing, made of them a great Slaughter; ſo that in the ſpace of leſs than three hours, fifteen hundred of them were in this thick and dark Miſt ſlain, with ſome few alſo of Baſta's Souldiers, and amongſt them Frederick Earl of Solmes, and the County of Erbach wounded. Upon the report of which Overthrow, the Rebels which yet lay at the Siege of the Caſtle of Zipze, in hope there at length to have taken Belgioſa, forthwith roſe and retired themſelves to Leuſta. But Baſta, after this Victory, removing to St. Andrews, and having recovered that Town from the Rebels, and thereinto put a new Garriſon, and ſo by this means ſomewhat daunted and repreſſed the Inſolency of the Haiducks in thoſe Quarters, and being not well able longer to keep the Field with his Army in ſo unſeaſonable a time of the Year, and ſo to maintain War as it were both againſt his Enemies, and the extremities of Nature, ſought by Letters to have re-reclaimed them of Caſſovia again unto their Obedience; offering unto them Pardon for all their Offences paſt, ſo that they would now at laſt acknowledge their fault, and receive into their Town a Garriſon of the Emperours. To which purpoſe he writ alſo to them of Eperia; in hope that if he might ſo have gained thoſe two ſtrong Towns, to have in them wintered in ſafety with his Army. But they of Caſſovia, having in the City a ſtrong Garriſon of ſix thouſand good Souldiers, and out of fear to be by Baſta beſieged at that time of the Year, and withal in hope (if need were) to be by Botſcay relieved, (who was then reported to be forty thouſand ſtrong) utterly refuſed to hearken unto Baſta's Motion for their Reconciliation, or at all to ſubmit themſelves again unto the Emperour. Which cauſed him with his Army to come nearer unto the City, yet ſtill ſeeking rather by fair means to have perſuaded the Citizens to have returned unto their Loyalty, than by force to have conſtrained them. But finding them obſtinately ſet down, and by no Perſuaſions to be removed, but with their great Ordnance, in what they might, to trouble his Camp, he ſent before, the County Hohenloh and Rotuitz, with part of his Army to Eperia, to command them, upon their Allegiance to receive the Emperour's Souldiers into the City, and to relieve them with ſuch things as they were able; and within a few days after, viz. the fifth of December, followed himſelf with the reſt of his Army. But being come thither, after much Talk had with the chief Men of the City, it was at length, contrary to all Mens Expectation, agreed, That Baſta, aſſuring them of the free Exerciſe of their Religion, of the good Behaviour of the Souldiers towards them, and to defend them from the Injury and Incurſions of their Enemies, they ſhould open their Gates unto the Imperials, and relieve them with what they were able, and ſo as before to continue in their Allegiance and Obedience unto the Emperour. Of all which things when Baſta had, upon his Faith given, aſſured them, they opened their Gates, and received in the Souldiers; unto whom (now almoſt dead and ſtarved with Hunger) nothing could have happened more comfortable or welcome. Leuſta, Barbeld, and Zebena, famous Towns in thoſe Places, following the Example of Eperia, ſubmitted themſelves in like manner, and helped Baſta's Souldiers with Relief. Thither, with great danger, came unto Baſta, Sigefrid Collonitz, a Man of great Power and Authority in that part of Hungary, to conferr with him about the appeaſing of theſe Troubles: who afterward by his Letters unto the States and the reſt of the Nobility of Hungary, yea, and to Botſcay himſelf, in vain perſuaded them to lay down Arms, and to return again unto their wonted Obedience unto the Emperour.

There had been hitherto in the Imperial Camp great ſcarcity of Victuals and of other Neceſſaries, ſo that for want thereof, and for the extremity of the Cold, and other Miſeries, it was greatly feared, leſt the Camp ſhould have been broken up, to the irreparable loſs of his Imperial Majeſty, as the ſtate of things then ſtood in Hungary. For the remedy whereof, thirty Waggons loaded with Money and Cloth were ſent from Vienna, under the Conduct of County Solmes, Collonel Starenberg, the Treaſurer, and others; unto whom Tanhuſar joyned fifteen hundred Huſſars (Hungarian Horſe-men ſo called) to ſtrengthen the Convoy againſt the danger which was feared from the Haiducks which lay upon the way, and who indeed were now roaming about and ſeeking after Booty in every corner of the Country. Which Huſſars, being come with the reſt of the Convoy into a thick Wood, about two Miles from Filek, like Enemies ſet upon the Waggoners, whom they ſhould have conducted, and there made a great ſlaughter of ſuch as were about to reſiſt them; inſomuch, that the County Solmes had much ado to ſave himſelf, and to get out of their hands, leaving the Waggons as a Prey unto the treacherous Huſſars; who now become Maſters of them, drave them away to Botſcay the Rebel's Camp; Tanhuſar their Captain in vain purſuing after them, (with ſuch of his Huſſars as, more faithful than the reſt, had no hand in that ſo foul a Treachery) and recovering nothing but ten Waggons loaded with Cloth, which the Traitors had left behind them, having taken the Horſes out of them, and put them into the other Waggons wherein the Money was, (which was reported to be 130000 Florens) with the more ſpeed to bring them to Botſcoy. Who, having upon the ſudden received ſo great a Sum of Money, by him not looked for, forthwith divided the ſame amongſt his Souldiers, the more to encourage them in their Rebellion againſt the Emperour.

The Huſſars traiterouſly ſpoil them whom they ſhould have conducted.

The News of this ſo great a loſs being quickly ſpread thorow all the Emperour's Camp, at the firſt filled the Souldiers with Grief and Diſdain againſt the treacherous Huſſars, but afterwards, with Wrath and Indignation againſt their own Commanders, as deeming it to have been nothing but a falſe Report by them deviſed, and given out to deceive them, and to feed them with a vain hope. Which Perſuaſion, though not true, had now ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed their Minds, as that they were about all to have riſen up in Mutiny, and to have forſaken the Service, to the utter Peril of their Captains, and endangering of the whole Province, now upon point to have been for ever loſt. All which Miſchiefs Baſta foreſeeing, did firſt what he might with Words and fair Promiſes to have appeaſed them; which not ſerving, he, with certain thouſands of Duckats and Waggons of Cloth, taken up at Leuſta and other Towns there by, wiſely contented them, in ſome good meaſure furniſhing the old Souldiers, before half naked, both with Money and Apparel, the Souldiers greateſt Contentments.

Baſta* wiſely appeaſeth his Souldiers, ready to forſake his Service.

Which Mutiny ſo again appeaſed, the Imperials ſhortly after ſurpriſing a Caſtle not far from Eperia, found therein a great many of Hungarian Gentlemen, whom they carried away with them Priſoners, to learn of them what they might concerning the Rebels Proceedings and farther Deſigns. In the mean time, the Haiducks on the other ſide beſieged the Caſtle of Sedara, which they, after many Aſſaults took, and put to the Sword all the Garriſon Souldiers therein; and departing thence, firſt rifled, and after burnt the Town of Filek. They alſo took the Caſtles of Bolvar, Setſchin, Dregell, Burac, Holloc, Blavenſtein, and the ſtrong Caſtle of Cabragetia, whither they of Hatwan, not long before, had carried their great Ordnance, at ſuch time as they for fear of the Turks, then lying at the Siege of Strigonium, had abandoned the Place; all Strong-Holds in the upper Hungary. After the taking of which Places, Ferentius Radius, and Charles Iſtuan, (Botſcay's near Kinſman) and the chief Captains and Ring-leaders of the Rebels, exacted Contribution-Money of the Mineral Towns (as they call them) belonging unto the Emperour in the upper Hungary; but eſpecially of the City of Newſol, inforcing them alſo to ſwear to be in all things obedient to Botſcay, and to take his part againſt the Imperials, threatning with Fire and Sword to infeſt ſuch Places as ſhould refuſe to do the like. And to the intent that they ſhould not by Collonitz be encouraged or defended, who to that end was coming thither, the Rebels in great number went to meet him, and having belayed all the Paſſages, enforced him to retire himſelf unto his Caſtle of Libentſia; where, he lying in great danger with his Wife, then in Child-bed, accompanied but with fifty German Souldiers only, for that he durſt not to truſt his Hungarian Coſſacks, now in heart altogether inclining unto the Rebels, was glad in poſt to ſend to Vienna, moſt humbly requeſting to have a new ſupply of German Souldiers ſent unto him for his relief, and the furtherance of the Emperours Service, in that ſo dangerous a time and wavering eſtate of that Country, being the beſt part of that the Emperour then held in Hungary.

Collonitz prayeth Aid from Vienna.

Now while Baſta thus lay with his Army at Eperia, and in the Country thereabout, he daily received great harm from the Haiducks, who were ſtill hovering about him, as Hawks over their Prey; his Souldiers by neceſſity inforced to fetch in Wood, and other things neceſſary into the Camp, being ſtill moſt miſerably ſlain and cut in pieces; yea, they were ſo bold, as oftentimes to trouble him in his Camp, and to aſſail his Souldiers where they lay quartered in their Trenches; as amongſt other times, they did in the latter end of December, to end the year withal; at which time, they by night breaking into the quarter where Charles Collonitz, with Copel and Pettenger, two Captains of Auſtria, with their Companies lay, they ſlew the ſaid Copel, with almoſt all his Souldiers, and burnt Pettinger in his Tent, Collonitz himſelf being at the ſame time in great danger, and hardly by them beſet alſo; until that incouraging his Men, by performing all the parts both of a good Captain and valiant Souldier, he by true Valour enforced them at length to retire back again into the Woods, from whence they came, having in this Conflict ſlain fourteen of them with his own hand.

Copel and Pettinger ſlain by the Haiducks.

About this time was a Spy taken in the Imperial Camp, one of Botſcay's chief men, diſcovered by one coming from Caſſovia to Eperia, which knew him; who, by Baſta's Commandment apprehended, and upon torture examined, and confeſſing what he had done, was for his good ſervice hanged, and afterward quartered, to the Terrour of others attempting the like.

The Turks this year were not much fortunate in their Wars, Haſſan, the Viſier Baſſa, and their General againſt the Chriſtians in Hungary, having in vain (as is before declared) beſieged Strigonium, and with all his Forces done nothing worth the remembrance; and Cicala Baſſa, their other General againſt the Perſians in the Eaſt, being with all his great Power by the Perſian King overthrown and put to flight, and the City of Babylon, now called Bagdat, taken; and was firſt at Prague, the two and twentieth of October, reported by the Secretary of the Vayvod of Valachia, ſent thither in Ambaſſage from his Maſter unto the Emperour, and afterward confirmed by an Ambaſſador ſent from the Perſian King himſelf unto the Emperour; who having audience, told his Majeſty how that the King his Maſter, was not ignorant of the great and difficult War by him now for many years maintained againſt the Turkiſh Sultan, with whom, although he for his part might have lived in Peace and Amity, yet, that moved with the Zeal which one Prince ought to have to the relief of another, he had taken up Arms againſt him, ſo to avert ſome part of that heavy War from his Majeſty, even upon himſelf; and that he had already obtained many great and notable Victories and Conqueſts againſt him; and recovered a great Territory, wrongfully before taken from the Perſian Kings, his Predeceſſors, by the Turkiſh Sultans; and that now he was of nothing more deſirous, than to joyn in a perpetual League and Amity with his Majeſty, that ſo, in a moſt ſtrong Confederation combined together, they might never afterward be diſſevered, or ever make Peace with the Sultan, without one anothers Knowledge and Conſent. And further, That for his part he was minded never to give over the War, ſo happily by him begun, until he had driven him even into his Imperial City of Conſtantinople, ſo that his Majeſty would on his part do the like, by continuing of his preſent Wars; it being not poſſible for the Turks to hold out againſt them both, and the only means to abate his greatneſs, and to aſſure them in their Eſtates; requeſting him withal, to ſend back with him ſome grave man, his Ambaſſadour, with ſufficient Authority and Inſtructions to conferr about theſe Matters with him; that ſo knowing and underſtanding one anothers Mind, the League and Confederation betwixt them might the more eaſily and commodiouſly be made and concluded.

The effect of the Ambaſſage of the Perſian King unto the Emperour.

Neither were the Turks buſied with theſe foreign Wars only, againſt theſe ſo great and mighty Princes, in Places ſo remote and far off, but unto theſe were joyned their own inteſtine and civil Wars and Troubles alſo; the Rebels being yet up in the leſſer Aſia, and the Baſſaes of Aleppo and Damaſco, two of the moſt famous Cities in Syria, and both of them men of great Place and Command, of late up in Arms one of them againſt the other; inſomuch, that they had brought the matter to be tryed by the Sword in the plain Field, where the Baſſa of Aleppo, in a great and bloody Battel overcome, and flying unto his own City, was by the Baſſa of Damaſco purſued thither, and ſo ſtraitly by him beſieged with an Army of thirty thouſand men, that in fine he was glad to reconcile himſelf unto him, and to make his Peace, by yielding unto whatſoever the other Baſſa his Enemy pleaſed to demand of him; as being thereunto driven by the Extremity of Famine, which then reigned in the City; as alſo for that he had loſt a great number of his Men, whom he had ſent ſecretly out of the City to ſeek for Victuals, being all ſlain by the Baſſa of Damaſco's Souldiers. With which ſo great matters, the Baſſaes of the Court (who had the managing of the State under the young Sultan) were much troubled, he himſelf (as was fitteſt for his years) in the mean time dilighting himſelf with the Pleaſures of the Court, and much rejoycing at the Birth of his firſt begotten Son, who was born about that time.

The Revolution of time had now thus brought this year to an end, the Troubles of Hungary and Tranſilvania yet ſtill more and more ſo increaſing, as if that thoſe moſt miſerable Countries had by the juſt and heavy Judgments of God been now appointed unto their laſt and utter Ruine and Deſtruction; the Cauſes of their ſo great Miſeries proceeding not ſo much from the Turks their Enemies, as from the natural Inhabitants themſelves; who, in Minds divided, both in Religion and Affection, ſome of them continuing in their Allegiance unto the Emperour, and otherſome following the Enſigns of the Rebel Botſcay, did both unto themſelves and to their Country more harme in a little time, than had the Turks in many years before. Of which ſo dangerous a Diſſention, and of the harms thereof inſuing, Belioioſa left by Baſta as his Lieutenant, was reported to have been the firſt and chief Authour; For whereas the year before the Biſhops and other Clergy-men, in an aſſembly of them at Poſſonium, had, without the Knowledge of the Nobility and States of Hungary, publiſhed a decree by them there made, for the burning or perpetual baniſhing of all ſuch as were of the reformed Religion in Hungary; and that the States of that Kingdom underſtanding thereof, and ſolemnly proteſting againſt the ſame, under the Seal of the Lord Palatine, had publickly affirmed with juſt Arms to defend themſelves, if they ſhould for their Religion be called into queſtion, or troubled; and had again repeated the ſame their Proteſtation at Galſet. Yet Belioioſa nevertheleſs in the mean time by cunning ſeiſing upon the reformed Churches at Caſſovia, would not ſuffer the Citizens of the reformed Religion there to have any Sermons in their own private Houſes, or ſo much as to read on the holy Bible. Neither any whit moved with the former Proteſtations of the Nobility and States, had taken unto himſelf all the Lands and Goods of them of their Religion in Caſſovia, not ſuffering them to bury the Bodies of their dead within the City, near unto the Monaſteries. And requeſting to have borrowed of Botſcay certain thouſands of Crowns, and thereof by him denied, cauſed his Souldiers to ranſack two of his Caſtles, and to ſpoil him of all the Wealth and Treaſure he had therein. For which Indignities and Injuries Botſcay enraged, cauſed open Proclamation to be made, That he would give unto every Haiduck that would ſerve him, four Crowns a Month pay, with all the booty that they could get. Whereupon ſix thouſand Haiducks, which then ſerved under Belioioſa, forthwith revolted unto Botſcay, their number increaſing daily. But after that unto this extraordinary pay, Pallas Lippa, his Lieutenant, had alſo joyned the Protection of the reformed Religion, it is wonderful to ſay, how the Haiducks by heaps reſorted unto him, and how the People in all parts of Hungary generally favoured him and his Quarrel, being in all places whereas he came, ready to joyn hands with him againſt the Imperials. The Turks and Tartars alſo, both with Men and Money furthering him in all his doings, whoſe help he refuſed not. Whereof proceeded all the aforeſaid Miſeries both in Hungary and Tranſilvania, with many other worſe than they, which, together with the beginning of this year, took their beginning and encreaſe alſo. Unto which ſo great Troubles, ſtill more and more encreaſing, Baſta, not able by force to give remedy, ſought by Lenity and fair Perſwaſions to have eaſed the ſame; by Letters oftentimes adviſing even Botſcay, the chief Rebel himſelf, to change his Mind, to lay down Arms, to diſband his Forces, and to perſwade with the reſt of his ſeditious followers, to ſubmit themſelves unto the Emperour, and to return again unto their wonted Obedience. Whereunto he at length anſwered, That if the Government of all Tranſilvania might be left unto himſelf alone; if a natural Hungarian born might be ſtill choſen Lieutenant General in Hungary, if none but ſuch as were Hungarians born ſhould have the government and command of all the Garriſons in Hungary; if the Wallon and French Souldiers might be ſhut out of Hungary, if the natural Hungarians born, might from thenceforth be regarded and provided of their pay, if it might be lawful for every man to have the free Exerciſe of his Religion; if the Authours of theſe Troubles might be delivered unto the Hungarians to be puniſhed, if the Emperour himſelf in Perſon ſhould come and be preſent at the Parliament at Preſburg, if the German Garriſon Souldiers ſhould ſtill keep themſelves within the Places whereunto they were appointed, without making of any Excurſions into the Towns or Villages near unto them, or hurting of the poor Country-men; he could then be content to come to ſuch a good Agreement for Peace. With which offer he ſent two of the Rebels, his Followers, unto Baſta, who not liking thereof, returned them back again, without concluding of any thing.

The chief Cauſes of Botſcay's Diſcontentment.

Botſcay's unreaſonable demands for to come to a Peace.

Gokara ſurpriſed by the Haiducks.

But while things were thus in talk, ſome of the Haiducks in the mean time, with a number of Tartars joyned unto them, in ſeeking after Booty, ſurpriſed Gokara, a Town over againſt Strigonium; where, having ſlain certain Germans which had the keeping of the Place, and rifled the Town, as they were about to ſet it on fire, by the coming over of the Governour of Strigonium with his Garriſon, they were inforced to forſake the place, and again to retire. This loſs received at Gokara, was again by our men requited by the taking of Palantwar, a good Fortreſs of the Turks, after a long and cruel fight taken by Captain Bathian, (Commander of the Imperial Troops on this ſide of the River of Danubius) whereinto a number of the Turks being retired, were there together with the Garriſon Souldiers all ſlain, and amongſt them divers men of great account, who but ſome few days before were come thither. Which Fortreſs the Captain cauſed to be forthwith razed, becauſe it ſhould no more ſtand the Turks in ſtead for the annoying of the Chriſtians.

Vacia moſt ſhamefully by the Haiducks betrayed, and delivered unto the Turks.

The Turks about this time had a purpoſe to beſiege Vacia, a City not far from Vicegrade, on the other ſide of Danubius, a Place which ſtill did them great harm, and ſtood the Chriſtians in great ſtead. The Garriſon of which Place was part Germans, and part Hungarians, as the reſt of all the Garriſons in the Imperial Towns of Hungary were. Of which the Turks purpoſe for the ſiege, the treacherous Haiducks there in Garriſon having got underſtanding, conſpired to deliver unto them the Place; and yet not ſo contented, to joyn thereunto a Treaſon more bloody and treacherous than was the betraying of the Town; for finding themſelves by farr too ſtrong for the Germans in Garriſon in the Town with them, they fell upon them, fearing no ſuch matter, and ſlew moſt part of them, the reſt ſaving themſelves by ſpeedy flight to Strigonium; and ſo afterward, according to their former pretended Treaſon, delivered the Town unto the Turks, joyning with them and the Tartars, and directing them for the more eaſie ſpoiling of the Chriſtians and the Country thereabout.

The taking of this City of Vacia, had in ſhort time called together great numbers of the Turks and Tartars out of all Places of the Realm; who, together with the Haiducks, made a great and puiſſant Army, to the Terrour of the Chriſtians, not then able to hold the field againſt them, and the incouraging of the Turks, thus holpen even by the Chriſtians themſelves, to the deſtroying of one another. With this Army they turned from Vacia to Gokara, with a purpoſe from thence to have paſſed over the Danubius upon the Ice, and to have ſurpriſed Strigonium. Which Exploit they had once before attempted againſt the baſe Town, being then by the Chriſtians repulſed and beaten back with their great and ſmall ſhot out of the Town, as now they were again. Howbeit, that ſeeing the number of their Enemies daily more and more to increaſe, they in Strigonium ſtood more in doubt of a ſecond ſiege, than they had done of the firſt, whereof we have before ſpoken.

Strigonium in vain attempted to have been ſurpriſed by the Turks and the Haiducks.

The Report of theſe ſo great Troubles, and of the general revolt of the diſcontented Haiducks in Hungary, much troubled and grieved the Chriſtian Emperour; who, both in reſpect of his Honour, and of the ſafety of his Eſtate, raiſed what Power he might out of his Provinces thereabout, and levied great ſums of Money from his Subjects, taking a Ducket upon every Houſe in Auſtria, being then in great fear of theſe Miſeries and Miſchiefs ſo faſt ſpreading, and ſtill more and more increaſing and approaching that way. Unto whoſe Forces already on foot, had the Aid promiſed from the King of Spain, the Pope, the Princes of Italy and Germany, with ſix thouſand Footmen, and two thouſand Horſe out of Bohemia, been in time joyned, they might have made a ſufficient Army under the Conduct of Baſta, the Emperours Lieutenant, to have repreſſed both the attempts of the Enemy, and the Inſolency of the rebellious Haiducks. All or moſt part of which Aid this year failing, and Baſta with his ſmall Forces much weakened with Wants and the Extremity of Winter, and not able to keep the Field, the Enemies ſtill increaſing both in number and ſtrength, and without fear of any to encounter them, at their Pleaſure roaming up and down, began now to draw near unto Vicegrade (a good and ſtrong Town of Hungary ſtanding upon the ſide of Danubius, about the mid way betwixt Buda and Strigonium) with a purpoſe to have beſieged the ſame. Of whoſe coming the Germans there in Garriſon hearing, and warned by the Treachery of the Haiducks of Vacia, what to fear from the Haiducks in Garriſon with them in Vicegrade, betime retired themſelves out of the Town into the Caſtle. In which doing they were well adviſed, being otherwiſe like enough to have run the ſame Fortune that the Germans their Fellows before had done at Vacia. For the Turks with the rebellious Haiducks were no ſooner come thither, but that the Haiducks in the Town, without more ado, opened the Gates of the Town unto them, as unto their Friends, directing them in beſt ſort they could, both for the beſieging and winning of the Caſtle. Which while the Turks hardly beſieged, and Germans therein notably defended, Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa, together with Begedes Baſſa, to perſwade them to yield up the Caſtle, writ unto them in this ſort.

The Town of Vicegrade by the Haiducks yielded unto the Turks.

The Letters of Haſſan the Viſier, and of Begedes Baſſa, unto the German Souldiers beſieged in the Caſtle.

'Right worthy and valiant Friends, it is not to you unknown, the Caſtle of Vicegrade, of right to belong unto our moſt mighty and dread Soveraign, the Great Sultan. And therefore ſeeing that it is Reaſon that every man ſhould have that which of right belongeth unto him; we advertiſe and requeſt you to yield up the ſame Caſtle unto our moſt mighty Emperour, and the honourable Lord Stephen Botſcay, Prince of Hungary; and with all your Subſtance to depart thence. Promiſing you upon our Faith and Honour, to ſuffer you quietly and in ſafety with your Wives and Children, Bag and Baggage, to depart thence; and to provide you ſufficient Shipping for the carrying away of your things to Strigonium. And if it ſhall pleaſe you to take part with us, we promiſe you the ſame pay from our Emperour, that you had from your own; and the ſame kind Entertainment which the Wallons have before had with us. But if that you upon an obſtinate Reſolution ſhall refuſe this our friendly Motion and Grace offered you, blame us not, if we ſhall by ſtrong hand and force of Arms ſeek to obtain our Right. In kindneſs we offer you our Friendſhip, and ſo with ſpeed expect your Anſwer.

But the Germans, hearkening not unto theſe Letters, as Men reſolved, valiantly ſtood upon the defence of themſelves, and of the Place, until that by extream Neceſſity forced thereunto, they yielded the ſame by Compoſition.

Baſta perplexed, publiſheth a general Pardon unto the Rebels.

Baſta in the mean time, with his Forces much diminiſhed, lying at Eperia, and in the Country thereabout, ſeeing the general revolt of the Haiducks, of late the Emperours greateſt ſtrength in Hungary, and Botſcay the Rebels ſtrength daily to increaſe more and more, with no poſſibility for himſelf with ſuch ſmall Forces as he then had, to repreſs the Rebels Inſolency, or to remedy theſe ſo far ſpreading Evils, but for want of great Strength he muſt lie ſtill as it were a man beſieged, was therewith exceedingly grieved, and as it were almoſt overwhelmed with the heavy burthen of ſo many great Miſeries at once beſetting him. To threaten without Power he knew to be but Folly; and to ſpeak fair, to be but vain. Nevertheleſs having procured from the Emperour a general Pardon for all ſuch as having taken part with the Rebels, were willing to return again to their allegiance; he, to aſſure all them whom it might concern, of the Emperors gracious Favour, and to put them all out of fear, cauſed Letters of general Pardon to be publiſhed, for all men to take knowledge of; the purport whereof was this.

The Proclamation given out by Baſta for the appeaſing of the Rebellion in Hungary.

'We George Baſta, County of Huſt and Marmar, Lord of Sult, Knight, Counſellor to his Imperial Majeſty, Governour of the Realm of Tranſilvania, and Lieutenant of the Chriſtian Armies of the Emperour, to all faithful, love and greeting. Whereas in this ſo troubleſome a State of things, ſome, as well of the Nobility as others, in theſe upper parts of Hungary, partly of their own accord, and partly for fear, have revolted from his Imperial Majeſty, and taken part with the traiterous Haiducks in their Rebellion, to the great prejudice of the Emperour's Service, and the ſtaining of their Faith; We, in the name of his Imperial and Royal Majeſty, whom we know to be greatly inclined, and ready to pardon his Subjects, even of his own natural Goodneſs and Clemency, have by vertue of the full Power and Authority, by his ſaid Imperial Majeſty granted unto us, given free Grace and Pardon to all them which have withdrawn themſelves from his Obeiſance, or forſaken the ſame, of what order, quality, or condition ſoever they be, whom we will receive into our Protection, as void of all Crime; and requeſt them, as much as in us is poſſible, to make their Profit of this Grace, and to return unto their former Duty and Obeyſance, under all aſſurance of Impunity for their forepaſſed Faults; and without any ſearch or inquiry to be of the ſame hereafter made, as well for matters of Religion, as of State; aſſuring them of their Lives, Goods, Fortunes, Dignities, Franchiſes, Priviledges, and Immunities whatſoever, as is more at large declared by his Majeſties Letters Patents which remain with us. And if any, letted either with their urgent Affairs, or with Sickneſs, cannot repair unto us within the day in the ſame Letters Patents nominated, we will accept of their juſt Excuſes. But if any, contrary to our hope, ſhall upon any indurate mind, or obſtinate Contumacy, fail to repent, and to make their appearance before us within the day limited, we denounce them to be Rebels, ſubject unto the Pain of Rebellion, and ſtained with the note of Infamy; pronouncing their Lives, their Goods, and Dignities to be confiſcate and devolved unto the Emperours Coffers; for which they ſhall by Us the Chieftains, and Captains of his Armies, with all Rigour and Extremity be proſecuted. Proteſting before the Majeſty of God, before the Majeſty of the Emperour, and before all Chriſtendom, us not to be in any ſort culpable of the Evils, Calamities, and Miſeries, which ſhall enſue of the Wars and Diſaſters which ſuch their Rebellion ſhall cauſe; but to be there-from exempt and acquitted, the only Authors of theſe Diſorders having deſerved theſe Imprecations and Calamities; upon the heads of whom we juſtly from henceforth lay them, as upon the miſerable Authors thereof, by their Wickedneſs having refuſed ſo great Grace from the Emperour and us; unto all men made known by theſe Preſents.

This Proclamation ſolemnly by Baſta publiſhed with the ſound of many Drums and Trumpets, the ſixteenth of January, and ten days Liberty given for ſuch as would come in, and again ſubmit themſelves; divers Gentlemen of the Country near unto Eperia, where Baſta with his Army lay, for fear of being ſpoiled came in, and accepted of the Grace offered: other of the ſeditious, dwelling farther off, little or nothing at all regarding the ſame. Inſomuch, that the Rebels in number daily increaſing, and the Rebellion ſtill farther and farther ſpreading, Botſcay was now grown ſo ſtrong, that he diſmiſſed from him moſt part of the Turks, whoſe ſervice he had in all theſe troubles hitherto uſed; reſerving yet certain Janizaries, whom he mingled with the Garriſon of Haiducks, which he had put into Caſſovia.

Baſta's Proclamation little regarded.

Pallas Lippa, before by Botſcay taken Priſoner, and upon his Revolt from the Emperour, by Botſcay made his Lieutenant-General, and a great man amongſt the Rebels (as is before declared) was now of many thought to be a moſt fortunate and happy man. But in the midſt of ſuch his Happineſs, and the greatneſs of his Command, he was, by the malice of ſome, envying at his eſtate, accuſed to Botſcay, as if he had had a purpoſe to have made him away; and delivering the ſtrong City of Caſſovia unto Baſta, to have gone over again unto the Emperour, and to have followed his Enſigns. Upon which ſuſpicion, he was by the commandment of Botſcay beheaded, with five other men more, of good place, ſuſpected to have been Partakers of the Conſpiracy with Lippa. In whoſe Treaſure, after that he was executed, were found an hundred thouſand Hungarian Duckats, with ſeven hundred Chains of Gold; all which he had ſcraped together in that ſmall time wherein he had been Botſcay's Lieutenant amongſt the Rebels. With which money, Botſcay in his Rebellion confirmed, became therein more obſtinate and furious than before, not admitting any talk with Baſta, concerning Peace, but upon ſuch unreaſonable Conditions as beſt ſtood with his own good liking.

Pallas Lippa*, Botſcay's Lieutenant, by his Commandment beheaded.

Now long and tedious it were to proſecute every particular exploit, with the divers woful events thereof, during this ſo great and dangerous a Rebellion in Hungary; which how heavy ſoever they were for the poor Chriſtians there dwelling to endure, as tending all to the ruine and Deſtruction both of themſelves and of their Country, (ſometime one of the moſt flouriſhing Kingdoms of Chriſtendom, but now become as it were a large Theatre, for all the World to behold moſt woful Tragedies and bloody Maſſacres acted in) yet for all that, unto ſome nothing is pleaſing but what is written of the greateſt Actions; as, of great and bloody Battels, of the Conqueſts of whole Kingdoms, and the ruine of moſt mighty and famous Princes; all other things elſe being unto them tedious. In ſome part to eaſe them of ſuch wearineſs, and to pleaſe their Appetites, I will briefly paſs over, and even lightly touch, ſuch things as for the moſt part of this year paſſed in this troubleſome Country, not ſtaying but upon matters of greateſt weight and importance. The Haiducks ſtill proceeding in their Rebellion, in the beginning of February beſieged the Caſtle of Sacmar, a place very fit for their purpoſe: which Caſtle the Souldiers there in Garriſon doubting to be able to hold out againſt them (being not paſt threeſcore ſound men left in it) and deſtitute alſo of their neceſſary Proviſion, covenanting to have their Lives ſpared, at length yielded unto them. But in going thence, meeting with certain other Companies of Haiducks near unto Tokay, they were by them moſt part of them ſlain, ſome few of them by ſpeedy flight eſcaping. The ſame Haiducks which had taken Sacmar, immediately after attempted to have ſurpriſed the Town and Caſtle of Tokay alſo, but the Governour of the Place, in good time advertiſed of their intent and purpoſe, cauſed the Ice wherewith the River was hard frozen, to be broken forty Paces over, near unto the Caſtle, and the ſame to be lightly covered over with Straw. Whither the Haiducks coming by night, and finding the Ice on the other ſide the River whereunto they firſt came ſtrong enough to bear them, by heaps thruſting one another forward, to have ſcaled the Caſtle, the Ice breaking under them, they there together by heaps moſt miſerably periſhed, many of the reſt which eſcaped that danger, being with ſhot out of the Caſtle ſlain alſo. In this Caſtle was no great ſtore of Victuals: whereof Baſta underſtanding, with his Army marched from Eperia toward Bodac, a Town holden by the Rebels, in hope with the ſpoil thereof to have relieved Tokay. But the Rebels hearing of his coming, having themſelves burnt the Town, had got themſelves, with that they had, into the Caſtle, and from thence with their great Ordnance ſo welcomed Baſta at his coming, that, diſappointed of his purpoſe, and having loſt ſome of his men, he was glad with all ſpeed (not having ſtayed above four hours) to return again to Eperia; certain of the Nobility of that Country, which took part with the Rebels, being reported, in his abſence, to have made a Road towards Eperia, to the endangering of that City. In which his Return towards Eperia, the Troops of County Turon, and of Charles Collonitz, by chance lighting upon 500 Haiducks in a Country Village, ſet the ſame on fire, and therein burnt moſt of the ſaid Rebels, and ſlew the reſt of them that remained, in ſeeking by flight to have ſaved themſelves.

The Caſtle of Sacmar yielded to the Haiducks.

Tokay* in vain attempted to have been ſurpriſed by the Haiducks.

In the mean time, one of the great men amongſt the Turks came to Caſſovia, bringing with him a great ſum of money; which, being divided amongſt the Rebels there, much confirmed them both in their Rebellion and Devotion towards the Turks: which Rebellion they ſpared not for any coſt by all means to maintain, as more prevailing thereby than by the greateſt Forces they could uſe for the conquering of Hungary.

The Turks with money maintain the Rebellion in Hungary.

But Baſta was no ſooner with his Army returned again to Eperia, but that the Souldiers generally exclaiming, and calling upon him for their Pay, were about in a Mutiny to have forſaken him. For the appeaſing of which Tumult, he was glad preſently to make what ſhift he could for Money, wherewith he in ſome meaſure gave them contentment, and ſo with much ado agreed with them for ſix weeks ſervice longer; thereby delivering the Citizens of Eperia from a great fear, wherein they were, for being ſpoiled by thoſe mutinous Souldiers, of whom they ſtood in no leſs doubt than they did of their Enemies.

Baſta's Souldiers in mutiny for their Pay.

And now the ſeditious Haiducks, after their wonted manner ſtill roaming up and down the upper part of Hungary, the 2d. day of March, about ſeven of the clock in the morning, came to Newſoll, a Fair in that Country, and there by many Reaſons perſuading the Citizens to revolt, and to take part with them, had Parley with them until it was full twelve of the clock; but drawing ſtill nearer and nearer unto the Town: inſomuch, that Turbelius, Governour of the Place, perceiving a yielding Inclination in the Citizens, and doubting without their help to be able to defend ſo great a City againſt the Haiducks with ſo weak a Garriſon as he then had therein, he with his Coſſacks, for his more ſafety, retired himſelf into the Caſtle. Which done, the Haiducks forthwith breaking into the City with ſix Companies, ſummoned the Caſtle, requiring to have it delivered unto them. Of whom Turbelius ſlew divers with ſhot out of the Caſtle; and the ſame day, in the Evening, courageouſly ſallying out of the Caſtle, with certain Companies of Harquebuſiers, drave the Haiducks again out of the City; which he afterward better for-fortified againſt their like Attemps. And the next day underſtanding by a Country-man, That certain Companies of Haiducks and Turks together, were coming to Turtzo, a Town not far off, carrying with them a great number of Cattel, Women and Children, which they had got out of the Country Towns and Villages thereabout; he preſently ſent forth his Lieutenant againſt them, with his Coſſacks (a deſperate kind of Horſemen) who meeting with theſe Haiducks and Turks, ſlew of them about an hundred and fifty, and recovered from them all the Captives, the Cattel, with two hundred Horſes, and a Mule loaded with four thouſand Hungarian Duckats.

Filek yielded unto the Haiducks.

Now had Filek (a moſt beautiful Caſtle, and as it were the Key of that part of the upper Hungary, which the Chriſtian Emperour yet held againſt the Turks) for certain Months been hardly beſieged by the Haiducks; which although it was ſo well ſtored with Victuals, and other neceſſary Proviſion, as that it might have holden out three Months longer ſiege, yet the Souldiers there in Garriſon, for want of Water were inforced now at length to yield the ſame. For the keeping of which Caſtle Redeius Ferentſius, Captain of the Haiducks which had woon it, placed therein a Garriſon, part Haiducks, part Turks, as not daring to truſt either of them alone; the Haiducks for fear of their Treachery, nor the Turks, for that he knew them to be deſirous of the place, for the commodious Scituation thereof, as giving them a way to enter farther into the Territories of the Chriſtians; which Redeius, though a Rebel, would not yet in any ſort grant them.

This Caſtle of Filek ſo (as is before ſaid) beſieged, the valiant Collonitz had oftentimes in vain ſought to have relieved; all the ways being ſo beſet, and as it were, fortified with the infinite number of the Turks, Tartars, and Rebels, as that there was no coming unto it; and moſt part of his own Souldiers being Haiducks alſo, to whom he durſt not well truſt, for fear of being betrayed by them. Concerning which Matters, he ſhortly after writing to a certain Nobleman, after that he had ſhewed unto him, That he deſired nothing more of the Emperour, than to be diſcharged of his Service, he thus breaketh forth.

The Letters of Collonitz to a certain Nobleman, concerning the Troubles raiſed by the Rebels in Hungary.

I Cannot (ſaith he) any more perform faithful ſervice unto the Emperour; for being attended upon with very Traitours, I am enforced to hazard even mine honeſt Reputation. I would willingly ſerve with German Horſemen; and I could alſo wiſh, three thouſand Coſſacks, and two thouſand Polonian Huſſars to be again raiſed; who wold do notable ſervice in purſuing of the Enemy; but every Month they muſt needs have their Wages pay'd them. The number of the Enemy increaſeth daily; and their ſtrength ſtill more and more; ſo that things cannot be in worſe ſtate than now they are. All Devices are directed to the hurt of the Emperour, neither is there any place quiet. What Courage am I of, which have loſt all my Wealth and Subſtance, is eaſie for any man to judge; all which, for all that, I could conceal and diſſemble, ſo that I might faithfully, and according to my deſire, ſerve the Emperour; which for all that, is not poſſible for me to do without a ſufficient ſtrength of German Souldiers. But this of all doth moſt comfort me, for that I know me to have done my Duty; for otherwiſe this Miſchief had ſpread further. Many were in hope that I would rather have revolted from the Emperour, than have loſt my Goods; and ſome there were, which doubted not to ſay ſo of me. The Enemies are now in my Dukedom of Cleve, and there made ſpoil of all. Setchin, Jarmeta, Tregla, Palanka, Samoſchin, Blavenſtein, Rabenſtein, Vacia, Regiomont, Dillena, Pugantſa, Tabra, Libetna, Sitna, Dibina, Sacmaria, Sendra, Onoth, Diſgiora, Zatnar, Calo, Scharoſpotac, Budnoc, Nagibana, Filek, and almoſt all Tranſilvania, are now ſubject to the Rebels; ſo that what will enſue thereof, except they ſpeedily be confronted, every many may right eaſily gheſs.

Strong Towns and Places by the Turks and Rebels taken in the upper Hungary.

Now if Collonitz, one of the greateſt and beſt Commanders of the Emperours Forces againſt the Turks in Hungary, was thus beſet, and ſpoiled of his Subſtance, by the Rebels, as he in theſe his Letters complaineth, and as indeed he was, having at one time received from them ſo great harm as was deemed to have amounted to an hundred thouſand Duckats; and not daring to truſt his own Hungarian Souldiers, whoſe Hearts he knew to be with the Rebels; In what State may the reſt of the People of that diſtreſſed Province, be thought to have been, being at the ſame time expoſed unto the ſame Rebels as a Prey and Spoil, and their Country lay'd open for the Turks and Tartars to forrage and over-run at their Pleaſure.

Wiglaſe in vain attempted to have been ſurpriſed by the Haiducks.

But in brief, to run along with the Haiducks, four thouſand of them attempting to have ſurpriſed Wiglaſe, were ſo from thence repulſed, as that many of them being there ſlain, five and thirty Wagons were ſcarce ſufficient to carry the reſt of the wounded over the Mountains, of whom an hundred died by the way. But going from thence, they brake into Turſon's Country, where, they having rifled all the Towns and Villages, commanded all the States of the Country, within three days next after, to ſubmit themſelves to Botſcay, and to ſwear unto him Fealty, or otherwiſe to expect all Extremities; who with fear diſmayed, all promiſed to ſubmit themſelves unto Redeius, Botſcay's Lieutenant.

Now for Remedy of theſe Evils, Napragius and Forgatius, two grave Counſellors, were ſent, in the Emperours Name, to intreat of the Peace with Botſcay; who, the ſeventh and twentieth of March, departing from Eperia, with fourſcore Harquebuſiers, towards Caſſovia, before they came thither, ſent before them an Herauld, to advertiſe Botſcay of their coming. Which Meſſenger, ſo ſoon as he was come into Caſſovia, the Turks ſo ſtraitly kept, as that no man might ſpeak with him but Botſcay himſelf; and not he alſo, but in open place, and that in the hearing of the Turks. Who at his firſt meeting with him, told him, That if the Ambaſſadours from whence he came, were ſent from the Nobility and States of Hungary, they ſhould be right welcome unto him, and have Audience; but if they came from the Emperour, as had Regatſius and Ciaccius before ſent from Baſta, they ſhould then ſpare their Labour, and come no farther; for that all matters had with him been often enough talked upon; it being now more than time, that things ſo often conſulted upon, ſhould be no more talked of, but indeed performed. Which Meſſenger returning unto the Ambaſſadors, told them what Botſcay had ſaid, and that the Haiducks had in Caſſovia built a Bulwark of a wonderful height, beſet the Gates with ſtrong Guards, and ſo filled the Trenches with Souldiers, that a man could hardly enter into the City; howbeit that every man might ſafely come and go thither about his Trade and Buſineſs. He told them alſo, how that Botſcay's Lieutenant had called together all the Governours of the Places thereabout, and adviſed them, for the ſpace of fourteen days to beware of the Excurſions of the Haiducks, and in the mean time, for their more ſafety, to bring their Wives and Children, with ſuch other things as they made moſt reckoning of, into the City, for that he could not as yet (as he ſaid) repreſs preſs the unruly and head-ſtrong Haiducks, being yet in their Rage and Fury, as the manner of the diſcontented Multitude is. Of which Haiducks, ſome going forth toward Newhuſe, and bringing home a great Booty of Cattel, were by Collonitz and Trautmanſtorf, purſuing them with their Horſemen, overthrown, and all the Booty again recovered.

Botſcay, about this time, viz. the nine and twentieth day of March, ſummoned all the Nobility and States of Hungary unto an Aſſembly to be holden at Serentium the ſeventeenth day of April, writing unto them in this ſort:

Botſcay's* Letters to the Nobility and States of Hungary, to call them together to Serents.

‘YOU know (ſaid he) right worthy and valiant men, into what extream Miſeries our afflicted Country (all the ancient Priviledges and Immunities thereof being contemned and troden under foot) is by the coming in of Strangers brought; whoſe Inſolency is gone ſo far, that we cannot only not quietly poſſeſs our own Goods, but ſo much as enjoy the Liberty of our own Conſciences. For which cauſe, the Nobility of the whole Kingdom being the laſt Year ſent in Embaſſy, and as it were foreſeeing what was to come, the Aſſembly of the Empire being ended, openly proteſted before the whole Imperial Diet, and by their Letters oftentimes declared, That they ſhould of neceſſity be at length inforced to take upon themſelves the defence of their Priviledges and of their Religion: by which their Proteſtations for all that they ſo little prevailed, that forthwith after, ſuch an intolerable Edict was by the Emperour's Commandment publiſhed, as had expoſed us all, and every one of us, to moſt certain Death, had we not betime provided for our ſelves. All which things are unto you all moſt certainly known, both by the unlawful Acts themſelves, and the whole Proceeding of the Provoſt General. All which things conſidered, you met together at Galeſt, and from thence again openly ſignified unto the aforeſaid Provoſt General (unto whom his Imperial Majeſty had committed the ſhedding of our Blood, the aboliſhing of our Priviledges and Religion, viz. the execution of this cruel Edict) that if he proceeded to go forward in that Buſineſs, you would put into Execution what you had before publickly proteſted in the general Aſſembly of the whole Empire at Presburg. But what Anſwer you received from him, foraſmuch as it is not unto any of you unknown, it is not needful here to rehearſe. Wherefore, when as he, going about the execution of the aforeſaid Edict, did in forcible manner, with certain Pieces of great Ordnance, impugn the Army of his Imperial Majeſty, both in his and our dread Lord and Sovereign, and by force took from us ſome of our Caſtles, and beſieged ſome others; we found no other remedy againſt theſe ſo great Evils, but that which God himſelf even then ſhewed unto us, which was, by force of Arms to defend our ſelves ſo far as we might. In which our purpoſe, ſeeing that the Grace of God, and the good Succeſs which we have hitherto had, will us to continue, although we have ſuffered no little harm from the Germans and Haiducks (which for all that is, for the recovery of the liberty of our Country, patiently to be borne) to the intent that we, united with other our Brethren through Hungary, may the better withſtand our Enemies, and fight againſt them; it is moſt neceſſary that we ſhould meet together, and all matters ſet apart, enter into Conſultation, how hereafter to reſiſt our Enemies, and ſet our Country in Peace and Quietneſs. Wherefore, ſeeing that we have determin'd to hold an Aſſembly at Serents the Seventeenth day of April, we by theſe Preſents warn and requeſt you all, there at the aforeſaid Seventeenth day of April to make your perſonal Appearance, to joyn in Amity with us, and, after God's Name called upon, to conſult and conclude upon ſuch things as may be both acceptable and pleaſing unto God, and moſt profitable and neceſſary for the good of our afflicted Country in general. But if there ſhall be any, which upon a preſumptuous or careleſs Contempt ſhall not at the time appointed come, nor ſeem to regard ſuch things as ſo much concern the common Good and Welfare of their Native Country; let them aſſuredly know, Both themſelves to be therefore to be accounted for Enemies unto their Country, and their Goods alſo ſo to be diſpoſed of, as ſhall unto the Nobility and States then and there aſſembled, be thought meet and convenient.

A great Tumult and Fire in Conſtantinople.

Much about this time, a great Tumult was raiſed amongſt the Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court at Conſtantinople; at which time a great Fire aroſe alſo in the City (as oft times the like hath before done through the Inſolency of the Janizaries, who in ſuch Confuſion of mens Minds uſe to make their own Gains) wherein many, both Men and Women, periſhed, with above five hundred Shops and Ware-houſes full of rich Merchandiſe, moſt part whereof belonged unto the Jews; of whom almoſt two hundred are ſaid to have been there burnt: the Deformity and Spoil made by which Fire in the City, remaining long after to be ſeen. Theſe Troubles brought a great fear upon the young Sultan, who firſt therewith half diſmayed, and ſeeing the like to ariſe in Pera alſo on the other ſide of the Haven, about a mile off from the Seraglio, could not otherwiſe think, but that the Souldiers were about ſome dangerous Treaſon. Which ſuſpicion, two Meſſengers, but a little before come from Cicala Baſſa, increaſed: who by the ſame Meſſengers deſired new Supplies to be forthwith ſent unto him; proteſting, that for as much as he had not long before in a great Battel loſt a number of his Men, if he were not with new Supplies ſpeedily relieved, he muſt of force retire, and leave all unto the Perſian. Howbeit, the Fire quenched, and the Janizaries and other Souldiers with the Spoil they had of the Loſſes of others gotten, ſatisfied, the Tumult was without much ado again quieted.

The Emperour's Souldiers in mutiny for their Pay, threaten their General, and ſpoil the Country betwixt Eperia and Presburg.

Now beſide the aforeſaid Troubles from the Rebels in Tranſilvania and the upper Hungary, that nothing might be wanting unto the Miſery of thoſe ſo miſerable Countries, the Emperour's Souldiers which ſerved under Baſta, having of long from day to day in vain expected their Pay, and ſeeing neither Pay nor other Relief to come unto them, roſe up in Mutiny, and ſo in a great Rage brake into Baſta, the General's Lodging; where, having heaped upon him many unworthy and deſpightful Reproaches, with their Pieces bent againſt him, and taking the ſpoil of certain Carriages loaded with many rich Commodities, they departed from him; and ſo marching thorow the Country toward Presbourg, by the way uſed ſuch Inſolency and Cruelty, by rifling and ſpoiling whatſoever came in their way, as that they ſeemed unto the People as they went, worſe and more inhumane than the very Turks and Tartars themſelves; where, amongſt other the Prey by them taken, which were very great, they carried away with them toward Presburg above ten thouſand Oxen and two thouſand Horſes; threatning by the way as they went to burn the Suburbs of the City ſo ſoon as they came thither, if they were not forthwith payed their Pay: whereupon many of the Citizens for fear forſook their Dwellings, and removed to Vienna.

Newſol taken by the Haiducks.

But the Rebels on the other ſide, having (as is before declared) in vain attempted to have taken Newſol, being forthwith driven out of it again, aſſembling themſelves in great number, came now again and beſieged it, and the ſixteenth day of April took it, to the great and incomparable Loſs of the Citizens; other of their Fellows in other Places having but the day before taken Cibinium, Portfeld, Schemnitſe, with ſome other Places alſo.

The miſerable eſtate of Hungary through civil diſcord.

Thus while the Haiducks at their Pleaſure on the one ſide ſpoil the upper part of Hungary, and the Emperour's Souldiers on the other ſide for want of Pay do therein no leſs harm than they, as Enemies rifling and ranſacking every corner of the Country as they went, the poor Husbandmen dwelling here and there diſperſed abroad in the Country, for fear leaving their homely Dwellings, with ſuch things as they had, fled ſome of them into Polonia, other ſome into the Mountains, where many of them periſhed with Hunger; the poor Husbandman not daring now to go forth to till his Land, neither the Shepheard to feed his Flock, all places being filled with Miſery, Mourning, and Heavineſs; the Turks and Tartars, the common Enemies of the Chriſtians, being not the Cauſers thereof, but even the Chriſtians themſelves, one of them even with greedineſs ſeeking the Ruine and Deſtruction of another; as commonly it falleth out in Kingdoms and States divided.

Moravia ſpoiled by the rebellious Haiducks.

Neither did theſe ſo great Troubles, the ground of ſo many Miſeries, contain themſelves within the Bounds of Hungary only, but brake out into other Countries and Provinces thereunto adjoyning alſo; but eſpecially into Moravia, into which Country the Haiducks breaking, miſerably ſpoiled the ſame, by force took certain Towns, which they robbed and rifled, carrying away with them even the very little Children, taken from their heavy Parents, to be ſold afterwards unto the Turks; a miſerable kind of Merchandiſe, and of all Chriſtians to be deteſted. For remedy of which Miſchiefs, by ſufferance ſtill more and more increaſing, Lichtenſtein, Governour of the Country, having raiſed all the Power that he was able for to make, went againſt them, and with much ado at length drave them out of the Country, with Fire and Sword now by them moſt grievouſly ſpoiled: they for all that carrying away with them a great part of the Wealth of that Country, with four thouſand Captives, all by them appointed unto the Turks ſlavery.

A notable Exploit by a few performed.

About this time alſo Baſta, lying at Presburg, and underſtanding that fourteen thouſand Turks and Tartars being come to St. Georges, ſix thouſand of them were gone over the Danubius, about a mile beneath Presburg, to the end that whilſt they were making a Road into Auſtria, the reſt in the mean time might prove their Forces upon Presburg; with his Horſe-men followed after them himſelf, to cut off ſuch ſtragling Companies of them as otherwiſe might have done great harm abroad in the Country, leaving behind him in Presburg but three hundred Wallon Horſe-men, with certain Companies of Foot-men for the keeping of the City. Which three hundred Horſe-men, being very good and expert Souldiers, and deſirous to be doing ſomething, by night made a Road out of the City toward St. Georges, where the reſt of the Haiducks and Turks in great ſecurity lay; upon whom theſe reſolute men upon the ſudden falling, brought a great fear upon the whole Camp, and having ſlain of them above five hundred before the reſt could arm themſelves, returned with a great Victory, though but with ſmall Prey, carrying with them ſome few Horſes of Service to Presburg; where, by that they had done, it was reaſonably thought that had they been but a thouſand ſtrong, they had diſcomfited the Enemies whole Camp.

In the mean time, they of the Garriſon of Comara underſtanding that Begedes Baſſa was determined with a notable Convoy to go from Buda with ſeventeen Waggons loaded with Money and other things of great value, to Botſcay the Rebel, and the Tartar Cham's Son, who with certain thouſands of Tartars was come to Solnock, to the Aid of Botſcay and the Rebels: they, in hope of ſo great a Booty, lay in wait for him upon the way whereby he muſt needs paſs, and at his coming ſet upon him, and ſlew a number of his Men; amongſt whom it fortuned the Baſſa himſelf to be ſlain, ſhot in the Breaſt with a ſmall Shot whilſt he was mounting up his Horſe; whoſe dead Body the Turks about him having taken up, and therewith about to flee, were there ſome of them ſlain, and ſome of them taken Priſoners, the reſt by ſpeedy flight eſcaping. Here were alſo all the aforeſaid Waggons taken, with an exceeding rich Booty; all which the Garriſon Souldiers, well worthy thereof, carried away with them to Comara, together with the Baſſa's Head, ſtruck from his Body with his own Scimitar; which Scimitar, with the Baſſa's rich Coat, Pogranus the Governour of Comara afterward ſent as a Preſent to the Emperour at Prague. This Baſſa while he lived was a moſt crafty and ſubtil man, the chief Plotter and Author of all the late Troubles in Hungary, having before put all Tranſilvania into moſt dangerous Stirs and Tumults, and greatly confirmed Botſcay in his Rebellion: he ſpake the Hungarian Language naturally, and was therein very eloquent, which ſerved him to great purpoſe both for the raiſing and maintaining of the Rebellion both in Tranſilvania and in Hungary. Which ſo dangerous a man taken out of the way, many were in good hope of ſome good end to be made of theſe Civil Wars, more dangerous unto the ſtate of both theſe afflicted Countries, than were the great and puiſſant Armies of the Turks, which were almoſt every Year in the heart of the one or of the other of them to be ſeen.

Begedes Baſſa ſlain.

The Name of the Germans odious unto the Hungarians.

Now was the Rebellion grown ſo great in Hungary, and the Rebels ſo ſtrong, that even the very Name of the Germans was become unto the Hungarians both odious and contemptible; inſomuch, that Baſta offering to have put new Supplies of German Souldiers into the City of Tyrna, then in danger of the Haiducks; the Governours of the Place not only refuſed to receive them, but alſo to let them have any thing of them for their ready money, ſaying, That they had Citizens enough in the City to defend the ſame againſt their Enemies; and that therefore, as they needed not of the help of the Germans, ſo they would have nothing to do with them. And yet as ſoon as Redeius, Botſcay's Lieutenant, was with his Army come thither, they without more ado opened unto him the Gates of the City, and receiving him in, were about to have ſlain all the Germans there dwelling amongſt them, being well near a third part of the Inhabitants; and had ſo done, but that ſome, wiſer than the reſt, conſidering that the Germans having there long dwelt, were by often Marriages joyned in Affinity with the Hungarians, and the Hungarians with them, otherwiſe perſuaded them, leſt in ſo doing they might ſeem to be cruel againſt their own Blood. And ſo the matter being referred to Redeius himſelf, it was by him (by the Counſel of one of the greateſt men of the Turks) ordered, that the Germans ſhould be ſpared their Lives, ſo that from thenceforth they ſhould no more uſe the German but the Hungarian Apparel and Attire, only the German Attire being taken away for the Germans themſelves.

The Germans in Tyrna conſtrained to wear Garments like to the Hungarians.

But to proceed with theſe Troubles according to the courſe of the time of the Year, about the twenty fourth of May the Turks and Tartars joyning their Forces with the Rebels, burnt fourteen Country Villages about the lake of Neuſidler, and as many more in other Places alſo towards Neuſtat, leaving behind them moſt lamentable Remembrances and Teſtimonies of their barbarous and inhumane Cruelty, having put moſt of the Women and Children to the Sword, and impaled divers upon Stakes, carrying the Men away with them as Captives, and the Beaſts and Cattel as a Prey; and ſo leaving the Country as they went almoſt deſolate, ſcarce any being therein left to bewail the Miſeries thereof. And about the end of this ſame Month the Rebels ſurpriſed Simega, Grotta, and Capernacum, and a little while after, Ginſium: all which Places they rifled and ſpoiled, as they did alſo Hogengoa, a great Town of the Lord Lichtenſteins: and Niderſprunga, a Town of Collonitzes, which they firſt rifled, and afterward burnt; and with the terror of this their dealing inforced all the Country thereabout, both far and near, to yield unto them; only Altſol and Chremnicz, who continued in their Loyalty, and ſtanding faſt for the Emperour, did the Rebels much harm.

About the beginning of June, certain Companies of Turks and Haiducks mingled together, came again, as they had before done, to Presburg: of whoſe coming the Governour of the City having Advertiſement, with three Troops of Wallon Horſe-men, and certain Companies of Harquebuſiers, breaking out of the City, cauſed them forthwith to retire; which the Wallon Horſe-men ſeeing, to prevent them in their Retreat, fetching a Compaſs about, met with them when they thought themſelves paſt all danger; and falling upon them, ſlew of them five hundred, and drave the reſt into Danubius; ſo that of all thoſe Turks and Haiducks none eſcaped but only fourteen, amongſt whom three Turks and one fugitive Citizen of Presburg, were found: whom, together with a great Spoil, the Garriſon Souldiers carried back with them into the City.

Veſprinium yielded unto the Rebels.

At the ſelf-ſame time the Citizens of Veſprinium favouring the Proceedings of the Haiducks, roſe themſelves in Rebellion alſo, and taking the Captain of the Caſtle, together with his Lieutenant and the Keys of the Caſtle, cauſed them to be carried to Redeius, Botſcay's Lieutenant; yielding themſelves into his Protection. Of which Revolt of the City the Turks took exceeding Pleaſure, and forthwith ſent News thereof unto the Sultan, wiſhing him to haſte the coming of his Army, for that the Paſſages were now laid open unto his farther Conqueſt; and farther adviſing him ſtill more and more to encourage Botſcay in his Rebellion.

Stiria and Auſtria ſpoiled by the Rebels.

And now was Hungary too little, or elſe too bare, to contain and ſatisfie the ſtill increaſing Rebels, who in great number breaking into Stiria (as they had before done on the other ſide of Hungary into Moravia) did therein great harm, waſting and ſpoiling all before them as they went; inſomuch that County Serin, the Lord Nadaſti, and Budian, all right worthy men, and ſuch as heretofore had done great things againſt the Turks for the Chriſtian Commonweal, ſeeing themſelves, and all that they had, in danger to be ſpoiled, being themſelves not able to withſtand the Rebels, nor any other ſtay whereon to reſt, ſubmitted themſelves unto Botſcay, as did many other Noblemen of that Country alſo. Out of Stiria the Rebels made head into Auſtria, and there roaming up and down the Country, did like harm.

Thus was the State of Auſtria and Hungary at this time moſt miſerable, which for that it is ſo well ſet down in certain Letters by a grave and underſtanding Citizen of Vienna, who was himſelf an eye-witneſs of moſt part thereof, as that it cannot well better be expreſſed; I have thought it good to referr the Report thereof unto the Letters themſelves.

The miſerable troubles of Hungary and Auſtria notably deſcribed by the Letters of a Citizen of Vienna.

‘ALL Auſtria (ſaith he) is full of Miſery and Calamity. From out of the Caſtle and Bulwarks here at Vienna, a man may ſometime at once behold fifteen Towns and Villages all on fire in the Country hereabout, kindled partly by the Rebels and Turks, and partly by our own mutinous Souldiers. Odenburg is yet beſieged, and the Haiducks have forraged the Country as far as Hinberg; whom had not the Regiment of Collonitz repreſſed, theſe our Suburbs of Vienna had now been taken, ranſack'd, and burn'd. Newſtat is on every ſide beſieged by the Enemy; all the Villages about Vienna, as far as Dreſskirc, are with Fire deſtroyed; they of Newſtat went about to have cut off ſome part of the Enemies Forces, but with evil Succeſs, having loſt above fifty of their own men. Brunna and Entzendorfe are alſo with Fire conſumed. The Wallons lye incamped at Miedling, moſt miſerably ſpoiling the Country People of all that they had: The Haiducks having by night ſurpriſed the great Town of Altenburg, and from thence carrying a great Prey, have burn'd it; The Caſtle had endured the like fortune, had not an hundred Harquebuſiers, that were by chance come thither, holpen to defend it. Six thouſand of the Enemies lye about Veſſelbourg; but whether the Wallons will attempt any thing againſt them or no, it is greatly doubted. Presburg is alſo in great danger; for the Garriſon Souldiers there do threaten the cruel Spoil of the Citizens, and all Extremities, if by a certain Day they receive not their Pay; who if they ſhall depart thence, there is no doubt but that the Haiducks will forthwith ſucceed them in their Places. Theſe men indeed do pretend Religion; but what Lovers they be thereof, the late Example of a Miniſter by them moſt cruelly tormented, not far from Cobbelſdorfe, doth manifeſtly ſhew. The Report is, That the Vayvod of Valachia doth favour neither part; into which Province a great number of Tartars are come in the Aid of Botſcay. All the Market-Places and Streets here in this City, lye full of poor fugitive Creatures of all Sex and Ages; a moſt miſerable Sight to behold. Our own mutinous Souldiers beſet all the ways to the City, and exclude us from all manner of Victual; and not to uſe many words, in Cruelty and Hoſtility almoſt exceed the very Enemies. The Hungarian Rebels, who of late forraged Auſtria, have carried away with them above eight thouſand Head of Cattel, which, together with the Priſoners by them taken, they have ſent into Turkey. The little Boys and Children, which cannot by reaſon of their tender Years go, they carry along with them upon Horſes, whoſe pittiful Mourning and Lamentation might move even the very Stones; and yet are they (inhumane men) no whit moved: yea, many of theſe poor Souls are here and there by the way found daſhed againſt the Ground, with their Brains beaten out. And theſe Rebels in their Behaviour ſhew ſuch Cruelty, as whereat the very Turks themſelves were amazed. All things about Iſenſtad are by the Enemies taken and carried away. They of Neuhuſe, beſieged by thirty thouſand of their Enemies, have hitherto played the Men, and of late repulſed the ſecond Aſſault, with much ſlaughter of their Enemies. They ſay, That two thouſand Tartars, as many Rebels, and thirteen thouſand Turks, are to be yet ‘expected to come unto the Camp at Neuhuſe; who, if they ſhall chance to come, it can ſcarce be, that they of Neuhuſe can long well hold out againſt them, eſpecially being not well appointed of neceſſary proviſion. The report is, that having taken Neuhuſe, they will remove to Strigonium. It is ſaid alſo, twelve thouſand Turks to have now paſſed over the Bridge at Eſſec; and great Supplies both of men and money to come to Botſcay, who lieth encamped about Eperia, and is ſaid to have made a Covenant with the Great Sultan, That what place ſoever either of them ſhould firſt take, he ſhould hold the ſame wholly unto himſelf. Tanhuſer, who of late was Governour of Filek, is now (as the report goeth) of Counſel with Botſcay. Germenchius hath put in three months Victual into Huſt in Tranſilvania. God in his mercy behold our poor afflicted and diſtreſſed Country.

Thus far he: Whereby, the Reader (as I ſuppoſe) may eaſily gather the miſerable eſtate of both the Countries of Hungary and Auſtria, the Chriſtians themſelves being the chief Authors thereof.

Odenburg beſieged by the Rebels, and by Baſta relieved.

The rebellious Haiducks had hitherto moſt ſtraightly beſieged the City of Odenbourg, having aſſaulted it in five ſundry places at once: upon whom, Trautmanſtorfe, General of the Garriſon there, cauſing part of his Horſe-men to ſally forth, ſkirmiſhed with them from eleven of the clock in the forenoon, untill two of the clock in the afternoon; at which time the Haiducks beginning to prevail, the Governour, with the reſt of his Horſemen, certain Enſigns of Foot-men, with ſome of the Citizens, with three field-pieces, upon the ſudden breaking out of the Gate, diſcomfited the Haiducks, put them to flight, and ſlew many of them, having taken from them twelve Enſigns, with many Priſoners, whom he carried with him into the City: of which overthrow the Haiducks deſirous to be revenged, with their renewed Forces ſhortly after returned again unto the City, burnt the Suburbs of the ſame, and ſpoiled the Villages thereabout. But whilſt they thus lay about Odenbourg, Baſta, but with a ſmall power, drawing near unto them, they preſently roſe, and paſſing over the River Draum, carried away with them two thouſand head of Cattel, with a great number of Chriſtian Captives.

The Turks ſeek to have Caſſovia delivered unto them by Botſcay.

The Turks being not to learn to make uſe of the diſcord of the Chriſtians among themſelves, had oftentimes been in hand with Botſcay, to deliver Caſſovia wholly into their hands: of which ſtrong City, being the beſt that the Chriſtians now held in the upper Hungary, the Turks were moſt deſirous, both for the commodious ſituation thereof, and alſo for that they deemed themſelves partly thereof already poſſeſſed, ſome good part of the Garriſon therein being Turks, as well Janizaries as others. The full poſſeſſion of which ſtrong City the better to obtain from Botſcay, and to get it into their own hands, they ſent unto him three Waggons loaded with money and other rich Commodities, for a Preſent, and to ſupply his wants, by a good Convoy of four hundred Haiducks, and ſome Turks joyned unto them. Which Haiducks, as they were by the way to Caſſovia to paſs by Tockay, a ſtrong Town holden by the Chriſtians, gave ſecret knowledge unto the Governour of the place, of their coming that way, and that if he would receive them into the Town, and ſo into his Protection, they would, with ſome ſmall help from him, deliver into his hands that ſo rich a booty, and ſo continue with him as his faithful and truſty Souldiers. Of whoſe offer the Governour well aſſured, forthwith ſent forth four hundred of the Souldiers of his own Garriſon to meet them; who, joyning with the aforeſaid Haiducks which came with the Convoy, ſet upon the Turks which came with them, and ſlew them every Mothers Son; and ſo with the rich Booty were by the Governour received into the Town, and by him courteouſly entertained: where they had not long lain, but that after their wonted manner looking abroad into the Country, they chanced to meet with certain Companies of Botſcay's men; with whom they encountering, and having ſlain of them near about five hundred, took from them ſeven Waggons loaded with good Proviſion, and thirty Horſes, beſide much other rich ſpoil.

Totiſa yielded unto the Turks.

Newhuſe hardly aſſaulted and valiantly defended.

Newhuſe diſtreſſed.

But the Rebels, notwithſtanding theſe and ſuch other loſſes, encreaſing both in number and power, ſtill more and more in all places prevailed, but eſpecially in the upper part of Hungary, the Towns there, one after another, daily revolting unto them, as amongſt the reſt the ſtrong Town of Totiſa did; whereinto the Rebels entring, ſent from thence part of the great Ordnance, together with Relinger, a German Captain, Governour of the Town, and certain other German Souldiers there taken, unto Redeius, Botſcay's Lieutenant, then lying with a great Army of thirty thouſand Hungarian Rebels and Turks, at the Siege of the ſtrong Town and Caſtle of Newhuſe: which, as it had oftentimes by him been ſharply aſſaulted, ſo was it by the Souldiers therein moſt notably defended, proteſting, never to yield the ſame, but to hold it out even to the laſt man therein to be left alive: which cauſed Redeius, for the encouraging of his Souldiers, (who had now lain there certain months at the Siege thereof) to promiſe unto them the whole ſpoil of the Town, and of all that therein was: And yet for all that, oft times kept back the Turks from aſſaulting the ſame, for fear leſt if they ſhould by force have taken it, they would by force alſo have holden it unto themſelves, as a Place for them moſt commodious for the conquering of that which remained of the upper part of Hungary: which he, though one of the greateſt Rebels, was yet loth to have it to fall into their hands; and yet himſelf, with the Haiducks, the Hungarian Rebels, afterward, viz. the 25th. of July, gave thereunto a moſt furious Aſſault, inſomuch that having advanced ten of their Enſigns to the top of the Rampiers, they were in great hope even preſently to have taken it, but yet were by the reſolute Valour of the Defendants notably repulſed, and inforced again to retire, leaving behind them above ſeven hundred of their moſt forward men dead in the Trenches: unto which Siege the Baſſa of Agria came alſo afterward with three thouſand Horſe-men and a Number of Janizaries; ſo that the beſieged, partly with Mines, partly with Shot and often Aſſaults diſtreſſed, were ſo waſted and wounded, that there were ſcarcely two hundred whole and ſound men left in the whole Garriſon; beſide that, both Victuals and Powder begun now to grow ſcarce alſo, ſo that they were brought unto ſuch extremity, as that well they could not be in a worſe caſe: and yet armed with a conſtant Reſolution, they ſeemed not to be any thing therewith daunted or diſcouraged, but ſtill valiantly held it out.

The Rebels in the Iſle of Shut ſubmit themſelves again unto the Emperour.

The Hungarians, dwelling in the Iſle of Shut in the River of Danubius, having before ſubmitted themſelves unto the Rebels, did with their help much trouble the Paſſages unto the Towns of Rab and Comara, and the City of Strigonium; unto whom certain Meſſengers were ſent on the Emperour's behalf, to perſwade them to forſake the Rebels, and to return again unto their ancient Obedi-

Obedience. Who ſo well uſed the matter with them, that taking a Truce for eight days, they in the mean time ſent five of the chief men amongſt them by Ship to Presburg, offering unto the Governour there, That if they might be ſecured of their Goods and Safety, and that the Haiducks that were with them might be entertained in Pay, they would be ready again to take the Oath of Allegiance, and faithfully to ſerve him as became his loyal Subjects and valiant Souldiers; and for the aſſurance thereof, to leave their Wives and Children as Pledges at Presburg. Which their Offer, was unto the Governour very acceptable and welcome, who yielding unto their Requeſt, in friendly ſort diſmiſſed them. But they being returned home, and having declared to the reſt of their Fellows what they had done, it was by general conſent agreed, That four thouſand of them ſhould joyn themſelves unto the Emperours Power under the Regiment of Colionitz, who, to be known from others, wore in their Creſts certain ſpecial Feathers; their Wives and Children being carried to Presburg as Pledges of their Faith: but this Agreement by them made with the Governour of Presburg being once known, the reſt of the Rebels in the Country thereabout together aſſembled with the Turks, invaded the Iſle, in hope upon the ſudden to have ſurpriſed them; but, deceived of their Expectation, were by the Inhabitants of the Iſle, and by the help of certain German Troops, overthrown and put to flight, and three thouſand of them there ſlain.

About the beginning of July, certain Commiſſioners were ſent on the Emperour's behalf to Caſſovia, to intreat with Botſcay concerning a Pacification to be made, who being by him there honourably entertained, and having with him ſtayed almoſt a whole Month, were at length, the nine and twentieth of the ſame month, again diſmiſſed. Now the Articles which Botſcay propounded unto theſe Commiſſioners to be conſidered of for the making of a Peace, and which for the moſt part were agreed upon in the Peace afterward concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperour, were theſe:

Articles by Botſcay propounded unto the Emperour's Commiſſioners for the appeaſing of the Tumults in the upper Hungary.

Firſt, that it ſhould be lawful, for all ſuch as would, to have the free exerciſe of the reformed Religion. For although (as he ſaid) he was not ignorant that there was an ancient Decree amongſt the Hungarians, whereby all that profeſſed not the Catholick Religion, or that revolted from the ſame, were to be burnt, and that he deſired not to have that Article repealed; yet that his Requeſt was, That the Emperour, having regard unto the Troubles of the preſent time, would promiſe and aſſure, That from thenceforth no man ſhould be troubled for his Religion, or called in queſtion for his Conſcience and Belief. Beſides that, he requeſted to have the Principality of Tranſilvania during his Life; yet with this Condition, That after his death it ſhould again return unto the Emperour, ſo that the Emperour in his Abſence ſhould appoint a natural Hungarian to govern the ſame, as alſo to have the chief Government in Hungary. That there ſhould no more Biſhops ſit in Council but one, and that he, if it ſhould be ſo thought meet, ſhould bear the Office of the Chancellor. That the Liberties and Priviledges of that Kingdom ſhould be kept whole and inviolate. That it ſhould be lawful for him only to make choice of the chief Palatine of the Kingdom. That Goods confiſcated for any offence committed, ſhould not be diſperſed or ſold, but given to men of deſert. That all Offenders againſt the State from thenceforth ſhould be judged by the Council of Hungary. That none ſhould be preferred to Biſhopricks in Hungary, but ſuch as were of the noble Hungarian Blood. That all Injuries heretofore done, ſhould be abſolutely pardoned, forgiven and forgotten. All which things, if they might be granted, he promiſed to labour to the uttermoſt of his power, upon the beſt Conditions he might, to procure a Peace betwixt the Great Sultan and the Emperour. Laſt of all he requeſted, That the Charters of Peace, containing theſe Articles thus agreed upon, might be ſubſcribed and confirmed by the Biſhop of Rome, the Emperour, the King of Polonia, and all the Imperial Kingdoms and Provinces.

The Great Sultan loth that Botſcay ſhould come to a Peace with the Emperour.

The Turkiſh Sultan underſtanding of this Treaty of Peace betwixt the Emperour and Botſcay, by a Meſſenger ſent in haſte to Botſcay, ſought by great Offers and Promiſes to hinder the ſame; putting him withall in remembrance, That a little before this Treaty made, he had not only by Words, but by Letters alſo, ſubſcribed with his own hand, promiſed unto Botſcay's Ambaſſadors ſent to Conſtantinople, That he would bring to paſs, that Botſcay, rewarded with ſuch Priviledges as King John in former time enjoyed, ſhould in ſhort time be proclaimed and crowned King of Hungary, and that to that purpoſe he was even now ready to ſend a Scepter and a Crown, the Ornaments of a King, to Alba Regalis. But for the preſent, he by theſe Meſſengers ſent unto Botſcay two goodly Horſes, with Furniture of Gold, gliſtering with precious Stones. He ſent him alſo a rich Scimitar, a pair of golden Spurs, and a long Horſemans Coat garniſhed with Gold and precious Stones of great price; perſuading him valiantly to perſiſt in his former courſe and purpoſe. Which he failed not to do: for immediately after, he with a gallant Train went from Caſſovia into Tranſilvania, there to take of the Nobility of that Province the Oath of their Fidelity unto him; accounting no pains or labour great, which he took to turn the People from their Obedience unto the Emperour, and to ſtrengthen himſelf. At which time he alſo ſent Redeius his Chancellor, with ſome others, into Polonia, to renew the Confederation which was ſometime betwixt the Polonians and the Hungarians: who, being admitted unto the King's Preſence, and Audience given him, firſt declared the Cauſes of the Diſcord and Civil War that then was in Hungary, which he imputed chiefly unto the Oppreſſion of Religion, the free exerciſe thereof being forbidden them; and to the Inſolency of the Germans, who there at their pleaſure commanded over them. Upon which two Points he ſtood much, labouring with many Words to perſuade the King thereof; and afterwards requeſting him of his gracious Goodneſs, and of the care which he, together with other Chriſtian Princes, had for the common quiet of the Chriſtian Commonweal in general, and eſpecially of thoſe two diſtreſſed Countries, lying as it were even in the Enemies Mouth, to enter into Conſultation how the ſame Evils might be remedied, and thoſe ſo great Troubles again appeaſed, and to the effecting of ſo good a work to put to his helping hand. Whereunto the King anſwered, That the friendſhip wherein Botſcay offered to joyn with him being but the renewing of the ancient Amity betwixt the Countries of Polonia and Hungary, to be unto him pleaſing; howbeit, he could not for all that, (as he ſaid) well like of Botſcay's Revolt from that Houſe and Family, whereunto he was himſelf ſo near adjoyned in Affinity; promiſing yet nevertheleſs, that he would propound the matter unto his Nobility, to be farther conſidered of: which when he had indeed done, it was by common conſent agreed, That no Aid ſhould be given out of Polonia unto Botſcay or the Rebels; and that whoſoever ſhould from thence afford him any Aid, ſhould ſhould therefore loſe his Head. With which anſwer the Ambaſſadours returned to Botſcay much diſcontented, being now with a great Power again returned out of Tranſilvania to Caſſovia.

The Lord Ruſworm beheaded.

About this Time the Lord Ruſſworm (ſometimes General of the Emperours Army againſt the Turks in Hungary, a Man of great Note and Valour, and of whom we have before much ſpoken) at Prague falling into words, and from words to blows, with Francis Count Belioioſa his Brother, and their Men taking their parts on both ſides, it fortuned the ſaid Francis, the Earls Brother, being grievouſly wounded, to be there ſlain, Belioioſa himſelf being alſo in five places dangerouſly hurt; who ſo hardly proſecuted the Death of his Brother againſt the Lord Ruſſworm, that within a while after he was therefore by the Emperour condemned, and at Prague beheaded, and divers of his Men hanged, with ſuch Weapons hanging at their heels, as wherewith they had ſlain the ſaid Faancis, the Earls Brother.

The Turks Troubles againſt his Rebels and the Perſians in the Eaſt, an eaſe unto the Chriſtians in the Weſt.

Now was the time of the year come, when as the Turks great Armies were wont to be ſeen even in the heart of Hungary; howbeit, ſuch were their Troubles in Aſia, both with the Perſian and their own Rebels, that they were not at lieſure now to ſend ſuch great Forces as they had before uſed, into Hungary; neither could the Chriſtian Emperour on the other ſide now raiſe ſuch a Power as he had in former times done to oppoſe againſt them, and to hinder their proceedings. The Hungarians themſelves (his greateſt ſtrength in thoſe Wars) were now generally revolted from him, and for moſt part followed the Enſigns of the Rebel Botſcay. The Princes wont to ſend him aid both out of Italy and out of Germany, now afforded him little or none at all; and his mercinary Souldiers for want of pay were now almoſt every where up in Mutiny ready to forſake his Service, and to pay themſelves with the ſpoil of his Countries, even unto the Gates of Vienna. So that had not the Turks been ſo buſied in the Eaſt, but at lieſure to have turned their whole Power into Hungary, as oftentimes they had before done, it is hardly to be imagined what ſhould have letted them to have over-run, not only that which remained of Hungary, but even all Auſtria, with ſome good part of Germany alſo; the Emperours Preparations being then ſo ſmall, and his Forces ſo weak, as that they were not able to hold the field againſt his own rebellious Subjects, much leſs againſt ſo puiſſant and dreadful an Enemy. But God, which with his Word hath ſet bounds unto the raging Sea, beyond which it cannot paſs, and by whoſe Power Kings do reign, and Princes bear rule, had by other means averted the greateſt part of the Turks Forces Eaſtwards; ſo that Serdar Baſſa, Sultan Achmat's Lieutenant General for his Wars againſt the Chriſtians, came this year but with a right ſmall Army (in compariſon of thoſe which the Turkiſh Sultans were wont to ſend) into Hungary. Howbeit, with ſuch Forces as he brought, and with ſuch Supplies of the Rebels in Hungary as came unto him, he being grown fifty thouſand ſtrong, and out of fear of the Emperours Forces, came the nine and twentieth day of Auguſt to Strigonium, and with his Army (part Turks, part Tartars, and part diſloyal Chriſtians) encamped in the ſelf ſame place where the Turks Army had but the year before lodged; having brought with him forty great pieces of Batter, with all things elſe neceſſary for the Siege. Neither were the Turks ſooner encamped, but that the Tartars which came with them to the Siege (after their wonted manner) more deſirous of Prey and Booty than of Honour and Victory, paſſing over the River of Gran into the Territory of the Chriſtians, there ſpoiled and burnt all before them as they went.

Strigonium* beſieged by the Turks.

The Turks make a Bridge over the River of Danubius, to keep Strigonium from being that way relieved.

The Turks in the mean time to deprive the beſieged of all relief to be ſent unto them down the River of Danubius, made a great Bridge of Boats over the River, well fortified at both ends thereof on each ſide the River with a ſtrong Corps de guard for the defence thereof, ſo that nothing could that way paſs to or from the beſieged City. Which things much diſmaied them in the City, ſeeing no Preparations to be made on the other ſide for their Defence or Relief; yea Baſta himſelf, General of ſuch ſmall Forces as the Emperour had then, ſeeing the Enemy ſo ſtrong, and himſelf ſo weak, began greatly to doubt of the Event of this Siege; and yet neverthleſs reſolutely ſet down to employ both his Valour and his Wiſdom for the ſafeguard of the Place, he, during the time of the Siege, failed not to the uttermoſt of his Power to ſhew the Effects both of the one and of the other.

The Iſle of Strigonium ſpoiled by the Haiducks.

And now the Turks, aſſiſted with the Hungarian Rebels, had performed an Exploit upon the Iſle of Strigonium, as well to take the ſame from the Imperials, as for the ſpoil and pillage thereof. The Inhabitants there had ſtill remained faithful unto the Service of the Emperour, whom the Rebels for all that had oftentimes ſought both by force and by perſwaſion to have removed from this their Loyalty and juſt devoir. Within this Iſle were 200 Haiducks, returned again to the Emperours Service, who were joyned unto the Iſlanders, for the better defence both of them and of the Iſland. But the Rebels knowing well the Paſſages and Entrances into the Iſle, upon the ſudden ſurpriſed the ſame, and in it theſe poor Haiducks, whom they cut all in pieces; which loſs cauſed Baſta to reſolve to ſend the Wallons he had in his Army into the Iſle for the defence thereof. Which they of the Iſland underſtanding, made requeſt unto the General, That he would not in any wiſe ſo do, for that they greatly feared leſt the Wallons, being Men altogether given to the ſpoil, not finding the Rebels to prey upon, ſhould after their wonted manner prey upon them, the Emperours faithful Subjects. At whoſe inſtance, the former purpoſe for the ſending of the Wallons being changed, Collonitz himſelf was appointed unto that Service; with whom Monſieur de Laual, a Noble young Gentleman of France (who but a few days before was newly come unto the Camp, for the honourable deſire he had to ſee Service, and to ſerve himſelf, with his Troop of Horſemen whom he had brought with him out of France) went over into the Iſland alſo; Whereinto when as the Rebels ſhortly after again entered, they were by Collonitz overthrown and driven out of the Iſle, two hundred and fifty of them being ſlain, and above fifty more of them taken Priſoners. In which Conflict the noble young Gentleman Laual ſo bravely behaved himſelf, as that he gained unto himſelf much Honour and Renown, every mans Mouth being full of his Praiſes, and wondering to ſee ſo great Courage in ſo young years, he being then ſcarce nineteen years old. With which loſs the Rebels rather enraged than diſcouraged, ſhortly after returned again, in greater number, and better reſolved; where, betwixt them, and them that were left for the defence of the Iſland, was fought a more ſharp and bloody fight than was the former; yet ſo, as that the Rebels were enforced again with loſs to retire. In which ſo hot and bloody a Skirmiſh, Monſieur Laual, having moſt valiantly born himſelf againſt the Enemy, and done enough for his Honour, but not ſo contented, but carried away with the heat of Youth, and the deſire of Glory, and not otherwiſe to be perſwaded, but ſtill adventurouſly preſſing on the retiring Enemy, was there with a ſmall ſhot ſlain, all they which knew him much lamenting his untimely Death.

The Haiducks invading the Iſle of Strigonium, by Collonitz overthrown.

Monſieur Laual* ſlain.

But the Rebels not ſo diſcouraged, but ſtill in one place or other invading the Iſland, and threatning the Iſlanders with all Extremities, except they would take part with them; what by Force, what by Perſwaſion, ſo much prevailed with them, that the moſt part of them revolting from the Emperour, upon the ſudden ſet upon the Count of Rhene, being then in the Iſland, and having ſlain three hundred of his men, grievouſly wounded himſelf alſo. For the ſpeedy appeaſing of which Multitude, Baſta ſent over into the Iſland certain Companies of the Ratzians and Wallons, who not regarding that the Iſlanders were daily damnified by the Rebels, moſt miſerably ſpoiled them of whatſoever the Rebels had yet left them.

S. Thomas's Fort battered and aſſaulted by the Turks.

The Turks encamped before Strigonium, firſt planted their Battery againſt the ſtrong Fort, ſtanding aloft upon Saint Thomas's Hill; for that from thence they ſhould have received infinite harm, if they ſhould before the winning thereof have attempted to have won the City; it ſtanding on their Backs, and all the plain betwixt the Hill and the City wherein they were to plant their Battery being ſubject unto it. Which Fort, though very ſtrong, they with continual Battery by the ſpace of almoſt three weeks, having with infinite charge, and the loſs of a number of their Men, made aſſaultable, the four and twentieth day of September mounted the Hill to aſſault the ſame. Unto which aſſault they went up the Hill ſo thick, one thruſting another forward, that the Hill ſeemed now to be nothing but a mount or heap of armed Men, ſcarce any part of it being to be ſeen, it was ſo covered with them. Upon whom ſo ſwarming up, the Chriſtians in the Fort, having repoſed all the hope of their Welfare in their Valour, and reſolved thereby to die or live, courageouſly diſcharged their murthering ſhot, both great and ſmall, ſcarce any of their deadly Bullets falling in vain. Howbeit, the Turks, reſolutely ſet down for the performing of that they had taken in hand, without reſpect of Death or Danger, came ſtill deſperately on, until that they were come to the puſh of Pike, and ſo to handy blows even in the very Breaches, which the long Fury of the Turks Cannon had made very aſſaultable. Five hours this furious aſſault was by the Turks maintained, and by the Chriſtians with invincible Courage and Reſolution endured, many brave and valiant men falling on both ſides; and thrice the Turks repulſed, were enforced to retire, but were ſtill by their Commanders brought on again. The loſs was to both ſides common, many worthy Men there ending their Days, worthy of eternal Fame. The Chriſtians fell dead upon the Turks ſlain by their Valour, and the Turks upon the Chriſtians ſlain by their Multitude. But what ſhould we ſay? The Turks by numbers died, but not their Force, that being by their great numbers ſtill maintained even in deſpight of Death, and always living in their great Multitude yet left alive. Which was not ſo with the Defendants, but even quite contrary; who could not loſe one only man, without diminiſhing of their Forces, and means of reſiſtance; ſo that they ſtill loſt without hope of ſafeguard, and yet could not be in ſafety without continuing of their ſo great loſſes. But he that ſtill fighteth only for to ſave his Life, without hope of killing his Enemy, being too mighty for him to overcome, muſt needs at laſt die overcome, if it were but with very wearineſs. So in the end of this long and furious aſſault, nine hundred of the Chriſtians being ſlain, together with the Count Oetingen, their Chieftain, and his Lieutenant mortally wounded, and nothing now more left but a few ſore wounded men, and the dead Walls for the Turks to overcome, they entered the Place, ſlew thoſe few whom they found yet breathing, made booty of their Death, Blood, and Arms; and by the infinite price of their own Blood, gained that place which had now no more Blood or Life left in it. From whence they carried certain great pieces to help to batter the City withal, and to vanquiſh them, for whoſe defence they were but a little before appointed.

S. Thomas's Fort won by the Turks.

The baſe Town of Strigonium battered.

The Turks having thus gained Saint Thomas's Fort, even as they were yet embrued with Blood, and prick'd forward with Fury, forthwith planted thirty great pieces of Battery againſt the baſe Town of Strigonium, ſtanding low by the ſide of Danubius, and commonly called the Water Town; which they with all their Force and Fury moſt terribly battered. This baſe Town was environed with a Palliſado of Wood, to defend it againſt all ſudden Surpriſes, as almoſt all the Towns of Hungary are; Whereunto the confuſed Multitude of the Turks carried a number of bruſh Faggots, ſtuffed with Gunpowder and Brimſtone, which being ſet on fire, preſently ſet fire upon the Palliſado alſo, and burnt it down to the Ground, making a way for the Turks to come even to the Walls of the City; which they with their great Ordnance both Night and Day inceſſantly moſt terribly battered, untill that by the Fury of the Cannon they had therein made a fair and large aſſaultable Breach. A great ſhame for our Men to ſuffer the ſame ſo to be made, and not again repaired; whereas the Turks before in the ſame place, had made it good againſt the great Army of the Archduke Matthias, being never to be driven and forced out of it by the Chriſtians Valour, until they were therein ſlain; and to be now by our men through their Cowardiſe not to be able to be made good. For why, it was even the ſame Place of battel, the ſame Men, the ſame Arms, and the ſame form of Fight, but not the ſame Courages. The Turks can very well learn of us that which is for them profitable, and make uſe thereof to their own advantage; whereas we can borrow nothing of them to ſerve us againſt them, and ſo profit our ſelves by their Example. Beſides that, the confidence they have in their Multitude carrieth them unto ſuch Advantages, as from which the deſpair of being ſeconded and relieved keepeth us; whoſe boldneſs alſo, firmly grounded upon a Reſolution to die, paſſeth our Reſolution far, in fighting only to ſave our Lives.

The baſe Town of Strigonium aſſaulted.

The Breach ſo made, the Turks in good order, ſtayed upon a firm Reſolution, came bravely marching on, one of them thruſting another, and as it were, ſtriving among themſelves who ſhould have the honour to give the firſt charge, their haughtineſs of Mind animating of them to ſeek for Honour even where Perils were riſeſt; ſo to have the honour to die amongſt the moſt forward and valient men of War, rather than to live among Cowards of no Reputation or Valour. During the heat of which their ſo great and firm Reſolution, they regarded not the ſhowers of deadly Bullets falling amongſt them as thick as hail, as too weak to daunt their haughty Courages; but thruſting one another amidſt theſe ſo great Dangers, came unto the breach, there to try the matter hand to hand with our men. The Janizaries were the men eſpecially appointed to this Service, and had taken the ſame upon them; who with their great Muſquets on their Reſts cruelly gauled our men, expoſed to the danger of their deadly ſhot upon the brink as it were of their own Graves. The Great Baſſa himſelf was there preſent at the aſſault, encouraging his Souldiers with Speeches full of Terror and of Comfort, as he ſaw Occaſion for either to be uſed; wherewith he ſtirred up their Valour as is a Ship with a fair or rough gale of Wind. Death it ſelf could not overcome theſe Miſcreants, their number ſtill repairing in a Moment what Death had taken away in an Hour; whereas our Men ſlew others but to be ſlain themſelves; and fought not but to become Sacrifices unto Death themſelves, and not by their reſiſtance to carry away the Victory againſt inexorable Deſtiny. The fight was great and terrible, and the bullets ſtill flew, few of them falling in vain amongſt ſuch a multitude and preaſe of men. They of the high Town, who themſelves expected the like danger wherein their Companions now floated betwixt Life and Death, ſtood above looking on, not daring to give them aid, or to remove out of their ſtrength, but reſerving themſelves with all their Forces, for the ſole ſafeguard of themſelves, and for their own defence. Howbeit, all this while the Enemies Forces ſtill increaſed, and the Chriſtians diminiſhed; for Death could not weaken theirs, whereas it ſtill deſtroyed ours, who failed but in number, not in Valour, and gave place but unto the force of death, and not unto the force of men. All the deadly blows appointed to be given for the defence of a Breach, had been by our men given; all the Arms neceſſary for ſuch a purpoſe had been employed, all reſiſtance that could be deſired had been made, and all the Duties of valiant and worthy men performed; ſo that nothing here wanted but number, and not valour. But in all ſuch Actions there are two things neceſſary, the one for the helping of the other, for the correſpondency of their Power; which both joyned in one Body, may do all things, but being divided, can neither of them do any thing againſt him which is poſſeſſed of both.

Power and Valour the life of great Actions.

In fine, after four Attempts in this Aſſault, moſt of the Chriſtian Defendants being ſlain, the Turks forced the reſt, and gained the Breach, treading under foot the dead Bodies both of the Turks and of the Chriſtians, to get into the City. This Place thus won, and thoſe that were left put to the Sword, and the Town rifled; the Turks yet in breath, and all embrued in Blood, gave an Attempt unto the high Town, in ſome hope, even at that time, in ſo great a Confuſion of the Defendants, to have carried the ſame alſo. Howbeit, the Defendants beholding their Weapons yet dropping with the Blood of their Friends and Companions, and ready to ſhed theirs alſo, for the preſent notably repulſed them: Who, ſo diſappointed of their purpoſe, and deſiring to gain the Place with the leaſt loſs they might, reſolved to take the ſame by undermining of it, repoſing more truſt in the Spade and the Mattock, than in their Swords and Harquebuſes, being by Experience of their former Sieges taught, how hard and dangegerous a thing it was by Battery and Aſſault to obtain the ſame. This travel in the Mines took ſucceſs according to their deſire; for within a few days, the Mines, (with much labour) being brought to Perfection, and fire put unto them, they failed not to work their effect, but with their great Violence blew up the Walls, Rampiers, Men, and Munition, all together, caſting forth ſuch Smoaks and Flames as wherewith a number of the Defendants were ſmothered and burnt. Which Breaches ſo made, and the defences of the City blown up, in ſuch ſort, that the Chriſtians lay open to the Enemies deadly ſhot, being not able any more to ſhew themſelves without danger of their Lives, the Turks in order forthwith came to aſſault and force the ſame. Which the Captains of the Chriſtians beholding, prepared themſelves to withſtand them, and to that purpoſe would have given order unto their Souldiers for the defence both of the Breach and of the Walls; whom they found ſuch as Eumenes at his greateſt need found his, not willing in any wiſe to fight, and in the moſt aſſured peril of Death, without Courage, either to vanquiſh their Enemies, or defend themſelves; in ſuch ſort, that not one of them would put themſelves in order, ſhew themſelves upon the Breach, or come near the Walls. Lazy Cowards, chuſing rather to attend an aſſured death in their Cowardiſe and want of Courage, than to adventure their Lives into the danger of Arms; well deſerving to endure the ſame with diſhonour, ſeeing that they refuſed by honourable reſiſtance to preſerve their Lives. The Captains, for all that, by fair ſpeeches, and by threats, ceaſed not to ſtir them up; praying, exhorting, and ſometime with Death threatening them, if they thus refuſed to do their Duty, and with their naked Swords in their hands, would have enforced them to the Breach. But all in vain; their dead Courages being not to be revived or ſtirred up in their ſo great a fear of Death; Which much diſmayed the Captains, ſeeing their Lives and Honour, together with the Place, (through this Tumult and Cowardiſe of their Souldiers) to be in extream peril. During which time, the Turks coming on, had without any great reſiſtance gained the foot of the Breach; whom the Souldiers now ſeeing ſo near unto them, and out of hope to be relieved, and deſtitute of Courage alſo, inſtead of truſting unto their Arms and Valour, betook themſelves unto the refuge of their ſhame and Cowardiſe. For compaſſing in the Count Dampierre, Governour of the Place, they would by Reaſons have perſwaded him to have yielded, and by Threats have feared him from farther reſiſting of the Enemy. Their Fury emboldened them, proceeding not from their Valour, but from their Fear; ſtorming againſt their General for not being a Coward, as they themſelves were; trembling for fear of their Enemies, and inſulting againſt him. They had but one man of him to fight againſt, which made them furious and hardy; hardy with cowardiſe againſt one, not daring to hold up their Weapons againſt their Enemies, being many. Howbeit, the Count, in the middle of theſe Fears enraged, continued firm in his Reſolution, his Courage increaſing in this ſtorm of Mutiny, wiſhing rather to dye by the hands of his own Souldiers, in the performing of his Duty, than to be ſaved by the Turks in the bottom of his Diſhonour. Which his ſo brave a Reſolution cauſed him even in the midſt of theſe furious and tumultuous Companies, to put them in mind of their Duties, and to perſwade with them, That the Peril they ſo much feared, was greater through their own fear, than indeed it was; that only their fearful Apprehenſion made the danger, and not the Action that was by them to be performed; ſeeing, that it was impoſſible for the Enemy to overcome them, if they would but reſolutely ſtand upon their Valour to reſiſt him. That all things reſting but in Opinion, were by themſelves to be ſubdued, if they had but the deſire to overcome them, and yet of power to overthrow them, if they will yield to their diſhonour. That therefore they ſhould propound unto themſelves the Honour and the Shame that was to enſue unto them, by the different Deportment of themſelves in this Action, how much the deformity of the one differed from the beauty of the other, and aſpire unto the Honour which their Enemies had ſometimes got in the ſame Place, and in the very ſame Action wherein they were now, for having with leſs appearance of their ſafety overcome the like danger, wherein their holding out had made them Victorious with Honour, without any great fight at all. That it ſhould be an eternal Infamy unto them, That the Turks ſhould ſurmount them by their Reſolution, in an Action wherein they ought to ſhew themſelves moſt valorous; and by their Cowardiſe become ſubject unto them, whom at other times they had accounted unworthy to be compared with them in Valour. That they ſhould lay their Hands upon their Hearts, and remember their Eſtate and Faith; bound unto the firſt by their Honour, and to the ſecond by their Duty. That they were Men of War, living by their Pay, which bound them to the Service of him from whom they received it, even unto Death; having before obliged their Lives unto their Pay; and that they were Chriſtian Subjects, bound to keep their Promiſe given by Oath before God. That forgetting either the one or the other of theſe things, they deprived themſelves of the Pay promiſed to them which performed their Service; and loſing their Renown in this World for their Cowardiſe, and in the World to come for breaking their Faith. That therefore they ſhould continue conſtant in the performance of their Duty, reſolving themſelves rather to endure an honourable Death, unto which belonged the recompence of an eternal Fame for their Valour and Fidelity, than to prolong a miſerable Life with perpetual Infamy for their Cowardiſe; whereof for all that, they could no more aſſure themſelves by the yielding up of the place, than by the defending thereof, for as much as the Turks were oft times even as cruel upon them that yielded, as thoſe that reſiſted; keeping no Faith with the Chriſtians, but as beſt ſtood with their Profit and their Pleaſure. And that therefore for his part he was reſolved, rather to die with Honour in the Place, than to be beholden to his Enemies for an infamous and miſerable Life. And that therefore he beſought them to follow him in this laſt Action of their devoir, which carried with it all the Trophies of their precedent Actions, wherein they had oftentimes aſſiſted him in many Actions of leſs worth, and of much greater Peril.

Moſt ſhameful Cowardiſe.

This Diſcourſe, grounded upon ſo good Reaſons, and proceeding from ſo great Valour, might have prevailed with any other generous Minds, except with theſe degenerate Souldiers, who by their Cowardiſe had hardened themſelves againſt all the points of Honour which might any way move them; in ſuch ſort, that they ſtood as faſt in their baſe Cowardiſe, as did their General in his valorous and conſtant Reſolution. They ſtood with their Hands behind them, without any Weapons in them, as was their Minds without any Courage at all; and as Men appointed to be ſacrificed upon the Altar of Death, attending without moving, but the Hands of them that ſhould ſacrifice them. Great and ſhameleſs Cowardiſe, not daring by reſiſtance to withſtand the Violence of their Enemies, for fear of hindering them in their deſires, being indeed ſuch as had vowed their Death to ſatisfie their own Fury. Mean while, ſome of theſe Souldiers ſeeing their Speeches to be but vain, and not able to move their Governour to ſatisfie their deſire, conceived the ſame their Requeſts, with the Reaſons thereof, into Writing, which they ſent unto him. Which the Governour having read, in their ſight tore their Letters in pieces, and trod the ſame under his Feet; rejecting as well their Demands by Letters, as he had done their Requeſts by Words. In brief, having forgotten nothing of the Duty of a worthy General, and valiant Captain, joyned now thereunto the Office of a ſimple Souldier, going himſelf unto the breach, with ſome few, to defend the ſame. But the more the Count ſtood upon this his ſo great Reſolution, the more theſe cowardly and mutinous Villains proceeded in their baſe Obſtinacy, in ſo much that they fell from Prayers to Fury and Rage, threatning to deliver him their Governour, together with the Place, unto the Enemy, to ſave their Lives, if he himſelf would not by Treaty ſave them from the imminent Perils. If theſe baſe Cowards were before deaf unto the juſt Remonſtrances of their Governour, which might have preſerved them from Death and Infamy, he was alſo as deaf as they, to conceive their Requeſts, or to be moved with their Threats; knowing that he had more Reaſon on his ſide, by conſtant Valour to withſtand the wicked and ſhameful Reſolution of his Souldiers, than they had with Diſhonour to enforce him, or to offer him Violence, to their eternal Shame and Infamy.

Moſt horrible Inſolency of mutinous Souldiers againſt their Governour.

In the mean time, theſe obſtinate and enraged Cowards proceeded from Words to Deeds, and from Requeſts to Violence, as did oft times the diſloyal Souldiers of Rome, in ſlaying the good Emperours. For they in cruel manner, without Reverence, by force layed Hands upon the Governour, put him in Priſon, and afterwards craving Parley, fell to Treaty with the Great Baſſa about the delivery up of the Place. Wherewith the Baſſa well contented, ſent in unto them Haly Baſſa, to conclude the matter. Where, after ſome little Talk, it was agreed, That they ſhould deliver up the Place (which was not indeed theirs to diſpoſe of) and that the Baſſa ſhould therefore promiſe and ſuffer them with Bag and Baggage in ſafety to depart whither they would, with their Enſigns frilled up, and Fire in their Matches; leaving behind them their great Ordnance, with all their other Munition and Warlike Proviſion. Which only Compoſition, by the perfidious Souldiers made in the abſence and in durance of their General, was by the Turks faithfully kept, amongſt a thouſand others like before by them broken; whether it were in reſpect of the eaſie Conqueſt of the City, (being one of the chief and principal Places of all Hungary) or for that they being overjoyed with the gaining of that which they had ſo long deſired, and now ſo little hoped for, they forgot their wonted cruelty and breach of Faith, is doubted.

The Conditions whereupon Strigonium was to be delivered unto the Turks.

The extraordinary Courteſie of the Turks toward the Garriſon Souldiers of Strigonium at their departure thence.

This City thus yielded the Third of October, and the Turks forgetting their wonted Cruelty, according to their Faith and Promiſe before given, in ſafety conducted theſe cowardly Souldiers within a League of Comara, helping them by the way to carry their ſick and wounded Men, together with their Fardles, which the Turks oft-times carried upon their own Shoulders. Theſe Cowards, which thus went out, with their Governour ſent out alſo with them, were in number a thouſand whole and ſound men, fitted, whilſt they were in the City, with all things neceſſary for their Honour and Defence of the Place; but themſelves deſtitute and void of all Honour and Courage. A thouſand, which all together were not worth their Governour alone, ſeeing that in him alone there remained more Valour, than in all that whole Multitude. Many of the Inhabitants which had there long dwelt, would not forſake the Place, but by the leave of the Turks there remained ſtill; the reſt which would not, having leave in ſafety to depart whither they would.

Thus this famous City of Strigonium, one of the ſtrongeſt Bulwarks of Chriſtendom againſt the Turks, which the Chriſtians had now holden by the ſpace of ten Years and one Month, after that it was by Count Charles Mansfelt won from the Turks, when as it had long time before been in the Turks Poſſeſſion, won from the Chriſtians by Sultan Solyman, now again (as is before ſaid) fell into the Power of the Turks, with threeſcore and ten pieces of great Ordnance, and a wonderful deal of other Warlike Proviſion.

The Captains and chief authors of the Mutiny, and yielding up of Strigonium, impriſoned, condemned, and moſt ſhamefully, but worthily executed.

Theſe baſe and cowardly Souldiers, together with the Count their Governour, being come to Comara, were juſtly deſpoiled both of their Honour and of their Arms, and ſent back again to Presburg, where, curſed and deteſted of all the World, and eſpecially of the Hungarians themſelves; (who, although they were revolted from their Allegeance toward the Emperour, yet could they not but much deteſt their ſo ſhameful and notable Cowardiſe) were there the chief of them committed to Priſon, where after they had for a certain time lain, and being brought to Judgement, and convicted of Treaſon, in delivering up the City of Strigonium unto the Turks, and in ſo doing, to have greatly damnified the Chriſtian Commonweal, they were therefore Condemned, and according to the quality of their offences, diverſly, in this manner Executed: Captain Leonard Frederick Schleker had his Judgement, firſt to have his right Hand cut off, and his Tongue drawn out behind his Neck, and both of them nail'd to the Gallows, and afterwards to be hanged; howbeit, through the Interceſſion of many of his Friends, he was not hanged, but beheaded: John Michael Schorer, John Hopſi, Adam Lindawar, Philip Dur, and Caſpar Lielbarter, all Captains, were adjudged to have their right Hands firſt cut off and nail'd to the Gallows, and afterward hanged, but through the Interceſſion of County Mansfield, they were hanged, and their Hands not cut off: John Lautenberger, was condemned to be quarter'd alive, but was at the Interceſſion of County Mansfield, firſt beheaded, and afterward quartered: John Diſchoff, with eleven other, were only hanged: Laurence Marſtat, was enjoyned to ſerve two Years againſt the Turks, as a common Souldier, without Pay, but through the Interceſſion of County Mansfield, had one Year pardon'd him: Jeremy Strelin, with divers others, which were either fled, or elſe remained ſtill in Strigonium, were judged, their Names to be ſet upon the Gallows; and being afterwards caught, ſome of them to be quartered, and others their Hands to be cut off, and nail'd upon the Gallows, and afterward hanged. And thus theſe diſloyal Captains, by ſhunning of an honourable Death in defence of Strigonium, and performing of their Duty; by neglecting the ſame, procured unto themſelves a moſt ſhameful Death, attended upon with perpetual Infamy and Diſhonour.

But, as the loſs of this ſtrong Place was unto the Chriſtians heavy and grievous, ſo was it unto the Turks no leſs pleaſing and joyful; it being the Place they had of long above all others deſired, and whereat they had ever ſince the loſs thereof, with their great Armies in Hungary, for the ſpace of ten Years ſtill aimed. Howbeit, this their Joy endured not long, their Proſperity being too hot to hold out without ſome cooling blaſt of adverſe Fortune. For the ſame report of Fame, which with the right hand preſented unto the Great Sultan, at Conſtantinople, the pleaſing news of the winning of Strigonium in Hungary; even with the left hand delivered likewiſe unto him the melancholy report of the Overthrow of his great Armies in Aſia, with the loſs of Damaſco, the greateſt City of Syria. For, to begin with the greateſt firſt: The King of Perſia, invaded by Cicala Baſſa, Sultan Achmat's great Lieutenant in Aſia; and hearing that the Baſſa of Caramania had expreſs charge, with all ſpeed to come unto him with a great ſupply of Souldiers, to be taken up in Caramania, and the Countries thereabout; he then having a puiſſant Army on foot, before prepar'd for all Events, preſently ſet forward againſt Cicala, whom he coming upon before he was ready to fight, by his unexpected coming, and ſudden charge, overthrew his Army, and took from him all his great Ordnance; Cicala himſelf, with three hundred Souldiers, with much ado eſcaping, and retiring himſelf to Adena; which City, the Perſian King, purſuing Cicala, ſhortly after ſtraitly beſieged. With which unlucky news, Sultan Achmat much troubled, forthwith writ unto the Baſſa of Trebezond, with all ſpeed to ſend aid unto Cicala; who, taking unto him ſome other of the Turks Commanders, with a great Army ſet forward on his Journey. Of whoſe coming, Cicala hearing, the better to direct the Baſſa in his proceeding, cauſed himſelf, with ten of his Souldiers whom he beſt truſted, ſecretly by Night to be let down over the Walls of the City: And ſo coming to the Baſſa, together with him kept on his way to joyn Battel with the King, as near unto the City as he could, for that he had taken order before he came out of the City, that ſo ſoon as they ſhould perceive the Battel to be joyned, they ſhould forthwith ſally out upon the backs of the Perſians, and ſo by holding of them with a doubtful Battel, to further the Victory: All which, the Perſian King hearing of the Baſſa's coming, wiſely doubting, and not willing to forſake the Siege, divided his Army, and leaving one part thereof to continue the Siege, went himſelf with the other to meet the Baſſa; wherein he uſed ſuch Expedition and Speed, that with all his Power falling upon him before he could put his men in order, or range his Battel, he made of the Turks (now confuſedly, and without all order, fighting more for the ſafeguard of their Lives, than for any hope they had of Victory) ſuch an exceeding great Slaughter, that few of them eſcaped, but were there almoſt all ſlain; Cicala himſelf, but with two or three more, having much ado, by getting into a little Boat, and ſo by paſſing over the River, to eſcape the danger. After which Victory ſo eaſily gained, the King returning again to the Siege, after many ſharp and great Aſſaults thereunto given, and many Men on both ſides loſt, had the ſame at length yielded unto his mercy.

The Baſſa of Trebezond with his Army diſcomfited by the Perſian King.

Now with this news of the loſs of his Armies, and of the Victories of the Perſian King, Sultan Achmat enraged, cauſed Cicala Baſſa's Houſe, at Conſtantinople, full of Treaſure and Wealth, to be rifled; after the manner of the World, deeming of the doings of him ſo great a Captain, according to the event and evil ſucceſs thereof, though not in his power to have been remedied; nevertheleſs, ſhortly after, he cauſed great ſums of Money to be delivered out of his Treaſures, and new Forces raiſed, for the renewing of the War againſt the Perſian King. Unto which Service, (now become unto the Turks dreadful) when as many of the Janizaries were to be appointed, they, after their proud and inſolent manner, all ariſing up in Mutiny, ſaid flatly, That they would not ſtir one foot out of Conſtantinople, except they were both before hand payed, and aſſured alſo to have their Wages increaſed; complaining grievouſly withal, of the Baſſa of Damaſco, the Great Sultan's high Treaſurer, that he, converting the Sultan's Treaſures to his own uſe, did not pay the Souldiers their wages due. For the appeaſing of which Mutiny and Tumult, the Sultan cauſed the ſame Baſſa to be apprehended, and his Head ſtrucken off, and ſo with the price of his Blood again appeaſed them.

The Janizaries Mutiny.

But leaving the Perſian King triumphing in his Victories, and the Great Sultan grieving at his Loſſes, let us turn aſide into Syria, to ſee the Troubles the Turks had even amongſt themſelves, to the weakning of their State, and the increaſing of the Great Sultan's Cares and Grief. The two Baſſaes of Damaſco and Aleppo, had (as is before declared) been at great Diſcord and Variance betwixt themſelves, and the Baſſa of Aleppo in field overthrown, and in his City beſieged, glad to make Peace with the other Baſſa, by yielding unto all ſuch things as it pleaſed him to demand. Which two Baſſaes for all that being diverſly affected unto the State, long agreed not, he of Damaſco continuing faithful in his Allegiance towards the Great Sultan, and the other of Aleppo ſecretly inclining unto Rebellion. Which the Baſſa of Damaſco perceiving, and joyning unto him the Baſſaes of Tripolis and Gazare, with their united Forces went againſt the Baſſa of Aleppo, leading with them 60000 good men, with purpoſe to have beſieged the Baſſa of Aleppo, his Enemy, in his City. But he betimes advertiſed of this his Deſign, and not unprovided for his coming, quickly called together his Forces, and had in very ſhort time raiſed an Army of thirty thouſand valiant men, whom he encouraging, and finding them willing to follow him whitherſoever he would lead them, marched directly towards his Enemies; with whom he meeting, readily joyned Battel with them, which was fought with ſuch fury and hideous noiſe, as if it had been two thunder-claps oppoſing each other in one Cloud, ſtriving of themſelves which ſhould burſt out firſt, being like People, like Arms, and like order of fight. The medley for a great time continued ſharp and furious, the number of the one ſide countervailing the valour of the other, and the others valour ballancing the others great number; howbeit in the end the one Baſſa overcame the other three, and the ſmaller number the greater, and putting them to flight, remained ſole Victors of the Field. Now the victorious Baſſa, as wiſe to uſe the Victory, as he was valiant to obtain the ſame, ſo eagerly purſued them, that without giving them leave to breath, he beſieged Tripolis, the Baſſa whereof at his coming abandoned the ſame, and carrying with him all his Treaſure, fled into Cyprus; which made the taking of the Place unto the victorious Baſſa eaſie, who rifled and ranſacked the ſame; and not content with this Conqueſt, forthwith beſieged the great and ſtrong City of Damaſco, reſolved to die in the Plains thereof, or to become victorious within the Walls of the ſame. During which Siege, the Baſſa of Tripolis had out of the Provinces and Countries of the Turks thereabouts, raiſed another great Army, and was coming to raiſe the Siege, and to reſcue the City. Whereof the Baſſa of Aleppo hearing, roſe with the greateſt part of his Army, and meeting with him, gave him battel, and therein the ſecond time overthrew him and put him to flight. Which misfortune ſo diſmayed the Minds of the beſieged, that deſpairing of all Succour and Relief, they, by conſent of their Governour, fell to Parley with the Enemies, and ſo upon certain Capitulations yielded unto him the Place. Whereinto the Baſſa entring, found therein great Treaſure, raiſed of the Turks Tributes, whereupon he ſeiſed, and by the means thereof reſolved to make himſelf maſter of all Syria, the chief City whereof he had now in his own Power; whereunto he gave free Acceſs and Traffick unto all the Merchants of Perſia, and of the Indies.

The Baſſa's of Damaſco, Tripolis, and Gazare, overthrown by the Baſſa of Aleppo.

The Baſſa of Tripolis the ſecond time overthrown by the Baſſa of Aleppo.

Damaſco taken and rifled by the Baſſa of Aleppo.

The Beglerbeg of Natolia's Lieutenant with his Army diſcomfited by the Baſſa of Aleppo.

Now in the time of this his Proſperity, News was brought him, That the Beglerbeg of Natolia had ſent his Lieutenant with a great Army againſt him; who, knowing that Diligence was the Spirit of Conqueſt, and that to conquer was to little purpoſe, without a vigilant care for the Preſervation thereof, reſted not upon his former good Fortune, but marched directly towards his Enemies: Wherein his Succeſs was anſwerable unto his Deſign, for within the ſpace of two days he had taken all the Paſſages which might give way unto his Enemies to diſtreſs him; and in the ſtraights of the Mountains, whereby the Enemy was to paſs, layed a great Ambuſh of two thouſand Harquebuſiers, and three thouſand Horſe, who the Enemies being paſſed, and he charging them a head, ſet upon them in the Rereward, and brought ſuch a fear upon them, that having made a great fight, in fine, they having loſt a number of Men, were glad to flie, and to leave the Victory to the Baſſa. And to the increaſing of his good haps, he intercepted a Ship, caſt by Weather upon that Coaſt, laded with great Treaſure, bound from Alexandria to Conſtantinople, with the Tributes of Egypt, belonging to the Great Sultan. Of all which things the Perſian King advertiſed, ſought to joyn with him in Amity, highly commending his valiant Acts, and ſending unto him honourable Preſents; to wit, a Piſtol, an Helmet, and a Targuet, all ſet with pretious Stones, eſteemed to be worth fifty thouſand Crowns. This Flame of Rebellion ſpred abroad out of Syria into Caramania, and ſo farther and farther into the leſſer Aſia. Which was the cauſe that the Great Sultan ſent with all ſpeed unto the Viſier Baſſa, then in Hungary; commanding him, now that Strigonium was taken, which before had hindered the concluding of Peace, he ſhould now upon reaſonable Conditions conclude the ſame, to the end, that his Affairs on this ſide of his Empire being ſet in quiet and ſecurity, he might forthwith after turn his Forces againſt the Perſians and the Rebels in Aſia.

But after all theſe great Troubles, to return again into Hungary. The Rebels there had of long beſieged the ſtrong Town of Newhuſe, as is before declared; which being hitherto valiantly defended by the German Garriſon therein, was now brought to ſuch Extremity, as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible to be longer defended, the Garriſon Souldiers therein being with often Aſſaults for the moſt part ſlain, and the reſt of them that were left grievouſly wounded. Of which ſtrong Town (being as it were the Key of that ſide of the Country) the Turks, which together with the Rebels beſieged the ſame, were, for the commodious Scituation thereof very deſirous; and the Rebels thereunto as unwilling, for that it being once in their hand, would hardly ever be again from them recovered. For which cauſe Illiſhaſcius, one of the Captains of the Hungarian Rebels, then at the Siege thereof, perceiving it could not long be kept, to the intent that the Turks ſhould not by force obtain the ſame, by Letters requeſted of Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant, though then his Enemy, That the Town might be delivered unto Humanoius, another Captain of the Hungarian Rebels, leſt the Turks ſhould by force obtain the ſame; aſſuring him upon the Peril of his own Life, and the Confiſcation of all his Goods to the Emperour, that upon a Reconciliation and Peace to be made betwixt the Emperour and the Hungarians his Subjects, he ſhould again deliver the ſame Town and Fortreſs into his Poſſeſſion. Whereupon by commandment of the Arch-duke, and of Baſta, the Town was yielded up the ſeventeenth day of the Month of October, unto the aforeſaid Humanoius, and the Hungarians only received into the Town; yet with this Condition, That the German Souldiers which were yet left, and who had valiantly thus long endured the Siege, might ſtill ſtay in the Town in Pay, and keep watch and ward together with the reſt of the Hungarians, Humanoius having command over them all.

Newhuſe yielded unto the Hungarian Rebels.

Wherefore the Turks, ſeeing themſelves diſappointed of their Purpoſe, for the obtaining of this ſtrong Town, riſing by Night, and not a little diſcontented with the Hungarians, marched towards Strigonium, at the Siege whereof the Viſier Baſſa lay. Howbeit within a few days after, the Hungarians not liking to have the Germans in Garriſon with them, turned them with their Captain Strenius out of the Town, and yet ſafely conducted them to Comara.

Altenſoll yielded to the Hungarian Rebels.

At the ſame time, they of Altenſoll, another ſtrong Town of the upper Hungary, not far from Newhuſe, having been long beſieged by the Rebels, and driven for want of Victual to eat their Horſes, for the ſpace of five Weeks; and having now eaten them all but ſeven, and nothing elſe left, yielded themſelves, together with their Town, to the Rebels; as did alſo they of Wiglas, Shemnitz, and Cremnitz.

In the mean time, Botſcay, with a very great Army of his Hungarian Rebels, came to Tyirna, a ſtrong Town, about ſixteen Miles diſtant from Vienna, attended upon with a Guard of an hundred tall Souldiers, gallantly apparelled all in blew; a little before whoſe coming, Humanoius, unto whom Newhuſe was a little before yielded, had ſummoned Presburg, requiring the ſame to be yielded unto him. Which thing, Botſcay, being now come, by Letters likewiſe required of the Citizens, threatning otherwiſe moſt ſtraitly to beſiege them. Whereupon, Schonberg, Governour of Presburg, doubting of the faithfulneſs of the Citizens, being almoſt all Hungarians, retired himſelf, with a good part of his Souldiers, into the Caſtle; with Proteſtation, to ſpend his Life, and all that he had, for the keeping and defence thereof. With whoſe Conſtancy the Citizens moved, continued firm in their Allegeance to the Emperour; which Botſcay perceiving, and that the City was not to be got by threats, forthwith removed and went to Peſth, where he was moſt honourably received by the Viſier Baſſa, and by him preſented with a Crown of curious workmanſhip, and threeſcore thouſand Duckets, with five and twenty moſt goodly Horſes; and there, having received from him full power to entreat of Peace, and to conclude the ſame with the Imperials, with Haly Baſſa, and certain other of the chief of the Turks, joyned in Commiſſion with him, again departed, and went to Kyrpa, unto an Aſſembly of the Hungarians there to be holden; whither but a little before Sigiſmund Forgat was come with the Emperour's Reſolution concerning the Negotiation of Peace, whenas in the mean time other Commiſſioners from the Emperour were come to Comara about the Treaty of Peace with the Turks, they themſelves ſo requiring. Howbeit, Collonitz, at the ſame time by Letters writ unto the Archduke, adviſing him that this Treaty of Peace might not, together and at one time, be taken in hand with the Turks and the Rebels; but that if it were poſſible, an Attonement ſhould be firſt made with the Rebels, and afterward a Peace concluded with the Turks; the common good of the Commonweal ſo requiring; for that he perceived the Turks indeed not to be deſirous of Peace at all, but only to go about, by keeping of the Chriſtians at variance among themſelves, and in ſuſpence between hope and fear, to do them harm, and themſelves good; which was afterward found to be ſo indeed.

Botſcay obtaineth leave of the Viſier Baſſa, to entreat of Peace with the Emperours Commiſſioners.

The Perſian King had ſome Months before ſent three Ambaſſadors unto his Imperial Majeſty, who being come at divers times one after another, were all with peculiar Letters diſmiſſed from Prague, the 29*th.* of November. Unto the firſt of which Ambaſſadors, Letters were given of this purport.

The Emperours Letters unto the Perſian King.

ZInel Chan Beg, whom your Majeſty hath ſent Ambaſſador unto Us, we have willingly ſeen and received, and given him Audience, in declaring of ſuch things, as he had from you in charge. It is unto Us both acceptable and pleaſing, that your Majeſty hath regard, ſo friendly to ſalute Us, and ſo carefully to ſeek to joyn in Amity and Friendſhip with Us, whereby your Majeſty much bindeth Us unto the like deſire of mutual love and friendſhip; and that We again on our parts ſhould be ready to perform ſuch things as may be unto your Majeſty pleaſing; and that we ſhould wiſh for nothing more, than that our Friendſhip ſhould daily more and more be confirmed, and for the common Good of Us both, for many years preſerved: wherein We for our parts will not be wanting. Whereas your Majeſty with great Courage hath undertaken, and with ſo happy ſucceſs of Victories continued your Wars againſt the Turk, whereof you had ſo juſt cauſe, We from our hearts in your behalf rejoyce, as all other Chriſtians worthily do; and We our ſelves are thereby much animated valiantly and conſtantly to proceed in our Wars, which we now ſo many years have made with the ſame Enemy, nothing doubting, but that God, the revenger of wrong, will ſo proſper the honourable Endeavours of your Majeſty, as that you ſhall not only recover ſuch things as have been wrongfully taken from you, but alſo weaken and deſtroy the Power of that perfidious Enemy. Which, that it may the better be brought to paſs, We alſo renew our Wars, raiſe greater Forces, and by our Ambaſſadors and Letters, exhort and incite the greateſt Chriſtian Princes and Potentates to extend their Power againſt this our common Enemy; and thereby to give fitter opportunity and occaſion unto your Majeſty, for the better proceeding of your Affairs in Aſia. The courſe of our notable Victories, which we have in few years paſt obtained againſt the Turks, the Tumults and Troubles which the Turks have by ſecret devices raiſed in Hungary, have ſomewhat hindred; howbeit, we hope by Gods permiſſion, that all things ſhall ſhortly be again reſtored unto their former eſtate, ſo that we may wholly without let turn our ſelves with our Power againſt the Turks. Yet in the mean time, we have thus much prevailed with the King of Spain, as that he hath already ſet forth a Fleet unto the borders of his Territories, to diſtract his Forces; the proſperous Succeſs of which Fleet we daily expect. We have alſo moved the Pope, that he ſhould alſo give Aid in this common Cauſe, and excite other Princes alſo to do the like, which he with great Endeavour doth. But concerning ſuch things as ſhall hereafter happen, We ſhall by Letters and Ambaſſadors certifie your Majeſty as occaſion ſhall require; as at this preſent we had appointed to ſend unto you the Baron of Dohna, a famous and noble Gentleman, who (all things being ready for his Journey) ſuddenly dyed; and would now have ſent another, had not the unexpected change of the Affairs of the Muſcovites otherwiſe diſſuaded Us, we having no other way but that, at this time, to ſend into Perſia. For concerning this great Prince, who is now reported there to reign, what his mind is, or how he ſtandeth affected, we have as yet no Experience. In the mean time, We ſo deſire a perpetual and firm Friendſhip to be eſtabliſhed betwixt Us and your Majeſty, with a certain ſecure and free Commerce, that if your Majeſty (which We wiſh) ſhall extend your Victories unto the Sea, your Subjects may have free Acceſs and Traffick unto all our Kingdoms and Dominions. We alſo thank your Majeſty, That you ſo kindly entertain the Chriſtians into your Kingdoms, and grant to them to have the free exerciſe of their Religion; as alſo for that you have ſent your Ambaſſadors unto the King of France, although without wiſhed Succeſs, whereby We eaſily gather your Majeſties great Care and Circumſpection every way. As concerning them whom your Majeſty hath ſent unto Us, they have diligently and faithfully performed their Duty, ſo that they have deſerved Praiſe and Favour, both here and in Perſia; whom we much Commend unto your Majeſty, to whom in all things We offer our greateſt Love and Affection.

Unto the Second Ambaſſador were alſo given Letters from the Emperour, to this effect.

W*Hilſt We were yet buſied in the diſpatch of* Zinel Chan Beg, your Majeſties former Ambaſſador, in the mean time, Methi Culi Beg, another Ambaſſador of yours came unto Us, whom we have courteouſly entertained, and graciouſly heard; by whoſe Speech, as alſo by your Majeſties Letters, We have with exceeding great Pleaſure underſtood both your friendly Greeting of Us, as alſo of the happy Succeſs of your Affairs againſt the Turks, ſince the departure of your former Ambaſſador, together with your kind Affection towards the Chriſtians in thoſe Parts. One of the Servants alſo of our Ambaſſador which dyed by the way, hath reported unto Us, how courteouſly our ſaid Ambaſſador was by your Majeſty received; and how you have ſhewed your ſelf affected againſt the common Enemy, which was unto Us a thing both acceptable and pleaſing. Unto both which your Embaſſies the more ſolemnly to anſwer, We had appointed again to ſend an honourable Embaſſage unto your Majeſty, had not theſe Lets and Impediments hapned, which in our Letters given unto your former Ambaſſador are declared. But ſo ſoon, and as often as may be, We will endeavour, either by Letters, or by Ambaſſadors, more at large to manifeſt our Love and Affection towards you. Wherefore we greatly deſire that your Majeſty may continue in perfect Amity with Us, and valiantly proceed in ſubduing of the common Enemy; We on our part being ready to perform all things whereby we may teſtifie unto you the deſire we have for the preſervation of our mutual Love and Friendſhip; as alſo of our Endeavours in our Wars againſt him. God Almighty long preſerve your Majeſty in Health, and make you ſtill Victorious againſt the common Enemy.

Unto the Third Ambaſſador were likewiſe Letters given from the Emperour, of this purport.

W*Hereas* Jus Baſſi Haſſan Beg, your Majeſties Ambaſſador unto the French King, came this way, at the ſame time that other two of your Ambaſſadors were here preſent with Us, we received him with the ſame Courteſie wherewith we received them, making ſtay of him, until that they might all three be together diſmiſſed. And, for becauſe that his Embaſſage was undertaken for the furtherance of the common Good, although it wanted the wiſhed ſucceſs, yet We have thought it good to give thanks unto your Majeſty therefore, and in moſt friendly manner to greet you by this your ſaid Ambaſſador, whom we highly commend unto you, for that for the time he here ſtayed in our Court, he ſo behaved himſelf, as that he well deſerved both our and your Majeſties Favour, whereof we wiſh him to be partaker. Almighty God bleſs your Majeſty with all Felicity, and long to his good Pleaſure preſerve the ſame.

Theſe Ambaſſadors with theſe Letters thus diſmiſſed, one of them went into Polonia, and there declared unto the King the great Love and Affection of the Perſian King towards him, offering unto him all love and kindneſs; firſt requeſting him, That he would joyn with his Majeſty in all friendſhip and brotherly love; and then, that he would take up Arms againſt the Turk, their common Enemy; promiſing on his Maſters behalf, That he ſhould not lay down Arms until that Enemy were utterly brought to nought and deſtroyed, ſo that the Chriſtian Princes would on the other ſide likewiſe impugn him. This was a ſtrange Meſſage, and not before heard of in Polonia, where, for all that, the Meſſenger was courteouſly and bountifully entertained, and afterward with good words put in hope of obtaining what he had requeſted, was honourably diſmiſſed.

The Turks and Hungarian Rebels by the Imperials overthrown.

But leaving theſe Ambaſſadors unto their long Journey; to return again into Hungary. A great number of the Turks and Hungarian Rebels, meeting together at Hidweg, had a purpoſe ſecretly to have ſurpriſed and oppreſſed the Imperial Souldiers in their Camp. Of which their purpoſe they in good time advertiſed, and therefore keeping good Watch and Ward, ſo received the Turks and Rebels at their coming, contrary to their Expectation, as that after a ſmall fight, they cauſed them to betake themſelves to flight; whom the Imperials ſo hotly purſued towards Caniſia, that they ſlew of them above a thouſand, took about two hundred more of them Priſoners, with fifteen hundred Horſe, which they carried away with them, and ſo having left ſufficient Garriſons on that ſide of the Country towards Caniſia, returned themſelves towards Vienna. In the mean time, the Commiſſioners from the Emperour being met together at Comara, about the Treaty of Peace with the Turks and the Hungarians, the ſixth of December, receiving Letters from the Baſſa of Buda, certain of them, the next day after, went by water down the River of Danubius to Buda; where, they being honourably received, and having much and long Talk with the Baſſa concerning a Peace, found little difficulty therein, but that the Turks ſaid they could nothing determine thereof without the preſence and conſent of the Hungarians. With which Anſwer, they, full of hope, returned back again to Comara, as did alſo Sigiſmund Forgat, with the like hope of Peace from Botſcay. At which time, Botſcay being about to depart from the Aſſembly of Kirpay back again to Caſſovia, gave Power and Authority to Illiſhaſcius for the farthering of the Treaty for Peace; who having received Letters of ſafe Conduct from the Arch-duke Matthias, about the end of December, together with his Wiſe went to Vienna; who being admitted unto the Arch-duke's preſence, and having had an hour and halfs Talk with him, and every day after conferred with the Counſellors, from eight a Clock to twelve, at length compoſed all Difficulties and Differences touching the Treaty of Peace, excepting five Articles onely concerning Religion, the free exerciſe whereof the Hungarians in any wiſe required; ſo that now men began to conceive ſome good hope of a Peace to be in time concluded.

The Treaty of Peace with the Turks and Rebels begun.

The Haiducks do great harm in the upper Hungary.

This Year thus ending, with the beginning of the Treaty for Peace, the next Year begun with the wonted Troubles of War, the rebellious Haiducks in Hungary doing great harm in the upper Hungary, tyrannizing after their wonted manner upon men of all ſort and condition. Where giving divers Aſſaults unto divers Cities, they being valiantly repulſed, were conſtrained to retire, (the Polonians and Coſſacks defending the ſame) yet did they nevertheleſs no little harm unto the Country Inhabitants. Whereof complaint being made unto the King of Polonia, he by his Ambaſſador ſent to Botſcay at Caſſovia, obtained, that thoſe ſpoiling Haiducks ſhould be called back again out of theſe Parts.

The free exerciſe of Religion granted to the Hungarians.

Now had Illiſhaſcius, the Negotiator for the Treaty for Peace to be made with the Rebels, ſo well dealt in that matter, as that the ſame in the latter end of January ſhould have been publiſhed at Vienna, but that certain of the chief of the Clergy could not be brought to conſent, that the free exerciſe of Religion ſhould indifferently be granted to all the People in general, but to the Nobility only. Whereupon Illiſhaſcius, with the reſt of the Commiſſioners for the Hungarians, with great diſcontentment being about to return home again without any thing at all concluded, the Deputies for the Emperour ſeeing that it could not be otherwiſe brought to paſs, at length agreed (although though never ſo much contrary to the liking of the Clergy-men) to ſatisfie the Hungarians in this their Requeſt, and that the free exerciſe as well of the Reformed, as of the Romiſh Religion, ſhould be permitted to all men throughout all Hungary, in ſuch ſort, as it had before been in the time of the Emperours Maximilian and Ferdinand. Concerning which point for the Liberty of the Religion, Letters were delivered unto Illeſhaſcius; all the other points concerning the Peace being put off unto the next aſſembly of the States of Hungary, ſhortly after to be holden at Presbourg.

About the beginning of March, the Spahi at Conſtantinople had requeſted of the Viſier Baſſa, That it might be lawful for themſelves to take up their wonted Penſion of the Farmers and Husbandmen here and there in the Country; which although it were unto them by the Viſier Baſſa denied, who had commandment from the Great Sultan within a few days after, to give every one of them his preſent Pay in Money; yet they not ſo contented, but going out of the City, preſumptuouſly preſumed to trouble the Country-men, and to do the Farmers great harm. For which their Inſolency, the Great Sultan (the chief Captains and Leaders of them being again returned into the City) cauſed them, ſome to be beheaded, ſome to be hanged, and otherſome to be bound in Chains and drowned; whereby no ſmall fear was ſtruck into the reſt of the common Souldiers. But the Rebellion in Aſia ſtill increaſing, and the Rebels there ſecretly both favouring and furthering the Proceedings of the Perſian King, the Sultan forthwith ſent for the Viſier Baſſa, who the laſt year had ſerved in Hungary, to go into Aſia, to repreſs the Rebels there, and alſo to withſtand the Proceedings of the Perſian King; committing in the mean time the managing of the War in Hungary unto his Lieutenant.

The Spahi inſolently oppreſſing the Country People, juſtly puniſhed.

Rab attempted to have been by the Turks ſurpriſed.

The Treaty of Peace both with the Turks and the Rebels, was yet in hand, whereunto how much the Turks were for their part inclined, the Garriſon Souldiers of Rab had good proof, for the eighteenth day of March, being the day at their requeſt appointed for the Treaty, and whereon the Commiſſioners on both parts there meeting together, ſhould have furthered the Negotiation of the Peace, not paſt fifty of the Turks coming to the Gate of the Town, required to be let in, as if they had come for that purpoſe. Whom our men nothing ſuſpecting, were about to receive them into the Town; when as a Sentinel without the Town, it being a thick miſt, perceived three thouſand more of the Turks lurking thereby, and forthwith giving an alarm to thoſe of the Town, bewrayed the Enemies Treachery, who thereupon retired, they of the Town diſcharging their great Ordnance after them. The next Month, about the beginning of April, certain Meſſengers came from Eperia (a City of the upper Hungary, yet holden for the Emperour) to Vienna, declaring the moſt miſerable ſtate of that City; which, although the way thereunto being three or four Weeks before opened, it had received ſome good ſtore of Victual, yet now (as they ſaid) was ſo on every ſide by the Rebels beſet, as that no Proviſion at all could more thereunto come; hoping by that means to bring to paſs, that the Citizens, pinched with hunger and want of things neceſſary, ſhould at length yield themſelves together with the City into their Power. By which means they but a little before had obtained the ſtrong Town of Tokay; wherein the Famine was ſo great, that the Souldiers had not only eaten their Shooes and Leather Jerkins, but had now alſo kill'd two Boys to eat, and ſome others of them had caſt Lots among themſelves, which ſhould be kill'd for the other to eat. By which Extremity, Ruber, the Governour of the Place, was enforced to yield; unto whom Botſcay, who then lay at Caſſovia, is ſaid to have offered a great ſum of Money, with many other good things, to have taken his part; all which he moſt conſtantly refuſed, proteſting even unto Death to continue faithful in his Obedience to the Emperour.

Eperia by the Rebels diſtreſſed.

Tokay by the Rebels taken.

The Letters of Illiſhaſcius ſent to a Noble man of Vienna.

About the ſame Time Illiſhaſcius, who had before not a little laboured about the furthering of the Peace in Hungary, writ Letters from Caſſovia unto a certain great Man at Vienna; whereby he declared, that Botſcay without the Conſent of the Eſtates of Hungary could of himſelf determine nothing concerning the Concluſion of the Peace; who had oft-times told him to his Face, that rather than they would again ſubmit themſelves to a foreign Governour, they would for ever put themſelves under the Turks Protection; and yet promiſed by the ſame Letters, that although he had got unto himſelf great Diſpleaſure thereby with the Haiducks, he would not for all that ceaſe by all means to draw the States of the Country in their next aſſembly unto his part, ſo that that which was before concluded at Vienna concerning Religion, ſhould not again be reverſed; for many of them (as he ſaid) were affraid that it would not be performed, which was there promiſed unto the States concerning the Exerciſe of their Religion. And that therefore they could not yet be perſwaded to put themſelves from under the Turks Protection, until they ſaw themſelves ſufficiently ſecured, both for the Liberty of their Religion, and the keeping of their antient Priviledges. And that they could not, nor would not endure a foreign Governour to rule over them, with whom they could not talk; nor yet ſuffer Clergy-men to have any Voices in their Civil Affairs. And therefore (he ſaid) he thought it very neceſſary that the Emperour ſhould not doubt in this point to gratifie the Hungarians. And that Tranſilvania, whereupon he had been hitherto enforced to beſtow ſo great coſt for the keeping thereof, being now left unto Botſcay, he ſhould appoint ſuch a Governour over Hungary as the States of that Country ſhould require. For that there was no hope of any Peace to be made with the Turks, except Botſcay and the States of Hungary ſhould undertake the Treaty thereof; ſeeing that they, but only ſeeking for a Peace in ſhew, were oftentimes diſcovered but to ſeek for their own Advantages and Profits.

Illiſhaſcius reprochfully uſed by the Hungarians.

But concerning Illiſhaſcius himſelf, the Hungarian Rebels ſeeing him ſo much to labour about the concluding of a Peace, in ſcorn called him by the by-name of Cripeliſhacius, as he that too much enclined unto the Germans; which by-name he took in ſo ill part, as that he departed ſtraight to Eperia, with a purpoſe not to have been preſent at the next aſſembly of the States; but being again pacified, and by Botſcay called back, he made ſuch a notable Speech unto the States in their next Aſſembly, that all men now began both to hope and wiſh more for Peace than they had before done.

In the mean time, the Turks in great numbers being gathered together to Belgrade, expected the end of this Treaty for Peace, and Letters from the Great Sultan to Botſcay were intercepted alſo; whereby he adviſeth him to proceed in his purpoſe, and joyning with his Powers, to ſeize upon Auſtria, Bohemia, and Moravia; for that he could be contented with Hungary and Tranſilvania, and leave the reſt of the Provinces unto Botſcay as his Inheritance.

The Tartars about this Time were about to make a Road into Polonia; but when as they with their often Incurſions had not a little troubled the Haiducks alſo in the upper Hungary, they reſolved amongſt themſelves to joyn their Forces together, and to fight as well againſt the Turks as the Tartars, and from thenceforth neither to truſt the one nor the other.

Hereupon, whenas the Turks in great number came to aſſault Lippa, a Town of the Haiducks, they forſaking the Town, fortified the Caſtle with certain Companies of armed Men, and afterwards beſtowed many others here and there in Caves and Cellars in the Town, and laied great ſtore of Gun-powder in the Streets. Unto which Town the Turks coming, and finding the Gates open, and none to reſiſt them, haſted to have taken the Caſtle. But in the mean time, the Powder which the Haiducks had laied taking fire, blew up a number of them, and they which lay hid in the Caves and Cellars forthwith breaking out, ſlew of them whomſoever they met, and ſo made of the Turks a great ſlaughter, and again cleared the Town.

The Inhabitants of Auſtria provide to ſtand upon their own ſtrength for the defence of their Country.

The Eſtates of Auſtria, conſidering the great harms they had in theſe late Troubles received, as well from the Hungarian Rebels, as from the Emperours mutinous Souldiers; and by Experience taught how dangerous a thing it was for them to reſt upon other mens Protection, being unto them ſtrangers; reſolved now in a general Aſſembly of the Eſtates by them about this time holden, to take upon themſelves the defence of their Country, againſt ſuch ſudden Incurſions and Tumults of the mutinous Souldiers, and no more to rely upon foreign Protection, ſtill to ſeek when they had moſt need thereof. Wherefore, to aſſure themſelves in their own ſtrength, they, with a general conſent, agreed to have always in readineſs two thouſand Horſe-men, and eight thouſand Foot-men, to be maintained at the common Charge; fifty of the Country Peaſants ſtill finding of one of the ſaid Souldiers.

The Biſhop of Vienna a great enemy to the Peace to have been concluded betwixt the Emperour and his diſcontented Subjects.

And much about this time, viz. the Third of June, Illiſhaſcius, a great Man amongſt the Rebels, and yet the greateſt furtherer of the Peace, (as appeared by his doings, and by that we have before of him written) having before obtained Letters of ſafe conduct from the Arch-duke, came now again with his Wiſe alſo to Vienna, there more at large to conferr upon the Articles for a Peace to be concluded, with ſuch as were on the Emperours behalf for that purpoſe deputed. Where, coming to conferr and talk upon the matter, he was ſo croſſed by Nicholas Biſhop of Vienna, who hitherto had been preſent in Council together with the reſt of the Commiſſioners, (a great enemy unto the Peace, in reſpect of the Article concerning the Liberty of Religion) he was, I ſay, by him ſo croſſed, as that there was no hope of any thing to be for the common quiet concluded, ſo long as he was there preſent. For which cauſe, he, on both ſides, and of all men deſirous of the Peace diſliked, was in the Arch-duke's name willed no more to come into the Council, for the diſturbing of the Peace. In which Negotiation for the concluding of the Peace, Illiſhaſcius had taken ſuch pains in travelling to and fro betwixt the Arch-duke then lying at Vienna, and Botſcay with the States of Hungary then lying at Caſſovia, and ſo debated the matter on both ſides, that all things being as good as agreed upon; for a full concluſion of all matters, he himſelf, together with George Humanoius, Francis Magot, Sebaſtian Tockell, Staniſlaus Turſon, and others, with two hundred Horſe, and two and thirty Waggons, in all, four hundred Perſons, the Seventh of September came to Vienna, with fifty Huſſars following of them: Shortly after whoſe coming, the Treaty for Peace was earneſtly begun with often Meſſengers paſſing to and fro betwixt Vienna and Caſſovia to Botſcay, lying then very dangerouſly ſick, untill that all the Articles of Peace were near about the Fourteenth of September fully on both parts agreed upon; moſt difference ariſing about the Article for the free Exerciſe of Religion. For although it was before declared, that men might have the free Exerciſe of Religion; yet the Hungarians, recalling that general word of Religion unto a particularity, would needs have it ſet down, that men might have the free Exerciſe of thoſe Religions, which are at this day called the Lutheran, Calvinian, and Romiſh Religion; neither would they conclude any Peace untill they were of their Requeſt in that point ſatisfied. Which Peace ſo concluded, the next day after, the Deputies for the Hungarians ſent an Ambaſſador to the Viſier Baſſa at Buda, to certifie him of all their Proceedings, and to requeſt him not as yet to attempt any thing for the diſturbing of the Peace; now the Articles whereupon the Peace was concluded, were theſe:

A Peace concluded betwixt the Emperour and his diſcontented Subjects of the upper Hungary.

F*irſt, That from thenceforth it ſhould be lawful for every Man throughout the Kingdom of* Hungary, to have the free Vſe of his Religion, and to believe what he would.

2. That if the Hungarians ſo thought good, they might chuſe a Palatine for their Governour, and that in the mean time the Arch-duke Matthias ſhould no more vſe the Title of a Governour, but of a Viceroy.

3. That the Crown of Hungary ſhould ſtill be left in the Emperours keeping.

4. That the Biſhops that were nobly deſcended in Hungary, and had Lands of their own, ſhould from thenceforth be admitted into the Council, but the other Biſhops not ſo to be received.

5. That Botſcay, for himſelf and his Heirs Male, ſhould for ever hold Tranſilvania.

6. That the ſame Country of Tranſilvania ſhould be ſtill ſubject unto the Kingdom of Hungary.

7. That for his Arms he ſhould bear three Royal Crowns and three open Helmets.

8. That he ſhould no more afterwards ſtile himſelf Prince, but Lord of part of the Kingdom of Hungary.

9. That they ſhould pay the Haiducks their Wages which had levied them.

10. That the Harms done on both ſides ſhould for ever be forgotten.

11. That Bohemia, Moravia, Sileſia, Lauſniſium, and Auſtria, ſhould not only with their Letters and Seals confirm the Articles, but alſo Swear at Vienna to keek the ſame ſo far as ſhould concern them.

12. That the Hungarians ſhould likewiſe ſend ſome to Vienna, who in their behalf ſhould with their Letters, Seals, and Oaths, confirm and ratifie theſe Articles.

13. That the Aſſembly of the Eſtates of Hungary ſhould be referred untill a more convenient time for them.

14. That all theſe things being done, this Agreement ſhould be publikely confirmed and enrolled in the Records of the Kingdom of Hungary.

15. That it ſhould be lawful for the Hungarians by their Ambaſſadors to invite the Princes of the Empire to the approving and confirming of theſe Artieles.

Which fifteen Articles were on the Emperours part ſubſcribed by Trauſam, Mollart, Sigifrid, Pruner, Lichtenſtein and Kreuberge; and on the part of the Hungarians, by Illiſhaſcius, Peter Erkod, George Turſo, and Sigiſmund Forgat, and others.

The twentieth of September following, the Ambaſſador for the Hungarians and of Botſcay, being admitted unto the Preſence of the Archduke Matthias, obtained of him Pardon for the forepaſſed Rebellion, and all that was therein done; unto whom Security for the ſame was afterward given by the Provinces; thereby alſo to aſſure them, that they ſhould not be therefore afterwards troubled. But yet for all that was before done, the Title of the Prince of Tranſilvania was left unto Botſcay for Term of his Life: who feeling his Sickneſs daily to increaſe, would oftentimes ſay, That he could willingly die, ſo that it might pleaſe God before his Death to give him leave to excuſe himſelf of his Rebellion before the whole Roman Empire. And ſo about the end of September, all the aforeſaid Ambaſſadors for the Hungarians and Botſcay, being aſſembled into the Caſtle of Vienna, together with the Emperours Council, and certain other Noblemen of the Provinces belonging unto the Emperour, received every one of them the Articles of the Peace copied out, and fair written in Parchment; which done, they returned every one to his own dwelling. But Illiſhaſcius went from thence to Neuhuſe, to be preſent at the Peace to be afterwards made with the Turks alſo; from whence he afterwards writ Letters unto the Viſier Baſſa, to requeſt him, not as yet to attempt any thing againſt the Emperours Provinces, but peaceably and quietly to expect his Commiſſioners, which were ſhortly to come unto him.

A great Fire at Conſtantinople.

But in the mean time whilſt this Peace was thus in concluding, certain Tartars at Conſtantinople, in their Inſolency, ſet fire upon a certain Jews Houſe, whereof aroſe ſuch a terrible Fire, as burnt not only many Houſes, but a great number of the Jews themſelves alſo; the harm there done being eſteemed at forty hundred thouſand Duckats. In which Tumult and Noiſe of the People running too and fro, and quenching of the Fire, the Great Sultan having a fall from his Horſe, was thereof for a while ſick.

The Turks ſeeking to ſurpriſe others, themſelves ſurpriſed.

The Turks of Caniſia alſo having conſpired with the Captain of the leſſer Comora, came to have ſurpriſed the ſame. But the Garriſon Souldiers there, having before had a Suſpition thereof, ſuffered ſo many of the Turks as they knew they were able to overcome, to enter; and ſo ſhutting the Gates of the City, kill'd them every Mothers Son, the reſt which were without returning again to Caniſia.

The Commiſſioners for the Emperour, to intreat of Peace with the Turks, come to Presburg.

Peace thus (as is aforeſaid) concluded with the Hungarians, George Turſon, Nicholas Iſtuan, John Mollart, and Althem, with ſome others, the Emperours Commiſſioners for a Peace to be made with the Turks, went to Comora; Sigifrid Collonitz and Budin following them with the Army; for as yet the ſaid Commiſſioners durſt not altogether truſt the Turks for intercepting of them by the way. Which Commiſſioners carried with them Solyman the Baſſa of Buda, who had now been ſeven years kept Priſoner in the Caſtle of Vienna, and Aly Baſſa, both bravely apparelled in blew Silk; ſix Waggons following of them, wherein were carried certain Preſents for the Great Sultan, to wit, a moſt curious Clock, certain fair pieces of Plate, an hundred thouſand Duckats, with divers other things of great value.

The Peace already concluded with the Hungarians, like enough to have again been broken off through the Inſolency of ſome few diſordered Perſons.

But whilſt they there ſtayed, expecting to hear from the Viſier Baſſa then at Buda, a ſudden inſolent Accident fell out, like enough to have broken off again the Peace already made with the Hungarians, as alſo to have utterly cut off the Treaty of Peace to be had with the Turks, and to have ſet them all together by the Ears again. For albeit that the firſt Article of the Peace made with the Hungarians, was, That every Man ſhould have the free Exerciſe of his Religion; yet the eighth day of October, about three of the Clock in the Afternoon, when as a certain Hungarian Lutheran Preacher was in the Pulpit preaching to the People in a Church, in the Suburbs of Comora, Buchem and Knevie, two Captains, coming from Dinner with certain of their Servants, more than half drunk, with their Swords drawn, ruſh'd into the Church, and drave out thence the Preacher, upon whom Captain Buchem's Trumpeter alſo diſcharged a Piſtol, and raiſed ſuch a Tumult in the Church, that divers Children were trodden to Death under foot, and the reſt put in great fear of their Lives.

Which inſolent Fact ſo moved the Hungarians, that Turſon and Budian, there preſent, with the reſt of the Commiſſioners, ready to have gone about the Treaty of the Peace, would needs the next day have departed from Comora, and were hardly by Mollart and Collonitz intreated to ſtay; Buchem and Knevie, the two Captains, being bound to their appearance for the anſwering of the matter, and the Trumpeter with Irons on his heels clapt in Priſon. But the News hereof being carried to Neuhuſel, and (as the manner of Report is) by Fame made far greater than it was, as, That an hundred and fifty Perſons were ſlain in the Church, there aroſe ſuch a Tumult among the Hungarians there, as that Illiſhaſcius, with the reſt of the Captains, had much ado to quiet and appeaſe the ſame; who, joyning with the Turks of Strigonium, and the Haiducks of the Iſland, had determined now by Night to have invaded Comora, where the Outrage was committed, had not Pogrania the elder, (a Man of great Gravity) coming from thence, declared unto Illiſhaſcius and the reſt of the Captains all the Matter as it was done; upon whoſe Relation the whole Tumult was again appeaſed. But for as much as the two aforeſaid Captains, bound to their Appearance, were by Night fled from Comora to Vienna, the Hungarians were very earneſt to have them ſeverely puniſhed, as breakers of the firſt Article of the Peace, concerning Religion. Botſcay in the mean time beheaded Catayus his Chancellor, who had gon about to have poiſoned him, in hope after his Death to have been Prince of Tranſilvania himſelf; placing John Januſy in his ſtead, and giving him Catay's Lands.

Botſcay cauſeth his Chancellor to be beheaded.

Peace now made with the Hungarians (as is aforeſaid) and Commiſſioners appointed for a Treaty of Peace to be had with the Turks alſo, (whereunto the Viſier Baſſa, then lying at Buda, was as forward as any, being ſo commanded from the Great Sultan his Maſter) there wanted but a Place Commodious for the ſaid Commiſſioners, without Suſpition of Danger, and indifferent for them all to meet in. Whereupon Cæſar Gallen, a Man of great Experience in ſuch Matters, with ſome other Captains, were appointed to find out ſome ſuch convenient Place for them to meet in; who having viewed many, at length made choice of one within half a League of Comora, ſo fit for that purpoſe, as if Nature had provided it for the ſame. The great River of Danubius being there divided into three parts, made therein three Iſlands, all compaſſed round with the Arms thereof, into which Iſlands the Commiſſioners for the Emperour, for the Turk, and for the Hungarians, might come without let one of another, to intreat of their Affairs, and ſo in little Boats prepared for that purpoſe, paſs over one to another, as their Occaſions required. Into this place, ſo commodious for all three parties, the Deputies for the Emperour the five and twentieth day of October, conducted by the

The Commiſſioners for the Emperor, the Turks, and the Hungarians, meet together to intreat of a Peace.

Horſemen of Manſfeld, Hohenlo, and Bonchimin. After whom followed Illiſhaſcius, and the other Deputies for the Hungarians, aſſiſted with the Nobility of Hungary, all attending the coming of the Great Sultans Commiſſioners; who likewiſe immediately after came, being brought up the River in four and twenty brave Ships well appointed.

Theſe Commiſſioners being thus apart arrived in the Iſlands, began firſt to conſult by themſelves, every one of their ſeveral Affairs and Buſineſſes, and afterwards many times meeting together, with much Gravity conſulted and conferred of the beſt ways and means for the making of a good and aſſured Peace for the appeaſing of theſe Wars; which every one of them and all together, to that end employing the uttermoſt of their Endeavours, at laſt, the nineteenth of November, it was betwixt all the three Parties fully agreed upon and concluded, and Hoſtages on all parts given one to another, with Oaths and Promiſes ſolemnly on all ſides given and received, for the inviolate keeping and obſerving of the ſame; the Articles whereupon the ſaid Peace was concluded being theſe:

A Peace concluded between the Emperour and the great Sultan.

Articles of the Peace concluded betwixt the Emperour and the Great Sultan.

‘FIrſt, That the Emperour and the Great Sultan, in all their Letters, Diſpatches, Inſtruments, and Embaſſages, ſhould not ſtile themſelves by any other Names or Additions, but by the Names of well beloved Father and Son; to wit, the Emperour calling the Great Sultan his Son, and the Great Sultan the Emperour (in reſpect of his years) his Father.

‘That in the beginning of their Letters they ſhould take upon them the Name and Quality of Emperour, and not of King, reſpectively one of them to another.

‘That theſe two Emperours ſhould take order, that the Realm of Hungary and the Archdukedom of Auſtria, might be in Reſt, Peace, and Tranquility, and altogether delivered and aſſured from all Incurſions, Oppreſſions, and Outrages of the Men of War on both Parties.

‘That it ſhould be lawful for the King of Spain, if he ſo thought good, to enter into this Treaty of Peace, without the Oppoſition or let of one or of the other of both theſe Emperours in any ſort.

‘That the Tartars, and all other People uſually wont to come in Arms into Hungary, ſhould be compriſed within this Treaty of the Peace, ſo to be diſarmed of all Power by their means to do harm within the Realm of Hungary, and they there aſſured from their Violences and Robberies.

‘That every one, both on the one part and on the other, ſhould forbear from making Incurſions and Pillages, and Enterpriſes of War, and from all Acts of Hoſtility one againſt another; and yet every one nevertheleſs to have Power to purſue Thieves and Robbers, and ſuch others ſeeking after Booty, to the diſturbing of the Peace, and injuring of the Common-weal; whereof every man ſhould have Power to give knowledge, to the intent by common force to ſuppreſs them, and to cauſe them to recompence the Wrongs and Harms by them done.

‘That all Places, Caſtles, Towns, and Forts, ſhould remain without attempt either on the one part or on the other, whether it were by Force, Surpriſe, or Treaſon, and ſo likewiſe the Goods, Families, and Cattel of the Country-men, which were of their Territories and Juriſdiction; Botſcay ſtill holding all that was lately to him granted by the Treaty of Vienna.

‘That all Priſoners taken in the Wars ſhould be ſet at Liberty, but eſpecially ſuch as had been taken in Towns and Citadels, which by their Valour and Courage they ſought to have defended; and the other Priſoners to be delivered by Exchange and Ranſom, as ſhould be moſt expedient and eaſie for both Parties.

‘That all Controverſies happening, as well on this ſide as beyond the River of Danubius, ſhould be peaceably ended by the Judgment of the Governour of Rab, of the Baſſa of Buda, of the Governour of Sclavonia, and of the Governours of other Places; and that if they ſhould chance to be of ſuch important Weight and Conſequence, as that they could not by theſe Magiſtrates be determined and compoſed, that they ſhould in that caſe be reſerved to be decided by their Imperial Majeſties; and that it ſhould be lawful both for the one party and the other to repair and build the Places ruined, but not to build Places of New, which might prejudice either the one part or the other.

‘That Amurath the Viſier Baſſa ſhould ſend his Meſſengers with Preſents to the Archduke Matthias, and that the Emperour ſhould diſpatch an Ambaſſador toward the Great Sultan with 200000 Duckats, and that the Great Sultan likewiſe ſhould ſend his Ambaſſador to Prague with great and rich Preſents to the Emperour.

‘That this Peace ſhould begin in the year 1607, and continue for the ſpace of twenty years, and that one of the Emperous ſhould ſend unto the other every three years their Ambaſſadors with their honourable and rich Preſents, according to the Pleaſure and Power of their Majeſties.

‘That all the Emperours Succeſſors, as alſo thoſe of the Kingdom of Hungary, ſhould be comprehended within this Agreement of Peace, together with all their Kinſmen, Allies and Confederates, as likewiſe thoſe of the Great Sultans alſo.

‘That the Chriſtians ſhould again have the City of Vachia, which they ſhould at their Pleaſure keep and fortifie, and that Strigonium, with all the Villages thereto belonging, ſhould remain unto the Great Sultan; yet ſo, as that no man ſhould be with any new Tribute oppreſſed; and that ſuch as had been free from paying of Tribute, ſhould ſtill keep the ſame Priviledges.

‘And that the Turks ſhould not exact their Tributes by the point of their Swords, but by the way of Juſtice, which they ſhould commit unto the Diſcretion of Judges and Receivers to that end appointed, that ſo it might be payd without oppreſſing of the People, except haply they which ſhould pay it, upon Preſumption ſhould deny it, or too long deſert the Payment of it; in which caſe it ſhould be lawful both for the one ſide and the other, to uſe ſuch means as ſhould ſeem unto them good for the obtaining thereof.

Great Joy and Triumph in Hungary for the Peace concluded with the Turk.

Theſe are the Articles of this Peace, which God turn to the Glory of his Name, and the benefit of the Chriſtian Common-weal; and for which all the Towns of Hungary made great Joy and Triumph, which they declared by the thundering of their Cannons, which they in great number diſcharged, with many other Solemnities and Triumphs. The Commiſſioners themſelves, in token of their conceived Joy, magnificently feaſted one another alſo; which the Turks firſt began; and not content to have made them great chear, gave unto our Commiſſioners great Preſents alſo; for the Baſſa of Buda gave unto Mollart, Althem, Turſon, Iſtuan, Collonitz, Budian, Hendoc, Cæſar Gallen, and Eleſchin, brave and courageous Horſes moſt gallantly furniſhed; and to the reſt exceeding rich Garments and Tapeſtry Hangings of great value. And as at the time of this Feaſt, the Troop of Manſfeld had by many Sallies and Vollies of ſhot given great Pleaſure unto the Turks as they ſat at the Table; Alla Baſſa, to declare the Contentment and Pleaſure ſure he had therein received, ſent to the Captain of this Troop two hundred Duckets, which he would not accept, requeſting in ſtead of them to have delivered unto him a certain Captain by the Turks then kept Priſoner; whom the Baſſa cauſed freely to be delivered unto him, and withal ſent back again the two hundred Duckets to be divided among the Souldiers; which for all that Mansfeld refuſed, ſending them back again unto the Baſſa. After which Actions of Joy and Peace, every man returned home well content and pleaſed.

The great Sultan giveth thanks to his Prophet Mahomet, for the Peace concluded with the Chriſtians.

Theſe things thus done, and the Peace confirmed, the Baſſa of Buda forthwith ſent his Ambaſſadors to Conſtantinople, certifying the Great Sultan of the Peace now made with the Chriſtians; who thereof conceiving great Joy, with a number of Janizaries and others, in great Magnificence went to the Church, to give Thanks therefore unto his Prophet Mahomet, and ſpent the next day with great Sport and Pleaſure, purpoſing from thenceforth to turn all his Force and Power for the ſuppreſſing of his Rebels in Aſia, and the ſubduing of the Perſian King.

The Haiducks begin new ſtirs in Hungary.

Now albeit that there was a Peace of late concluded with the Hungarians at Vienna, (as is before declared) yet divers ſtirs and Tumults were nevertheleſs by the Haiducks in divers Places of the upper Hungary ſtill raiſed; inſomuch that about the end of November, the Inhabitants of the County of Bocotſie were through their Inſolencies enforced to joyn Battel with them, wherein a number on both ſides were ſlain, and three Country Villages burnt; ſo that it ſhould ſeem, no Peace can be ſo well and indifferently made, but that ſome will be ſtill troubling and impugning the ſame.

Botſcay calleth an Aſſembly of the States of Hungary, and inſtructeth them what to do at their next general Aſſembly.

Shortly after, viz. the Thirteenth of December, Botſcay calling together an Aſſembly of the Eſtates of Hungary, propounded to them to be conſidered of, firſt, That the late Revolt, almoſt generally made throughout all Hungary, with all the ſtirs and troubles thereby raiſed, had all been hitherto to no other end made, but for the defence of their Religion, and the maintenance of their ancient Liberty: Then, That whereas they by their general good liking had made choice of him for their Prince, and that hitherto he had done nothing without their knowledge and conſent; and that even now at this preſent he was by their conſent ready to depart from the Caſtles and free Cities in the upper Hungary; and had now ſent his Letters unto the Archduke Matthias, for the ſending of his Deputies to receive them; whether he ſhould from thenceforth relinquiſh the Title of a Prince, or not. And that for as much as no War could be made without great harm doing, that he would therefore, for the avoiding of farther troubles about ſuch matters, that a Decree ſhould be made, That all ſuch Wrongs and Injuries ſhould be forgiven and forgotten, and that every man ſhould ſtill hold all ſuch Goods, whether they were moveable or immoveable, during the time of this late War. He wiſhed them alſo in the next general Aſſembly of the States, with all their Power and Endeavour, to urge the repealing of the Article concerning the burning of Hereticks, with all other Articles contrary to their Religion; and not to remit any thing concerning the choice of their Palatine, as had in former time been uſed; neither in this next general Aſſembly of the Eſtates to neglect any thing which might ſeem to concern their Priviledges and Liberty. And that therefore they ſhould be careful to ſend thither Wiſe and powerful men, ſuch as ſhould not eaſily be overcome with the Clamours and Out-cries of the contrary Part. At length he wiſhed them to conſider of this alſo, how a true and ſincere Confederation might be made betwixt Hungary and Tranſilvania, ſo that a ſafe and quiet Traffick and Commerce might in both Places be uſed.

Botſcay dyeth at Caſſovia.

Theſe things thus done, Botſcay's ſickneſs ſtill more and more increaſing upon him, ſo at length prevailed, that it made an end of him, to the great ſorrow and grief of all the People in general, who had him in great Honour and Regard. He dyed at Caſſovia the Thirtieth of December, in the Year 1606. He was honourably deſcended, and a Man of great Spirit, Ambitious, Wiſe, and Politick, a great lover of his Country, but an extreme Enemy unto the Germans, and their Government in Hungary.

A little before his Death, he earneſtly perſwaded John Januſie his Chancellor, to continue in his Allegeance to the Emperour, and not to raiſe new ſtirs, or ſo much as in him was, not to ſuffer any to be raiſed. Nevertheleſs, ſuch his wholeſome Counſel not regarded, there were ſome, who immediately after his death, were about to have raiſed new Forces, for to have ſeized upon Tranſilvania, and ſo to have ſtirred up new Troubles. For preventing whereof, Matthias the Archduke forthwith ſent a Meſſenger unto the States of the upper Hungary; adviſing them, That the great harms and miſeries conſidered which that part of Hungary had of late felt and indured, almoſt to the utter ruine and deſtruction thereof, (which proceeded not ſo much from the Wars with the Turks, as from their own civil Tumults and Seditions) they ſhould from thenceforth give themſelves to Quietneſs and Peace, and not again inſolently to preſcribe unto the Emperour what to do, or how he was to diſpoſe of the Country of Tranſilvania; aſſuring them, that the Emperour would not hereafter wink at ſuch their rebellious Plots and Devices, but forthwith turn all his Power and Forces to the utter deſtruction and rooting out of ſuch rebellious and ſeditious Perſons, the diſturbers of the common Peace and Quiet. By which the Arch-duke's warning, ſome, otherwiſe ready enough to have raiſed new ſtirs and troubles, were not therein ſo forward as otherwiſe haply they would haue been, but kept themſelves quiet.

The Emperour not to be blamed for making Peace with the Turks.

Now many there were (and yet are) which much marvelled, that the Chriſtian Emperour would thus make Peace with the Great Sultan, (as is aforeſaid) he being then ſo much troubled with Wars, both againſt his own Rebels, and the Perſian King, in Aſia, moſt part of his Forces being turned that way; ſo that a fitter time, or of more advantage, could not have been wiſhed for the Emperour to have done great matters againſt him in, and not only to have holden his own (which he did not) in Hungary, but to have recovered ſome good part of his Loſſes there before received alſo. And indeed true it is, that the time then well ſerved for both; but what availeth opportunity without Power? And had the Hungarians (the greateſt ſtrength the Emperour hath hitherto had for the defence of that little which is yet left of that ſo great a Kingdom) been at quiet, and at his Command, and he himſelf a Prince which had reſted upon his own Strength and Power, ever at his pleaſure to have been raiſed, and, as need ſhould require, ſupplied, without depending upon his Friends and Allies; then haply it might have been in him accounted a great overſight to have omitted and overſlipped ſo fair an opportunity. But the Hungarians, being then not only revolted from him, but taking part with the Turks, and the Turks with them, and he of himſelf with his own Power not able to hold the Field againſt them, or well to maintain a defenſive War; and his Friends and Allies, his wonted and greateſt ſtays, then at his greateſt need failing of him alſo, what ſhould

he

1606 he in ſuch a caſe do but as he did? to accept of a reaſonable Peace whilſt he might have it; eſpecially againſt ſuch an Enemy, as whoſe whole Power being turned againſt him, might have eaſily endangered his whole Eſtate. For it is not reaſonably to be thought, how the Emperour ſhould of himſelf, without the great Aid of the other Chriſtian Princes, his Friends and Allies, be able to withſtand the huge and dreadful Power of the Othoman Emperour; as (without ominous Preſage be it ſpoken) it is to be feared it will too true appear, whenſoever his Wars and Troubles in the Eaſt being ended, he ſhall again turn his Forces this way toward the Weſt.

1607 Now Botſcay was no ſooner dead, but that ſome others of the Nobility, both of Hungary and Tranſilvania (happily no leſs ambitious than was he) began by divers means to ſeek after and to aſpire to that Principality. Of whom, though ſome, either with the weakneſs of their own means, or with the threats of Matthias the Archduke, deterred, ceaſed farther to ſeek after it; yet were there ſome others, who better ſupported, and nothing afraid of the Arch-duke's great Words, laboured under hand to have obtained it. For the croſſing of whom, and the avoiding of farther Troubles to be raiſed by theſe ambitious Competitors, certain of the Nobility of Tranſilvania gathered together at Claudianople, the Twelfth of February, made choice of Sigiſmund Ragotſie for their Governour, and their Prince of Tranſilvania, and the more to aſſure him of their love and affection towards him, bound themſelves unto him by the Oath of their Allegeance ſolemnly taken in the chief Church there. And afterward ſent Meſſengers to the Archduke Matthias at Vienna, to certifie him what they had done, and to excuſe themſelves thereof; who coming to Presburg the Twelfth of March, there openly proteſted this Election of Ragotſie for their Prince to have been made, not for that they were about to rebel, or to revolt from the Emperour, whom they would always acknowledge for their Sovereign Lord; but for that their neceſſity ſo required, many of the Nobility both of Tranſilvania and of Hungary gaping after this Principality, and going about for the obtaining thereof, to raiſe new ſtirs and troubles. Howbeit, the ſame Ragotſie, afterward doubting not to be able, without great trouble and danger, beſides the Emperours diſpleaſure, to hold the ſame Principality, of his own accord, about a year after, gave the ſame up again, and got himſelf out of the way to Sarentum, who was no ſooner gone, but that Gabriel Bathor was about to have ſtept into his Place; unto whom the States of Tranſilvania ſent word by two of the Noblemen, That the free Election of the Prince belonged to them, and that therefore he ſhould not ſeek by force to intrude himſelf into the Principality, but quietly to come unto the Election, and not to bring with him above a thouſand Horſe-men, and five hundred Foot.

Sigiſmund Ragotſie choſen Prince of Tranſilvania, afterward yieldeth up the ſame Principality again.

Newhuſe again delivered unto the Emperour.

About this time, the ſtrong Town of Newhuſe (otherwiſe called Newheuſel) the laſt year ſo hardly won by the Hungarian Rebels was again delivered to Sigefrid Collonitz, for the Emperour; who, ſhortly after coming to Vienna, brought news of a great number of the Turks to have riſen up in Rebellion at Belgrade, to have rifled the Town, and to have burnt another Town, called Aliſchria, down to the ground, and ſo with a great Prey to be gone over to the Rebels; and alſo Redeius, Botſcay's Lieutenant, in going to take Poſſeſſion of certain Lands given him by Botſcay, to have been by his own Tenants, lying in wait for him upon a ſtrait Paſſage, ſlain.

1607 Amongſt the Articles of the Peace before concluded betwixt the Emperour and the Great Sultan, one was for the mutual ſending of Preſents one of them unto another; with which Preſents, when as the Ambaſſador, by the Emperour appointed for the carriage of the ſame to Conſtantinople, from day to day deferred to ſet forward, the Turks and Tartars began to doubt, or elſe ſeemed to doubt, of the good meaning of the Chriſtians, for the obſerving of the aforeſaid Peace; and thereupon began again not only to roam abroad into the Territories of the Chriſtians, but alſo cauſed the Pledges left at Buda for the obſerving of the Peace, to be hardly handled and clapt faſt in Priſon; whom, whenas the Baſſa of Buda ſhortly after ſuffered again a little to walk abroad, the proud Janiſaries were therewith ſo much offended, that riſing in a Tumult, they had almoſt ſlain the Baſſa with Stones, heaping upon him many reproachful Words, and unto his Face calling him Traytor and betrayer of his Prince and Country, one of which Pledges they grievouſly wounded alſo. Which their Inſolency the Baſſa in ſome ſort to chaſtiſe, and to deter them from doing the like again, cauſed certain of them the Night following to be ſecretly taken, and being bound, to be ſo caſt into the River of Danubius. And yet ſhortly after, they purpoſing to make a Road upon the Chriſtians, to colour ſuch harms as they ſhould therein do, and to lay all the blame thereof upon the Chriſtians, and to excuſe themſelves, they procured the Baſſa to write unto the Archduke Matthias, of great wrongs done unto the Turks by the Chriſtians, whenas there was no ſuch thing at all; the effect of which Letters were, That whereas it was in the Articles of Peace ſet down and agreed, that both Parties ſhould abſtain from Roads and Incurſions of each others Countries, yet that the Chriſtians for all that had above an hundred times ſince the concluſion of the Peace, made Roads into divers Territories of the Turks, and ſlain many of them; but eſpecially them of Leoven and Serſchin, who (as they ſaid) had ſlain divers Turkiſh Merchants of Peſth, and taken from them great ſums of Money, as they had alſo taken from them of Potſen a hundred and twenty Horſes, with divers other Cattel. Beſides that, there were (as he ſaid) four Turks more by the Chriſtians ſlain, near unto Caniſia, and eight and twenty more taken Priſoners; and that in the mid-way betwixt Hatwan and Buda five and twenty Turks more were ſlain, and their Horſes, with all that they had beſide carried away. Which things, for that they tended to the breach of the Peace, he could not (as he ſaid) but advertiſe his Highneſs of, for that he thought the Chriſtian Captains upon the borders of their Territories to be men that hated Peace, and to ſeek by their Excurſions, as heretofore they had done, ſo now likewiſe alſo, to diſturb this good Work begun, and by all means to increaſe their own private Profit. And that therefore, ſeeing that he and the Turks on their part wiſhed not to attempt or go about any thing contrary to the Articles of the Peace, that ſo likewiſe the Chriſtians ſhould contain themſelves within their own bounds, and with all ſpeed by Letters to give him to underſtand whether they would keep the Peace or not.

The Janizaries in Mutiny againſt the Baſſa of Buda.

The effect of the Letters of the Baſſa of Buda to the Archduke Matthias.

The Great Sultan (as is aforeſaid) having made Peace with the Chriſtian Emperour, and now purpoſing to turn all his Forces againſt his Rebels in Aſia, and the Perſian King, (as we have oftentimes ſaid) and deſirous to appeaſe thoſe his Troubles at home, before he had farther to do with the Perſian, he ſent a Meſſenger unto the Baſſa of Aleppo, to lay down Arms, and to deliver over his charge unto another, to whom he had appointed pointed the ſame; promiſing, that if he would ſhew himſelf obedient unto this his Command, he would not only pardon him all that was paſt, but receive him into his Grace and Favour alſo. Whereunto the Baſſa anſwered, That he had never taken up Arms againſt his Majeſty, but to be revenged on the Baſſaes of Tripolis and Damaſco, his ſworn Enemies; who once taken out of the way, he would not only yield himſelf unto his Majeſty, but re-deliver alſo the Tribute ſent him from Caire and Alexandria, by him before intercepted, and (if he ſo pleaſed to employ him) to bring great Forces in his Service againſt the Perſian King. With which anſwer, the Sultan not contented, ſhortly after ſent the Viſier Baſſa with a great Army againſt the Rebels into Aſia; who, by his Wiſdom and Diſcretion, more than by force of Arms, having appeaſed the Rebels in the leſſer Aſia, and received certain of the chiefeſt of them into his favour, with an Army of an hundred and thirty thouſand men marched directly towards Aleppo in Syria. Of whoſe coming, the Baſſa of Aleppo having intelligence, with an Army of forty thouſand men, moſt part of them Harquebuſiers, went againſt him, and in a place of advantage, not paſt two miles from the City, there encountred him, and in three notable Battels one after another, withſtood his whole Forces. But making himſelf ready to have encountred him the fourth time, underſtanding of great aid comming to the Viſier from the Baſſaes of Damaſco and Tripolis, he with ſpeed retired, and returning into the City, and having truſſed up his Treaſure, with ſuch things as he made moſt reckoning of, fled into the Mountains towards Perſia, with the greateſt part of his Army yet left ſtill following him. After which unfortunate Battel, the Viſier Baſſa with his Army coming unto the City, at length by force took the ſame, and there, to the terrour of the Inhabitants, put to the ſword all the Garriſon ſouldiers which the Baſſa had there left.

The Rebels in the leſſer Aſia by the Viſier Baſſa appeaſed.

The Baſſa of Aleppo, after three notable encounters with the Viſier, flyeth.

But the Baſſa, purpoſing with new Forces to have encountred with the Viſier, finding himſelf, together with his better Fortune, forſaken by many of his former Friends and Companions, did think it beſt at length to take his refuge unto the mercy of the Great Sultan; and ſo reſolved, by Letters requeſted the Viſier Baſſa to write in his behalf unto the Sultan; and ſo, if it were poſſible, to procure his peace. Which the Viſier having eaſily obtained, he was by Letters from the Great Sultan ſent for to Conſtantinople, with aſſured promiſe, that he ſhould be employed in ſervice againſt the Perſian King. Upon receit of which Letters, the Baſſa with an hundred horſe ſet forward; and coming to Conſtantinople, there, in the preſence of many other of the Baſſaes, humbled himſelf unto the Sultan; who not only kept his promiſe with him in pardoning of him, but alſo, in regard of the antient Family whereof he was deſcended, as alſo of his great valour and fair conditions, received him again into his favour, and cauſed all the goods taken from him in Syria, to be again reſtored unto him.

The Baſſa of Aleppo pardoned by the Great Sultan, and received again into favour.

The great Sultan ſeeketh in vain by the means of the Tartar to make peace with the Perſian.

The Letters of the Perſian King unto the King of Spain.

Now in the mean time the great Sultan had, by the means of the great Cham of Tartary, endeavour'd to make peace with the Perſian King, but all in vain; for that he demanded the City of Tauris, with all the Provinces before taken from him by the Perſians, to be again reſtored unto him; which the Perſian King utterly denied, for as much as he had now by force of Arms recovered the ſame, and which in former time belonged unto his Anceſtors. At which time the ſaid Perſian King, the more to entangle the Turk, writ unto the King of Spain, for the turning of his Forces alſo againſt the Turk, their common Enemy; the Letters being to this effect: That though they were in Religion divided, yet that in Power and in common hatred againſt the Othoman Empire they were conjoyned: and that he, conſidering the greatneſs of his Power and Arms, whereby he was become his Neighbour in the Eaſt, could not but moſt entirely love and favour him; and that therefore he had commanded all his Provinces, as well in India as in other places thereabouts, that they ſhould ſhew unto his Subjects all manner of courteſie, and to demand of them no Tribute. And that he, having by force recovered the Fortreſs of Aden, which Solyman the Turkiſh Sultan had ſometime by Treaſon ſurprized, had appointed the ſame unto the ſervice of the Spaniſh Governour dwelling in Goa. And that his pleaſure was, That all the Chriſtians dwelling in his Kingdom ſhould enjoy the ſame liberty and priviledges which his own faithful Subjects had. And beſides declared, that he had now for ſeven years ſpace made continual Wars againſt the Turkiſh Sultan, who had by Treaſon taken from him the ſtrong Town of Chiamon, for the recovery whereof, he had now divers times overthrown his Armies. But for as much as he was determined to make no end of this War, until he had driven the Sultan out of thoſe parts of the Eaſt, and recovered the Seat of Iſmael and Juchel, his Anceſtors in Babylon and Caire, he therefore requeſted him, being a King of ſo great power, to joyn in League with him, and to ſend his dreadful Fleet into the Perſian Gulf; promiſing, that by ſuch means, the Othoman Power driven out, he could eaſily make himſelf Lord of Syria and of Egypt. Laſt of all, he rekoneth up the Preſents he ſent him, to wit, the Images of Iſmael, Juchel, and of Jonas, together with his own, caſt in gold, and ſet with moſt rich precious Stones and Pearls; a Perſian writing Table, garniſhed with fair precious Stones, four Dogs, by nature wonderfully ſpotted with red, yellow, and blue ſpots, two pieces of Arras, adorned with moſt precious Stones and Pearl, wherein the worthy Acts of him that great Tamerlane were lively to be ſeen: four Hunters horns very ſmooth and richly garniſhed; twelve moſt gallant Plumes of Feathers of divers colours: ſix Drinking-glaſſes which could not be broken, and Couch-beds ſo cunningly made, as that they were like unto Chairs, having wrought in them the antient Wars betwixt Aſcanius and Chinſa King of the Medes.

The States of Hungary about to depart from Presburg, by the perſuaſion of the Arch-biſhop there ſtaid.

Now the Emperour, for the better appeaſing of all former troubles, and the preventing of new, and the better aſſurance of the State, had, about the middle of Auguſt, called an Aſſembly of the States of Hungary to Presburg; whither they being come, and having long in vain expected the coming of Matthias the Arch-duke, by the Emperour appointed to have been Preſident in that Aſſembly, were, in the beginning of September, about to have returned home, but that, requeſted by the Arch-biſhop to ſtay yet fifteen days longer, they were contented ſo to do; but yet upon condition, That if the Arch-duke then came not, they ſhould not be bound to ſtay any longer: For why, they, by Letters certified of the attempts of the Tartars, (who had requeſted to have a place in the Borders of Hungary appointed them to dwell in) were deſirous in any wiſe to have that Aſſembly of Parliament put off to a farther time, that ſo they might the better betime prevent and meet with ſuch the Tartars Deſigns, whom they were loth to have for their bad and troubleſom Neighbours. And now the Turks in the mean time, in hopes that the Peace betwixt them and the Chriſtians would not long hold, were come to Buda in ſuch multitudes, that the houſes in the Town being not able to hold them, they were glad to ſet up Tents for them to lye in within the City; for that the Baſſa would not ſuffer them to ſet up any Tents abroad in the Fields, leſt the Chriſtians ſhould ſuſpect them to be about the raiſing of an Army, and ſo to diſturb the Peace.

The States of Hungary depart from Presburg without any thing doing.

But the States of Hungary, having ſtayed full fifteen days, as the Arch-biſhop had requeſted, and the Arch-duke not coming; made a ſolemn Proteſtation before the Chapter of the Cathedral Church at Presburg, that they departed from Presburg, and ſo returned home, not upon any diſcontentment or Contumacy, but for want of things neceſſary, and other their urgent Occaſions, (having above ſeven weeks expected the Arch-duke's coming, without whom nothing could be done) and yet, that if it ſhould pleaſe the Emperour by ſolemn Summons at any time after to call another Parliament, they would be ready upon any ſuch Summons given, to return again to Presburg, and there to conſult of all ſuch things as ſhould be for the good and welfare of the Common-weal; ſo that nothing were propounded contrary to the Articles they the year before agreed upon at Vienna, which they would have in all points kept whole and inviolate; ſo that if any man ſhould go about or attempt any thing in diſpoſing and ordering of the Publick Affairs contrary to that Agreement, they would not in any wiſe ratifie the ſame, altho it were by the Emperour himſelf allowed; which their Proteſtation they requeſted to have regiſtred, and ſealed with the Chapters Seal, and ſo, not having done any thing at all for which they came, again returned.

The Haiducks go about to raiſe new ſtirs in Hungary.

After whoſe departure from Presburg, the Haiducks, (Men uſed to live by their Swords, and not by their Labour) of all others moſt diſcontented with this general Peace, began now to raiſe new ſtirs and Tumults, and daily to grow ſtronger and ſtronger, craving Aid of the Turks and Tartars, and not of the other Hungarians their Country-men, now again returned to their wonted Allegeance unto the Chriſtian Emperour; a number of which Haiducks flocking to Buda, the Baſſa there, with ſome other of the Turks Captains and Commanders, entred into Conſultation what to do with theſe ſo fit Inſtruments for the troubling of the Chriſtians, and the diſturbing of the Peace. To entertain them he durſt not, and to caſt them off he was loth; but yet purpoſing to uſe them, and to ſet them a work as occaſion ſhould ſerve, he, to prepare an entrance thereunto, by Letters threatned them of Comora, that except they better kept the Capitulations and Articles of the late Peace, they ſhould ſhortly hear of new matters. But in the mean time, Letters were ſent from the Great Sultan to the Baſſa of Buda, with charge, that although the Chriſtians were reported to increaſe their ſtrength, he ſhould yet keep himſelf within his bounds, and to attempt nothing againſt them, except they ſhould proceed to manifeſt force; in which caſe he ſhould not fail by all lawful means to revenge himſelf. Which the Sultan's mind once made known, the Turks again departed from Buda, moſt part of the great Ordnance that they brought with them being carried back again to Sigeth.

The Baſſa of Buda forbidden to make Wars upon the Chriſtians.

An Aſſembly of the States of the upper Hungary, and the decrees by them there made.

But the States of Hungary, being returned home from Presburg, and again Aſſembled, the Fourteenth day of October, by their general conſent, decreed, That Tokay ſhould again be joyned unto their Juriſdiction; and that the great Ordnance throughout all the free Cities ſhould be removed and carried home unto the Places whereunto they before belonged: That the Vayvod of Tranſilvania ſhould be admoniſhed not to ſeparate Tranſilvania from Hungary: That the Baſſa of Buda ſhould be warned to keep his Turks within their own bounds: And that the Nobility of Hungary ſhould betime be admoniſhed with all their force to repreſs the Haiducks, and all other their Enemies. Howbeit, the Haiducks proceeding in their inſolent Out-rages more than before, took certain Forts, and with Fire and Sword ſpoiled many Places of the Country, cauſing the People to ſwear to be Friends to them and the Turks, and Enemies unto the Germans and Wallons; and demanding of Humanoius the Crown wherewith Boiſcay had ſometime been rewarded from the Grand Seigniour, had a purpoſe to have crowned him, or ſome other for their King; who for all that, by a Meſſenger ſent word unto them, that he would not at their hands accept that Dignity, but faithfully continue in his Allegiance toward the Emperour. But when the States of the upper Hungary were about to have gone againſt theſe ſeditious and rebellious People to have ſurpriſed them; they were from ſo doing deterred by the Baſſa of Agria, threatning with his Turks and Tartars to take their parts if they ſhould once take up Arms againſt them.

About the ſame time, ſix hundred Haiducks going to the Caſtle of Saint Andrew, and coming thither could not be let in by the Garriſon Souldiers, as they had deſired; and perceiving them to make no reckoning of their Service, could no longer hold, but openly profeſſed themſelves to become the Great Sultan's Servants; who from thence marching to Budnok, took it by force, and ranſack'd it; and ſo ſtill ſeeking after Booty, ran out towards Tockay, where by the way they were in a ſtrait by Humanoius, lying in wait for them, entrapped, and almoſt all ſlain; who afterward ſent two of the Turks Enſigns taken from them to Vienna, and to the terrour of others, empailed ſome of them upon Stakes, being brought Priſoners to Caſſovia. For which unfortunate Expedition, ſome other of the Haiducks lighting upon two of the Captains, who by chance had eſcaped out of Humanoius's hands, put them both to death for the evil leading of their fellows, hanging up the one, and with their Swords hewing the other all to pieces. Now by the report of ſome of the Priſoners there taken, it was known this new Rebellion of the Haiducks to have been raiſed by the procurement of the Baſſaes of Buda and Agria, who by their Meſſengers had promiſed unto them all help. Which Report to have been true, the Event did ſhortly after confirm; for the 27th day of November almoſt fifteen thouſand of theſe Haiducks, having before received from the Great Sultan three hundred thouſand Duckets for Pay, came and moſt ſtraitly beſieged Filek, a ſtrong Caſtle, the Turks ſending them great Ordnance from Agria; unto whom theſe Haiducks had promiſed to deliver all ſuch Places as they ſhould win. Howbeit, the Event of this ſiege anſwered not their deſire; for Thomas Boſnias, Captain of Filek, with his Garriſon all of German Souldiers, ſo valiantly repulſed them, and the extremity of the Winter-weather ſo diſtreſſed them, that they were glad to raiſe their ſiege, and be gone.

Six hundred Haiducks intercepted by Humanoius

The Haiducks in their Rebellion ſupported by the Turks.

Now much about the ſame time, viz. about the beginning of November, a great Fire aroſe at Conſtantinople, wherein almoſt five hundred Shops of Wares, with many other fair Buildings were burnt, ſo that the harm there by fire done was eſteemed to amount to above two millions of Gold.

A great Fire at Conſtantinople.

At the ſame time that the Aſſembly of the States of Hungary ſhould have been holden at Presburg, (as is before declared) the Emperour had appointed appointed alſo another Aſſembly of the Nobility and States of Auſtria to be holden at Vienna; where, after they were aſſembled, certain Articles were unto them on the Emperours behalf propounded for them in that Aſſembly then to conſider of; as firſt, that for the keeping of the Frontiers of Auſtria in quiet, the Contribution by them granted among themſelves the laſt year, ſhould this year following be doubled. Then, that if it ſhould fortune the Enemy to attempt any thing of new againſt that Province, that inſtead of the Horſes and Money which they were wont to ſend unto the Wars, they ſhould for the ſpace of twelve Months, or of the greateſt part thereof, as occaſion ſhould require, of their own coſts maintain ten Companies of German Foot-men, every Company being three hundred ſtrong; and as many Troops of German Horſe-men, every Troop conſiſting of an hundred Horſe. And, that if for the better defence of the Borders of Auſtria there ſhould happily need a greater ſtrength, the ſame ſhould be raiſed in no other ſort than was uſed in Hungary, nor at greater charges maintained. And, that if it ſhould continue Peace, theſe charges ſhould be converted to the payment of the Souldiers Wages: And that the States and other Subjects of that Province ſhould ſo much as might be, be eaſed from the trouble of ſending either of Horſe or Foot for the defence of the Frontiers. Thirdly, that Commiſſaries ſhould be maintained this year alſo to attend the Army, and certain skilful Captains appointed for the chuſing of a fit General for the Army. That diligent regard and care ſhould be had for the Proviſion of Corn and Victuals for the uſe of the People in General, as well in the time of Peace as of War. And that foraſmuch as it much concerned the good of the Common-weal, to have the Frontiers of the Country toward Caniſia diligently viewed, for fear of the Turks great Garriſon there ſtill lying, that therefore certain good and expert Souldiers, which knew thoſe places well, ſhould be choſen, who, together with the Deputies of the Emperour, Hungarians, and Stirians, riding about theſe Confines, ſhould forthwith conſider what were beſt to be done for the ſafety thereof. In brief, ſeeing that on the ſafety of Rab, the welfare of the City of Vienna, and of the Forts thereabouts depended, that for the repairing of the Fortifications thereof, and the better ſtrengthning of the ſame, the ſum of four thouſand Florens ſhould be appointed; and for the defence of the Frontiers of Auſtria from the incurſion of the Turks Garriſon of Caniſia, five thouſand; and for the furthering of the Buildings at Nuſtorfe, five thouſand more ſhould be paid; and that thoſe who hitherto had been ſlack in paying of their Contribution Money, ſhould forthwith be enforced to pay the ſame. And alſo that it might be conſidered of, how that too much inhauncing of the value of Monies might be reſtrained; that good orders might be kept; all the Country cleared from the Robberies of the Souldiers, ſtragling here and there up and down the ſame; that the counterfeit Hungarian and Polonian Money ſhould be prohibited, as not current; that good order might be taken for the ſtaying of the Plague, which then began in many Places in Auſtria.

An Aſſembly of the States of Auſtria, and the Emperors demands therein.

The Aſſembly broken up, and nothing concluded.

Concerning which Articles, when as the States there aſſembled complained, all that Country to be with the long Wars againſt the Turk, the Incurſions of the Rebels, and the Outrages of the mutinous Souldiers, already almoſt exhauſted, and miſerably bared of Money; no reſolution could then, according as the Neceſſity required, be made, but was unto a further time deferred, and the Aſſembly broken up.

A Diet of the Empire by the Emperour appointed at Ratisbone.

The Articles by the Emperour propounded to be conſidered of in the Diet of the Empire at Ratisbone.

The Emperour at the ſame time appointed a Diet of the Empire to be holden at Ratisbone; wherein he, having appointed Ferdinand, Arch-duke of Auſtria, to be chief in his place, he with a notable train of ſeven hundred Horſe, and a gallant guard of Footmen, came thither the eight and twentieth of November, and was there by the Citizens honourably received. Unto which Aſſembly, when as the Deputies of the Electors, and of the other Princes and Cities of the Empire, were in great number come, at length, the twelfth of January, Divine Service being done in the Cathedral Church, Ferdinand the Arch-duke, with his Courtiers, the Emperours Counſellors, and other the Princes Deputies being there preſent, taking Horſe before the Church, with a great company of the Nobility and Princes Deputies following of him, went to the Court; the Citizens in their Arms ſtanding on both ſides; where Godfrey Ortelius, the Emperours Secretary, having in a notable Oration ſet forth the Emperours Love and Affection towards the Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire; and why, the Emperour himſelf could not be preſent at this Aſſembly, as willingly he would have been; he propounded in his Name five Articles for them in this their Aſſembly to be eſpecially conſidered of. Firſt, how the Empire might hereafter be preſerved and defended againſt the Violence of the Turks, and the dangerous rebellions by their procurement ſtirred up in Hungary, to the endangering of the whole Empire; eſpecially ſeeing that the Turks themſelves (with whom the Peace was of late concluded) by their doings had heretofore more than ſufficiently declared what truſt or credit was to be given unto them; and ſeeing that it is moſt manifeſt, them therein to have ſought for nothing elſe, than that having made or rather counterfeited a Peace with the Chriſtians for a time, for the ſuppreſſing of the Rebels, and the repreſſing of the Invaſions of the Perſians, they might after ſuch Victory againſt them obtained, come better provided and ſtronger to overcome the Chriſtians. Which was eaſie to be ſeen; for that whilſt they were yet intreating of Peace, they had taken Strigonium, and having concluded Peace, they ceaſed not as yet with their Counſel and Aid to help the Rebels in their rebellious Tumults; which was manifeſtly to be perceived by the Haiducks themſelves, who were not aſhamed openly to profeſs themſelves to be the Great Sultans Servants, to require Cities and Fortreſſes to be yielded unto the Sultan, and to conſpire againſt the very name of the Germans. For the ſpeedy Remedy of which miſchief, the Emperour had thought good, that conſideration of this point ſhould ſo be had, as that the Princes ſhould either conſent unto a certain ſtanding and perpetual Contribution, whereby a ſufficient ſtrength might always be ready wherewith to withſtand the Enemies attempts; or elſe that for certain years twenty thouſand Foot men, and four thouſand Horſe might there be ſtill in readineſs, to be maintained at the common charges of the Empire; which the Emperour (need ſo requiring) might uſe againſt the common Enemy. Or, that if this were heavy or troubleſome unto the States of the Empire, yet at leaſt they ſhould conſent yearly to contribute ſuch Money as might ſuffice for the ſuſtaining of ſuch a Power. Another point of this Concluſion, was, about the correcting and reforming of the adminiſtration of Juſtice in the Imperial Chamber. For, ſeeing that in the former Aſſemblies and meetings this matter could not be fully decided, by reaſon of certain hinderances and impediments which then fell out, and that without the due Adminiſtration and Execution of Juſtice no Empire could long ſtand or flouriſh, no more than the World could without the Sun; his Imperial Majeſty therefore would not have the Deliberation of this ſo neceſſary a point to be put off or referred unto any other Aſſembly, but to be done and concluded in this preſent Aſſembly. The third point to be conſidered of was, the War which hath been now ſo many years made in the Low-Countries, and the inconveniency thereof redounding unto the Empire. For whereas in the Treaty of Peace in the Low-Countries, (at which Treaty both he and the whole Empire ought to have been there preſent) for the better concluding and ending of the ſame, he had heard the confederate Princes to be now acknowledged for a free State, he could not now any longer (as he ſaid) forbear, but that (ſeeing the Low Countries to be a member and Fee of the Empire, and by the antient Records of the Empire, and of the Emperours, and by many other Proofs it appeareth, the Governours of the Low-Countries to have been Vaſſals of the Empire) he ſhould by Letters which were written unto the King of Spain, the Arch-duke Albertus, and the States of the confederate Provinces, admoniſh them, That they ſhould not proceed to do or determine any thing in this matter, which might any way tend to the hurt or prejudice of the Emperour, of the Empire, and of the Houſe of Auſtria. And foraſmuch as that War in the Low Countries had hitherto done no ſmall harm unto the Empire, if happily it could not be agreed upon between the Parties, and that it ſhould happen the ſame War to be any longer continued, or rather again renewed, it ſhould then be conſidered upon, how the Empire might be ſatisfied for the great harm it had until this preſent thereby received, and how it might be from the like harm hereafter kept and preſerved. The fourth point in this Conſultation, which was to be conſidered of, concerned the Coyn. For whereas it is manifeſt, that the value of the Mony to be daily more and more inhaunced and raiſed, and that thereby not only the Magiſtrates in the publick Recipt, but the Subjects alſo in general received great and manifeſt harm, foraſmuch as the price of ſuch neceſſary things which we muſt in this Life have ordinary uſe of, muſt of neceſſity be ſtill more and more increaſed, according to the value of the Money, the Emperour thought good with mature Deliberation to remedy this miſchief in this preſent Aſſembly of the Empire. The fifth and laſt point which was to be conſidered upon, was, the perfecting of the Matriculer of the Empire, for the giving unto every Man that which of due belongeth unto him; the perfecting of which Matriculer, the Emperour would have in this Aſſembly to be amongſt them conſidered of.

Which Articles thus propounded, there fell a great Controverſie amongſt the Deputies of the Princes concerning the manner of their proceeding in theſe matters: as whether they ſhould conſider of theſe Articles in ſuch order as they were propounded, or otherwiſe. And when as many thought it beſt firſt to conſider of the Article for the Reformation of Juſtice, being the ſecond Article propounded to be conſidered of, and afterwards to come unto the reſt of the Articles to be afterward conſulted of; when as the two and twentieth day of January they came again to Council, a Writing was by the Emperours command read unto them, whereby it was ſignified unto the States of the Empire, the rebellious Tumults by Botſcay and ſome others raiſed in Hungary to be yet by the Haiducks continued, the Sultan himſelf ſending of them Rewards, and furniſhing them with Ordnance and other things neceſſary for the Wars, by the Governour of Agria, and the Baſſa of Buda, threatning all Extremities unto them which ſhould go about to reſiſt them; and then augmenting the danger which thereby might enſue unto the Empire, and eſpecially unto the German Name, ſeeing that it was manifeſt thoſe rebellious Haiducks to have eſpecially conſpired the Deſtruction of the Germans, and to have confirmed that their League, by drinking of an Health: It was requeſted, that leaving off theſe Contentions for the manner of their Proceeding, they would turn their Conſultations unto the firſt Article, and reſolve how Remedy might in time be given unto this miſchief, and how Aid might be ſent unto the Emperour againſt his Enemies.

The Deputies for the States of the Empire, in the Aſſembly at Ratisbone, at variance among themſelves.

But when as in their often meetings nothing could be concluded, by reaſon of the divers and different Opinions betwixt the Proteſtants and Catholicks, Ferdinand the Arch-duke again calling together the Deputies of the Electors, of the Princes, and of the Imperial Cities, cauſed it by Letters to be declared unto them, How that the Emperour, not without his great Grief and Sorrow had heard, That for certain diſſentions among them they could not yet come to conſult of the Articles propounded in that Aſſembly to be by them conſidered of, but to his great Grief to be from day to day protracted; and that therefore he requeſted them, That either they themſelves would quietly end thoſe Diſſentions amongſt themſelves, or elſe ſend their Differences, conceived in Writing, unto the Emperour to be decided, and ſo at length to come effectually to conſult of the propounded Articles. And indeed the Deputies aforeſaid had in Writing before exhibited their Minds concerning that point, for the manner of their Proceeding, unto the Arch-duke Ferdinand. But foraſmuch as that Writing was according to the manner of the Catholicks and the Proteſtants, of two different ſorts; the former thinking it meet to conſult of the aforeſaid Articles in ſuch order as they were propounded, and firſt of all, to conſider of the Contribution to be given againſt the Turks, and other Enemies in Hungary; but the other labouring, firſt for the Reformation of Juſtice, and the confirming of the Peace of Religion; and afterward to provide for Aid againſt the foreign Enemies, that ſo Remedy might firſt be provided for inward, than for outward Griefs; eſpecially ſeeing that they had no expreſs Commandment firſt to determine of the Contribution. Unto whom the Arch-duke by Writing again anſwered, That he had received no other Inſtruction from the Emperour, then that he ſhould conſult of the aforeſaid Articles, with the Deputies there preſent, in ſuch order as they were propounded: Neither that it was convenient, that the firſt Article concerning Contribution being neglected, they ſhould proceed unto the ſecond, ſeeing that the Enemies might eaſily, by the delay of putting off the ſame in effect take occaſion in the mean time to do the Chriſtians great harm. Beſides that, that he had ſufficiently proteſted, That Conſultation concerning the Reformation of Juſtice ſhould in this preſent Aſſembly be had alſo; neither that it was the Emperours mind to have it deferred unto any other Aſſembly. Wherefore he exhorted the Proteſtants, That they ſhould forthwith endeavour by their Letters unto the Electors & Princes, and other their Superiours, to obtain leave, that they might firſt determine ſome certainty about the firſt Article concerning Contribution; that ſo giving way to the Opinion of the other party, they might inſtantly prepare themſelves for the making of the Contribution. Howbeit, this his perſwaſion prevailed nothing, by reaſon of their Diſcord and Diſſention about the order of their Conſultation; the one part ſtill labouring for the Contribution to be firſt agreed upon, and the other part holding as hard for the Reformation of Juſtice; ſo that Ferdinand the Arch-duke, out of hope of concluding any thing that good was, not in vain to ſpend his coſt and time any longer, the fifth of May diſmiſſed the Aſſembly, and returned home, as did all the reſt of the Electors and Princes Deputies, no one Article that was propounded being ſo much as once reaſoned of, but all left undecided; ſo ſmall care was there of the common good, either for the raiſing of Money for the withſtanding of the Turks and Rebels, or for the Reformation of Juſtice; the Neceſſity of both, either on the one ſide or the other, ſo hardly urged, and yet in Concluſion be neither reſpected or regarded.

Matthias the Arch-duke cometh to Presburg.

Whilſt the Diet to no purpoſe (as is aforeſaid) was by the Arch-duke Ferdinand holden at Ratisbone, Matthias the Arch-duke, with a grait Train following of him, came in the mean time to Presburg, where he was with much Joy and Triumph received; the Garriſon Souldiers in order ſtanding on both ſides the way as he went unto the Caſtle: Napragius the Biſhop of Rab, with an eloquent Oration welcoming of him, in the preſence of certain of the Hungarian Nobility, who had gone out as far as Hainburg to meet him, and now alſo honourably welcomed him, much rejoycing at his coming. The next day the Arch-biſhop, and Cardinal of Strigonium, with a notable Train of Hungarian Gentlemen came to Presburg; who, forthwith received into the Caſtle, and having ſaluted the Arch-duke, conferred with him of many things in this Aſſembly to be conſulted of. In the mean time Illiſhaſcius (that Noble Hungarian of whom we have ſo often ſpoken) arrived there alſo with twelve Coaches, ninety Harquebuſiers, and forty Hungarian Horſemen going before him, and three hundred Haiducks which had attended upon him, being at the Gate diſmiſſed. So the chief of the Hungarian States being come, the Conſultation was begun the three and twentieth day of January; where, when as the Arch-duke had propounded unto the Hungarian Nobility, what things they were eſpecially to conſider of; it was by them anſwered, The Haiducks, before their coming out, to have determined, not one whit to depart from the Articles the year before propounded and agreed on at Vienna; nor to admit any limitation at all of them, ſo that for the appeaſing of the Tumults of the Haiducks, there was no need of any new Conſultation, but only to confirm ſuch things as was then and there conſulted and agreed upon. From which their Reſolution, when as the Hungarians were not to be removed, and being grieved with the ſcoffing at of certain of the Clergy (thereupon refuſing in any wiſe to make their appearance, as they were commanded, before the Cardinal in the Caſtle) were about again to depart, making a ſolemn Proteſtation, themſelves to be guiltleſs of ſuch harms as ſhould thereof afterwards enſue; it was at length on all parts agreed upon, That the whole matter ſhould be committed unto ten choſen out of the Hungarian Counſellors, and ten more of the Counſellors of Auſtria, to be conſulted and determined of. By whom, being met all together the eight and twentieth day of January, in the Houſe of Illiſhaſcius, it was concluded, That ſeeing that Peace and Quietneſs in thoſe Countries of Hungary and Auſtria, could not otherwiſe be made, that thoſe Articles and Conditions, concerning which no Agreement could the year before be made in the Treaty at Vienna, being quite left off and neglected, the reſt of the Articles which were there agreed upon, ſhould be ſtill entirely obſerved and kept; and that it ſhould be lawful for every man to have the free Exerciſe of his Religion. Which thing the Commiſſioners of Auſtria by a ſpecial Writing there confirmed unto the Hungarians. Whereby they declared themſelves, after long and mature deliberation, to have perceived, not only by the true relation and report of the Hungarians, but alſo by their own experience, unto how great Inconveniencies the whole Kingdom of Hungary hath of long been expoſed, as well for the Wars it hath had with the common Enemy of the Chriſtians, as for divers the civil Tumults and Seditions therein; and that therefore they, not willing that ſuch harms ſhould in thoſe Countries again increaſe and grow, to the infinite effuſion of Chriſtian Blood, after the Articles of Pacification agreed upon at Vienna, ſaw no other better Remedy for theſe ſo great Inconveniencies, than that all Parties ſhould ſtill hold themſelves contented with the ſame Articles of Pacification concluded and agreed upon in the ſaid Aſſembly at Vienna. And that therefore they had decreed, thoſe Articles to be ſincerely and inviolately kept; and promiſed unto the States of Hungary, to give their Aid for the defence of theſe Articles, againſt all their Enemies, being ready to give good reaſon thereof before God, the Church, the Emperour Rodolph, the Arch-duke Matthias, and his other Brethren, and all the Houſe of Auſtria, as the Neceſſity of thoſe Countries ſhould ſeem to require; hoping alſo that the States of Hungary would reſt themſelves likewiſe in that Pacification of Vienna, and the aſſurance thereof, in all points obſerving the ſame; and that they would always give their ready Help and Aid unto the Countries of Auſtria againſt their Enemies in like manner. All which things thus agreed upon and determined, Letters of Confederation were in the Name of Matthias the Arch-duke, and of all, as well the Eccleſiaſtical as Temporal States of Hungary and Auſtria, to this purpoſe written, That whereas, for the appeaſing and ſuppreſſing of the Tumults and Seditions, which the Haiducks by the Inſtigation of the Turks had of late not doubted to raiſe, for the concluding of Peace with the Great Sultan; they were met together at Presburg, and therein altogether buſied, to deviſe how the Kingdom of Hungary, with the Countries adjoyning, might from Deſtruction be delivered, in the Chriſtian Religion preſerved, and from waſting and ſpoyling, whereunto they had hitherto been expoſed, ſaved; upon mature Deliberation, had as well in the Name of them that were preſent, as of them that were abſent, made ſuch a Confederation and League, That if hereafter it ſhould fortune any detriment of War to be by any man made or done unto the Hungarians, or the Countries thereabout, for the aforeſaid Articles of Pacification, which they had determined religiouſly to keep, that they would forthwith with their united Forces come to Aid their Confederate Brethren, and together with them to live or die.

Letters of Confederation betwixt the States of Auſtria and Hungary, for the maintaining of the Articles of Pacification agreed upon at Vienna.

With theſe Letters ſigned and ſealed with the hand of the Arch-duke, and of the Noble Men there preſent, the firſt of February, Illiſhaſcius, with George Turſon, were ſent unto the Tumultuous Haiducks (who had now appointed their Meſſages to be ſent unto the Sultan and the Tartar Cham, to crave their Aid) to diſſwade them from ſuch their purpoſe, and to perſwade them to quietneſs; threatning them withal, That if they would not hearken unto ſuch honeſt Conditions, they ſhould all together, and at once, be ſet upon and oppreſſed by the whole Power of the States.

The States of Enſeric commanded by the Archduke Matthias to be always in a readineſs againſt the Haiducks.

The Aſſembly at Presburg thus ended, Matthias the Archduke returning to Vienna, and forthwith calling together the States of Enſeric, declared unto them all that was done in the Aſſembly at Presburg. And for as much as that Aſſembly was chiefly to that end appointed, That the Kingdom of Hungary ſhould not altogether be pluck'd away from the Empire; and that after the revolt thereof, the greateſt harm to be done by the Incurſions and ſpoyling of the Enemies, would lie upon the Countries of Auſtria; he adviſed them ſo to look unto themſelves, and carefully to provide for the Common-weal, as that having Money always in readineſs to maintain an Army, they might with all convenient ſpeed go to meet with the Haiducks, if haply they would not conform themſelves unto the Articles of the Pacification, but again raiſe new Broils; that ſo they might defend and preſerve their Country from their Outrages.

The Prince of Valachia dieth, whoſe Widow notably preſerveth the Country for her Son.

About the beginning of this Spring, when as Jerome Prince of Valachia was dead, leaving behind him a Son but thirteen years old, the Emperour admitted him, as yet not capable of the Government, under Tutors, unto the Succeſſion of his Heritage. Which thing the Valachians being by no means willing to endure, and bearing themſelves upon the help of the Turks, went about to make choice of another inſtead of their Prince of late dead. For which cauſe, the Princeſs, Widow, by Letters certified Polloſcie, her Son in Law, of this Outrage and Injury of her Subjects; and having obtained of him a great ſum of Money, and therewith raiſed an Army of ten thouſand good Souldiers, went forth againſt the Valachians, and in open field overcame them, in ſo bloody and terrible a Battel, that having ſlain five thouſand of the Valachians and Turks, ſhe had over them a notable Victory, and by that means preſerved the Principality of that Country for her Son.

The Duke of Florence in vain requeſted by the Turks to ſpare their Gallies.

The Great Duke of Florence had hitherto done great harm with his Fleet unto the Turks in the Mediterranean Sea; for which cauſe, a Meſſenger about this time coming unto him in the Great Sultans Name, promiſed him great Matters, if he would from thenceforth forbear to hurt and purſue the Turks Gallies. Which his Requeſt ſerved the Turks to no other purpoſe, but as it were to put Oyl unto the Fire. For the Duke afterward cauſed new Gallies to be made, and his Fleet increaſed, and therewith did more harm than formerly he had done.

The Haiducks refuſe to admit of the Pacification made at Vienna.

Now although that after the ending of the Aſſembly at Presburg, Illiſhaſcius and George Turſon had delivered unto the Haiducks the Articles of the Pacification, and commanded them from thenceforth to keep themſelves quiet; yet for all that could they not yet be perſwaded to hearken unto ſuch their Counſel; for that they being Men ſtill accuſtomed to the Wars, and living by their Swords, could not endure to fall to Husbandry, and ſuch other Labours. For which cauſe, they of the Country about Gymeric, writ unto them which dwelt in the Country about Nuſol, Letters to this effect: That foraſmuch as they, being divers times certified of the miſerable eſtate of their Neighbours, had refuſed to come to aid them, they ſhould yet now remember how neceſſary a thing it were, with their conjoyned Minds and Forces to help one another; for that the Haiducks, having now paſſed the River of Teiſe, were broken into that Province, and were run as far as Budnoc; neither were they minded ſo to ſtay, but to rob and ſpoil all the Country before them, if they were not with ſpeed encountred. And the rather, for that but a few days before they had received thirty thouſand Hungarian Duckats from the Turks, whom they now acknowledged for their Lords, with Horſes and other Gifts, to be divided among their Leaders and Captains; and moreover, daily expected Aid from the Tartars, who in great Numbers lay about Belgrade. Wherefore ſeeing it could not be expreſſed what great harm and loſs was by the Haiducks done, as well unto the Noblemen themſelves, as to the common Country-men; that they ſhould therefore thereof give their Neighbours to underſtand, and with all ſpeed to take up Arms againſt the ſame rebellious Haiducks.

The States of Auſtria warned by the Arch-duke to prepare themſelves for an Expedition to be made into Moravia.

Not long after, about the latter end of March, Proclamation was made by the Commandment of Matthias the Arch-duke, throughout all Auſtria, That every man ſhould provide himſelf to take up Arms. The cauſe whereof men diverſly ſuſpected; howbeit that unto this Proclamation was this Reaſon joyned, That the Arch-duke was determined himſelf to go about the fourteenth of April into Moravia, and there to gather together all his Power, as well Hungarians, as Auſtrians and Haiducks, for the War he was to take in hand. There were alſo Letters in the Arch-dukes name ſent unto the Vaſſals of Auſtria, to give them to underſtand, That whereas they were not ignorant, what, for the obtaining of Peace, and Defence of theſe Countries, had of late been decreed at Presburg; and that all the States of Enſeric had approved the report thereof received from their Deputies, and ſo promiſed their help and aid unto the Arch-duke, as if that he himſelf would take in hand any Expedition, they would joyn themſelves unto him, and together with him to live or dye; yet that there were ſome, which being more deſirous of War than Peace, did not only not reſt upon the former Pacification, but gathered an Army alſo in the Borders of Moravia, with a purpoſe to make an inroad as well into Moravia, as into Auſtria it ſelf. For which cauſe, the States of Moravia alſo were enforced, for defence of themſelves, to raiſe an Army, and to crave help from their Neighbours. And that therefore, ſeeing the Arch-duke, mindful of his promiſe for the common Defence of the Countrey, was reſolved to beſtow his Life and all his Fortunes, and in his own Perſon to undertake an Expedition unto thoſe Places from whence the greateſt danger was to be feared to fall upon thoſe Countreys; neceſſity then required, that the States themſelves alſo ſhould ſuffer nothing to be wanting on their behalf, but every one of them, together with their Servants, forthwith to joyn themſelves unto the Arch-duke, and, to the uttermoſt of their power, to endeavour themſelves to deliver them and theirs from death and deſtruction. That God, in whoſe name this Expedition was by them to be taken in hand, as by the lovers of Peace, might ſo in ſhort time make an end of all tumults, and grant unto thoſe Countries wiſhed Peace and quietneſs. And that therefore they were to be admoniſhed, That, according to the tenor of the Decree made at Presburg, they, with ſuch a number of Horſe and Foot as they could upon the ſudden raiſe at a day to be ſhortly after named unto them, ſhould joyn themſelves unto the Arch-duke, and not to ſuffer any thing to let them in ſo doing. So that if haply any chance or ſickneſs ſhould happen unto their General, yet notwithſtanding that they ſhould ſend their Power under the leading of ſome other man, ſeeing that the Arch-duke himſelf ſpared not to adventure his Life and Fortunes, and (if God ſhould ſee it ſo good) account it a great gain even to loſe the ſame, ſo that thereby he might do his Countrey good.

About the beginning of April, the Cardinal returning from Prague to Vienna, brought with him the Emperours Anſwer and Reſolution, viz. That he did ratifie and confirm all things that were done and concluded with the Hungarians and Turks; but that his Will was, That the Confederation made betwixt the States of Hungary and Auſtria at Presburg, ſhould be void, and of none effect. Which, the Arch-duke proteſting that he could by no means like of, or ſuffer to be done, he, the fifteenth of April afterwards, with a great number of the Peers, Nobility, and Counſellors, and a multitude of good Souldiers, going out of Vienna towards the Monaſtery of Neoburg, ſet forward upon his Journey, carrying with him eight and twenty Pieces of Ordnance, there expecting his Souldiers in all places levied: by publick Letters proteſting, That no man ſhould from his Army receive any harm; or if that by chance any harm were done unto any man by his Army, aſſuring his Subjects it ſhould be again unto them reſtored and recompenſed.

The Arch-duke Matthias prepareth himſelf for his Expedition into Moravia.

But the rumour of this Expedition being brought into Bohemia, the Nobility of the Countrey began to aſſemble themſelves the fifteenth day of April, whither, when as many of the Deputies of the other Countreys were aſſembled alſo, it being decreed, That the Nobility of the faithful States there preſent, ſhould with all ſpeed return home, and ſo provide themſelves and their Subjects of neceſſary Arms; that, need ſo requiring, they ſhould therewith be able to defend themſelves and their Countrey, the Aſſembly was diſmiſſed. Beſides that, the Emperour himſelf, careful for all Events, cauſed many, both Horſe and Foot, to be brought to Prague, and to be diverſly billeted in the Citizens houſes: and furthermore, the eighteenth of April, by Letters directed unto certain Princes of the Empire, and to certain Earls alſo, Citizens, and other Vaſſals of the Kingdom of Bohemia, warned them with all ſpeed to ſend Aid unto him at Prague.

The Nobility of Bohemia are by the Emperor commanded to be ready in Arms.

But Matthias the Arch-duke in the mean time marching forward with an Army of twenty thouſand Horſe and Foot, the twenty fourth day of April came to Zname, a City of Moravia; and was there, by the States of Moravia (who the day before were come thither alſo with four hundred Horſe) honourably received and brought into the City. From thence, ſending out Letters into the Territories of Bohemia, and to the City of Prague, he requeſted, That they would ſend out of every place two Deputies for them, unto the Aſſembly to be holden at Zaſtuia the fourth day of May: promiſing withal, That he himſelf being there preſent, would yield unto their Deputies a reaſon of his doings, as alſo what he meant to do hereafter. Beſides that, he, by Letters ſent unto the Electors and other Princes of the Empire, declared the cauſe why he was enforced to make this Expedition; and withal ſending unto them a Copy of the Agreement made at Vienna the five and twentieth day of April in the year 1606, by the common conſent of the Arch-dukes; in moſt friendly manner requeſted them, That they would not intermeddle in this buſineſs, but rather with their Counſel and Aid to further the ſame.

The Arch-duke Matthias with an Army cometh to Zname in Moravia.

The Emperour ſendeth Ambaſſadours to the Arch-duke Matthias at Zname.

But the three and twentieth day of April, the Emperour ſent the Popes Ambaſſadours, with the Ambaſſadours of divers other Princes and States, then lying at Prague, with ſundry of the Bohemian Miniſters, in Embaſſage to the Arch-duke Matthias, ſtill lying at Zname; whom the Cardinal the next day after followed alſo, to make ſome good Pacification, if it were poſſible, with the Arch-duke. But the Emperour in the mean time calling unto him the Counſellors of the old and new Town of Prague, (contrary to his wonted manner) moſt courteouſly with his own hand received them, and giving them thanks for the faithful Duties by them hitherto performed; requeſted them, That hereafter they would continue in their like fidelity and Loyalty alſo; moſt liberally promiſing unto them all kindneſs, with the reſtitution of the Priviledges concerning the ſhutting of the Gates of the City; which Liberty they had before loſt in the time of the Emperour Ferdinand. And not long after, a general Muſter was taken, not only in the City of Prague, and the Towns thereabouts, but alſo throughout all the Kingdom of Bohemia, and three hundred Muſqueteers appointed for the guard and keeping of the Caſtle, under the command of Count Solmes, who had Commiſſion for the raiſing of other Souldiers alſo.

The Tartar Cham dieth.

The ſeditious Turks raiſe new ſtrifes in the leſſer Aſia, and ſpoil Smyrna with the Countrey thereabouts.

At the very ſame time, it was from Conſtantinople certainly reported, the Tartar Cham to have dyed, and the Turkiſh Sultan having received news thereof, to have diſmiſſed his Son, whom he hitherto had detained as a Pledge, and with divers Ships and Gallies, to have cauſed him to be tranſported over the black Sea, unto the Borders of Tartary, there to take poſſeſſion of his Fathers Kingdom. It was alſo then reported, certain of the ſeditious Turks, making of a road to have ſurprized Smyrna, a rich City of Aſia, and to have forraged all the Countrey about it far and near, and coming unto Magneſia, a chief City of that Countrey, to have had ten thouſand Crowns by the Inhabitants offered, from thenceforth to ſpare the Countrey thereabouts. The Perſian King alſo, at the ſame time notably to proceed in his Wars, and to do the Turks great harm, the Turks and Tartars ſeeking in vain to withſtand him.

Ambaſſadours ſent from the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg for the appeaſing of the troubles betwixt the Emperour and Matthias.

In the mean time, Ambaſſadours coming unto Prague from the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, part of them, the ninth of May, went unto the Arch-duke Matthias to Zaſtavia, who ſtill lay there encamped with an Army of five and twenty thouſand Men; of whom they requeſting a Truce for the ſpace of eight Days, for the making of a Pacification betwixt the Emperour and him, and for friendly ending of this buſineſs, eaſily obtained the ſame, eſpecially ſeeing that thoſe Princes Electors, being joyned and bound unto the Emperour in a double Confederation, as well for their Electorſhip, as in reſpect of the Kingdom of Bohemia, could not, as they ſaid, otherwiſe do, but ſend preſent Aid unto the Emperour, his Neceſſity ſo requiring; to which end they had now in readineſs certain thouſands of Souldiers in the Frontiers of their Countries, to be forthwith ſent unto him: The other part of theſe Ambaſſadors in the mean time ſtaying with the Emperour, where, after the German manner, they were well provided of good Cheer and Wine.

Matthias the Arch-duke marcheth towards Prague.

About the ſeventeenth of May, Matthias the Arch-duke, with eighteen thouſand Men, roſe and marched towards Prague, Collonitz with the reſt of the Army following him. And although that the Arch-duke had ſeverely commanded his Souldiers to abſtain from robbing, ſpoyling, and burning of the Country, and had divers times ſeverely puniſhed ſome Offenders therein, by hanging of ſome, and heading of others; yet could he by no means ſo reſtrain them, and keep them in, but that ſome of them would ſometimes be ſtragling abroad, and doing harm, eſpecially the Hungarians, who were ſtill running out even as far as the Emperours Camp, and the new City of Prague: Whom for all that, the Emperours Souldiers (being then twenty thouſand ſtrong) would not meddle withal, being ſo commanded by the Emperour. Howbeit ſome of theſe Straglers going too far abroad into the Country, were by the Country-men cut off and ſlain.

An Aſſembly of the States of Bohemia, holden at Prague, in the Preſence of the Emperour.

The Requeſts of the Nobility and States of Bohemia unto the Emperor.

The three and twentieth day of May, an Aſſembly of the States of Bohemia was called at Prague, the Emperour himſelf being there preſent, Adam Waldſteine carrying the drawn Sword before him. In which Aſſembly, the Nobility and States of the Country with one conſent promiſed to ſpend their Goods and Lives in the Emperours quarrel; yet in the mean time requeſting theſe things following to be granted and confirmed unto them; viz. That Religion, according to the confeſſion of Bohemia and Auguſta, ſhould inviolately be kept, and that they which profeſſed the one, ſhould not therefore ſcoff or deſpiſe the other. That Bohemians only ſhould be preferred to Archbiſhopricks, Abbotſhips, and other ſpiritual Preferments. That the Archbiſhop ſhould not meddle with Civil and Political Affairs. That Eccleſiaſtical Offices ſhould be permitted unto the Proteſtant Miniſters, as in former time, the Catholicks in the mean time holding that they had. The Pontificial diſpenſation in cauſes of Matrimony, according to the Decree of the Aſſembly holden in the Year 1602, ſhould be abrogated and taken away. That it ſhould not be lawful for Prieſts and other Eccleſiaſtical Perſons to buy Lands or Territories,* without the expreſs conſent of all the three States, but to hold themſelves contented with their Tyths and other their Revenues. That it ſhould be lawful for all men in their own Ground and Territories to build Churches for Religion, on both ſides. That Proteſtants and Patrons of the Univerſity of Prague ſhould be joyned to the Conſiſtory, as they were in the time of the Emperour Ferdinand. That one ſhould be choſen for Burgrave in this Aſſembly. That chief political Offices ſhould not be left void above a Month. That unto theſe political Offices men of both Religions ſhould be admitted; ſo that if the Burgrave were a Catholick, the chief Judge ſhould be a Proteſtant. That every man ſhould enjoy his Right, and that no Decree ſhould be publiſhed againſt the ſame; neither that they which were of the Order of Knights ſhould be raſhly ſued, or bound to any arreſt. That one of the Bohemians ſhould always be choſen into the ſecret Council, and made acquainted with the Bohemian Affairs. That every mañ might have acceſs to the Emperour, and not all things to be done by his Counſellors. That it ſhould be declared to all Men, what was to be underſtood by the Crime of Treaſon: That a difference ſhould be made betwixt Offences; and that no man ſhould for any light Offence, together with his Goods, loſe his Life and Reputation. That the Suits of Widows, Orphans, and others alſo, ſhould with Expedition be diſpatched, and not from day to day deferred. That from henceforth the Father ſhould not be bound to pay the Sons debt, which he was run into without his knowledge; neither yet the Son himſelf. That in political Offices Men ſhould not be too much grieved with too heavie Exactions. That Men ſued ſhould not be ſummoned but in good Terms, and that ſuch as were in any Reputation be bound unto any arreſt, without the hearing of their Cauſe, and much leſs to be impriſoned. That the Sword, upon frowardneſs or madneſs taken out of the Church of Thine certain years before, ſhould be again ſet in the former place. That Lawyers which pleaded mens Cauſes, ſhould be contented with ſuch Fees as were by common Decrees appointed them. And laſt of all to conclude, they in any wiſe requeſted the Emperour, that it would pleaſe him to eaſe the Nobility and States of Bohemia of theſe Griefs, before they were compelled to anſwer unto ſuch things as were to be propounded unto them on his behalf. Who eaſily granted unto moſt of theſe Articles, thoſe which concerned Religion only excepted, ſo that the Senators of the old Town of Prague obtained the deſired Sword to be again forthwith ſet in the wonted Place. But as for the buſineſs of Religion, it was altogether put off and deferred unto the next Aſſembly to be holden at the Feaſt of St. Michael.

Matthias* the Archdukes Ambaſſadors come to *Prague.

About the end of May, the Arch-duke Matthias's Ambaſſadors, having received ſafe Conduct from the Emperour and the Nobility of the Kingdom of Bohemia, came to Prague; and being admitted into the Councel of the Nobility, Charles Count Tiſeratin, to whom that charge was given, having in the Archdukes Name firſt ſaluted the Nobility, cauſed what he and the reſt had in charge, to be before them out of a long Writing in the Bohemian Tongue read; which done, when as the Nobility ſo requiring, they were put aſide, and almoſt an hour after were called again, they received Anſwer, That the points of the Ambaſſage by them propounded, were greater, and of more weight, than that ſufficient Deliberation could thereof in ſo ſhort a time be had; and that therefore it was by the Nobility thought meet, that Commiſſioners on both ſides, meeting together in the open Field near unto Debritſe, ſhould there conſult of theſe Articles, and by the Conſent of the Emperour and the Arch-duke, to do what they might to end the matter; Unto which Anſwer the Arch-dukes Ambaſſadors conſenting, the ninth of June returned again unto the Camp. The Emperours Ambaſſadors within two days after with forty Coaches and an hundred Horſe following them unto the Place appointed; who oftentimes going to and fro, at length ſo wrought the matter on both ſides, that the Buſineſs quietly and friendly ended, they were again made Friends.

Commiſſioners appointed for the ending of the Troubles betwixt the Emperour and Matthias the Arch-duke.

The Articles of which Pacification and Agreement betwixt the Emperour and the Arch-duke were the ſeventeenth day of June, in the Caſtle of Prague, openly read in the Bohemian Tongue, Lichtenſtein, Kintskie, and other Chieftains, the Arch-dukes Ambaſſadours, being there preſent, in order thus:

The Articles of Pacification betwixt the Emperour and the Arch-duke Matthias.

That the Emperour refuſed not, but that the Crown of Hungary ſhould be delivered into the Arch-duke Matthias's Hands; and to yield unto him the Kingdom of Hungary, and to remit unto his Subjects the Oath of their Allegeance before given unto him, ſo that the Nobility and States of Hungary ſhould chuſe no other King but the Arch-duke. That in the next Diet of the Empire, he ſhould propound unto the States of the Empire to be conſidered of, what Contribution they ought to make unto the Archduke for the defence of their Frontiers, if happily longer War were to be made with the Turk. That he ſhould cauſe the Writings which concerned that Kingdom of Hungary, within the ſpace of two Months to be delivered unto the Arch-duke. That he ſhould likewiſe alſo ſurrender up the Arch-dukedom of Auſtria, by himſelf hitherto poſſeſſed, unto the Arch-duke: yet ſo as that the Arch-duke ſhould take upon himſelf all the Emperours Debt, as well in Hungary as in Auſtria, and within a year ſhould cauſe ſufficient Recognizance or Caution, ſealed with his own hand, to be delivered unto the Creditors. That he ſhould cauſe all the Letters and Writings, as well concerning the upper Auſtria, as the nether, within the ſame time to be delivered unto him, together with a Copy of the Priviledges therein, until that Deliberation might be had concerning them, to be transferred unto him alſo. That the Nobility and States of Bohemia ſhould in the Emperours Name ratifie and confirm the Treaty held at Vienna, for the making of the Peace betwixt the Emperour, the Turks, and the Hungarians. That they alſo ſhould not refuſe, at the Emperours requeſt, to promiſe unto the Arch-duke a certain Succeſſion into the Kingdom of Bohemia; but yet with condition, ſo that if it ſhould happen the Emperour to dye without Heirs Male, before the death of the Arch-duke his Brother; but if he ſhould have Heirs Male lawfully begotten and under age; that in that caſe he ſhould only have the Rule and Government of the Kingdom of Bohemia, yet with certain Bohemian Counſellers joyned unto him. That the Arch-duke ſhould by writing confirm unto the Nobility and States of Bohemia, That he ſhould after the uſual manner and faſhion demand the Kingdom of Bohemia, being void of a King. That he ſhould take the uſual Oath of a King, and always have like regard of all their Priviledges as the other Kings his Predeceſſors had. That the States of Bohemia ſhould not gainſay, but that the Arch-duke might hereafter uſe the Title of the deſigned King of Hungary. That the Adminſtration of the Marquiſet of Moravia ſhould be granted unto the Arch duke Matthias and his Heirs, together with the Title of a Marqueſs, until that after the death of the Emperour this Province was again to revert unto him which was to enjoy the Kingdom of Bohemia. But if it ſhould happen the Arch duke to dye before the Emperour, the States of Bohemia ſhould not refuſe, but that this Province ſeparate a-part, might (as ſhould ſeem good) chuſe unto it ſelf a Patron and Defender, unto the death of the Emperour. That the Biſhoprick of Almits, hitherto in Temporalities ſubject unto the King of Bohemia, ſhould from thenceforth acknowledge the Arch-duke Matthias to be the Governour thereof, leſt there ſhould be a confuſion of Suits in Moravia; the Biſhop in the mean time having regard unto his own Priviledges. That the Emperour at the requeſt of the Arch-duke ſhould maintain the Priviledges of them of Sileſia, and of the States of the ſix Cities, and augment them alſo with new Priviledges, being reaſonable and convenient. That for the defence of the borders againſt the Turks, the Nobility and States of Bohemia ſhould not contribute more than hitherto they were wont; yet ſaving unto the Arch-duke power and ability in the general Meetings and Aſſemblies of the Kingdom to entreat thereof, as the Emperour had hitherto had. That the Titles of all the Provinces which the Emperour did now ſurrender unto the Arch-duke Matthias, ſhould be ſtill unto him reſerved. That the Arch-duke Matthias ſhould utterly renounce the County of Tirali, and ſurrender his part thereof unto the Emperour. That in the Meetings and Aſſemblies to come, the Arch-duke ſhould by all means endeavour, that the Emperour ſhould receive a reaſonable yearly Contribution out of thoſe Provinces which he now departed with. That all offences hitherto committed, ſhould generally be forgiven and pardoned, all and every the Perſons on both Parties, onely Verkavious excepted, concerning whom, as alſo concerning his debt, the Nobility of Moravia had undertaken in their next Aſſembly to take order. And that Arms ſhould on both ſides be laid a part.

The Crown of Hungary delivered unto the Arch-duke Matthias.

Which Articles thus agreed upon, and on both parts accepted of, the Crown of Hungary, with the Ornaments thereto belonging, ſuch as are King Stephen's Sword, the Golden Apple, with the Croſs of the Kingdom upon it, two pair of rich Shooes, a very ancient Robe, with a Royal Scepter, were by the Emperour's chief Lieutenant carried into the Camp, and there in a broad and open Field delivered unto the Arch-duke Matthias; who, with his Army in order ranged, and ſixteen thouſand Horſe and Foot divided into three Battalions, after he had received theſe Royal Ornaments, commanded three great Vollies of ſhot to be diſcharged, and afterwards royally feaſted the Emperour's Ambaſſadors. Which Pacification thus made, many out of the Arch-duke's Camp, but eſpecially the Hungarians, went into the City of Prague, there to buy things neceſſary; and many came alſo out of the City to ſee the Arch-duke's Camp. But in the mean time, certain inſolent Souldiers having by night broken up certain Shops of the Jews, and carried out of them much rich Wares, were the cauſe of great ſtirs and Tumults in the City; inſomuch, that divers of the Souldiers were therefore caſt into Priſon.

The firſt of July, King Matthias riſing with his Army, departed from before Prague, taking his way with his chief Counſellors towards Lintz, and dividing his Army into three parts, that ſo they might the more eaſilier paſs through thoſe Countries home. After the riſing of which Army, a certain Noble Bohemian, and a good Souldier, called Cottouits, unto whom the Hungarians and Haiducks had in this Expedition done great harm, with ſix hundred Harquebuſiers, and a number of Country-men went forth to a Place called Partouitſe; where, having cut off the Paſſage, and cut down Trees croſs the ways, that none might that way conveniently paſs, he, with ſuch fury in a Place of advantage charged the Hungarians, coming that way, that having ſlain about nine hundred of them, ſome others were alſo carried away Priſoners, with a great booty of Horſes, Waggons, and other Goods. With which deed the Hungarians grieved, trod down the Corn as they went, and began to ſet fire on the Villages and Houſes in the Country thereabouts. But the news thereof being brought unto the King, he forthwith by Herberſtein, General of the Horſe-men, commanded the Hungarians and Haiducks not onely to deſiſt from this their Inſolency, but themſelves alſo, upon a great Penalty, to help to quench the fires by them raiſed.

The Hungarians and Haiducks by Cotouits ſlain.

King Matthias entereth into Hungary, and is royally received into Vienna.

In the mean time, the coming of King Matthias being reported at Vienna, great preparation was there made for the receiving of him and bringing of him into the City, according to his Royal Dignity, who, the fourteenth of July, toward night, being come thither, with the Arch-duke Maximilian his Brother, and three thouſand Horſe, the Archbiſhop of Hungary, who, with Count Trautſamius, and many other the Emperour's Counſellors and Servants, went out of the City to meet him, and there amidſt eight Enſigns of German Souldiers, and fifteen hundred Horſe-men, as it were ſet in order of Battel, received him with a long and Eloquent Oration, as did afterwards Trautſamius in the name of the States of Auſtria; the Emperour's Counſellors alſo honourably welcoming him. Which done, mounting again to Horſe, the King, with the Arch-duke Maximilian his Brother, ſtaied until that two Troops of the Horſemen of Vienna (each of them conſiſting of two hundred Horſe) were all entred into the City; and afterward, fifteen hundred of Bucheime's Horſemen, and the aforeſaid eight Enſigns of Germans going before, and the Emperour's Counſellors following them, the King himſelf with the Arch-duke his Brother, and all his Train, ſet forward, and paſſing over the Bridge, whereon three triumphal Arches were moſt ſumptuouſly erected, he was by three thouſand Citizens of Vienna, gallantly apparelled and armed, with much thundering of the great Ordnance and Vollies of ſmall ſhot, moſt magnificently received, divers other Triumphs and Sports, to manifeſt the Joy of the People, being there made alſo, which for brevity ſake we paſs over. But being gone a little farther, he was by the Senators of Vienna on Horſe-back received under a rich Canopy, borne up by ſix of the ancienteſt of the ſaid Senators, and ſo brought to Saint Stephen's Church; whither, he was no ſooner come, but that lighting from his Horſe, he was there received by the whole Clergy, and under a Canopy brought into the Church; where, after Service done, he was with like Triumph and Magnificence, through divers other triumphal Arches, brought to the Caſtle, the great Ordnance on all ſides ſtill thundering off from the Caſtle, the Walls, and Bulwarks of the Town.

The Proteſtant States in Auſtria require to have the free Exerciſe of their Religion granted unto them.

The Proteſtant States of Auſtria refuſe to take their Oath of Allegeance unto the King until they might be ſecured of the free Exerciſe of their Religion.

But theſe Triumphs and Solemnities ended, ſhortly after, whenas they began to conſult about ſuch things as concerned the good Government of the Kingdom of Hungary, and the crowning of the King, and that the Proteſtant States of Auſtria in many Places began to Exerciſe their Religion according to the manner of the Confeſſion of Auguſta, and that the Miniſters began openly to Preach in the Churches there, Leopold, the Archduke and Biſhop of Paſſavia, coming to Vienna, with Melinus the Popes Nuntio, (but a little before come to Prague) with Cardinal Forgatſius, and the Biſhop of Vienna, with earneſt and importunate ſolliciting of the King, obtained from him a Commandment, That that Exerciſe of Religion ſhould be again abrogated, the Churches ſhut, and publick Preaching forbidden. Which thing forthwith brought forth new ſtirs and troubles in Auſtria. For the Proteſtant States, forthwith calling a Counſel among themſelves, by general conſent refuſed by Oath of Loyalty and Allegeance to bind themſelves unto the new King, until they had of him obtained the liberty for the free Exerciſe of their Religion; and combining themſelves together, reſolved even with the loſs of their Lives and Goods to maintain the free preaching of the Word, and the Exerciſe of their Religion, according to the Confeſſion of Auguſta; and to that end commanded all their Subjects and Tenants to be ready in Arms, that, need ſo requiring, every thirtieth man, tenth, or fifth, might be preſs'd to come forth unto the Wars. But having ſent a Supplication unto the King, whereunto 180 of the Nobility had ſet their hands, and receiving no anſwer, but that they ſhould deſiſt from their purpoſe, and without delay to make their appearance to take the Oath of their Allegeance unto the King, they forthwith, the fourteenth of September, going to Horne, by Letters ſent unto the reſt of the Roman Catholick States, proteſted themſelves to be clear before God and the whole World of all the evils and miſchiefs that were afterward to enſue, if thoſe States, not regarding the appeaſing and ending of thoſe Troubles, or the ſafety of them their Country-men, ſhould take their Oath of Allegeance unto the King. And ſo forthwith raiſing an Army, leſt upon the ſudden they ſhould be at Horne oppreſſed, they began by all means to provide for their Affairs. But the report thereof coming unto the States of Bohemia and Moravia, their Neighbours, they were from them given to underſtand, that they would become Interceſſors for them unto the King, and yet not to be wanting unto them at their need, as occaſion ſhould require.

Preſents ſent unto the Great Sultan from King Matthias.

In the mean time, Letters were brought from Conſtantinople to Vienna, declaring King Matthias's Embaſſadors (having audience with the Great Sultan) to have in an Eloquent Oration on the King's behalf promiſed religiouſly to keep the Peace, of late made betwixt him, the Othoman Emperour, and the Hungarians; and afterward, in the King's name to have offered his Preſents unto the Sultan, and he, in the preſence of his chief Baſſaes, to have received them. But when he came to requeſt the Government of Tranſilvania, he would in no wiſe thereto conſent, but gave the ſame to Gabriel Bathor, with commandment unto the Baſſa of Buda for the eſtabliſhing of him in this Principality.

The Catholick States take the Oath of Allegeance unto King Matthias.

About the beginning of October, the Counties of Trautſeme and Furtſenburg were from King Matthias ſent unto the Proteſtant States at Horne, and ſhortly after them, Maximilian the Arch-duke followed alſo; who, although they with moſt glorious promiſes ſought to appeaſe them, and by all means to draw them to take the Oath of their Allegeance; yet could they with them no whit prevail, without granting of them the free Exerciſe of their Religion. But the ſixteenth of October, the Catholick States, not expecting the conſent of the Proteſtant States, at Vienna took the Oath of Allegeance unto Matthias the new King of Hungary, the great Ordnance in the mean time thundering off, with Drums and Trumpets in every place of the City ſounding, and the reſt of the day being with great Feaſting, Triumph, and Solemnity ſpent.

King Matthias goeth to Presburg.

Articles by the Hungarians preferred unto King Matthias at Presburg.

King Matthias, having thus at Vienna received the Oath of Allegeance of the Catholicks, ſhortly after departing thence, the twenty ſecond of October coming to Presburg, was there by the Nobility of Hungary received, and brought into the City with ten thouſand Souldiers; which States afterwards, viz. the ſixth of November, offered in writing unto the King certain Articles, whereof they deſired to be by him aſſured; moſt of which Articles were drawn out of the Pacification made at Vienna the twenty third day of Auguſt, in the year 1606, the chief effect whereof was this. That the free Exerciſe of Religion ſhould be permitted unto all Men in all the Cities and Towns of Hungary, not ſo much as that City excepted wherein the King ſhould be reſident: That no German Captain ſhould be ſuffered in any the ſtrong Forts of Hungary, but that the ſtrong Towns of Rab, Comora, Vivaria, and others, ſhould be committed unto the Government of natural Hungarians born: That the Crown of Hungary ſhould ſtill be kept in Hungary, and committed to the keeping of temporal Men: That firſt, and before all other things, a Count Palatine ſhould be choſen: That the King himſelf ſhould always reſide in Hungary; or if not, that the Palatine ſhould in his abſence have full power, with the Counſellers of Eſtate of Hungary, to determine and conclude of all things, and that the King ſhould therewithal hold himſelf contented: That no publick Office ſhould be beſtowed upon any, but upon ſuch natural Hungarians as had of their Country well deſerved; nor permitted unto any for Money: That no Jeſuits ſhould be ſuffered in the Kingdom, neither that Eccleſiaſtical men ſhould be ſo much favoured as formerly they had been: That Officers ſhould not be bound to give account of the Adminiſtration of their Offices, but before the Treaſurers of Presburg, being natural Hungarians born: That from henceforth Money ſhould not be carried out of the Kingdom, as hitherto it had been: That the Palatine being dead, the King ſhould within a year chuſe another, the chief Juſtice in the mean time after the old manner ſupplying his room.

The Proteſtant States of Auſtria crave Aid of the Nobility and States of Hungary.

The Proteſtant States of Auſtria had a little before ſent their Ambaſſadors unto the Nobility and States of Hungary, then gathered together at Presburg; with requeſt, that foraſmuch as they could not by any intreaty obtain of the King the free Exerciſe of their Religion, as well within their Cities as without, and that very neceſſity had driven them by force of Arms to ſeek for the ſame, that they would, by ſending of them Men, afford them ſuch Aid as was unto them due by the former Pacification made at Vienna in the year 1606. Which troubles of Auſtria, the Nobility and States of Hungary deſiring to have appeaſed, ſent George Turſon, and ſome others, with Letters of Interceſſion in their behalf unto the Arch-duke Maximilian; which when they had delivered unto him, they received from him this anſwer, That King Matthias never thought to diſturb the common quiet of that Country, or to attempt any thing againſt the Priviledges thereof, granted by the Emperour Maximilian of happy Memory; but to grant unto the Cities the liberty of Religion, he could by no means, partly in reſpect of Conſcience, partly for the danger that might thereof enſue from the Pope and the King of Spain, and yet nevertheleſs, that he would promiſe to ſuffer and tollerate the free Exerciſe of Religion without the Cities, and in the beſtowing of publick Offices to have no reſpect of Religion; yet with this Condition, that they ſhould lay down Arms, ſubmit themſelves unto the King, acknowledge their Fault, and crave Pardon for the ſame; for that in ſo doing, the States ſhould haply prevail more than by force of Arms.

The Proteſtant States of Auſtria by the Hungarians adviſed to lay down Arms, and to ſubmit themſelves unto the King.

With which anſwer, ſeeing no better could be got, the Hungarian Ambaſſadors going unto the Proteſtant States of Auſtria, began by divers reaſons to perſwade them to ſubmit themſelves unto the King. If the Hungarians ſhould (as they ſaid) give aid unto them of Auſtria, they ſhould in ſo doing, inſtead of helping them, but do them more harm; for that the Hungarian Power could not be brought into Auſtria, but to the utter deſtruction thereof. That the League betwixt the Hungarians and them of Auſtria was a general League, and concerned as well the Catholicks as the Proteſtants. That the Chriſtian Religion was never with the Sword planted or defended, Chriſt himſelf ſaying, them to be happy which therefore ſuffer Perſecution, and commanding Peter to put up his Sword into his Scabbard. That it was an eaſie matter for every man to raiſe Stirs and Tumults, but that again to appeaſe them was a far harder matter. That by the taking up of Arms, the free exerciſe of Religion could not be furthered or provided for, it being rather dangerous, leſt the contrary part prevailing, it ſhould be utterly ſuppreſſed. That by this means, Hungary it ſelf ſhould be expoſed to many dangers, for that not only new Stirs might upon this occaſion by the Subjects thereof be raiſed, but other foreign Princes take up Arms againſt it alſo; the Emperour, by force of Arms, ſeeking for his Right, and the Turkiſh Sultan, by a new Invaſion, going about to bring the ſame under his Subjection; and telling them farther, the Archduke to have promiſed to take good order for all things, ſo that they would lay down Arms; and that the Clemency and Bounty of thoſe Princes being known, they were not to doubt but that they would indeed perform what they had in word promiſed; and that the Hungarians could not now do or attempt any thing againſt the King: but that if it ſhould happen theſe two Arch-dukes being dead without Heirs-male, the Government of theſe two Provinces ſhould come unto the Arch-duke Ferdinand, that then they ſhould have more cauſe to help them of Auſtria againſt him. Moravia they ſaid to be a free Country, and yet the King to have thereunto given no more aſſurance for the liberty of Religion, more than his bare promiſe. Wherefore ſeeing that both the fortune and chance of War was doubtful, and that War was not without the great expence of Money to be maintained, that they were of opinion, it to be beſt for the Proteſtant States of Auſtria to lay down Arms, and by way of requeſt to ſollicite their cauſe with the King.

Illiſhaſchius choſen Palatine of Hungary. Matthias at Presburg crowned King of Hungary.

In the mean time, the Griefs whereof the Hungarians complained being taken away, and all Controverſies happily ended, Illiſhaſcius was, by a general conſent, choſen to be Palatine; and Matthias, the 14th of November, openly proclaimed King of Hungary; and the 19th of the ſame Month in St. Martins Church at Presburg in this manner crowned: firſt, the Royal Crown was in a ſtately Chariot carried out of the Caſtle unto the Church, with a great number of the Counſellers and Nobility of Hungary attending the ſame; in which Chariot were alſo carried ten Enſigns, with the Arms of the Kingdom in them frilled up, four of the Hungarian Counſellers taking it out of the Chariot in a little Cheſt covered with Cloth of Gold, and ſo carrying of it into the Chancel of the Church. After which, King Matthias, together with the Arch-duke Maximilian his Brother, followed on Horſe-back, both attired in Hungarian Apparel, and ſo going into the Chancel, there ſtayed about half an hour, until that he was by two Biſhops brought forth unto the Altar, before whom ten of the Hungarian Nobility carried the ten aforeſaid Enſigns; after whom followed the Palatine with the Crown, Endeodius with the Royal Scepter, Forgatſie with the Apple of the Kingdom, Turſo with King Stephens Sword, Tſechius carrying the Pax, as they call it; Budian the Croſs, the Cardinal Forgatſie ſaying Maſs, with divers Biſhops and Prelates helping of him, by whom the King was at the beginning of Service anointed with Oyl; where, while the Epiſtle and Goſpel were in reading, the Cardinal ſet the Crown upon the King's Head, all the People crying out, Long live Matthias, the King of Hungary. But the King, with the Crown upon his head, taking a drawn Sword out of Sigefred Collonitz the Marſhal's hand, thrice brandiſhed it a-croſs over the Clergy-mens heads, and received the Sacrament at the Cardinals hand. The Maſs being ended, he, by an high-way covered with Cloth, going in his royal Robes from S. Martins Church unto the Bare-foot Friers Church, as he went, cauſed money to be caſt abroad among the People. In which Church, after the firſt Chapter of the Goſpel of St. John being read, he made 28 Knights. From thence the King, with the Crown yet on his Head, and in his ſtately Robes, went out of the City at St. Michael's Gate, and there on Horſe-back was brought unto an high Stage covered with cloth, whereon he was ſworn unto the Hungarians as their King, and they unto him as his Subjects: and afterward thrice mounting up to Horſe upon a little Hill made for that purpoſe, and ſo down again, and thrice brandiſhing his Sword a-croſs, he returned back again into the Caſtle, where he with Maximilian the Arch-duke, Cardinal Forgatſie, the Pope's Nuntio, and the Palatine, ſat down at one Table, the reſt of the Hungarian Nobility, to the number of 70, ſitting down at ſix other Tables, and ſo dining with great mirth; the Haiducks, and common ſort of People, being there bountifully feaſted alſo: where many of them, in ſcrambling for the money that was caſt abroad, and in taking up of the Cloth from the Scaffold, having their hands and fingers cut off, and ſo lamed, carried from thence the woful remembrance of that was there then done.

The Solemnity of this Coronation thus paſt, King Matthias thought it good for him yet for a time to ſtay at Presburg, untill that the new building in the Caſtle was ended, which the Nobility of Hungary had appointed for the keeping of the Crown of Hungary, to the intent that he himſelf might ſee the ſame, with other the Royal Ornaments put thereinto, and ſealed up with his own Seal; he in the mean while labouring to appeaſe divers Contentions, and to place fit men again in the great Offices of the Commonweal; for that the Hungarians would by no means ſuffer the Germans to enjoy any of the ſame: for which cauſe, many of the chief Officers, men of great Authority, were diſplaced; and amongſt them, Sigiſrid Collonitz alſo, a man who had moſt well deſerved of the Kingdom of Hungary: howbeit, ſhortly after, he by the Counſel of Maximilian the Arch-duke, was by the Hungarians themſelves (repenting them of that they had done) not only reſtored unto his former Offices, but had by them (and that not without his juſt deſert) even greater Preferments offered him alſo; ſo mutable a thing the Judgement of the common People is. But Illiſhaſchius, now the Palatine of Hungary, the 28*th* day of November, talking with the King Matthias at large, and earneſtly intreated with him in the behalf of the Proteſtant States of Auſtria, eſpecially for that the other Proteſtant States of Hungary ſeemed now in their behalf to be much moved alſo; and the Moravian Ambaſſadors openly at the ſame time proteſting, that their States could in no wiſe forſake them their Friends, the States of Auſtria, if their need ſo required. And albeit that both the Elector of Saxony, and other Princes of the Empire, were become earneſt Interceſſors alſo unto the King for them, yet the Popes Nuntio ſo hardly withſtood them, as nothing could as then be granted.

Illiſhaſcius and others in vain intreat for the States of Auſtria.

About the beginning of December, the King returning again from Presburg to Vienna, about the ſixteenth of December the Proteſtant States of Auſtria at length ſent Erneſtus the free Baron of Landau, Maximilian Polheime, Sebaſtian Grobner, Charles Forberger, Pilgram Sitſendorff, and Chriſtopher Buchner, their Ambaſſadors unto the King, to bring them anſwer whereunto to truſt; who, the 27*th* of December received anſwer, That they ſhould hold themſelves contented with ſuch anſwer as they had before received, and to ſubmit themſelves to the Kings pleaſure, or elſe, to do what they themſelves ſaw good. With which anſwer they returning, the States forthwith began to levy new Forces, and to perſuade their Souldiers, that, mindful of their Oaths, they ſhould faithfully ſerve whitherſoever, and againſt whomſoever they were led.

The States prepare themſelves for War.

And now a great Army of the Proteſtant States of Auſtria lay in the Villages about Crembſa and Spaine, ſo that thoſe two Towns were thought to be in great danger of them; for the ſtrengthning of which Places, Bucheime was by the King ſent thither with 1500 Horſe and certain pieces of great Ordnance, and an Edict withal publiſhed the 10*th* of January, charging the States to be preſent at Vienna, the 21*th* day of the ſame Month, to take the Oath of their Allegeance to the King. Howbeit, they moſt ſtifly ſtill refuſed ſo to do, or to remit any thing of that which they had before required; inſomuch, that Maximilian the Arch-duke, who, hitherto had not a little laboured in this cauſe, was quite out of hope to bring them to any Conformity, or make any good end thereof. In the mean time, certain of Bucheime's Horſe-men on the King's part being about to have taken up a Place, ſuch as they thought convenient for them for to lodge in, had like to have been diſappointed of the ſame by the Horſe-men of Gerrane, on the States ſide. About which matter, Bucheime, coming forth with ſeven Troops of Horſe-men, and Gerrane but with three Troops of Horſe, and three Companies of Foot, there was betwixt them a hot Skirmiſh for the time, fought the 13*th* of January; in which Skirmiſh an 100 of Bucheime's Horſe-men were ſlain, but of Gerrane's Men not ſo many, they having the advantage of the Ground, and ſo therewith in the Skirmiſh holpen both for the defence of themſelves and the annoying of their Enemies. Whereof the King having knowledge, and therewith much moved; beſide the aforeſaid Edict, cauſed another to be proclaimed at Vienna, againſt ſuch Souldiers as ſerved the Proteſtants; proſcribing them all, and pronouncing them Rebels, except before the 21*th* day of January, they laying down Arms, departed out of the Proteſtants Camp. Howbeit, the Proteſtant States were ſo far from diſmiſſing their Forces, as that they with new Supplies ſtrengthned the ſame; and having taken an Hill not far from Hallenbrune, and from thence diſcharging three tire of 20 pieces of great Ordnance, ſtruck a great fear and terror into the Minds of the King's Souldiers within the Town.

About this time alſo the States of Moravia (that nothing might on their part be wanting for the making of an Attonement betwixt the King and the Proteſtant States of Auſtria) ſent ſome of their Ambaſſadors unto thoſe States at Horne, and other ſome unto the King at Vienna; who, having acceſs unto the King, declared unto him, the States of Moravia, from whom they came, to be earneſtly importuned by the Proteſtant States of Auſtria, to ſend them Aid, according to the Agreement made with them the year before; and told him moreover, That this manner of his proceeding tended not unto Peace and Quietneſs, but rather unto the Trouble and Deſtruction both of the Kingdom, and of all the other Provinces to him belonging; all that Error, the ground of thoſe Troubles, they ſaid, to depend on a perverſe interpretation or miſconſtruing of words, rather than of the matter it ſelf; ſo that it might by Men deſirous of Peace eaſily be compoſed and ended. And that therefore their requeſt unto his Majeſty was, That he, having regard not only unto the good and welfare of his Provinces and Subjects, but even of himſelf, and of his Honour alſo, would of his Clemency and Goodneſs vouchſafe to give remedy unto the preſent danger, and avert the miſerable Calamities now hanging over them, and even ready to fall upon their heads. The Proteſtant States they ſaid to be content to put the Controverſie to be decided and compoſed by certain grave and wiſe Men, to be choſen Arbitrators on both parts; yet with this Condition, That for the ſpace of fourteen days, no Hoſtility ſhould on either ſide be uſed; that the Inhabitants, both above and beneath Amiſum, ſhould be compriſed within this Truce; that ſuch as were kept in durance for their Religion, ſhould be ſet at liberty; and that all High-ways and Paſſes ſhould be from all Ambuſhes, and other dangers cleared. Unto which their requeſt the King condeſcending, gave leave unto the States of Moravia, upon the moſt equal Conditions they could deviſe, to compoſe and end all matters; who ſo laboured in this buſineſs betwixt the King and the Proteſtant States of Auſtria, that at length, viz. the twelfth of March, a Pacification was made betwixt the King and them his Subjects; Leopold the Arch-duke, Melinus the Popes Nuntio, the Biſhop of Vienna, and other great Men of the contrary Religion and Faction, ſeeking in vain to have letted the ſame; the chief Articles and points of which Pacification were theſe: That the Nobility in their Caſtles and Towns, as alſo in their Houſes in the Cities, ſhould for themſelves and their People have the free Exerciſe of their Religion: That the free Exerciſe of Preaching might be uſed in the three Churches at Iſerſdore, Tribelſuincel, and Horne: That the other Churches ſhut up, might again be opened by three of the Romiſh and three of the Reformed Religion, and the free Exerciſe of Religion in them uſed: That Counſellers and other publick Officers ſhould from thenceforth indifferently be choſen of men of both Religions; but that ſuch Offices as were hereditary ſhould ſo ſtill remain: That the Election of Magiſtrates and other publick Officers in Towns and Cities, ſhould from thenceforth be made by the Magiſtrates and Citizens themſelves, and not to be nominated from the Court as hitherto they had been: That no Church ſhould hereafter be ſhut againſt either part, but their own Churches to be left unto them both quietly to uſe: That the Towns-men and Citizens in their Towns and Cities ſhould from thenceforth have power to make choice of their Miniſters and Preachers, and that for them it ſhould be lawful to viſit the Sick, and to adminiſter unto them the Lords Supper: That the Oath of Allegeance ſhould be taken of them of the Reformed Religion, in like manner as it had been betaken of them of the Romiſh, but yet not with the ſame Ceremonies of the Romiſh Church; all union and confederation with them to be had, to be taken away; that all grudging, hatred, and quarrel ſhould be on both ſides forgiven, and for ever forgotten; Wolfgang of Hoffkirch, Voltſogius, and others, removed and put from their Offices, for not taking the Oath of Allegeance, being again received into Favour, and reſtored into their Places: That it might be lawful for the free Towns and Cities above Amiſum, to have the free Exerciſe of the Reformed Religion in their Suburbs and Hoſpitals.

The States of the reformed Religion in Auſtria take the Oath of Obedience unto King Matthias.

It was not long after this Pacification ſo made, but that King Matthias, the ſeventeenth of May, going to Lintz with three hundred Horſe, was there with eight Troops of Horſe-men, and fifteen Companies of Foot, by the States ſent forth to meet him, moſt honourably received, and by three triumphal Arches brought into the City; where he received of the States of the Religion, the Oath of their Obedience; which with much Joy, Triumph, and Feaſting performed, he, the ſeven and twentieth of the ſame Month again returned to Vienna. The aforeſaid States of Auſtria in the mean time with great zeal continuing the free Exerciſe of their Religion at Horne; a great multitude of People daily reſorting unto the Sermons there made; they of the Romiſh Religion much grieving and fretting thereat. The King himſelf alſo being come to Vienna, put divers Romiſh Catholicks out of their Offices, and placed thoſe of the Reformed Religion in their rooms, to the great diſcontentment of many.

The Turks ſeek ſecretly to encroach upon the Chriſtians, and the Chriſtians ſeek again to annoy them.

About this time, the Baſſa of Agria, notwithſtanding the Peace, had for the ſum of twenty thouſand Crowns before hand paid, ſecretly compacted with one Andrew Drake, to have the ſtrong Town of Fileck in the upper Hungary delivered unto him. Which the Traytor had intended (as he himſelf confeſſed) to have performed, by ſetting of the Houſe wherein he himſelf dwelt by night on fire; unto the quenching whereof the Garriſon Souldiers reſorting, his purpoſe was in the mean time to have ſecretly let in the Turks, and ſo to have delivered the Town into their Hands. But this his ſo wicked a purpoſe in good time diſcovered, and by him confeſſed, he was therefore, as he had well deſerved, alive cut in four pieces; a juſt reward for his foul intended Treaſon. The Baſſa of Buda alſo, contrary to the Treaty of Peace, about the ſame time went about to have exacted the Oath of Allegeance of above four hundred Country Villages of the Chriſtians, being not compriſed within the foreſaid Treaty. But as the Turks for their part were ſecretly plotting how to encroach upon the Chriſtians, and to do them harm; ſo the Haiducks on the other ſide in great numbers gathered together in the upper Hungary, began here and there to moleſt and trouble the Turks, until they were by their Superiours commanded to deſiſt from ſo doing, for diſturbing of the Peace.

Illiſhaſcius the Palatine of Hungary dieth.

Now about this time alſo, Illiſhaſcius the County Palatine of Hungary died at Vienna; a man much beloved of the Hungarians, his Countrymen, and now by them no leſs lamented for: whoſe dead Body was with great Honour afterward conveyed from Vienna unto his own Territory in Hungary, and there with all funeral Pomp buried with his Anceſtors. In whoſe ſtead George Turſon was afterward, by the general conſent of an hundred and fifty of the Hungarian Nobility, choſen County Palatine of Hungary, and ſo with the univerſal and ſolemn Acclamations of the People ſaluted.

New Troubles for Religion ariſe in Bohemia.

And now the Troubles for Religion were ſcarcely well ended in Auſtria (as is aforeſaid) but that the like, or rather worſe, began forthwith, even for the ſame quarrel, to ariſe in Bohemia; the Huſſites (as they call them) moſt earneſtly importuning the Emperour for the free Exerciſe of their Religion, or rather for the taking away of certain grievances done to their Religion: and the Roman Catholicks even at the ſame time leaving nothing unattempted, which might ſerve to bring them of the Religion into hatred with the Emperour, and others ſitting at the Helm of the Government of the Eſtate, and ſo to fruſtrate whatſoever the Emperour had in the general Aſſembly of the States the laſt year granted unto them of the Religion, for the free Exerciſe and Advancement thereof. The compoſing of which Controverſie, (tending unto the rending in ſunder of the whole Kingdom) when as the Emperour had referred unto certain of his chief Counſellors, and they altogether favouring the Roman Catholicks, would give them of the Religion no certain Anſwer whereon to reſt: they therewith much diſcontented, as out of hope to be by them relieved, and in great fear to be by their Adverſaries, as Enemies unto the State, oppreſſed, layd their heads together, and after good Deliberation taken, what were beſt for them to do, both for the ſafety of themſelves, their Wives, Children, and Religion; they, by a general conſent, of themſelves appointed the fourth of May to hold a general meeting of them of the Religion in the new Court at Prague, there to conſult of all matters concerning the buſineſs of Religion. And yet in the mean time openly in Parliament proteſting, by the Mouth of Wentceſlaus Bodouitſius, a Baron of Bohemia, Them to have appointed this Aſſembly for the Emperors good, and for the common quiet of the whole Realm; as alſo for the better informing of the Emperour of all Matters; and to provide that the Emperour and the Kingdom might not through the means and perſwaſions of thoſe his evil Counſellors be brought into extream Peril and Danger. Immediately after, the States of the Religion with all ſpeed diſpatched their Ambaſſadors unto King Matthias, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Saxony, and the Duke of Brunſwick; to requeſt them, by their interceſſion to become Mediators for them unto the Emperour, for the obtaining of the free Exerciſe of their Religion, which in all points agreed with the Confeſſion of Auguſta, and which long before was exhibited unto Maximilian the Emperour, and by him allowed. Now in the mean time theſe the States of the Religion were by ſome for theſe their proceedings commended; but by other ſome not only blamed, but alſo accuſed of Rebellion againſt the Emperour and the State. But the matter being declared unto the Emperor, he complaining unto himſelf of the inconſiderateneſs of his Counſellors; to maintain his Authority, cauſed the Parliament then in hand to be prorogued; and to ſeem of himſelf to grant that which he could not well withſtand, commanded by a Decree, that ſame very day to be appointed for the concluding of that Article of Religion, on which the States themſelves had before appointed for their Aſſembly to be holden in the new Court at Prague. Notwithſtanding which Decree, many troubleſome Spirits publickly ſet forth other their Conceits in Writing, to far other purpoſe, grievouſly therein reprehending the States of the Religion, for that of themſelves they had appointed a day for their Aſſembly into the new Court at Prague; Which (as they ſaid) was nothing elſe but in a rebellious manner to riſe againſt the Laws of the Kingdom, and the Authority of their lawful Prince; and therefore adviſed them to forbear from making any ſuch Aſſembly as was by them appointed. Hereof aroſe great troubles, even under the Emperours noſe, in Prague the chief City of Bohemia, they of the Religion not daring to truſt the Roman Catholicks, neither they them; being ſtill ready upon every falſe report, or vain ſurmiſe, to go together by the ears; until that the Emperour, for the ſtaying of theſe Troubles, and the avoiding of farther danger, was glad to cauſe it to be openly proclaimed in the new Court at Prague, That his Imperial Majeſty, having received and underſtood the Apology of the States, now did abrogate that his Edict publiſhed againſt them but a few days before; and now by this his new Edict did account all the States of the Religion for his faithful and well beloved Subjects; and, as of them unto whom the right of the Kingdom, and the King's Oath belonged, as well as to all other States of the Kingdom. And that he alſo had thoſe the ſame States excuſed, in that they for the good of his Majeſty, and of the whole Kingdom, had appointed their Aſſembly in the new Court at Prague; and that therefore he denounced them in ſo doing, not in any thing to have done any thing contrary unto his Majeſty. And that he appointed the five and twentieth day of May for the general Aſſembly of Parliament to be holden in the Caſtle of Prague, for the ending of the Article concerning Religion, and the reforming of other the publick Grievances of the Common-weal: yet with this proviſo, That the ſaid States ſhould ſafely and quietly come unto the ſaid Parliament, without entertaining of any foreign Souldiers; as that his Majeſty ſhould alſo, not by himſelf nor any other, for pay entertain any, or ſuffer any foreign Souldiers to come into the Kingdom. Which the Emperours Edict being proclaimed, the States of the Religion having made their publick Prayers, and ſung certain Hymns and Pſalms unto the Glory of God, for the good ſucceſs of their buſineſs, left the new Court at Prague, and returned every man home to their own Houſes, to make themſelves ready to come unto the Parliament to be holden at the appointed day.

The States of Bohemia by writing declare unto the Emperour their purpoſe for the defence of their Religion.

But the day appointed for the Parliament being come, and the Emperour ſtill delaying the matter, the States of the Religion, weary of ſuch long delays, and in doubt to be therewith deluded, as having not received from the Emperour any ſuch anſwer as whereon to reſt, the third of June offered unto the Emperour a ſhort writing, concerning their Grief and farther purpoſe, to this effect. They had (as they ſaid) expected, and well hoped, that regard being had, not only of ſo many requeſts of ſo great and moſt noble Princes, made in their behalf; but even of the Emperour's promiſe alſo, made unto them, both in the general Aſſembly of the States the laſt year, and in the late Precept of the Emperour's alſo, they ſhould at length have received ſuch anſwer unto their Petition, concerning the free Exerciſe of their Religion, as whereon they might have ſafely reſted. Which, for that it had not been yet done, they referred the doing thereof unto God and future time; imputing the blame thereof, not unto his Imperial Majeſty, but unto the unquiet and troubleſome Natures of ſome as well the Eccleſiaſtical as Temporal Magiſtrates and Perſons. But foraſmuch as they meant not longer to be deluded by their Enemies, and much leſs to be defrauded of his Majeſties Royal Promiſe, which was now unto the World known, they had thought good to offer and preſent unto his Majeſty a Writing conceived in the Bohemian Tongue; according unto which they deſired to be ſecured, concerning the free Exerciſe of their Religion; moſt humbly requeſting his Majeſty to accept of the ſame, and at length to ſatisfie their requeſts. Which if it might not be granted, (the Emperour's Majeſty, having more reſpect unto the troubleſome Clergy-men, and ſome other his evil affected Counſellors, than to the faithful States and Subjects of his Kingdom) that then they would reſt themſelves upon the Decree made in the Aſſembly holden in the year 1608, and upon the laſt Edict of his Majeſty; yet with this ſolemn Proteſtation, That ſeeing they had by certain Information underſtood much Warlike Preparation (but eſpecially in Bavaria) to be made, and divers Conſultations in many Places to be holden againſt the States of the Religion, (his Imperial Majeſty, and the other his faithful Counſellors, thereof not knowing) which might tend unto the Ruine and Deſtruction both of his Majeſty and of the whole Kingdom; they themſelves would take upon them the defence thereof, and do their endeavour, that, furniſhed with Men and Arms, they might to the uttermoſt of their power defend him their Sovereign, together with themſelves, and the whole Kingdom, againſt the Force and Invaſion of their foreign Enemies.

Ambaſſadors from the Duke of Saxony in the behalf of the States.

In the mean time, while theſe things were thus in doing, an Ambaſſador came from the Duke of Saxony to Prague, to intreat the Emperour for the States, and for the granting of them the free Exerciſe of their Religion; the Ambaſſadors of the States of Sileſia forthwith following of them alſo; who, in like manner requeſting alſo of the Emperour, to have the liberty for the free Exerciſe of their Religion by him confirmed unto them; promiſed their moſt ready help and aid unto the States of Bohemia, if need ſhould ſo require. But the States of Bohemia, having from day to day in vain expected anſwer from the Emperour, turning themſelves unto their former Reſolution for the defence of themſelves and of their Religion; forthwith raiſed a great number both of Horſe and Foot, whom, with their well-known Captains and Commanders, they brought even unto the City of Prague. Howbeit, at length, viz. the eleventh of July, the Saxon Ambaſſador earneſtly ſolliciting their Cauſe, and urging their requeſt, they, according to their deſire, received anſwer from the Emperour, by Letters from his Majeſty written to this effect.

The States of Bohemia raiſe their Forces.

The Emperours Letters unto the States of the Religion in Bohemia, for the free Exerciſe of their Religion.

He gave all Men (as he ſaid) to underſtand, and by theſe his Letters witneſſed to eternal Memory, That after that all the free States of his Kingdom of Bohemia, which, in the receiving of the Lord Supper, participate the Body and Blood of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt under both kinds, his faithful Subjects, had in the Aſſembly holden in the Caſtle at Prague in the year 1608, in all humility requeſted, That it might be lawful for them to hold, and freely to Exerciſe their Religion, according to the Confeſſion of Auguſta, (as ſome call it) exhibited unto his Father Maximilian the Emperour of moſt happy Memory, and by him unto the ſaid States allowed; and that he then and at that time, by reaſon of other moſt weighty buſineſs, for which that Aſſembly was then called, and ſuch as could ſuffer no Procraſtination or delay, had thought it good to deferr the allowing and ratifying of this their Petition, unto this preſent Aſſembly of Parliament; and that the ſame States now again aſſembled, inceſſantly renewing this their former Petition and having thereunto joyned alſo the requeſt and Interceſſion of certain Noble Perſonages, had requeſted to be therein ſatisfied; and that he with his Counſellors would conſult how Proviſion might be made for his Subjects in the Kingdom of Bohemia, as well Communicating under both kinds, as under one; now at length to have effected the ſame. Wherefore ſeeing that his Will and Deſire was, that both in theſe and future times, Peace and Quietneſs might for the increaſing of the Kingdom be preſerved and kept amongſt his Subjects of all the three Eſtates of the Kingdom of Bohemia, communicating as well under the one, as under both kinds; that both parties might freely, and without any impediment or let, have the free Exerciſe of their Religion, whereby they were both in hope to obtain everlaſting Salvation. And to the intent that Accompliſhment and Satisfaction might in all points be made, as well according unto the breaking up of the Aſſembly of Parliament in the year 1608, as to the performance of his own Precept, of late publiſhed, (whereby he hath acknowledged, and even yet acknowledgeth, thoſe ſame Eſtates communicating under both kinds, and ſubſcribing to this Confeſſion, for his faithful and loyal Subjects, unto whom the Rights and Immunities of the Kingdom of Bohemia belonged) He by the common conſent of the Counſellors, and other Magiſtrates of the Kingdom did determine, That his Subjects, communicating both under one and both kinds, ſhould friendly and peaceably live together, without wronging or reviling of one another; and that upon the Pain and Penalty in the Law ſet down, to be inflicted upon them that ſhould otherwiſe do. And moreover, ſeeing that they which communicated but under one kind, enjoyed the free Exerciſe of their Religion in all points throughout the Kingdom of Bohemia, that he gave leave, and commanded, that they alſo which communicated under both kinds, viz. all the States of the Religion, with all ſuch as embraced the Confeſſion of Bohemia, ſometime exhibited to Maximilian the Emperour, his Father, in the Parliament holden in the year 1575, and now again to himſelf preſented, ſhould every where, and in all places of the Kingdom, have the free Exerciſe of their Religion, without the let or interruption of any; to retain the ſame, until a general Union of Religion, and an ending of all Diſſention and Controverſies might be made. Moreover, That He did grant unto the States of the Religion this Favour, That they ſhould have the lower Conſiſtory at Prague, with Power to conform the ſame according to their own Confeſſion. That they might lawfully make their Prieſts, as well in the Bohemian as German Tongue, and ſet them over their Churches, without any let of the Arch-biſhop of Prague. That he did alſo reſtore unto them the Univerſity of Prague, which for many years ago belonged unto the States of the Religion under both kinds; giving them Power again to open the ſame, to furniſh it with grave and learned Men of their own Confeſſion, to beautifie it with good Laws, and to appoint certain of their own Company and Profeſſion for Governours and Defenders as well of the Conſiſtory as of the Univerſity; whom, ſo by the States appointed and choſen, he without any ſtay or delay, or other inſtruction or information than they ſhould from the States receive, would confirm in that their Office, and pronounce them for the lawful Defenders; yet ſo, as that if he, being letted by other greater buſineſs, cannot perform the ſame within the ſpace of fourteen days, they ſhall nevertheleſs continue Defenders, and as well enjoy the charge of the Office committed unto them, as if they had been therein by him confirmed; and that one or other of their number being dead, it ſhall be lawful for the States to chuſe others in their Places. And if that, beſide the Churches which they now hold, they would build other more, or erect more Schools for the inſtructing of the Youth, it ſhall be lawful for them freely, and without any let ſo to do, as well in the Cities as in the Country Towns and Villages. And foraſmuch as in ſome of the Cities of the Kingdom of Bohemia, Men of both Religions dwelt together, he therefore did will and command, That for the preſervation of Peace and Quietneſs, either part freely exerciſing their Religion, and obeying their Prieſts, ſhould by no means either hurt or trouble them on the other part; and much leſs to hinder them to bury their dead in their Churches or Church-yards, with the ringing or tolling of the Bells, or go about to turn any Man from his Religion, of what ſtate or condition ſoever he be, whether he dwell in the City, or in the Country Town or Village; or by force to draw them to their Opinion, or to take their part. For that he only reſpected, that Peace and Quietneſs might be kept, and that mutual Love might ſtill grow amongſt all the three States: Unto which end and purpoſe, that He for himſelf and his Heirs, and the Kings of Bohemia his Succeſſors, in the Faith and Word of a King, did grant and promiſe unto the States of the Religion, unto whom this common Peace of Religion (as they call it) belongeth, as to a principal member of the Empire, all theſe things to be for ever inviolably kept (the Eccleſiaſtical and Temporal Perſons whoſoever in vain reſiſting) ſo that no contrary Precept or Edict, ſhould either by himſelf, or any other his Heirs or Succeſſors be publiſhed againſt the States of the Religion; or being publiſhed by any, ſhould be accounted effectual and ſtrong; eſpecially, ſeeing that he by theſe his Letters, pronounceth all the Edicts hitherto publiſhed againſt theſe the States of the Religion, to be void, fruſtrate, and of none effect. Neither would that any thing of thoſe which were done by the States of the Religion, whilſt they ſought for the Confirmation of this Article concerning Religion, ſhould for ever be layd to their charge, or by any man by way of reproach objected unto them. And that therefore he ſtraightly charged and commanded all Magiſtrates, and ſuch as bare rule in Bohemia, to the uttermoſt of their Power to protect and defend all the three States, together with them of the Religion; and neither themſelves to trouble them, nor ſuffer them to be by any others for the Exerciſe of their Religion moleſted or troubled: For that he and other the Kings of Bohemia, his Succeſſors, would moſt ſeverely chaſtiſe all ſuch as ſhould offend againſt theſe his Majeſties Letters (which, to be for ever remembred, he would cauſe the ſame to be enrolled in the publick Records of Parliament) whether ſuch Offenders were Eccleſiaſtical or Temporal Men, to be ſharply puniſhed as the Troublers of the Common Peace.

This was the ſum of his Majeſties Letters, which he cauſed to be publickly ſet up in the Caſtle of Prague the thirteenth of July, that it might be to all men known, this Article of Religion, which was the firſt of the Articles in this Parliament propounded, to be concluded and agreed upon according to the Mind of the States of the Religion, and ſo their Requeſts to be in all points ſatisfied. Who forthwith thereupon, the fifteenth day of July, cauſed the firſt publick Sermon according to the Confeſſion of Auguſta, to be preached in the German Tongue in a Church of them of the Religion, which had for a long time before been ſhut up. At which time, they alſo ſent unto the Elector of Saxony, to ſend unto them certain learned men, for the ſetting up of the Univerſity, and the governing of the Conſiſtory at Prague. And yet for all this, the Ambaſſadors for the States of Sileſia, ſtill earneſtly labouring with the Emperour for the Liberty of Religion to be granted to the ſaid States and the reſt of the Inhabitants of the Province; the States of Bohemia refuſed in any wiſe to diſmiſs their Souldiers whom they had muſtered near unto Roggenſon, until the Sileſians were of their requeſt in that point ſatisfied; offering alſo unto the Emperour a large Libel of the Griefs of them the ſaid States.

Now it may be that ſome having read ſo much as is before written concerning theſe late Troubles about the free Exerciſe of the Reformed Religion, but eſpecially in Bohemia, Auſtria, Moravia, and Sileſia, may deem the ſame both tedious and beſide our purpoſe; unto whom indeed it is not written; but rather unto ſuch, as who, together with my ſelf (the Wars betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks ended, and the Peace concluded as is aforeſaid) deſire yet to know in what ſtate thoſe frontier Countries ſtand; which being the greateſt Bulwarks on that ſide of Chriſtendom, and the chief Territories of the Houſe of Auſtria, are (the peace being either expired, or otherwiſe broken off) moſt ſubject unto the Fury of the puiſſant Enemy, as neareſt unto him, and ſo like ſooneſt to feel of his great Force and Power, prefixing unto it ſelf neither bounds nor meaſure, ſo long as there is any thing farther. Againſt whom the Chriſtian Emperour had no other Forces of his own to oppoſe, more than ſuch as he could raiſe out of the Reliques of Hungary, and the aforeſaid Frontier Countries. All together but weak helps againſt ſo puiſſant an Enemy, as never cometh into the field but with a world of Men following of him; but yet much weaker, being (as now of late they were) every one of them apart divided in themſelves about matters of Religion, the incurable malady of the Chriſtian Eſtates and Common-weals; the heavy and lamentable effect whereof too much of late appeared in the loſs of Strigonium, won by the Turks with a far leſs Army than ever the Grand Seigniors Lieutenant General was wont to come into Hungary withal; and yet the Chriſtian Emperour, by reaſon of the revolt of the Hungarians, (upon a diſcontentment about the Exerciſe of their Religion) not able of himſelf to relieve the diſtreſſed City of Strigonium, or yet to put an Army of any ſtrength into the Field, for the defence of the reſt of his Cities or Territories. So weak are even the greateſt Princes, their Subjects being among themſelves in Minds divided.

The Turks Ambaſſadour cometh to Vienna, and from thence to Prague.

But not to ſtray farther, the Turks Ambaſſador in the mean time with a notable train of an hundred and fifty Turks coming from Vienna the one and twentieth of September, and there having ſaluted, and with great Gifts preſented the King, ſet forward toward Prague, where he was by the Citizens and certain Noblemen of the Emperours Council the twelfth of October honourably received; and the nineteenth of the ſame Month admitted unto the Emperours Preſence, firſt preſented unto him from the Great Sultan his Maſter, a rich Tent of divers colours, moſt curiouſly wrought with fair Orient Pearl of great value; and then four couragious Horſes, all furniſhed with moſt rich and ſumptuous furniture. He preſented unto him alſo certain Turkiſh Weapons ſet and garniſhed with precious Stones, and a Princely Turks robe, ſuch as they uſe at their Marriages, gliſtering with Gold and precious Stones, with divers other rare things of leſs value; together with which he delivered unto him the Great Sultans Letters, and withal deſired the Confirmation of the Peace before made for twenty years, to be now again renewed. Unto which Ambaſſadour Letters were afterward delivered from the Emperour, together with certain other rich Preſents to be by him preſented unto the great Sultan: viz. certain Caroches lined within with Damask, and covered without with black Velvet; ſix fair and gallant Horſes moſt richly furniſhed; a Clock of wonderful Workmanſhip; two fair Deſks to write upon of Ebony; with divers other like Preſents of no ſmall price. Who ſo charged with Preſents, and bountifully rewarded, and to his good liking anſwered, was afterward, in the beginning of January, with a train of two hundred Horſe from Prague honourably diſmiſſed.

The Perſians enter into the Province of Babylon.

The Turks defeated.

The Turk makes Gambolat General of his Army.

He commands him to be ſlain.

THE Turkiſh Emperour, having been freed ſome years from the care of Wars in Hungary, in regard that he had concluded a Truce for twenty years with the Emperour Rodulphus, he now bent all his Forces againſt his Rebels in Aſia, and the Sophie of Perſia, where he had no good Succeſs this year. For the Perſians, having formerly extended their Monarchy far into the Turkiſh Empire, and defeated Cicala Baſſa, and others in divers Battels; now they entered into the Province of Babylon, with a deſign to joyn it to Perſia. Achmat, to ſtay the courſe of their Proſperity, ſends a mighty Army thither, under the command of Naſſut Baſſa; but his fortune was no better than thoſe that went before him. The Perſians came to meet him, gave him battel, defeated him, and ſlew twenty thouſand of his Men. Theſe mournful News coming to Court, did much diſtemper the Sultans Mind; he could not endure it ſhould be ſaid, that the Perſian had defeated his mighty Armies thrice in open Battel; and much leſs that it ſhould be ſo, and that he ſhould ſeiſe upon his Countries: wherefore, to repaire this loſs, he levies new Forces to be commanded by Gambolat Baſſa of Aleppo, who had been the moſt powerful Rebel in Aſia, and was newly reconciled and brought into favour with the Grand Seignior. This man came to the Port to receive the Sultans Commandments, and to paſs his Army into Aſia; but, whether having ſome ſuſpition that he had intelligence with the Perſians, or that ſuch as envied his Greatneſs, had given ſome bad impreſſion of his Loyalty to the Sultan; within ſome few days after his arrival, Achmat cauſed him to be ſlain by his Capigi. Whereby we may well obſerve, that he that is a Rebel to his Prince, which hath ſo violently oppreſt his Subjects, and ſet his Countries on fire by Sedition, the which he hath been forced to quench with the blood of Innocents, cannot but end his days violently and miſerably, ſeeing that God revengeth the Blood of Innocents upon the guilty.

Ambaſſadors come from the Perſian to the Emperour.

Preſents ſent to the Emperor.

The Perſian, ſeeing what advantage he had gotten of the Turk, laboured by the bruit of his Victories to draw the Chriſtian Princes unto his party, and with them wholly to ruine the Othomans; the which he had ſo happily begun. For the effecting whereof, he ſent his Ambaſſadors to the Emperour being at Prague, to perſwade him to break the Peace with the Turk, and to joyn with him. The Ambaſſadors arrived at Prague this year with rich and rare Preſents; firſt, a Croſs of Gold inrich'd with many precious ſtones; amongſt which there was one piece of Amber, whereon was ſeen the figure of the Virgin Mary, holding her young Babe in her Arms; the which was ſo artificially graven, as it might be thought the work of Nature; a Topas of exceeding greatneſs, given to the King of Perſia by an Indian King; two Knives of Damask, with hafts of Jaſper, and their ſheaths covered with Diamonds; a certain kind of Indian Wood of moſt excellent vertue, moſt ſovereign to cure the pains of the Breaſt, and to purge the Stomach; the gall of a Pellican, excellent to cure the Pleuriſie, Apoplexy, and Fever; two Topazes, the one white, and the other violet, this laſt was ſo big, as it was capable to make a Cup; an Amathiſt as big as a Hens Egg; a Perſian Bow inlaid with the Veins of a Cammel, and a rough Diamond exceeding great; a white ſtone of the colour of Water, which was a preſervative againſt the Plague, being hung about ones neck; three Oriental Pearls exceeding big; three rich Eſcarbuncles, and three marvellous fair Diamonds; and with all this a Serpents Horn, much eſteemed for the rare Vertues. All theſe Preſents were very well accepted, and the Ambaſſadors much honoured. But what appearance was there for the Emperour, who had ſo great Differences with his Brother Matthias, King of Hungary, who ſaw the greateſt part of his Subjects rebelled againſt him, his Provinces in diviſion, Tranſilvania in Combuſtion by the Conſpiracy which had been diſcovered againſt Battory, and finally a general Diſorder over all, to break the peace with the Turk, (who was at his Door, retained only with this Bar) and to allie himſelf with the Perſian ſo far from his Countries, from whom he could draw no Succours, but only that he might keep the Othomans buſie in Aſia? Thus the Ambaſſadors returned, carrying home nothing but good Words.

His Affairs will not ſuffer him to joyn with the Perſian.

The Proceedings of Leopold in Bohemia.

Since the Troubles which hapned in Bohemia made him ſee of what importance it was to entertain Peace with the Turk; for if he had broken it by the Perſians Perſwaſion, he had given his Enemy an aſſured means to ruine him; for the Arch-duke Leopold entred into Bohemia with an Army of nine thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe; he ſurpriſed petty Prague, attempted the old Town, and ſeeking to force it, he ſlew many which made reſiſtance. Matthias King of Hungary advertiſed of this Diſorder, parts from Auſtria with a powerful Army, and advanceth ſpeedily towards Bohemia. It was to be feared, that if Matthias's Army and Leopold's had met near unto Prague, it had been the loſs and overthrow of the one, and the deſolation and ruine of the Country. The Emperour foreſeeing this Danger, cauſed 300000 Florens to be delivered to Romeo, Leopold's Lieutenant, for the payment of his Army, and ſo ſent him out of Bohemia. This diviſion betwixt the Princes of the Houſe of Auſtria, grew by the Practices of ſome of the Emperours Counſel, who being delegated Judges to compound the Differences of the Bohemians of divers Religions, inſtead of labouring to reconcile and unite thoſe People, for the good of the publick, they made themſelves Partiſans to the one, to oppreſs the other; and thereby they drew the Princes into a dangerous diviſion, for the ſupport of Parties. And moreover, the Arch-dukes Ferdinand and Leopold, practiſed to deprive Matthias, King of Hungary, of the Succeſſion which he pretended of Bohemia; leſt that being Maſter, he ſhould take revenge upon their Partiſans for the Troubles wherewith they had formerly afflicted the Country. Such was the Eſtate of Affairs in Germany, giving the Turk a fair Opportunity, if he could have embraced ſo rich an occaſion, to make his Profit of their Combuſtions. But the Confirmation of the Truce, and the Affairs of his Houſe, kept him in Thrace.

The Gallions of Malta feared by the Turks.

Let us ſee how the Turk ſpeeds at Sea; where he hath the Knights of Malta, the Sicilians, and Neapolitans, and the Florentines, vigilant and valiant Enemies, to annoy him, and croſs his Deſigns. The laſt year, which was 1609, the Chriſtians had no good Succeſs, loſs fell particularly upon the Knights of Malta; for he that fights often, can hardly vanquiſh always. The Gallion of the Order, commanded by Chivalier Guidoti, an Italian, had made two Voyages to Sea very fortunately, and brought to Malta three hundred Turkiſh ſlaves. The incouragement of this good Succeſs engaged many Knights to divers Enterpriſes. They armed certain Gallions, and made a Fleet of ten good Ships of War, as unfortunate in their Courſes as the Gallion of the Order had been before ſucceſsful; for, meeting with the Turks Fleet in the Seas of Cyprus, they were ſet upon, and moſt of them ſlain or made ſlaves. The Knight Freſſinet was ſlain, and the Red Gallion, wherein he commanded, taken by the Turks; but it was after a whole day Fight. Ambuſon, otherwiſe called Fueillade, another Knight, was made a Slave, and his Gallion taken; the Knight Ouges ran the ſame fortune, with the loſs of a Gallion. Freſſinet having brought a Pinnace with him to attend his Ship, after ſome fight near unto the Gallion, it eſcaped by night. In this Voyage, unfortunate for them of Malta, the Gallion of the Order would needs ſeek ſome better adventure; the Knights of Bailou and Rhodes, did accompany him either of them with a ſmall Gallion. He ſet upon the Caravan of the Turks Fleet, near the Iſland of Rhodes, his ſucceſsful beginning of this Combat made him hope for Victory, and the number of the Enemies Veſſels for a rich Booty; for there were among the reſt two great Gallions of the Sultans; theſe are Ships which belong to the great Seignior's Women, loaden commonly with great Riches; but twenty Gallies of Rhodes ſeeing this fight, came out of their Port to ſuccour them, and by the favour of a fair Wind, drew them into ſafety.

The Gallion of the Order ſets upon the Turks Caravan.

At Malta the bruit was, That the Turks Army conſiſting of fourſcore Gallies, ſhould go and beſiege the Iſle of Goza, whereas a Knight called Saint-Liger commanded. Whereupon, the Great Maſter had reſolved to fortifie the Caſtle of the Iſland, with a good Counterſcarſe, which he cauſed to be made, ſending thither two hundred Souldiers, and thirty Knights for ſupply, all brave Souldiers, who might have made a great reſiſtance, if the Turks had attempted it; but the Enemies Fleet paſſed on, and gave them time to reſt.

But this Year 1610, Vignancourt, the Great Maſter of Malta, ſent the five Gallies of the Order into Barbary, towards the Port Farino, memorable, for that it was the Haven where Saint Lewis the French King ended the Navigation of his days, and at his return from Hieruſalem and Paleſtina, went to receive in Heaven the glorious palms of his holy Actions. The Gallies of Biſerta had been accuſtomed to fetch Palms there in that ſeaſon (which was in the Spring time,) whem the Gallies of Malta had a deſign to ſurpriſe. But the contrary Winds, and the tempeſtuous Seas overthrew that Enterpriſe; yet their Voyage was not altogether unprofitable; for returning toward Malta, being within the Channel which divides the Iſland from that of Sicily, they encountered with a great Gallion of Tunes, armed by a Turk called Carouſinan, being in view of the Gallies of Malta: The Raiſe (who commanded) aſſured his Company, and (ſmiling) promiſed to free them from their Enemies. Being ſo tranſported with Vanity, as he ſpake confidently, that he would not fear twenty of the Gallies of Malta; but this his pride was ſoon abated with his ruine; for the five Gallies came cloſe under him, and plied him ſo furiouſly with their Cannon, as they ſunk him. The Gally wherein Verdelli, an Italian Knight, commanded, had like to have been loſt, for being grapled with the Gallion, if the diligence of Verdelli had not ſpeedily retired it. The Turks, after the loſs of their Veſſel, began to ſwim away, but they were all made Slaves to ſerve in the Gallies of Malta, who this year had no other Fruits of their generous Enterpriſes.

They ſink a Gallion of Tunes.

The Gallies of Coſmo de Medicis, Great Duke of Tuskany, parted from Ligorn, under the Conduct of the Commander and Admiral Inghirami, and running along the Coaſt of Barbary, they took a Turkiſh Ship in the ſight of Algier, laden with Merchandiſe, Arms, and Munition of War, freeing many Chriſtian Slaves which were in it. This happy beginning promiſed them better fortune. They paſs on, and ſome twenty five Leagues beyond Algiers, they go to ſurpriſe the Town of Biſquerre, a ſmall Town in Circuit, but ſtrong and well walled. Inghirami drawing near unto the Coaſt, took down his Maſts, leſt they ſhould diſcover his coming. In the mean time, he ſent two long Boats to find ſome place fit for their landing; the which being carefully obſerved, Collonel Bindii landed his Men, and about eleven a Clock at Night marched in good order towards the Town, and forced it. The Darkneſs of the Night kept them from ſpoiling it; being content only to ſet their Guards and Sentinels in the moſt important Places of the Wall; but day being come, the Souldiers made themſelves Maſters of the Town, which they ſacked and ſpoiled. Certain Moors and Turks, during the Obſcurity of the Night, had retired themſelves into a Moſque which they fortified: They were ſummoned to yield; but the fear of being Slaves, (which they could not avoid) made them reſolve to die in their own defence; ſo as the Florentines having forced the Place, put them all to the Sword; and then embarqued their Troops, having filled Biſquerre with with Fire and Blood. The Night following, being in the Gulph called the Bad Woman, they met with a Pinnace loaden with Corn, the which they took, and ſent to Ligorne, and then they paſt on to encreaſe their Conqueſt. Being upon the Coaſt of Sardinia, two Galliots of Biſerta did furniſh them with a fair Occaſion. Inghirami ſendeth his Gallies to purſue them, who having had them in chaſe threeſcore Leagues, took the one, wherein they had one hundred and twenty Slaves, and freed many poor Chriſtians from the Chain, who ſuffered the Tyranny of the Turkiſh Servitude. They alſo took a Turkiſh Gally within half a League of Algier, and ſpoiled it. And thus triumphing over their Enemies, they took their Courſe towards Ligorn, having taken four Turkiſh Veſſels, ſpoiled the Town of Biſquerre, and twice braved that of Algier.

The Moriſques or new Chriſtians chaſed out of Spain.

This year was fatal for the Moriſques or new Chriſtians in Spain, who being in number nine hundred thouſand Perſons, as the original writes, and had continued there from Father to Son, for the ſpace of almoſt nine hundred years, were now in an inſtant baniſhed, and made Vagabonds with the blaſt of the Kings Mouth: Men diſcourſed diverſly hereof. Some ſaid, that the King had reaſon to do it, for that they had ſecret Practices and Intelligence with the Turk, his capital Enemy. Others affirmed, that he did wiſely to prevent their Attempts againſt his Eſtate, which were to be feared, conſidering their Numbers were ſo great. And ſome ſaid plainly, that it was to have their Lands and Inheritances, which had continued ſo long in their Races. But the King declared his own intent by his Edict, the which he publiſhed in theſe Terms.

The King of Spain's Edict.

The King: For that reaſon doth in Conſcience bind a good and Chriſtian Government, to expel out of all Realms and Common-weals thoſe things which breed ſcandal, and bring hurt to our good Subjects, and Danger to the Eſtate, but eſpecially which are offenſive to God, and prejudicial to his Service; for this cauſe, Experience having taught us, That the reſidence of the new Chriſtian Moriſques, and their abode in the Realms of Granado, Murcia, and Andeloſia, hath been the cauſe of all theſe Inconveniences: For that beſides the manner of their proceeding, which joyned in the Rebellion of Granado, the which began by cruel Murthers of all the Prieſts and old Chriſtians which lived amongſt them, calling the Turk in to their Aid; yet having drawn them out of the ſaid Country, and ſuffered them to live in our other Provinces, ſo as they would repent them of their Faults, and live faithfully and Chriſtian like, according to the Precepts and juſt Ordinances which were given them: They have not obſerved and kept them according to the ſtrict and direct Rules of our Holy Faith; but have always made ſhew to contemn it, and to have no fear to offend God; as hath been ſeen by the great numbers which have been puniſhed by the Inquiſition; and beſides, they have committed many Thefts and Murthers againſt the old Chriſtians. And not content herewith, they have conſpired againſt my Royal Crown and Realms, ſeeking Aid and Succours from the Turk, certain interpoſed Perſons being ſent to that effect, and doing the like with other Princes, promiſing unto themſelves Aid and Aſſiſtance, offering unto them their Perſons and Means. And ſeeing that during ſo many years, in which they have practiſed theſe Treaſons and Conſpiracies, not any one hath come to reveal them, but they have always covered, concealed, and denied them; it is a moſt apparent ſign that they have all been of one Mind and Will, againſt the Service of God and of me, and againſt the good of this Realm; yet they might have imitated many Knights of theirs, of generous extraction, who have done ſervice to God, to the Kings our Progenitors, and to us, like good Chriſtians, and moſt loyal Vaſſals.

Wherefore conſidering all this, and how much I am bound to ſet down ſome good order, and to procure the preſervation and increaſe of my Realms and Subjects, and deſiring to provide for all; I have decreed, with the Advice and Counſel of many judicious learned men, and others, that are very religious, wiſe, and jealous of Gods Service and mine, to chaſe out of the ſaid Realms of Granado, Murcia, and Andeloſia, and out of the Town of Hernache (although it be not within the Limits of the ſaid Realms) all the new Chriſtians Moriſques, both Men, Women, and Children. For when as a great or deteſtable Crime is committed in any Colledge or Communalty, it is fit that Colledge or Communalty ſhould be ruined, and that the leſs for the greater, and one with another ſhould be puniſhed; and that ſuch as pervert the good and ſincere Life of Common-weals, and of their Towns and Cities, ſhould be baniſhed from other Inhabitants, leſt their Contagion infect them.

For this cauſe, by vertue of theſe Preſents, we ordain and command, That all the new Chriſtians Moriſques, without any exception of Age or Sex, of thoſe that live and reſide in the ſaid Realms, and in the Town of Hernache, except ſuch as be Slaves, ſhall within the ſpace of thirty days after the Publication hereof, depart out of all our Realms and Dominions of Spain, with their Wives, Children, Servants, and others of their Nation; and that they ſhall not preſume to return nor make any reſidence in them, in any ſort whatſoever; And we forbid them to depart by the Realms of Valencia, or Aragon, nor to enter into them, nor to ſtay in any of our Realms or Countries after the time prefixed, upon pain of Death, and confiſcation of all their Goods. And we command, that no Perſon within our Realms and Seigniories, of what Eſtate, Qualities, or Condition ſoever, ſhall preſume to receive, conceal, or defend publickly nor ſecretly any Moriſque Man or Woman after the ſaid term, upon pain to loſe all their Goods, Vaſſals, Forts, and Lands; and moreover to loſe all the Graces and Benefits which they have from me, to be applied to my Exchequer.

And though I may juſtly confiſcate all the Goods moveable and unmoveable of the ſaid Moriſques, as belonging to Traitors, and guilty of high Treaſon; yet uſing Clemency, I am content, that during the ſaid term of thirty days, they may diſpoſe of their moveable Goods, and carry them away, not in Gold, Silver, Jewels, nor Letters of Exchange, but in Merchandiſe, which is not prohibited, bought of the natural Subjects of this Realm, and not of others; or in the Commodities of the ſaid Country. And to the end they may during the time of thirty days diſpoſe thereof, and of their moveable Goods, and employ it in Merchandiſe, or in the Commodities of the Country, and tranſport what they ſhall buy; (for as for their Lands, that muſt be annexed to my Revenues, to be employed in the Service of God and the Common-weal, as I ſhall think moſt fit) I declare by theſe Preſents, that I take them into my Royal Protection, and aſſure them and their Goods, That during the ſaid time they may go and come, to ſell, exchange, and alienate all their moveable Goods, and to employ their Mony, Gold, Silver, and Jewels, in Merchandiſe not prohibited, or in the Commodities of the Country, and to tranſport the ſame freely, without any let or interruption, by Land or by Sea, paying uſual Cuſtoms; ſo as they carry no Gold or Silver coined, or to coin, nor any other thing prohibited by the Laws of my Realm. Yet we are content, they ſhall carry ſo much Money as ſhall be needful for their Paſſage by Land, and embarking by Sea; commanding all our Officers and loving Subjects to ſee this preſent Edict duely obſerved, &c. Signed, I the King.

After the Publication of this Edict, the term of thirty days was reſtrained to twenty, ſo as the Moriſques were haſtened to depart; and the Ships and Veſſels of what Country ſoever were ſtayed in all the Ports of Spain, to tranſport them whither they would go. Many paſſed from Spain into Barbary; but during this year there came above 150000 of theſe Moriſques into France; the King ſending Commiſſaries, to ſee them well uſed, and orderly tranſported away.

Deſcription of the Town of Arrache or Allarache.

There was a War fallen out in Barbary betwixt Muley Xequy, King of Fez, and Muley Sidan his younger Brother, both Mahometans; in which War the younger forced the elder to flie his Country, and to come and crave Aid from Philip King of Spain; But the unfortunate loſs of Don Sebaſtian King of Portugal, was a good Preſident for the Spaniard not to truſt in barbarous Kings, without good aſſurance; He treated with the Barbarian, and promiſed him Succours, with an hundred thouſand Duckats to return to Alarache, (a place which held for him) where by Money or other Practiſes, he ſhould draw unto him as many Souldiers as he could; and that for the ſafety of the Succours that he ſhould give him, he ſhould put Alarache or Arrache into his Hands. This Arrache is a ſtrong Town in the Realm of Fez, in the Province of Algar, ſeated upon the Ocean, at the Mouth of the River of Lucus, whereon part of it is built, and the other part upon the Ocean: It hath a goodly Port, and hard to take for that it is defended by a Fort, in the which the Kings of Fez do uſually entertain a Gariſon of three hundred light Horſe, and three hundred Harquebuſiers; for that the Portugals and Caſtilians hold in a manner all the Sea Towns of the Provinces of Habat, and Erif, where they have great Gariſons. This Province is from the River of Nocor along the Mediterranean Sea, unto the ſtraight of Gibralter, the other is upon the Ocean from the ſaid ſtraight unto the River Lucus, in the which the King of Spain holdeth at this day the ſtrong Towns of Tanger, Arzilla, and others. According to the former accord, the Barbarian returned to Arrache, with his Money in one of the King of Spain's Ships; to whom in a ſhort time repaired many of his Friends and Servants. The Spaniard in the mean time having prepared a Fleet of a great number of Gallies and Ships, and embarqued ten thouſand Souldiers therein, he gave the command thereof unto the Marqueſs of Saint Germaine, who arrived on the twentieth of November in the Evening at the Port of Arrache, and there rode at Anchor all the Night. The next day in the Morning, the Marqueſs, calling all the Captains to a Council, imparting unto them his Deſign for to force Arrache, in caſe that the Mooriſh King did not keep his Promiſe; they gave him aſſurance, that they would carry themſelves like unto brave and valiant Souldiers. But ſee what happened; The King of Fez, having no means to go from his word, ſeeing the Spaniard ſo ſtrong as he might well force it, many of his Followers and People, fearing to fall under the Power of Spain, they would have abandoned him; but having the Governour of the Caſtle at his Devotion, he thruſt out the Gariſon, and delivered the Keys himſelf unto the Marqueſs of Saint Germain. Upon the firſt bruit that the Spaniards were entred into the Caſtle, all the Inhabitants ran to Arms, and thinking to reſiſt them, after that many of them had ended their days valiantly, during three hours Combat, they were forced to yield unto the Marqueſs, who preſently planted the Croſs and Arms of Caſtile upon all the Towers and Steeples. Thus this ſtrong Town, which the Caſtilians and Portugals had ſo long deſired, and whereby the Inhabitants received a great ruine, is in the end fallen under the Domination of their King. The News of this Exploit being brought into Spain, pleaſed the King much, and the People made bone-fires for joy; theſe are the Alterations of times. The Moors in old time were wont to over-run Spain, and now the Spaniards take their Pleaſures in Mauritania.

Arrache in Barbary taken by the Spaniards.

About the end of this year, News came to Conſtantinople, of the great Wars which had been between the Uncle and the Nephew, by the death of the Great Cham of the Tartars; the Son, who during his Fathers Life time had continued at Conſtantinople as an Hoſtage, and was now ſent back into his Country by the Sultan Achmat, thinking to enjoy his Fathers Eſtate; his Uncle, Brother to the deceaſed Cham, practiſed to ſeize upon the Crown; but either of them having drawn an Army of 60000 Men together, in the end, they joyned battel, whereas after the ſlaughter of 40000 Men upon the place, the Son had the Victory, and by that means obtained the Crown of Tartaria.

A great Battel in Tartarie.

I will conclude this year 1610, with the Relation of a particular Buſineſs, to ſhew the greedy deſire of the Turks to get by any unjuſt means whatſoever, and their Infidelity and Falſhood to ſay and ſwear any thing for Bribes. Some years before, one Maſter Willoughby, an Engliſh Gentleman, having rigged up a Ship for war into the Levant, he came into Algier in Barbary to ſell his prize, where at that time one Solyman Catania was Baſſa. This Ship was ſuddenly ſeiſed on, and rifled by the command of this Baſſa, upon no other Subject, but that the Baſſa pretended this Ship had burnt a Caramouſal of his, which in truth the Baſſa himſelf had cauſed to be ſet on Fire, that under colour thereof he might ſeiſe upon the Ship and Goods. Maſter Willoughby went to Conſtantinople, and there made his complaint to Sir Henry Lilloe, then Ambaſſador for the Engliſh; but yet could get no ſatisfaction; whereupon he returned into England, and obtained Letters from his Majeſty to the Grand Seignior, and to Sir Thomas Glover, then Ambaſſador, reſiding at Conſtantinople; which having received, he went preſently to the Chimacham (who was Lieutenant to Murath Baſſa the Grand Viſier, he being then imployed in the Wars againſt the Perſian.) The Chimacham having read theſe Letters, would not ſuffer them to be delivered to the Grand Seignior; promiſing to do Juſtice upon Solyman Catania, whom he diſcharged from his Place, and ſent for him to Conſtantinople, who being come, and called in queſtion, he denied the Fact; Maſter Willoughby (having no certain proof of his loſs) ſuborned one Oſiſh Baſſa a Turk, who had been at Mecha, and was therefore held a very holy man, who ſet a Brother of his to procure falſe Witneſſes, upon promiſe to have the tenth part of what ſhould be recovered; The Witneſſes being ready to ſwear to his Aſſertion, Solyman Catania hearing their Oath, compounded with Maſter Willoughby, and gave him four or five thouſand Dollars; ſo the buſineſs ended. Which ſhews the Corruption of the Turks, and that the holieſt of them for Money will not ſtick to bear falſe Witneſs, and take falſe Oaths.

A great Plague in Conſtantinople.

200000 perſons died of the plague.

The Turks obſtinate belief touching predeſtination.

This year 1610, the City of Conſtantinople was wonderfully afflicted with the Plague, the which diſperſed it ſelf over all, and crept into the Grand Seignior's Seraglio, wherein one of his Sons died of that Infection; whereupon the Grand Seignior was forced to retire for his ſafety, and to paſs the remainder of the Summer in his Palace or Seraglio of Darut Baſſa, about a League and a half diſtant from the City; this violent Contagion did ſo rage in Conſtantinople for the ſpace of five Months, as there were numbred two hundred thouſand Perſons dead within the time, and they did commonly carry every day twelve or fifteen hundred Bodies to be buried. The greatneſs of this Mortality is not to be imputed ſo much to the Corruption of the Air, as to the wilful Negligence of the Turks, who would not vouchſafe to turn away from a Body dead of this Diſeaſe, when it goes to burial, nor to forbear to viſit their Friends being infected. The obſtinate belief they have of Predeſtination maketh them bruitiſhly contemn all ſorts of dangers: For, ſay they, aſſoon as man comes out of his Mothers Womb to injoy the Light of the World, God writes in his Forehead all the good or evil ſhall happen unto him, and particularly of what Death he ſhall dye, the neceſſity whereof no humane power can avoid. All is governed (ſay they) by Deſtiny, and therefore they regard not any Infection, but contrariwiſe when any one is dead, another takes his Clothes and wears them; which is the cauſe that Conſtantinople and the Grand Caire are ſeldom free; and whenas the Air is any thing diſpoſed to Contagion, there dyes ſuch multitudes of People, as they do not number them but by hundred thouſands.

The Ceremony of Ambaſſadours at their firſt Audience.

The Turks feaſt the French.

The Sultans Chamber.

Before the beginning of this Plague, the Baron of Salignac, Ambaſſador for the French King at Conſtantinople, ended his Embaſſage with his Life. His moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſent the Baron of Mole, eldeſt Son to the Baron of Sanſie, to ſupply his Place. He arrived at Pera this Year in the beginning of September, and about the end of October the Sultan being returned to Conſtantinople; after that he had viſited the Muphti, (who is the chief of their Law) the Grand Viſier, the Deſtorda, (who is the Sultan's high Treaſurer) the Boſtangi Baſſa his chief Gardiner, with other great Men of the Port which were highly in Favour; in the end he was admitted to Audience, and to kiſs the Sultan's Hand. A Ceremony, which in mine opinion I owe unto the Hiſtory, to ſhew that the Majeſty of the Turkiſh Emperours is ſo great, as to approach near unto them the Ambaſſadors of foreign Princes are forced to diſguiſe themſelves, and leaving the Habits of their Nation, to attire themſelves and their Train after the Turkiſh manner. Thus the Ambaſſador of France parted from his Lodging at Pera, wearing upon his French Apparel a long Turkiſh Robe of Cloth of Gold curled, furred with Sables; his Gentlemen and Secretaries, to the number of ſixteen, had the like Robes, but of meaner ſtuff, wearing Caps of black Velvet; he had twenty Servants in long Caſſocks of Scarlet, called in Turkiſh, Ferrages, and upon them long Robes of the ſame ſtuff, with Caps of Taffata; the four Dragomans, or the Kings Interpreters, the Captains, Maſters of Ships, and other French-men attired all in long Robes, accompanied the Train. He paſt the Channel which doth ſeparate Pera from Conſtantinople; being come to the other ſide, he found many goodly Horſes for him and his Train, which ſome Turks, that were Friends to France, had ſent him to conduct him to the City; at the Gate whereof many Chiaus and Janizaries attended him to conduct him to the Seraglio; two Chiaus Baſſaes went of either ſide him, accompanying him thither, the reſt of the Turks going before. His arrival was no leſs honourable at the Palace Royal, than his coming to the Town: Two Capigi Baſſaes, or chief of the Porters, received him at the entry of a great Court, and conducted him to the Grand Viſier, who attended him at Dinner in the Hall, where he was feaſted, being accompanied only with one Dragoman or Interpreter; the reſt of his Train were conducted into a low Gallery, whereas Dinner was prepared for them after the Turkiſh manner: That is to ſay, a great Tapeſtry upon the Ground without Cloth or Napkins, and ſome Diſhes thin ſet. The Meat was Water-gruel with Sugar, and ſome Pottage with Pullets; there were two Men either of them holding a certain Inſtrument of ſodden Leather, in which there was a Beverage which they call Cerbet, made of the juyce of Lemons, Water and Sugar, and withall, they held a Cup of blanch'd Copper, giving to every one Drink, and going among the Diſhes to ſerve them more commodiouſly. From this Feaſt, diſtaſteful to them that had lived after the French faſhion, they paſs'd into another Gallery, whereas the Ambaſſador and ſixteen of his Company received each of them a Robe of Tinſel, the which having put on upon their other, they were conducted thorow a little Court paved with Marble, towards the Grand Seignior's Chamber, which was inriched on the out-ſide with many Pillars of Marble, and ſquare Stones of the ſame ſtuff, and beautified with two little Fountains on either ſide: The Chamber within was about ten paces ſquare, the Planchard was gilt, the Walls enamelled with flowers after the Turkiſh manner, and the Floor covered with Tapeſtry of Gold and Silk. At the entry of this Imperial Chamber ſtood ſix Capigi or Porters, whereof two of them took the Ambaſſador under the Arms, and led him to kiſs the Sultan's Hand, or rather his Robe; for having ſaluted him from the greateſt of Chriſtian Kings, he kiſt but his Robe, and then was led on the one ſide, going backwards, to the end he ſhould not turn his back to the Emperour. The French Gentlemen were conducted after the like manner to kiſs his Robe. But they could hardly ſee the Sultan, for his Face was turned towards a Window that was grated, before the which, during the Ceremony, there paſt 30 Capigi, every one carrying a piece of the Preſents which the Ambaſſador had brought; during the which, the Frenchmen could not ſee him but on the other ſide. This Salutation being ended, the Ambaſſador made a ſhort Speech, and preſented unto the Sultan the principal Letter of his Embaſſage, written in the Turkiſh Tongue.

The Valachian expelled his Countrey by Battori.

This paſt at Conſtantinople, whereas the Sultan did willingly ſee an Ambaſſadour, his Allie, whom he honoured above all others. But in Tranſylvania the Affairs went after another ſtrain; the combuſtions which ſeemed inſeparable to this miſerable Province, made it ſtill the Theatre of all diſorders. Gabriel Battori, who governed it ſince the ceſſion of Ragotzi, had put himſelf into the Turks Protection, againſt King Matthias, who pretended a Title, by reaſon of the ceſſion made by Prince Sigiſmund unto the Emperour, as King of Hungary, and had recovered Hermſtad, and chaſed Raduille Vayvod of Valachia out of his Countrey; where, having ſetled a new Governour, and filled the Garriſons with Haiducks, he returned toward Tranſilvania, to oppoſe himſelf againſt Fortgatſie, King Matthias his Lieutenant, who came with Troops out of high Hungary, and paſs'd the River of Tibiſce. The Vayvod Raduille had retired himſelf into Moldavia to Prince Conſtantine, whom he gave to underſtand, That Battori had an intent to ſeize upon his Country, and to make but one Monarchy of their three Provinces: whereupon they joyned their Forces together, and in the end of June entered into Valachia, from whence they expelled Battori his Lieutenant with all the Garriſons. This Exploit made them to hope of a continuance in the Proſperity of their Arms; they entered into Tranſilvania, whereas they purſued Battori with ſuch diligence, as they forced him to come to a Battel near unto Cromſtat, the which he loſt with part of his Troops, being conſtrained to ſave himſelf with his Horſemen in Hermſtad, whereas ſome of the chief Inhabitants ſeeing him receive this Diſgrace, attempted to ſubmit themſelves under the obedience of King Matthias: but the Practice being diſcovered by him, he did ſuch Execution, as he purchaſed to himſelf the Name of Cruel.

Fortgatſie, Lieutenant to King Matthias, enters Tranſilvania.

Battori's Practiſes.

Fortgatſie expelled Tranſilvania, by Battori.

In the mean time Fortgatſie, Lieutenant to King Matthias, maketh uſe of this defeat to ſeiſe upon Tranſilvania: he made an Accord with Andrew Nage (who had drawn high Hungary into Rebellion, and cauſed the Haiducks to revolt) ſo as being freed from that fear, he entereth into Tranſilvania; where, having taken ſome Towns and Caſtles, he layd ſiege to Clauſenburg, the which he battered ſo furiouſly, as the Garriſon and Inhabitants ſeeing themſelves ready to be forced, yielded, and took the Oath of Allegiance to King Matthias the five and twentieth of July. But as theſe Proſperities of Fortgatſie were humane, ſo did they not long continue. Battori being ſhut up in Hermſtad, conjures all his Friends to come unto him, and entreated the Baſſaes of Buda and Temeſwar to ſuccour him, according to the commandment which they had received from the Grand Seignior; he practiſed with Nage (a man which did ſwim continually in the floats of Inconſtancy) and makes him to revolt again in high Hungary, upon a ſurmiſe, That Fortgatſie had not kept promiſe with him; ſo as Nage took Arms again, ſeiſed upon the Fort of Bayens, and filled all High Hungary with Combuſtions; ſo as Fortgatſie could expect no Succours at his need from thence: then having received ſome Forces from the Turks and Tartarians, he went to field, purſuing Fortgatſie with ſuch heat and fury, as he forced him to abandon all that he had taken in Tranſilvania, and to retire into Valachia. What Deſolations did this War bring unto theſe Provinces by ſo many Priſes and Repriſes? Battori going with a thouſand Horſe to ſurpriſe Tocai, upon the Frontiers of Valachia, whereas they then held a great Fair, he found the Garriſon ſo watchful upon their Guard, as having loſt part of his Horſemen, he was forced to return into Tranſilvania.

Fortgatſie's miſerable retreat.

On the other ſide, Fortgatſie with his Hungarians, thinking from Valachia to recover High Hungary by the Country of the Zeclerians, could not effect his Deſign; for Battori being advertiſed thereof, ſtopped his Paſſage; and in like manner the Earls of Bucheime and Dampier had paſſed the River of Tibiſce to meet him; ſo as Battori ſet ſuch Guards in all the Paſſages and Streights, that Fortgatſie was forced to retire towards Polonia by the ſteep Mountains, and deſart Places; whereas his Army was ſo oppreſt with Famine and all other Neceſſities, as they periſhed miſerably, there remaining few alive; with the which he ended his Paſſage into Polonia, and from thence ſoon after he returned into Hungary, but with a very poor Equipage.

Troubles in Moldavia.

Three Princes pretending to Moldavia.

The Negotiation of the Ambaſſador of England, for one of the Princes of Moldavia.

Thus the ſtorm ceaſing in Tranſilvania by the reſtraint of Fortgatſie, a more violent Tempeſt riſeth in Moldavia, to the end that theſe unfortunate Regions ſhould never be without ſome touch of Miſery; For the Turk having underſtood, That Conſtantine, Prince of that Country, had relieved the Valachian againſt Battori, his Allie, or rather his Tributary, he ſends a new Prince into Moldavia, the ſuppoſed Son of one Thomas, or Aaron as ſome write, who had in former time commanded there, and with him fifteen hundred Souldiers, with Letters of command to the Turks and Tartarians thereabouts, to aſſiſt him with their Forces. This new Prince was ſometime in France, and afterwards detained Priſoner in the Fort of Jaques in Spain, within the Pyrenean Mountains. Thus two Princes contend for Moldavia, the one ſupported by the Polonian, and the other by the Turk. But behold, a third Prince cometh in and pretends a Title, being Son to one Janicolo, who had commanded there. This Man had been a Priſoner in the black Tower at Conſtantinople, to which he was committed by the Sultan Amurath, for that he had loſt a Battel in the year 1601, againſt Michael, who then poſſeſt Moldavia; who eſcaping from thence, wandred through divers Countries, and at laſt coming into England, his Majeſty of Great Britain pitying his miſerable Eſtate, recommended him by Letters to Sir Thomas Glover, his Majeſties Ambaſſador, then reſiding at Conſtantinople, with commandment to aſſiſt him, and to ſollicite his Reſtitution with the Grand Seignior. Upon the receipt of which Letters, he retired this wandering Prince into his Houſe at Pera, where he entertained him, with many of his Friends and Followers which repaired unto him, for a long time; and in the mean time, he ſollicited the Grand Seignior for his Reſtitution, having good Acceſs unto him, by reaſon that he ſpake the Turkiſh Tongue perfectly, and needed no Dragoman or Interpreter. To whom the Sultan ſtill gave good Anſwers, but with Delays, that it was not yet time; but he ſhould have ſatisfaction. His Competitor (who was in Poſſeſſion of Moldavia) hearing of this Practice, made Friends at the Great Turk's Court, and corrupted ſome of the Baſſaes by Bribes, (they being all by Nature very covetous) to the end he might croſs his deſign, and make him away if it were poſſible; and among the reſt, he had won Murath Baſſa, the Grand Viſier, a Man of great Power and Authority, who practiſed many means to get the Moldavian into his Hands. Firſt, he ſent word unto the Ambaſſador, That the Sultan, having a meaning to reſtore him, deſired to ſee the man, if he were capable of the place or no; but being advertiſed of their intent, and well acquainted with their Practices, he refuſed to ſend him. After which, he wrote unto him, That it was the Grand Seignior's Pleaſure, he ſhould ſend the Moldavian unto him, that he might confer with him. To whom the Ambaſſador made anſwer, That unleſs he might ſee a Warrant under the Grand Seignior's own Hand, he would not deliver him. Murath Baſſa, ſeeing that none of theſe Practices could prevail, reſolved to fetch him out by force. For the effecting whereof he drew together two thouſand Janizaries. The Ambaſſador hearing of his intent, fortified his Houſe, and armed his People with the Moldavians which were with their Prince, meaning to ſtand upon his defence. Murath Baſſa, deſirous to know what the Ambaſſador did in his Lodging, diſguiſed a Janizary like unto a Greekiſh Shepheard; who entering into the Ambaſſadors Houſe, found them all in Arms; then returning unto the Baſſa, he told him that he had to do with a mad Man, and if he proceeded in his Enterpriſe, he would hazard the loſs of many Janizaries; whereupon he gave it over. After which, the Ambaſſador being called home into England, the Moldavian deſpairing of Reſtitution from the Turkiſh Sultan, he turned Turk; and being preſented to the Grand Seignior, was made Bey of Burſia in Aſia; the which he enjoyed not long; for Naſſuf coming from the Perſian Wars, diſcharged him. Thus Moldavia, having many pretending Sovereigns, ſuffered many miſeries, and was a Prey to Turk, Tartarians, and Polonians, all Partiſans to theſe Sovereigns.

The Voyage of the Gallions of Florence againſt the Turks.

Theſe were the Troubles which the Turks cauſed at land for the Ruine of the Chriſtians. But behold what he ſuffered at Sea by the Gallies of Florence, Malta, and Naples: the Florentines made their Enterpriſe apart. The great Duke of Tuſcany being advertiſed, That the Caravan which tranſported the Tribute of Ægypt to Conſtantinople, prepared to put to Sea, he reſolved to divert this Tribute, and by the Valour of his Arms to bring it to Legorn: and for the effecting hereof, he ſpeedily armed four Gallions, under the Command of Beauregard, a French-man, who was Admiral. The firſt was called the new Gallion, in which the ſaid Admiral went; the ſecond, the Great Legorn, commanded by Brandequedor, General at Land, and allied to the Duke; and the other two were commanded by two French Captains. Beauregard having received Commandment to paſs with this Fleet into the Levant, to meet with the Caravan, he bent his courſe towards Candy, a fertile Iſland inhabited by the Grecians: Being arrived in the Port of Caliſmene to water, he continued there ſix days. Leaving this Iſland, he ſailed towards Cyprus, which is held by the Turks; and ſo coaſting Syria, they learned of a Ship of Marſeilles, that the Caravan was yet in the Port of Alexandria, where they prepared for their Voyage to Conſtantinople. To attend them, the Admiral Beauregard went and caſt Anchor at the Fort of Sidon, called Sarepta, governed by Emir, or Armil Facardin, a Rebel to the Turk, and a great Friend to the Florentines, where he ſtayed twelve days, to take in Bisket, Fleſh, and other neceſſary Refreſhings. And having made a more ſtrict League of Friendſhip with Facardin, he honoured him with a Coffer full of Arms, whereby the Florentines Ships came as freely into thoſe parts, as into their own Country.

The Enterpriſe to take the Caravan of Egypt.

Beauregard, having well victualled and munitioned his Gallions, returned towards the Iſle of Cyprus, whereas he found a Chriſtians Ship, called the Flying Dragon, which came from Damietta, by whom he was aſſured that the Turks Army, conſiſting of a great number of Gallies, was gone out of the Port of Rhodes, and had taken a Flemiſh Ship. Theſe News made him think that he ſhould meet the Fleet, and that he muſt of force defend himſelf. Wherefore he made all things ready, and preſcribed the Order which his Captains ſhould hold during the Fight; cauſing his Ordnance to be mounted as if they were to joyn. He had four as good Gallions, and as well furniſhed, as any in the Levant Seas, either of them being armed with forty Pieces of Ordnance, and four hundred good Souldiers. Betwixt the Iſland of Cyprus and Caramania they encountered this Turkiſh Fleet, conſiſting of forty Gallies and two Galliaſſes, under the Command of Baſſa Muſtapha Grego, who was General of this Fleet, which was in ſight of the Florentines Ships: the Galliaſſes advance to take view of them, and to find how far their Cannon would reach: and in the mean time the Gallies put themſelves into the form of a Croiſſant, ready for the Combat. Beauregard, an old Sea-Captain, and well practiſed in Sea-fights, would not make a ſhot againſt the Gallies, but attended until the whole Fleet came cloſe up to him; which being near, he ſaluted them ſo furiouſly with his Cannon, giving them the broad ſides, as the Turks (who expected no ſuch Reception) were all amazed, and making a ſtand, would proceed no farther. Their General having well obſerved the reſolute Countenance of the Florentines, divided his Gallies into two Squadrons, giving charge to the one to give an Aſſault to the Florentines Gallions, and in the mean time the reſt ſhould prepare themſelves to fight.

The Florentines meet with the Turks Fleet.

The Turks aſſail the Gallions of Florence.

Five Turkiſh Gallies ſunk.

Being thus divided, they came one after another to the Aſſault, the which continued for the ſpace of ſix hours, and yet could not board them; Muſtapha ſeeing five of his Gallies ſunk by the Enemies Cannon, with the loſs of all the men that were within them: but ſuddenly the Wind changed, and proved favourable to the Florentines, who embraced this Advantage, giving chaſe to the Turks Gallies, forcing them to ſeek their ſafety in the Haven of Famaguſta, the chief Fort of Cyprus; ſo of Aſſailants (being beaten) they became Run-a-ways: ſo inconſtant are the accidents of War, and eſpecially at Sea, whereas the good or bad Succeſs many times dependeth of a little Wind.

The Turks put to flight.

The Florentines take a rich Ship of the Turks.

This Turkiſh Fleet having loſt five Gallies, and recovered a Port in Cyprus, the Admiral Beauregard ſeeing his Deſign againſt the Caravan diſappointed, he reſolved to return towards Legorn with his Gallions. Being at Sea, he encountred a Turkiſh Veſſel called a Caramouſal, which came from Rhodes, to go unto Cyprus: they chaſed it, and in the end overtook it; which they preſt ſo with their Ordnance, as they ſlew one hundred and thirty Turks, and took three hundred Slaves. The Booty was very rich, being valued at fourteen hundred thouſand Crowns. After this Prize, their Victuals beginning to fail, having been ſo long at Sea, they bent their Courſe for Legorn: but the Wind falling contrary, they were forced to ſtay eight days in the Iſland of Scarpante, paſt the Bar of Meſſina; and having given chaſe to certain Gallies of Tunis, they arrived at Legorn the fifteenth of June, where there was great joy for their Return, and the Prize which they had brought, the which, according to the Cuſtom, was to be divided; one third to the Souldiers and Mariners, and the other two parts imployed for the Entertainment of the Ships, and the payment of the Captains.

This Caravan, which goes from Egypt to Conſtantinople, is every Year attended for, not only by the Gallions and Gallies of Florence, but by thoſe of Malta and Naples, and by all the Pyrates of the Mediterranean Sea: like unto the Engliſh and Hollanders, who yearly lay in wait for the Indian Fleet before the concluſion of the Peace and Truce with the Spaniard. And although their principal Deſign was to take ſome part of the Caravan, yet they had other Enterpriſes upon the Turks Country, beſides the ſpoil of Merchants which they met by chance, which many times payd the charge of their Voyage; and ſometimes, they that thought to take, were taken, and loſt both their Ships and Lives.

The Exploits of the Gallies of Malta and Naples.

The Gallies of Malta, commanded by the Bailiff of Venouge, and thoſe of Naples by the Marqueſs of S. Croix, joyned together ſoon after, with a deſign to ſet upon the Caravan, which carried the Revenue and Tribute of Egypt to Conſtantinople, or elſe to put in execution the enterpriſe which they had long before projected, upon certain places of Albania, or to ſurpriſe or ſpoil ſome Iſland in the Archipelague which might pay their Charges. But the firſt failing, they met with a Venetian Ship laden with Merchandiſe, to the value of one hundred thouſand Crowns. The Spaniards who commanded in the Gallies of Naples, ſeiſed upon this Ship; but the General of Malta would by no means conſent unto it, nor ſuffer any of the Merchandiſe to be put into his Gallies, for that he would not unjuſtly violate the Friendſhip which was betwixt his Order and the State of A Venetian Ship taken.

Venice. This Example did touch the Spaniards Conſciences, ſo as within few days they ſent away the Venetian Ship, but in courteſie they had unladen all the merchandiſe.

The Chriſtians Gallies go to the Iſland of Lango.

After this Prey of a Chriſtian Ship, the Fleet diſcovered two Sails at Sea, ſending preſently after them, they were two Barks, the one coming from Candia laden with Wood, and the other from Scarpante charged with Wine, the which being brought unto the Generals, gave them to underſtand, that the Caravan of Ægypt was not yet paſt, being advertiſed that fifty Chriſtians Gallies attended them in their Paſſage. Upon this advice, the Chriſtian Generals, being out of hope to ſurpriſe the Caravan, preſently reſolved to undertake a more great and glorious Enterpriſe, and to ſurpriſe the Iſland and Caſtle of Lango in the Archipelague, upon the Coaſt of Natolia; and about ſeven of the Clock at Night they ſet Sail with a good Wind, but being changed in the Morning, they were forced to return to the Iſland of Porcherne; from whence they parted again at eight of the Clock at Night, and continuing their courſe, in the Morning they diſcovered three Florentine Ships, who told them, that they had entred into the Iſle of Nigropont with ſeven Gallies; but having been diſcovered, they could not effect any thing; and that their Gallies were ſeparated from them in the chace of four Galliots. The Chriſtian Fleet continuing their courſe, they arrived about eleven of the Clock in the Morning at St. Jean de Seruaë, where having caſt Anchor, there was a Council called in the Admiral; where they reſolved to Petard the Caſtle of Lango, toward the Sea; for the Execution whereof they ſhould land two hundred men, viz. thirty Knights and fifty Souldiers out of the Gallies of Malta, and one hundred and twenty Spaniards out of the Gallies of Naples; and that they ſhould carry two Petards with them, the one given in charge to Captain Beaulaigue in the Troop of them of Malta, and the other was conducted by the Spaniards; the reſt of their Men which they ſhould land, ſhould go and Aſſault the Town of Lango. With this Reſolution they parted from St. Jean de Seruaë, with a good Wind, and arrived at the Iſland of Lango on the ſixth of June, an hour after mid-night, whereas they landed three miles from the Town; they that were appointed for the Enterpriſe, march'd on with their Petards, according to direction; but the Night being very dark, the Troop of Malta ſtraied from their Guide, but their Valour brought them directly to the Walls of the Town; where, after many turnings and windings to find a fit place to plant the Petard, (notwithſtanding that they were diſcovered and much ſhot at) Beaulaigue ſet it to a Port next the Sea, well flanck'd with the Caſtle, the which he forced, and his Men entring with fury, went from Street to Street, and put all to the Sword that made reſiſtance. The Spaniards on the other ſide made another Breach with their Petard, and entred the Town; notwithſtanding that at their firſt approach, the Turks (having diſcovered them) plaid upon them with their great Ordnance and ſmall ſhot. The Troops being joyned together, having cut all the Turks in pieces they met with, they came to the place before the Caſtle, which they thought to ſurpriſe; but the Bridge was drawn, and they lay open at the mercy of their ſhot; ſo as there were fifteen Knights of Malta hurt, one ſlain, with a Spaniſh Captain, and ſome ſix and thirty Souldiers of the Gallies of Naples, and as many wounded. Day being come, the Bailiff of Venouge, General of the Gallies of Malta, came unto the Town with the foreward, wherein were 150 Knights, and 450 Souldiers; the Marquiſs of St. Croix followed him, with the two Sons of the Viceroy of Naples, and fifteen hundred Spaniards, who ſpoiled the Town and Suburbs, and took all that were living Captive; but the Caſtle being well fortified, they found it impoſſible to force; whereupon, embarking their Men and Spoil, they reſolved in their return to Malta and Naples, to make an Enterpriſe upon ſome Towns of Albania; but upon the way they were advertiſed, That the Turks had diſcovered the Intelligence which the Spaniards and Knights of Malta had with the Grecians of the Country; whereupon they took Revenge upon them, putting many of them to death, and amongſt others a Patriarch, who being accuſed to have practiſed the Chriſtians revolt againſt the Turks, was cruelly fleyd alive, and his Skin ſent to Conſtantinople. So dangerous a thing it is to ſeek for Liberty with this Mahometan Nation.

The Caravan of Ægypt was ſtill in the Port of Alexandria attending a Paſſage, and to be freed from ſo many Chriſtian Gallies which lay in wait for it; and it ſtaid the longer by reaſon of the great Plague, wherewith Conſtantinople was afflicted. But in the end of October, Mechmet Baſſa of Caire, (who would conduct it in Perſon) having a Convoy of fifty Gallies well armed, put to Sea, and arrived at Conſtantinople without any Encounter. At his Landing, this Baſſa cauſed to march before him ſixty Mules, every one laden with 20000 Sequins in kind, being a whole years Tribute of the Kingdom of Ægypt, the which he cauſed to be carried to the Sultan's Serail. This Money was welcome to the Port: for the former Wars, both in Hungary, Tranſilvania, in Aſia againſt the Rebels, and in Perſia, had ſo waſted the Emperour's Treaſure, as it would hardly entertain one of his Armies. The Baſſa, who had gathered this Tribute together faithfully and with great diligence, was at his coming to the Sultan's Port honoured with the charge of Baſſa of the Sea, (he, who had it before, being advanced to the Dignity of Viſier) and moreover the Sultan promiſed him his Daughter in marriage, being but three years old.

The Caravan of Ægypt arrives at Conſtantinople.

The Baſſa's recompence that brought it.

News came to the Port, that certain Ships, Gallies, and Galliaſſes of the Chriſtians, to the number of fifty, came near unto the Helleſpont; which put the Turks in great fear: and complaints being brought unto the Grand Seignior, That certain Caramouſals had been taken by the Chriſtian Gallies; he ſent preſently for the Captain Baſſa, or Admiral of the Sea, demanding of him, Whether the Report of theſe loſſes were true or no? To whom he anſwered yes. Why are not you then at Sea, ſaith he? He anſwered, For that I can get neither Men nor Money. Whereupon the Deſtorda or Treaſurer was ſent for, who had loſt his head, had not the Aga of the Grand Seignior's Women intreated for him.

The Turks are in fear of the Chriſtians Gallies.

This Summer, Conſtantinople and the Country thereabouts was ſo plagued with ſuch clouds of Graſhoppers, as they did ſhadow the very Sun beams, and fell upon the City and Country round about. The Turks conſulted with their Wiſe-men, what it might portend: Who anſwered, That they did foreſhew great Plenty to follow. But indeed they left not a green Herb nor Leaf in all the Country adjoyning, nor in the City, where they entred into their very Chambers, and annoyed them much, being almoſt as big as Dormice, with red wings. And ſoon after there fell ſuch extraordinary great Hail in Conſtantinople and Gallata with ſuch abundance of Rain, as the violence of the Water did ſuddenly ſhut up one of the Gates of the City, and ſo rebounding, filled their Shops and Houſes, that very many were in great danger of drowning. Some Houſes fell down, and ſome People were ſlain; the pavements of the ſtreets were torn up, and the ſtones carried together into great heapes.

Violent Rain in the City.

1610 We have formerly made relation of the Perſians Victories, and of the defeat and death of Cicala General of the Turks Army, in the year 1605. And that the year following, the Sophy, having recovered whatſoever the Turks had taken from his Predeceſſors, had extended the bounds of his Empire unto the black Sea, from whence he ſent an Ambaſſador unto the Grand Seignior, to let him underſtand, that having recovered what had been unjuſtly uſurped from him, he would proceed no further, but deſired to live in Peace; the which might now be the better aſſured, the one holding nothing from the other. Moreover, this Perſian Ambaſſador, having remained ſeven Months at the Sultans Port, was in the end forced to retire into Perſia without audience. And laſtly, That Amurath Serder the Grand Viſier, was afterwards forced to convert his Arms againſt Gambolat and the Rebels of Aſia, and to neglect the War of Perſia.

A Perſian Ambaſſador comes to Conſtantinople.

1611 Notwithſtanding the Perſian War, there arrived this year at Conſtantinople an Ambaſſador from Perſia, who, according to the Turks manner, was attended on by a great Troop of Chaoux on Horſeback, Capigi's, Janizaries, and other Captains, ſent by the Sultan to conduct him to his lodging. Within few days after his arrival, there was a great ſhow made in Conſtantinople, by the ſeveral Trades of the City, every one marching by themſelves before the Grand Seigniors Serrail, and repreſenting unto him their manner of marching in the Wars, and the order of their Proviſion; ſome carrying on their Shoulders Sheep, others Lambs, Calves, Beef, &c. All which was done of Policy to daunt and diſhearten the Perſian Ambaſſador, and to encourage their own People; and withal, to let him know, that there ſhould be as great plenty in their Camps, as he ſaw at that preſent. And to abuſe him ſtill with the Imagination of their great Preparation, the Chimacham or Viſiers Lieutenant, ſent the next day for this Perſian Ambaſſador, and during their Conference had taken order, That the Emperour of Tartaria's Brother (who was then in the Sultans Court) ſhould come in; at whoſe entrance the Chimacham aroſe from his Place; Oh (ſaid he) I know for what you come, It is for Money for your Souldiers; you ſhall receive it at ſuch a Place. Which words were heard by a Dragoman to the Engliſh Ambaſſador, being then preſent; the which was done to terrifie the Perſian Ambaſſador; and at the ſame time, and to the ſame end, they ſent over divers Troops of Souldiers to Scudaret, as if they had been ready to march with an Army.

The Turks Army againſt the Perſians.

The Turks great Armies are not raiſed in haſte, neither do they march in poſt; when as the Spahi's, that is to ſay the Horſemen, which make the greateſt part of his Army, and have no other Pay or Entertainment than the Revenues of certain Land, are diſcharged, they muſt have a whole year to recover their Revenue, and to put themſelves in Equipage; and moreover, it is threeſcore days march for an Army from Conſtantinople into Perſia.

The Death of Amurath Serder,

Alſo in the year 1609, and 1610, the Turk had not attempted any thing againſt the Perſian, who ſtill ſollicited him for Peace. The greatneſs of the Othoman Empire could not reſolve to make a Peace, having receiv'd ſo great defeats; they would give it but as Victors, not as vanquiſhed. But this year Achmat reſolved to ſend a puiſſant Army of above 150000 men, againſt this antient Enemy of his Houſe, under the command of Amurath Serder, his Grand Viſier: But before the Army entred into Perſia, it was without a Commander, by the death of Serder, in the end of July, ſo as they were forced to ſtay and attend the Sultans pleaſure from Conſtantinople.

It was ſuſpected that he had been poiſoned by Naſſuf Baſſa, one that ſtood out in Rebellion againſt the Grand Seignior, and yet he had many Friends in the Turks Army; wherefore, to prevent all Mutinies, and conſequently, the overthrow of the whole Army, Amurath Baſſa in his Sickneſs adviſed the Grand Seignior (by Letters which he ſent unto him) to make Naſſuf General of the whole Army, and ſo by fair means to draw him home, and then to diſpoſe of him at his pleaſure. The Sultan with his Baſſaes approved well of this Advice, and choſe him Grand Viſier, and General of the Army; who having received the Seal and Authority, did forthwith put many of Amurath's friends to death, and with their money paid all the Souldiers, which had wanted pay, whereof ſome had been without five years before: he alſo ſent unto the Grand Seignior threeſcore and ten Mules laden with money of Amurath's treaſure, and threeſcore with goods; all which the Sultan gave to Amurath's Wife and Children.

Severity of the Sultan.

It is ſtrange to read, how the Grand Seignior doth tyrannize over his Subjects, and how ſeverely he doth puniſh the leaſt omiſſion in any of his Officers: for I find it obſerved, that the ſeventh of January in the end of this year 1611, the Grand Seignior being abroad in the Snow, and not well provided for of fuel, he cauſed Stambol Aga, who had that charge, to be ſtrip't naked, and ſet in the Snow four or five hours. Indeed this Winter was very rigorous, and there fell abundance of Snow throughout all Turkie, with great Storms, many Houſes were beaten down; and amongſt others, the French Conſul at Aleppo was ſlain with the fall of his own houſe.

The Perſian offers Conditions of Peace, and a Tribute.

Naſſuff parted from Aſia, and marched with his Army unto the Frontiers of Perſia, where he committed ſuch Spoils, as the Sophy was conſtrained to draw all his Forces together, to prevent the ruine of his Countrey, being then about the midſt of Auguſt. But when they were come to a Battel, the Perſian, finding the Party unequal for him, and dangerous, offered Conditions of Peace, and promiſed to give the Turk a quantity of Silk which ſhould make the charge of two hundred Camels, for a yearly Tribute, in acknowledgment of ſome Countreys which he had conquered from the Othomans. Theſe offers were accepted at Conſtantinople, but there was added, that the Perſian's Son ſhould be called Baſſa of Tauris, and that the Magiſtrate and Judge of that City, called the Cady, ſhould be ſent from Conſtantinople. We ſhall ſee in the following year the Effects of theſe Propoſitions, by the Ambaſſadour of Perſia, whom Naſſuff ſhall bring to Conſtantinople; in the mean time, let us return to the Mediterranean Sea, to take a ſurvey of the valiant Exploits of the Knights of Malta againſt the Turks.

The falſehood of a Turk puniſhed by the Juſtice of God.

On the twenty ſixth day of April, a Turk, having lent a good Sum of Money to a Chriſtian, to be paid at a certain day; he came before the appointed day with another Turk, and willed the Chriſtian to pay the Money to that other Turk when the day came; which the Chriſtian promiſed to do, and performed it accordingly: but the Turk denied the receit thereof; whereupon he to whom the Money was properly due, came and demanded it: to whom the Chriſtian anſwered, that he had paid it to that Party to whom he had aſſign'd it: whereunto the Turk replied, that if it were ſo, he was ſatisfied: but yet the other Turk denied it: whereupon the matter was brought before the Judge, and the Turk who had received the Money, taking an Oath to the contrary, the Chriſtian, according to the Turkiſh Juſtice, was enforced to pay the Money again; the which he did, but withal, he praid God to ſhew ſome publick ſign which of them had done the wrong. And thereupon, the Turk going forth to repair home to his Houſe, fell down dead in the Street.

Corinth taken and ſpoiled by the Knights of Malta.

The Great Maſter Vignancourt, continuing his generous Deſigns to ruine the Turk, had an Enterpriſe againſt Navarrin, a place importing this common Enemy of Chriſtians; for the Execution whereof, he ſent the five Gallies of his Order, under the charge of Vaqueras, great Commander of the Order, and chief of the Nation of Provence. They came within ſome miles of the Shore, but found their landing very difficult, for that they had been diſcovered by one of the Caſtles of Navarrin, which had given the alarm unto the whole Country, ſo as they were forced to paſs on to ſome more eaſie Conqueſt, to the end their Voyage might not prove unprofitable; wherefore they ſailed into the Archipelague, and came near to the Coaſt of Morea, ten Leagues from Corinth, where in the Night they landed 800 Men under the Conduct of the Commander of Cremeaux, General at Land; this Troop marched towards Corinth, and an hour before day were at the Town Gates to force them. Some Turks took Arms, but their weak reſiſtance could not ſtay the Knights from entering with their Troops; they ſack'd the Town, and having taken what ſpoil was portable, they carried away with them 500 Slaves. After this Triumph, the Chriſtians made a happy retreat, and in good order, notwithſtanding all the attempts of the Turks Horſe and Foot, who were drawn together in great numbers, making 10000 Souldiers, for the Country is very populous; in view of whom they imbarked their Spoil and Slaves. Hereby it appears, that this was one of the moſt deſperate Enterpriſes that hath been of long time ſeen. For to attempt a Place ſo far from their retreat, in ſo populous a Country, which upon the leaſt alarm may draw together ten or twelve thouſand Turks, and to make their retreat with ſo ſmall a number, againſt ſuch great Troops which purſued them; doubtleſs we muſt confeſs, that as they ſhewed great Valour, and had good Fortune, ſo they undertook a very dangerous Enterpriſe. Thus the Knights of Malta vanquiſhed, whom we might term the Maſters of the Mediterranean Sea, if the Revenues of their Order would ſuffer them to ſet forth Shipping and Forces equal to their Valour.

But to follow the variable courſe of the Hiſtory, let us obſerve the different Occupations of Chriſtians. At Prague the Germans entertained themſelves with the conſideration of a Crown which appeared in the Firmament, over that City about the midſt of October, giving a very great Light, and about it Armies of Men fighting who ſhould have it. At that time the Emperour Rodulphus was upon the Weſt, or declining of his days, and Matthias who ſucceeded him in the Empire, then King of Hungary, was upon the Sun-riſing of his Triumphs. Many expounded this heavenly Apparition, as a Preſage of Happineſs and good Fortune to Matthias; he enjoyed the Crown of Hungary already, and by Deſignation that of Bohemia, and now they did prognoſticate unto him that of the Romans. Doubtleſs men which aſpire after great Fortunes, do rather adorn the Sun-riſing, than the ſetting; and Mans Life when it declines, taſts of the Lees. The flouriſhing Glory of Matthias, his Age, and his Actions in the Wars, did add nothing to the Authority of other Men in the Country, but did mightily ſettle his own. Three Suns which were ſeen in the Firmament over Vienna, the chief City of Auſtria, confirmed the Germans more in this their hope, that he ſhould have the third Crown of the Romans. This laſt Apparition happened the year following.

About the end of the year, ſome of the Engliſh Ambaſſadors Men entering into quarrel with certain Jamoglans of the next Serail; from words they fell to blows; during which tumult one of the Ambaſſadors Men threw a Stone, and ſmote a Jamoglan on the Fore-head, whereof he died within few hours after. The Aga of the Serail complained hereof to the Grand Viſier, who preſently ſent the Subbaſſa of Galata to make inquiry of the Fact; the Ambaſſador went himſelf to the Serail, and ſent for his Men which had been in the quarrel, willing the Turks to deſign the party which had thrown the Stone; who all with one ſhout ran upon one Simon Dibbius, a man that was newly come from Candy, where he had ſerved in the Venetian Garriſons, and was now entertained into the Ambaſſadors Service. This Simon was not he that threw the Stone; notwithſtanding the Turks would none but him; on him they laid hands, and dragged him away. The Ambaſſador interpoſing himſelf, and offering to pledge for him, was thruſt away by them, his Men beaten, and one of his Pages wounded; whereupon he complained to the Grand Viſier, but prevailed little; for to Priſon they dragged this Simon, and there kept him a whole Month; neither could he be releaſed, albeit the Engliſh Nation offered great Sums to ranſom his Life; for the Turks would needs have Blood for Blood. The day of Execution being appointed, the Ambaſſador ſent his Chaplain to the Priſon where this Simon was, to prepare him for Death; unto whom (examining him how he had formerly lived) he confeſſed, that in England ſome few years before he had killed a Man, for which fact he fled thence into Candy; from whence he came to Conſtantinople, where he was to ſuffer for that which he did not; the juſt Judgment of God purſuing him to the ſhedding of his Blood in Conſtantinople among Turks undeſervedly, for the Blood which he had ſhed in England wilfully. He was hanged at the Ambaſſadors Gates, his Head and Heels the next Night were ſtolen away by the Turks, as it was thought, to uſe in ſome kind of Sorcery; the other parts of his Body they had leave to take down and bury.

This year 1612 they did celebrate at Conſtantinople a double Nuptial Feaſt; for the Marriages of Baſſa Mehemet, Son to the deceaſed Cicala, with the Sultans Siſter; and of Baſſa Mechmet, Admiral at Sea, he whom we have ſeen lately return from Egypt, and bring to Conſtantinople the Revenues of that rich Kingdom, with the eldeſt Daughter of his Emperour. For the Feaſts of young Cicala, the Spahi made Courſes on Horſeback with Battle-axes and Bars, in the open place near unto the Serail, where they made divers fireworks of very great charge, but of ſmall Invention; and they gave Preſents to above 20000 Perſons, beſides the charge of the banquetting ſtuff which amounted to above 20000 Crowns. The Pomp was double; for the Sultans Women did celebrate that day with the greateſt Ladies of the Port, and the Men ſeparated in other Places did ſolemnize it in like manner. But the magnificence of the Marriage of the Baſſa Admiral at Sea with Achmats eldeſt Daughter, had far more luſtre at the Port. The Ceremony was performed on the thirtieth of June, twenty days after the other; and the order of this Pomp, as well as ſome other which we have deſcribed in this Hiſtory, requires a particular Relation.

The Ceremonies of the Daughters Marriage.

The day before the Conſummation of the Marriage, they ſent the Brides moveables and Jewels, from from the Serail to the Bridegrooms Lodging, with this Order and State as followeth; Firſt, there marched 500 Janizaries on foot, being followed with the Grand Provoſt of Conſtantinople, and the general Serveiour, both on Horſeback, and attired in Cloth of Gold; the Aga, or Collonel of the Janizaries, very proudly adorned, and environed with ſome Janizaries, marched alone on Horſeback; after theſe two hundred men of Quality well mounted, and richly attired, followed with a ſlow pace. The laſt which march'd in this Pomp or Ceremony, were the Taliſmans, Centons, Emirs, and other Miniſters of Mahomets Clergy. And preſently followed after the Baſſa Achmat, Deftarda, or High Treaſurer, who conducted the moveables, as choſen by the Sultan to be Godfather or Sagois to the Bride, being environed with twelve Footmen attired in long Robes of Gold. After him followed the moveables, Apparel, and Jewels, which made the Brides truſs, having in the Head excellent Muſick after the Turkiſh manner, of Hoboyes and Kettle-drums on Horſe-back.

Wherein the Brides moveables conſiſted.

Theſe Moveables, or this Truſs, conſiſted of twenty ſeven Preſents. The firſt was a little Hat all of Gold, covered with precious Stones, and with Pantofles or Womens Shoes, after the Turkiſh faſhion, of pure Gold, enrich'd with Turquoiſes and Rubies; a Book of Mahomets Law, the covering whereof was of Maſſie Gold, all ſet with Diamonds, many Bracelets, and other rare Devices for Women, of pure Gold, with many precious Stones; a little Coffer a Cubit long, and half as broad, all of Chriſtal of the Rock, having the corners of Gold, in the which were to be ſeen great Diamonds and huge Pearls, to the value of 80000 pounds ſterling: after this precious Coffer, were carried many Smocks embroidered with Gold and Pearl, and Head-bands for the Fore-head, with many Robes of Cloth of Gold. All this was diſtributed into twenty ſeven Preſents, as we have ſaid, and carried with great Pomp by twenty ſeven Men on foot.

The Brides Slaves.

After theſe Preſents followed eleven Caroches full of young Maidens, Slaves to ſerve the Bride; theſe Caroches were covered and ſhut, and either of them attended by two Eunuchs Moors; and after theſe followed twenty eight Virgin Slaves, attired in Cloth of Gold, and accompanied by twenty eight black Eunuchs all on Horſeback, and richly clad. After which were ſeen 240 Mules, loaden with Tents of Tapeſtry, Cloth of Gold, Satin, Velvet, with the ground of Gold, with many Cuſhions, which are the Chairs the Ladies of Turkie uſe; with many other rich and ſumptuous Moveables. Such was the Truſs which this young Princeſs brought to her Spouſes Houſe. Doubtleſs this Equipage was ſtately, and did well become the Pomp and Greatneſs of the Othoman House, from whence ſhe had iſſued, the mightieſt and richeſt of all the Royal Houſes in Europe, yea, I dare boldly ſay, of all the World.

The Order of the Brides conducting to her Husband.

Emirs and their Priviledges.

The Marriage day being come, the Bride was conducted to her Husbands lodging with no leſs Pomp and State than her Moveables. The Janizaries marched firſt, as they had formerly done, being followed by the Grand Provoſt, the Surveior, their Aga, and many other Officers of the Port. The Emirs (who are deſcended from Mahomet, and alone carry green Turbants) marched after to the number of eighty; this Name of Emir is as much as to ſay Lord. They which wear them anſwer not, and obey none but their Chief, called Mirabachi, and their Voice in Judgment ſtands for two; they were followed by the Taliſmans or Prieſts of Mahomets Law, and by a great number which ſtudy it, and which aſpire to the Offices of Cadies or Judges, of Cadileſquiers or Mufti. The Viſiers or ſupream Judges of the Turks Eſtate, who judge of all Affairs in Council, came after with the Grand Viſier, who is Lieutenant General to the Turkiſh Emperor throughout his whole Empire, and keeps the Seals of his Empire. He had on his left hand (which is the moſt honourable rank in Turkie) the Grand Mufti, or ſupream Biſhop of their Law. The Muſick followed after on Horſeback, conſiſting of thirty Men with Drums and Hoboys, being followed by eight Egyptians, which carried Biſcain Tabors, and did a thouſand Apiſh Tricks. Theſe were followed by forty Muſicians, marching two and two, ſome playing on Citerns, others on Harps, and ſome on Lutes after the Turkiſh manner. A Fool (held for a Saint amongſt them) being mufled with a Cap and a Cloak covered with Mutton bones, danced and ſung with theſe Inſtruments; fifty of the chief Officers of the Arſenal march'd after them, and thirty Men with Hammers and other Iron Inſtruments, to break down whatſoever advanced too far in the Streets, and might hinder the free Paſſage of two Trees of an immenſe height, laden with divers ſorts of Fruits all of Wax, carried by many Men, and ſupported from the top and the midſt with Ropes. After theſe Trees came twenty Officers belonging to Achmat Baſſa the high Treaſurer, Godfather to the Bride. And he himſelf alone richly attired, and proudly mounted; after whom came two great Torches light, carried by many Slaves, and then a third torch of a wonderful bigneſs, all covered with plates of Gold, and ſhining more with precious Stones than the Flame which burnt. The Raiſſer Aga with fifty of the Princeſs's Officers, followed theſe Lights, and after them was carried a great Canopy of Crimſon Velvet, and after it another greater, covered with plates of Gold, whoſe Curtains being ſhut on all ſides, hung down to the Ground. Under this Canopy was the Princeſs on Horſeback, with ſome of her black Eunuchs, her Caroch followed covered with Cloth of Gold, and drawn by four great white Horſes, wonderful beautiful. Then followed eight other Caroches, in which were a great number of the Brides Maids, with many Negroes gelt; and finally, twenty five Virgin ſlaves, choſen amongſt the faireſt, all on Horſe-back, having their Hair confuſedly hanging upon their Shoulders. Such was the Pomp of this Marriage; but many times the Nuptial Feaſt is intermixt with Funeral mourning. For not many days after, the Sultans ſecond Daughter, promiſed to Naſſuf Baſſa, was carried to her Grave without any Pomp or Honour; for the Turks make no great eſteem of Women.

The Death of the Sultans Daughter.

The day after the marriage, the Grand Seignior did cruelly beat his Sultana, the Mother of this Daughter, whom he had married to the Captain Baſſa; he ſtabbed her with his Hand-jar or Dagger through the Cheek, and trod her under his Feet. The reaſon was, becauſe ſhe had ſtrangled a Favorite of his, which was one of his Siſters Slaves, whom the Grand Seignior having ſeen, and beeing enamoured with her, ſent for her. The Sultana hearing thereof, cauſed her to be brought to her lodging, where ſhe ſtript her of her Apparel, ſtrangled her, and put her Cloths upon one of her own Slaves, whom ſhe ſent to the Sultan inſtead of the other, and at her return ſtrangled her alſo; as ſhe had done many others when they once appeared to be with Child by the Grand Seignior.

A great Plague at Conſtantinople.

The Plague beginning furiouſly to ſpoil the City of Conſtantinople, the Sultan was forced to return to his Country Palace, called the Serail of Darut Baſſa, to avoid the danger of this violent Contagion; the which makes me think, that the Turkiſh Emperours for their own profit diſpenſe with ſome Articles of their Faith; for, as we have ſaid before, The Turks are ſo obſtinately tied to the belief of Predeſtination, as they will not vouchſafe to turn from a peſtiferous Body, when it is carried to the Grave, and much leſs forbear to viſit his Friends being ſick of the Plague, for that (ſay they) if we muſt needs die of this Contagion, it is in vain to flie it, for it will find us whereſoever; if not, our Health ſhall never be empaired, altho' we converſe with thoſe that are ſick of this Diſeaſe. But their Sultans know well how to flie the danger; yea, and to cauſe them to be led under the Arms that come to kiſs his Hand, leſt they ſhould offer him ſome violence. Thus we ſee the defect of falſe Religions, when as we ſee this mark of Univerſality in the Faith taken away; for there every Man believes according to his private intereſt, as well among many others which have ſeparated themſelves from the Truth, to canton themſelves in their Errors, where we do often try the diverſity of their belief.

A Deruis ſeeketh to kill the Emperor.

Sultan Achmat, being in his Palace of Darut Baſſa, and going to viſit a ſtately Moſque which he cauſed to be built there, a Deruis or religious Turk, thruſt on by ſome deviliſh Fury, caſt a great Stone at him to beat him down; but the blow of this deteſtable Traitor, fell upon his Shoulder, and hurt him but lightly. Achmat commanded they ſhould draw from this wretch the Confeſſion of his Confederates: but the Officers of the Port cauſed him to be executed the next day, ſomewhat too ſuddenly, and by a Death too honourable for a Crime ſo full of Abomination, for they cauſed his Head to be cut off. A Deruis of the ſame Order had in former times ſought to murther the Emperor Mahomet the Second.

The Funeral of the Lady Glover, the Ambaſſador's Wiſe.

On the fourteenth of April, the Lady Ann Glover, Wiſe to Sir Thomas Glover, Ambaſſador reſiding at Conſtantinople for the Engliſh, was buried with very great Solemnity, the like had not been ſeen in the Country ſince the Turks conquered Conſtantinople. There were preſent at this Funeral of moſt Nations in the World; the Sermon was preached in a large Garden under a Cypreſs Tree; and although but few of thoſe preſent did underſtand it, yet it wrought this effect, that whereas the Jeſuits and Friers had formerly poſſeſt both Turks, Jews, and other People, that the Engliſh Nation ſince the change of their Religion, had neither Churches, nor any form of divine Service; hereby they perceived, that they had both, and ſerved God far more decently and devoutly than they themſelves; inſomuch that the Jeſuits, being aſhamed of their Impoſtures, and ſlanderous Untruth, durſt not for a while after walk the Streets for fear of the Turks, who threatned them for ſo much belying the Engliſh. The Sermon being ended, the Body was carried from Pera unto the Engliſh Graves, which were almoſt a mile from the Place; it was cloſed in Lead, and laid in a Caroch covered over with black Velvet, and the Horſes with black Cloth. The Dutch Ambaſſador, the Hungarian Agent, the French Collonel, with a great number of all Nations both Men and Women followed her to her Grave. The Tomb was of fair Marble built four ſquare almoſt the height of a Man, having an Epitaph engraven thereon.

The Caſtle of Lango taken by the Florentines.

We have ſeen the year before, the Iſland and Town of Lango ſpoiled by the Gallies of Malta and Naples, but the Caſtle was ſaved from Ruine by the reſiſtance it made againſt the Chriſtians Attempts; but this year, in June, the great Duke of Tuſcans Gallies running over the Archepelague, aſſailed it ſo furiouſly, as they forced and ſpoiled it, carrying away twelve hundred Priſoners. Mechmet Baſſa, Admiral at Sea, whom we ſaw even now buſied at his Nuptial Pomp with the Emperours eldeſt Daughter, being advertiſed of theſe Spoils of the Florentines, by the daily complaints of the Turks which loſt their Shipping, and of many other Enterpriſes attempted upon his Maſters Countries lying near the Sea ſhore; he departed from Conſtantinople in Auguſt with three and thirty great Gallies, having commanded all the Beyes of the Iſlands and Towns in the Archipelague to joyn with him, with as many Gallies as they could make, to ſtop the Chriſtians Courſes in the Weſt. But whilſt that he is buſied in thoſe Seas, the Pirats of Ruſcia deſcending into the Euxine Sea, by the Mouths of thoſe Rivers which diſcharged their Waters into the Sea, over-ran and ſpoiled the Turks Coaſts in thoſe parts.

Courſes of the Ruſſians and Tartars upon the Turks.

At the firm Land Conſtantine, one of the pretending Princes in Moldavia, annoyed all that had any dependance upon the Turk. A part of that great Army of the King of Polands, which had mutinied for their Pay, ſpoiled Podolia; and a Prince of the Tartarians, diſcontent for that Achmat had preferred a Couſin of his before him in the Inveſtiture of the Realm of the Tartars Precopians, with 5000 Souldiers ſpoiled the Rivers of Moldavia under the Turks Dominion, and he did the like in the Gulph of Nicopolis.

Troubles in Moldavia.

This was at ſuch time when as miſerable Moldavia was the Theatre whereas the Turks, Tartarians, and Moldavians acted a bloody Tragedy at the Coſts and Charges of the poor Country-men. For Tomſho, having been choſen Vayvod or Prince of that Province by the Turk, Conſtantine, who could not endure that he ſhould reign, armed the Country, over-ran it, ſpoiled it, and made havock of all, detaining two Capigi Priſoners, whom the Sultan had ſent unto him, with commandment to obey his Will, and a prohibition not to trouble Tomſho in the Poſſeſſion of his Province. But this was a Meſſage of hard Digeſtion to Conſtantine; he could not with Patience yield to this Ceſſion of Moldavia: and inſtead of ſending theſe Meſſengers back to the Turk with an Anſwer, he carried them with him into Polonia, whither he went to demand Succors, and cauſed them to be guarded as Priſoners. In the mean time, by the Support and Aid of Potoſky, Governour of Velin, his Brother-in-Law, he obtained from the King of Poland, that he ſhould be ſupported againſt Prince Tomſho, his Competitor, whom the Turk had advanced; and to make his entry into Moldavia more eaſie, they reſolved to ſend an Ambaſſador unto Conſtantinople, to entreat Achmat to call back Tomſho to his Port, that Conſtantine might quietly enjoy Moldavia, and to acquaint him with the right and intereſt the Polonians had by their Capitulations with the Turks, to name a Vayvod or Prince in that Province, to the end no wrong might be done unto them.

A Polonian Ambaſſador arreſted at Conſtantinople.

This Polonian Ambaſſador being arrived at Conſtantinople (thinking to be preſently diſpatched, either by a grant or denial of his demand, and not to ſtay above fifteen or twenty days) being viſited at his arrival by all the Ambaſſadors of Chriſtian Kings and Princes which remained there: but inſtead of Audience, after ſix weeks attendance, he was arreſted and detained Priſoner: underſtanding from the Turks, that he ſhould have no Liberty until that the two Capigi, whom Prince Conſtantine carried into Poland were releaſed.

The Troubles and Diviſions among Chriſtians, Neighbours to the Turk, have always ſerved as a Bridge for this Infidel to invade them, and by this Advantage to uſurp ſuch Towns and Countries as lie fit for him. Now that Valachia, Moldavia, yea and Tranſilvania, are toſt and turmoil'd with continual Diſorders and Combuſtions; the Sultan ſeems to embrace this Occaſion, to make himſelf Soveraign of theſe Provinces, and to get Cromſtad beſieged by Battori.

He demands Succours from the Turk, and is betray'd.

Poſſeſſion of all that lies betwixt the River of Danow, the Mountains of Sarmatia, the River of Tibiſcus, and the Euxine Sea. He employs all his Thoughts and Inventions upon this Subject, to bring his Deſigns to effect. He arms and draws Forces about Belgrade, under the Conduct of Baſſa Mahomet Belzergi; He commands the Tartarians to enter into Moldavia, and he ſent a Naval Army towards the Mouth of the River Danow, which made the Frigots of Ruſſia to diſlodge, the which had continually made Inrodes and Spoils upon his Lands. Battori, Prince of Tranſilvania, was at that time before the Town of Cromſtad, which he had beſieged, but the tediouſneſs of this Siege made him reſolve to ſend an Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople, to demand Succours from the Grand Seignior, to the end he might be able to continue this Siege, and to take the Town; he gave this charge to Andrew Giezy, and ſent him to the Sultans Port; but inſtead of ſerving his Maſter faithfully, he practiſed a deteſtable Treaſon againſt him, to put the Turk in full Poſſeſſion of Tranſilvania, and to make him abſolute Sovereign. The practice was concluded after this manner, That the Baſſa Mahomet Belzergi ſhould enter the Province with his Army, and that Giezi ſhould joyn with him with certain Troops, and ſhould deliver unto him Veradin, Lippa, and ſome other ſtrong and important Places, and for recompence he ſhould inveſt him in the Principality of Tranſilvania, in the place of Battori, and under the Authority of Achmat.

This Treaſon might have drawn this miſerable Province into Ruine, and it may be the reſt near adjacent, if it had taken the Effect which the Treachery of Giezi had promiſed unto himſelf. But the Baſſa of Buda, underſtanding that Battori had ſome vent of the Practice at the Port, and that being now in great fear and Perturbation, he had raiſed the ſiege from before Cromſtad, and was ready to caſt himſelf into the Arms of the Palatine of Hungary, and to crave relief from him; the crafty Baſſa knowing that this courſe would be prejudicial for the Sultan, and finding that the depoſing of Battori would be more difficult than they expected, he diverted Mahomet Baſſa from attempting any thing againſt Battori or Tranſilvania. This act ſhews ſufficiently, that Chriſtian Princes which think to ſhelter themſelves under the ſhadow of the Turkiſh Creſcent, are very ill aſſured; for he never fails to ſtir up Enemies againſt them, to make them ſue for Succours, and himſelf Neceſſary; Then in the end he expels them, and becomes abſolute Maſter of their Countries. It was alſo ſaid, That the Baſſa Mahomet would not attempt any thing in Tranſilvania, by reaſon of the Election of the Emperour Matthias, whereof the Baſſa of Buda was aſſured by the Ambaſſador which the ſaid Emperour ſent to Conſtantinople, to carry the Preſents unto the Sultan; which Ambaſſador was honourably entertained at Buda by the ſaid Baſſa, and from thence conducted ſafely to Conſtantinople.

But not to keep theſe Turkiſh Troops idle, Mahomet Baſſa, being advertiſed that Conſtantine, the pretending Prince in Moldavia, had been in Poland to crave ſome aſſiſtance from thence, he reſolved to employ his Forces that way, to diſpoſſeſs him and ſettle another.

But the better to underſtand the beginning and ſucceſs of theſe Moldavian Wars, we muſt make a Repetition of that which paſt ſome years before. In the year 1608, Jeremy Mobyla, Prince or Vaivod of Moldavia died; committing the Government to his Brother Simeon, during the Minority of his three Sons, Conſtantine, Alexander, and Bougdan, the eldeſt being but eight years old. He left three Daughters, married to three generous Princes of Polonia, Potosky, Viſinouſky, and Corresky. Prince Simeon continued in the Government until the year 1611; after whoſe deceaſe the young Prince Conſtantine, by the Perſwaſion of his Mother, that he might ſafely take upon him the Government of Moldavia, and not attend any Confirmation from the Sultan, for that Prince Simeon, who had been confirmed by the Turk which then reigned, was but Tutor to his Nephew; entred the Government. At this time there remained at Conſtantinople, one Stephano or Tomſho, who had of a long time practiſed the favour of one of the Viſiers called Mehemet, an Eunuch of Georgia (who was then Chimacham, or Lieutenant to the Grand Viſier) and of ſome other Baſſaes, as well by Money as by other Practices, ſuggeſting falſely that he was Son to Prince Aaron, who had been Vaivod of Moldavia before the deceaſed Jeremy; and he prevailed ſo by his Practices and Corruption (whereunto the Turks are more ſubject than any Nation in the World) as he was admitted to the Principality by the Grand Seignior, and having given him to underſtand by the Viſier, that Conſtantine had thruſt himſelf raſhly into the Government, and that he would not acknowledge him for his Lord and Sovereign, nor pay the yearly Tribute, which was 40000 Chequines, he ſent Fouſſeyen Aga with 20000 Turks and Tartarians to ſettle Stephen or Tomſho in Moldavia, and to expel Prince Conſtantine. Which Army marched ſo ſecretly, as they had in a manner ſurpriſed him; yet drawing together a head of 10000 Men, he reſolved to attend the event. The Aga ſent to acquaint him with his Commiſſion, and among other things threatned him, that if he would not ſuffer him to proclaim Stephen Vayvod of Moldavia, and yield him the City of Tas free, he would cut him in pieces. Whereunto Conſtantine made anſwer, by the advice of the Prince Potosky his Brother-in-Law, That the Grand Seignior had been abuſed; for if he had underſtood, that his Predeceſſor had granted unto the deceaſed Prince Jeremy his Father, and to Prince Simeon his Uncle, That he ſhould ſucceed his ſaid Father in the Government; it was not credible that he would ſeek to diſpoſſeſs him by force, without hearing, and inſtall in his place an unknown Perſon, who had falſely ſuppoſed himſelf to be the Son of a Prince of Moldavia; neither ſhould they find, that he had refuſed to acknowledge the Sultan for his Sovereign Prince, or denied to continue the ſame Tribute which his Father and Uncle had paid; but if the Aga would proceed without any reſpect of his Offers, he did hope that the true God of Battel would maintain him in his juſt defence, and would not ſuffer an Uſurper to prevail over a lawful Prince. Fouſſeyen Aga, who had no will to capitulate with Prince Conſtantine, being corrupted by Stephen with Preſents and Promiſes, advanced with his Army, ſo as the next day they joyned battel; but the Moldavians, oppreſt with Multitudes of Turks, Tartarians, and Valachians, could not make it good. Wherefore Potosky entreated Prince Conſtantine to ſave himſelf, and to ſuffer him to finiſh the Battel; but he could by no means perſwade him, ſtill reſolving to attend the event. Whereupon they went both again to the charge with ſuch Troops as they had left, and defeated many of the Turks Forces; but being oppreſſed with a new ſupply of 2000 Horſe which the Aga ſent by Stephen, they were conſtrained to yield themſelves to the Mercy of their Enemies. Prince Conſtantine fell to the Tartarians ſhare, either for that he had been taken Priſoner by ſome of them, or elſe was given them by Fouſſeyen Aga, to draw a ranſom from him, and be inſtead of their Pay.

Conſtantine's Anſwer to the Turks Aga.

Conſtantine and Potosky taken Priſoners.

But they made no great uſe of him; for as they led him away, paſſing the River of Nieſtre, he leapt into it, thinking either to ſave himſelf by ſwimming, or unwilling to ſurvive his Diſgrace. And as for Prince Potosky, he was carried to Conſtantinople, and was put into the black Tower, which is a Priſon appointed for Men of Quality, where he continued until the year 1616. The loſs of this Battel by Conſtantine, gave an eaſie entrance to Stephen into Moldavia, no Man daring oppoſe himſelf againſt the Turks Forces; ſo as Fouſſeyen Aga cauſed Stephen to be proclaimed Prince of Moldavia in the City of Tas, and then diſmiſſed his Army, and returned to Conſtantinople. Such was the Fortune of the Prince of Moldavia, ruined by the Turks, and ſuch was the Diſorder and Confuſion of his miſerable Country.

Conſtantinople afflicted with Graſhoppers.

This Summer Conſtantinople and the Country round about, was annoyed with abundance of Graſhoppers, as it had been in the former year; but to free themſelves from this devouring Vermin, about the midſt of July, the Patriarch of Conſtantinople and Alexandria, with divers other Biſhops, and Calloires attired in their Copes and other Ornaments, went forth in ſolemn manner at the Gate of Adrianople, being the North Gate of the City. Whereupon (ſaid the Greeks) they all periſhed; and indeed about this time infinite heaps of them were found dead; but not by reaſon of their Curſe, for moſt were dead before they curſed them, and were to be ſeen dead upon every buſh and twig of a Tree before their curſe, and many lived after their Curſe, and continued until the next Summer. The cold dews which fell this Summer (being extraordinary) were thought to be the natural cauſe thereof; God cauſing thoſe dews to fall, to free the Country from theſe devouring Creatures.

The Troubles of Tranſilvania.

Let us now deſcribe the Miſeries of the Tranſilvanian, and of his Province, a Table ſo often repreſented in this Hiſtory. Gabriel Battori, who governed Tranſilvania, as lawfully deſcended from the Sovereign Princes thereof, having made himſelf a Tributary unto the Turk, and by his impious Actions mingled Mahomets Impiety with the Chriſtian Religion; and moreover, exceeding in his Cruelty, became a memorable Example to all Poſterity, that Princes which carry the glorious Name of Chriſtians, when they have once laid aſide all fear of the Sovereign of Princes, cannot attend, but a miſerable end in their Reign, conformable to the courſe of their Enormities. So Gabriel Battori, holding it a Law of State to ſettle his Affairs with the ruin of Religion, allies himſelf with the Turk, and with him afflicts the Chriſtian Provinces. But ſeeing many Factions made againſt him, as well by the deſcendents of Botſcay, as by Giezi, Bethlem Gabor, and ſome other, he ſupports himſelf with the Forces of Andrew Nage, the head of the Rebels in High Hungary, who came unto him to the ſiege before Cromſtad to aſſiſt him in his Affairs. Battori entertained him with all ſhews of Courteſie, invited him to dinner in his Tent; and for a greater Demonſtration of Friendſhip, after Dinner they two went to take the Air on Horſeback. Nage had drunk after the Hungarian manner; Battori entreated him to run his Horſe a carreer, and he refuſed it; the which Battori taking for an Offence, ſpake many words of contempt unto him, and he anſwered him in the ſame manner, being more inflamed with Wine, than governed by Reaſon. Battori being wonderfully offended, that a Man of no ſort, being but a poor Souldier of Fortune, crept up to ſome Authority among the Souldiers but by Degrees of Rebellion, ſhould give him ſuch words of Indignity, gave him three blows on the Head with a Battle-axe which he held in his Hand, and ſlew him. Thus Nage ſwims juſtly in his own Blood, having wickedly and to the ruine of his Country floted in the ways of Inconſtancy, and popular Tumults; and ſo he died as he had lived.

Battori kills Nage.

Parties againſt Battori.

But Battori found himſelf daily oppreſt with many Affairs, which drave him inſenſibly to his Ruin. Peter Decaci, Kinſman to the deceaſed Botſcay, annoyed him on the one ſide with Troops of Souldiers. Andrew Giezi (who had betrayed him in his Embaſſay to Conſtantinople) levied Forces to proſecute him; and Bethlem Gabor, a Nobleman of Tranſilvania, and aſſiſted by the Turk, took many Places from him, after that Giezi had forced him to raiſe his ſiege at Cromſtad, and generally all Tranſilvania revolted againſt this Prince. To ſee more plainly in the Obſcurity of theſe confuſed Diſorders, you muſt underſtand, that this Province is peopled by three ſeveral Nations, the Sicules, Saxons, and Hungarians. The Sicules (deſcended from the Scithians) came with Attila King of the Hunnes, in Pannonia, now called Hungary, and taking their way towards their Country, they inhabited that part of Tranſilvania which lies next to Moldavia, and dividing themſelves into ſeven Colonies, they built the Towns of Kiſdi, Orbai, Sciſſi, Cykuduarheh, Aranios, and Maros. The Saxons (mutinying againſt the Government of the Emperour Charlemaigne King of France, for certain Impoſitions wherewith he had charged them) retired into Tranſilvania, and by force ſeiſed on that part of the Country which confineth upon Valachia, where they built the Towns of Hermenſtad, (otherwiſe called Cibin) Cromſtad, Nezen (or Biſtric) Meduviſch, Sciespourg, Clauſenbourg, and Alba-Julia. The Hungarians inhabited this Province from the time of Saint Stephen King of Hungary; and having maſtered the other Nations, they obtained ſuch Preheminence among them, as ſince their Succeſſors have cauſed themſelves to be called Nobles of Tranſilvania, and the Vayvods or Princes of the Country have been taken from among them. The Towns of Varradin, Dever, Zilahi, Gela, and ſome others, owe their beginnings unto them. The greateſt part of theſe three Nations which inhabit Tranſilvania were revolted againſt Battori; but particularly the Saxons had taken Arms againſt him, his great Cruelty having forced them to this extream Remedy.

Diviſion of the People of Tranſilvania.

All the three Nations againſt Battori.

Battori ſends an Ambaſſador to the Emperour Matthias.

Battori being thus abandoned by his Subjects, proſecuted by his Nobility, and forſaken of all the World, knowing not whither to flie for Succour, and not daring to truſt unto the Turk, who openly favoured Gabor; he reſolved to try if he could by Preſents draw the Emperour Matthias to give him any Aſſiſtance. Wherefore he ſent Ambaſſadors unto him, to promiſe all Subjection and Obedience; and he ſent for Preſents, a long Robe or ſacerdotal Cloak of Gold, ſet with Pearl and precious Stones, certain Plumes of black Herons, adorned with precious Stones, a Turkiſh Sword, the Scabberd being of Silver richly ſet with Jewels, ten black Horſes with rich furniture embroidered with Gold and Silver, and a Turkiſh Horſe, having half the Body and Legs of the colour of Gold, with his Furniture of Crimſon richly embroidered. He laboured to have the Emperour give notice to the Baſſa of Buda, That this Attempt of the Turks againſt Tranſilvania, was againſt the Articles of Peace; but the Baſſa made anſwer, That his Emperour was not to be blamed if he ſeiſed upon that Province, which did immediately belong unto him, and kept it quiet from the Practices of others. But Battori, relying not wholly upon this ſupport, but deſiring to have more ſtrings to his Bow, ſent Ambaſſadors to the Sultan, with rare and rich Preſents, who had ſecret Treaties and Councils with the Baſſa's; the which Negronius, the Emperours Ambaſſador reſiding at Conſtantinople, diſcovering, he ſent word unto the Emperour, that he entertained a Monſter among Men.

Cruelty of Battori.

About the ſame time there came Ambaſſadors from the Saxon Towns of Tranſilvania, complaining much of the Cruelty and Tyranny of Battori. The Saxons (ſaid they) living many years in Tranſilvania, had beautified the Provinces with Towns, Villages, and Markets, and had by their vertue obtained many Priviledges from former Emperours; but Battori, againſt his promiſed Faith, and the Oath which he had taken, had deprived them of their Priviledges, and afflicted them in ſuch ſort, as they were in a manner ruined; that from his firſt entrance he had ſought to root out the antient Family of the Saxons; that he had afflicted them with Impriſonments and miſerable Servitude, and had detained John Benner three years in Priſon, for no other cauſe, but for that he knew he had brought a great Eſtate out of Germany; he had deprived honeſt Widows of their Eſtates, and had oppreſt others with unjuſt Exactions; he had ſurpriſed Hermſtad, the chief City of the Saxons, and ſuffered the Haiducks to ſpoil it, and to commit all ſorts of Inſolencies. That he had expelled the Magiſtrate, baniſhed honeſt Citizens, raviſhed Women, ſlain the Parents, to deprive the Children of their Inheritance, and committed all the barbarous Cruelties that could be deviſed. That he had ſent three hundred Captives to the Sultan for a Preſent; many he cut into ſmall pieces, ſome he had thrown down from the tops of Mountains and Towers; ſome he had hung up by the Feet, others he had drawn in pieces with Horſes and Trees, and to conclude, he had practiſed all kinds of barbarous Cruelties. That having expelled Religious Princes out of Moldavia and Valachia, he had made them ſubject to the Turk, for no other end, but getting an occaſion to circumvent the Chriſtians, he might waſte all with Fire and Sword, having Multitudes of Barbarians to ſecond him; and for a Concluſion of his notable Cruelty, having freed the Town of Gaudin, he made choice of twenty of the principal Inhabitants, and delivering to every one of them a Pike, he forced them in his Preſence to kill one another in the midſt of the Market-Place.

Gabor and the Turk preſs Battori.

But God revengeth his Exceſs by his Ruine, whereinto we ſhall preſently ſee him run headlong miſerably; for, Bethlem Gabor, his capital Enemy, having joyned his Forces with thoſe of Baſſa Serder, they both entered together into Tranſilvania, forced Lugaſti, took Deve, and ſtruck a great Terror into the whole Country. Ogli Baſſa on the other ſide ſurmounts the difficulty of the ways, and lodgeth with his Troops in the Suburbs of Cromſtad. and from thence went and camped over all the Tract of Barry or Barſac. Thus Battori ſees himſelf oppreſt by an Enemy from whom he can expect nothing but his Miſery and Ruine; he attended Succours from the Emperor, under the Conduct of the Palatine of Hungary and Fortgatſie; they came, but not ſuch as were able to reſiſt the Turk. This made him write to Trinau for the levying of Souldiers; but the hatred they bare him generally, deceived his hopes, no man would march under his Enſigns. This refuſal makes him diſtruſtful, he dares not confer with any man touching the Affairs of the War. A treaty of Peace ſeems more fit for his Affairs; he makes an overture to his moſt familiar Friends, and tells them, that he holds it neceſſary to purchaſe his Peace with Serder Baſſa at what price ſoever; yea, were it in delivering into his hands the Places of greateſt Importance. But he receives no other Anſwers from them, but that they had rather die than adviſe him to it. Thus he ſees himſelf void of all hope of ſafety in his Affairs; he wanted Money, his Subjects, yea, even his Souldiers hated him, as a Prince abandoned to all Cruelty; and for his laſt Remedy, and the moſt ordinary in baſe and cowardly Minds, he fell into deſpair, intreating one of his Servants to kill him; but the other refuſed him that honour, ſuffering him to draw on his miſerable Life, till that within ſome few days after, going forth to view where his Troops were lodged, being in an open Chariot, accompanied only with two Gentlemen, fifty of his Souldiers (which attended him in an ambuſh) ſhot at him, ſlew him, and hurt thoſe that did accompany him. It is true, this accident hapned in the year 1613, when as this unfortunate Battori went to give an account unto God of the bad Government of his Eſtate.

The Miſeries and Deſpair of Battori.

Battori ſlain by his own Souldiers.

Bethlem Gabor made Prince of Tranſilvania by the Turk.

Some few days after, Bethlem Gabor was declared Prince of Tranſilvania by Baſſa Serder, who gave him this adviſement at his Introduction; Battori ſhall ſerve for an Example to bad Princes; I do not think that you will follow his Steps. Beware you attempt not any thing without the Privity of my Maſter; Maintain Peace with your Neighbours, and make Men of Experience and Honeſty of your Council. Tranſilvania did yet fear the continuance of a ſtorm of a fatal War, when as in leſs than forty days it ſaw it ſelf ſettled in the calm of ſweet Peace, by the acknowledgment which all the Towns made unto Bethlem Gabor, and the Oath of Fidelity which they took unto him, as to their elected Prince; notwithſtanding that the Emperour Employed all his Credit to hinder it. But the deſire of Peace, and the fear of the Turks Armies, drew all the Governours of Towns to acknowledge Gabor; ſuch were the Affairs of Tranſilvania, diſordered by the Turk. Let us now make an end of the remainder of the year 1612, the which we have deferred, for that we would not interrupt the relation of the Affairs of this Province.

A Perſian Ambaſſador comes to Conſtantinople.

We have ſaid elſewhere, That the King of Perſia had offered Conditions of Peace to Sultan Achmat, much to his Advantage, ſeeing that he yielded himſelf the Turks Tributary, in regard of certain Lands which he had conquered from them. Now the Viſier Naſſuf, General of the Army againſt the Perſian, brings his Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople, to conclude this Peace. Naſſuf arrived with his Army and the Perſian Ambaſſador at Scudaret, right over againſt Conſtantinople, whither moſt of the Baſſaes of the Port went to ſalute him, and then returned. But the Grand Viſier ſtayed there two days; on the third he paſt over to Conſtantinople, where he was entertained at the water ſide by all the Baſſaes which accompanied him; an infinite number of Janizaries going before with their Pieces, and ſome of them in Armour, after whom followed their Aga on Horſeback; then came a great number of Jamoglans, and the Emirs or Kindred of Mahomet with their green Turbants, with many blind men ſhouting aloud; theſe holy men carried the banner (as they ſay) of Mahomet, and the People ſtanding by kiſſed it with great Devotion as they paſt; after them came the Chaoux on Horſeback, the Baſſaes, then the chief Muphti, and laſt of all Naſſuf Baſſa himſelf; after whom followed the Treaſure which he brought with him for the Emperour, being two hundred thirty four Moyles laden with Gold and Silver. The Viſier, as he paſt by the Sultans Window, bowed himſelf very low unto him, from whom he had a nod with his Head, and ſo ſet Spurs to his Horſe and rode away faſt, as the manner of the Turks is when they ſalute a greater man than themſelves, preſently to run or ride away apace. The Viſier being come to the Serail, went in to the Sultan to kiſs his Hand, where he continued a whole hour, the reſt of the Baſſa's attending without. There were preſent at this days Pomp the Emperours Ambaſſador, the French, the Engliſh, Polonian, Low-Countries, and Venetian; the Perſian remaining ſtill at Scudaret. The Grand Viſier, as he paſt by the Emperours Ambaſſador, put off his Hat and ſaluted him, but not the reſt. The ſame day Tomſho, who had been lately made Prince of Moldavia by the Grand Seignior, ſent many Polonians to Conſtantinople, whom he had taken in the Wars. All which (notwithſtanding they threw down their Caps and offered to turn Turks) were put to death. And within few days after, the Viſier Naſſuf, ſitting in the publick Divano, had three Robes ſent him from the Grand Seignior to grace him.

Achmat, having a Will to let the Perſian ſee the Magnificence of his Court, went out of Conſtantinople; and under a pretext to go take the Air at his Country Palace, called Darut Baſſa, he takes occaſion at his return to make a ſtately entry at his Imperial City. The general Surveyour being advertiſed of his will, cauſed the ways from his Palace of Darut unto the City, to be covered with Sand; the which contains two French Leagues, or four Engliſh Miles. This done, the Emperour parted from his retinue, and entered in Pomp into Conſtantinople. The order of his entry was in this manner: A great number of Men at Arms marched firſt on Horſeback, and after them ſome Troops of Foot, the Cadis of Conſtantinople, or Men of Juſtice, and all the Taliſmans, or thoſe of Mahomets Law, in very great numbers followed after, and after theſe march'd the Viſiers and Baſſaes in great Pomp; after whom followed the Sultans Houſhold, that is to ſay, ten Men leading in their Hands ten goodly Horſes richly capariſoned, the laſt of which had the Bridle and Saddle all covered with precious Stones; the Sultans Targuet was made faſt unto the Saddle, and upon it did hang even to the Ground a great taſſel of Pearls; and over all this, a long Horſe-cloth or covering for a Horſe, the which was embroidered ſo thick with Pearl, as the ground could not be diſcerned; after which followed the reſt of the Emperours Houſehold in divers Troops; firſt, fifty Janizaries on foot, every one leading Dogs in Leaſhes, Maſtiffs, or Iriſh Grey-hounds, the goodlieſt of all were thoſe which the French Ambaſſador had preſented unto the Sultan. Secondly, the Grand Seignior's Footmen called Peiks, Perſians by Nation, all well attired, wearing on their Heads Bonnets of Silver, and gilt, in form of Pots. Thirdly, threeſcore Archers on foot, in the midſt of which the Sultan came, attired in a rich Robe of Cloth of Gold imbroidered with Pearls and Diamonds, his ſlaves were enrich'd after the ſame manner; his Turbant covered with five Plumes of black Herons Feathers inrich'd with great Diamonds, and a Chain of the ſame Stones about the lower part of his Turbant; upon his little Finger he had a Diamond of a large bigneſs and eſtimable price, the which gave a marvellous great Light; he was proudly mounted upon a goodly Horſe richly capariſoned, Emperour like, the Saddle was embroidered with Gold, Pearl, and Diamonds, the Stirrups of pure Gold ſet with many Diamonds, and from the Horſe Neck did hang a great taſſel of Pearl, the which were ſo great, as they were eſteemed very rich and pretious. Fourthly, After the Grand Seignior followed three Men on Horſeback, carrying in their Hands, the one his Arms, the other his Cloak, and the third his Imperial Turbant, and theſe were attended on by certain Eſquires and Gentlemen all on Horſeback. Fifthly, Then came the Muſick after the Turkiſh manner, conſiſting of threeſcore Men on Horſeback, which played upon Phieſs, Clerons, and Trumpets. Sixthly, There followed an hundred Pages of the Sultans, bravely mounted, and followed by many Eunuchs, fifty of which Pages carried every one a Faulcon upon his fiſt, having their Heads enrich'd with Diamonds, and theſe were followed by thirty Guards of the Port. Seventhly, Fifty Faulconers and Huntſmen richly attired and well mounted; four whereof had either of them before him upon his ſaddle bow, a Leopard covered with Cloth of Gold. Eighthly, A great number of other Pages, fairer than the Pictures of Adonis or Love, choſen amongſt the Infants of the Tribute, and unfortunately appointed for the filthy and unnatural Pleaſures of their Maſter, whoſe Garments after the Turkiſh manner were pretious, and made of rich Cloth of Gold curled. They were followed by a great Troop of young men plainly attired in Cloth, having upon their Heads yellow Caps pointed in form of a Sugar-loaf, and theſe were ordained to ſerve the Sultans Pages.

There were moreover attending the Sultan in this Pomp divers Beglerbegs, as of Boſna, Buda, Romania, Natolia, and others; every Company going diſtinct, both of Horſe and Foot, with the Baſſaes Servants all gallantly attired and well mounted; and after them followed Naſſuf's Attendants, being five hundred in number richly armed; there were alſo the Kings Fire-men, Calkers, Azappes, the Rices or Officers of Gallies with Spears in their Hands; all that belonged to the Arcenal, the Carters which governed the Carts going to War, and their Captains: then the ſhot-men with their Banner, and the Armourers all in Armour, with their Banner. There were alſo the Banners of the Grand Seignior Mahomet, and of the Grand Viſier, every one in his order before the Grand Seignior, ; and after all followed the Capigies and Officers of his Kitchen. The number of all ſorts of Attendants in this Pomp was ſo great, as it was eſteemed to amount to the number of forty thouſand Perſons.

The Perſian Ambaſſador, for whoſe ſake the Emperour Achmat had made this ſtately ſhew, to the end he might carry back into his Country a pattern of the Othoman State and Greatneſs, cauſed to be caſt out before his Lodging when as the Sultan paſſed by, an hundred pieces of Silk, the which were gathered up by the Archers of his Guard, whereof they made good purchaſe. All theſe Magnificencies, added to thoſe which we have formerly related at the Marriages of the Sultans Siſter and Daughter, with other Pomp celebrated in France, Spain, Naples, and Germany, for the Marriages of Lewis the Thirteenth, King of France, with Ann of Auſtria, Infant of Spain; and of the Prince of Spain with the Lady Elizabeth of Bourbon, the Kings eldeſt Siſter, and for the Coronation of the Empreſs, and the Emperours entry into Nuremberg, may give unto this year 1612, the Title of magnifique or ſtately.

A largeſs of the Perſian Ambaſſador when as the Sultan paſt.

Four days after Sultan Achmats entry into his Imperial City, the Perſian Ambaſſador had audience, and was received to kiſs his Hands; he preſented unto his Majeſty in the behalf of the King of Perſia his Maſter, four hundred balls of Silk, a Beſonard Stone as big as a mans fiſt, with ſome others that were leſs; nine bags of Leather full of Turquoiſes, the which were a foot and an half long, and above four fingers broad, a great number of Tapeſtries of Wool, Silk, Cloth of Gold and 1612 and Silver, with many other things of great price, and very rare. The Complements being ended, they began to treat ſeriouſly of a Peace betwixt two great and antient Enemies, the Turk and the Perſian; the which, after ſome Difficulties, was concluded upon theſe Conditions: That the Perſian King ſhould pay yearly unto the Turkiſh Emperor, by way of Tribute, a quantity of Silk to the burthen of two hundred Camels; that the King of Perſia's Son ſhould be called Baſſa of Tauris, and that the Cadi or Sovereign Judge of that Town ſhould be ſent from Conſtantinople. This Peace thus concluded to the Turks Advantage, the Perſian Ambaſſador returned to his Maſter, having left moſt of his Train dead of the Plague at Conſtantinople. Being arrived at Tauris, the King of Perſia ſeeing this Peace to be ſo diſhonourable and burthenſome for him, he cauſed his Ambaſſador's Head to be cut off; and ſent back the Chiaux, who was come from Conſtantinople to ſee him ſwear the Peace. Some write that he did him ſome Indignities, which made theſe two great Monarchs return again to Arms.

The Chimacham put from his Place.

The Grand Viſier Naſſuf, after his return to Conſtantinople, to ſhew his Great Power and Authority, procured means to have the Chimacham (who had formerly ſupplied the Place of the Grand Viſier in the abſence of Amurath Baſſa, and until the return of Naſſuf) to be deprived of his Baſſaes Place, and ſent preſently over unto Scudaret, under pretence of preferring him to a Government near unto Trebizond in the Confines of Turkey, but with an intent to deprive him of his Head. The Friends of this Chimacham, (who were many, and great in Court) ſeeing him ſo diſgracefully ſent away, and doubting Naſſuf's purpoſe, procured leave from the Grand Seignior to have him ſent for back again, for that he was an old Man, and might from thenceforth live at home in quiet; and for his former Services a thouſand Aſpers a day allowed him for his Entertainment; which Naſſuf took very diſcontentedly.

During the Perſian Ambaſſador's abode at Conſtantinople, the Emperor Matthias (Succeſſor to Rodulphus his Brother) ſent an Ambaſſador to the Sultan, to complain of the Enterpriſes which were made daily upon Tranſilvania, a Province which he ſaid belonged unto him, as a dependance of his Realm of Hungary. This Ambaſſador, called Negroni, was received at the Court, and admitted to kiſs the Sultans Hand; but his Preſents were little eſteemed, for that they were of leſs value than thoſe which they had lately received from the Perſian. His demands to have the Province of Tranſilvania, were grounded upon an Article inſerted among thoſe of the Peace betwixt the Emperor and Botskay, at that time choſen Prince of Tranſilvania; that is to ſay, That Botskay dying without Iſſue Male, Tranſilvania ſhould remain at the Diſpoſition of his Imperial Majeſty. This Article being read by Negroni in the Turks Council, whither he had been admitted; the Muphti or Sovereign Prieſt of Mahomets Law, anſwered, That it was contrary to his Law; ſo the Demands of this Ambaſſador touching Tranſilvania were rejected, ſeeing that Botskay had no Power from the Sultan (ſaid the Grand Viſier) to treat with the Emperour, and to give him Tranſilvania after his Death. Negroni grounded this Gift of Botſcay (mentioned in the ſaid Article) upon the eighth Article of the Peace betwixt the Turk and the Emperour, concluded in the Iſle of Danow, by Amurath Viſier, and the Deputies of his Imperial Majeſty, in theſe words: That all which had been granted in the Treaty of Peace made at Vienna, to Botskay, ſhould be duely and faithfully obſerved. Naſſuf, the Grand Viſier, replied, Th[illegible] Amurath being then Viſier, might err in ſigning theſe Articles of the Peace upon the Danow; and at the ſame inſtant he ſhewed forth ſome other Articles whereas that was not inſerted; ſaying, That the Sultan would faithfully perform thoſe and no others, preſſing the Ambaſſador Negroni to ſign them; the which he refuſed to do; ſo as Naſſuf uſed ſome Threats to terrifie him; but Negroni replied, That he was in their Power, and that in this caſe he had rather loſe his Life, and die gloriouſly for the good of his Maſters Affairs, than to have it taken from him at his return to Vienna, with Shame and Infamy, having ſigned thoſe Articles. Finally, he promiſed to advertiſe his Imperial Majeſty, and to certifie them of his Pleaſure: which promiſe for this time ended the Contention.

The Emperor Matthias ſends an Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople.

The malice and falſhood of the Turks.

In the beginning of this year, Sultan Achmat, after the Reception of the Perſian Ambaſſador, and the ſtately entry he made into Conſtantinople, went to lie at Adrianople, where his Janizaries and Spahies began to mutiny, ſpurning at their Bread and Rice which was given them for their daily Entertainment: and being demanded the Reaſon of this their Inſolency, they anſwered, that no Emperor before him had ſo carried out his Men in the depth of Winter: which anſwer did much incenſe Naſſuf Baſſa. This Viſier was in ſuch Credit with the Grand Seignior, as during his abode at Adrianople he came three times in Perſon privately to viſit him, who grew ſo powerful over his Maſters Affections, as he obtained a priviledge, That it might not be lawful for any Man to ſpeak with the Grand Seignior privately, but himſelf. Being returned to Conſtantinople, there happened a great Fire, in which there were five hundred Houſes burnt. The Viſier Naſſuf coming to ſee it quenched, and finding ſome Janizaries more careful to break open Locks, and rifle Shops, than to do any good Service, he ſtruck out the Brains of one of them with his Mace, and brake the Arm of another.

It had been an ancient Cuſtom in Conſtantinople, that the owner of the Houſe with all his Family where the Fire began, ſhould be put to death for their Negligence: but it happening that the Emperours own Serail, in the time of Mahomet, Father to Achmat, being ſet on fire, Cicala Baſſa preſented a Petition unto him, that this Cuſtom might be aboliſhed, holding it unjuſt that other Men ſhould be put to death, and the ſame let paſs in the Emperours own Houſe: whereunto he yielded, holding it reaſonable. And ſoon after there happened another great Fire, at which the Viſier cauſed many of the Janizaries to be hanged: finding them too buſie in rifling Houſes: and he went up and down the Streets with his Scimitar in one Hand, and a Janizaries Head in the other, which he had cut off. The Grand Seignior ſent Holy Water unto the Viſier, wherein he had dipt a piece of Mahomets Garment, the which being poured into the Fire, the Turks ſaid it ceaſed preſently; yet by the Report of viſible Witneſſes, it burned four hours after. The Grand Viſier Naſſuf was a cruel Enemy to the Janizaries, of whom he ſent ſixteen thouſand away into Aſia, and would not ſuffer any more to be made, but only Spahies: and over ſuch Janizaries as remained he made his own Servants to be Chiubagies, and Agaes or Captains over fifties and hundreds; fortifying himſelf by all the means he could deviſe againſt the future time, to prevent his ſudden Ruine; but all this could not preſerve him from a ſhameful fall, as you ſhall hereafter hear.

In the mean time let us paſs unto Affrick, to obſerve the Troubles which fell in the Realms of Fez and Morocco; the Quarrels betwixt Prince Xerif Muley Cidan, and the Xerif Muley Achmet, Ben-Abdalla his Nephew, and the Victories of Cidan againſt Abdalla.

The beginning of the Xerifs of Fez and Morocco.

The Family of the Xerifs, Princes of Fez and Morocco, took its beginning ſome hundred and four years ſince, from Mahomet Xerif, born at Tigumedet in Dara, at this preſent one of the Provinces of Morocco: he was Alfaqui or Preacher of Mahomet's Law, who, ſeeing the Diviſions betwixt the Soverign Princes of thoſe Realms, and that the Portugals had ſeized of the chief Forts of Morocco, he began with three of his Sons, Abdalla, Hamet, and Mahomet, to lay the Foundation of a new Monarchy, ſupported by three Pillars: that is to ſay, by a counterfeit Piety and diſguiſed Religion; upon a godly Pretext to make War againſt the Portugals Chriſtians which were in Affrick, and upon a paſſionate deſire to retire the Mahometan Moors which were in their Pay, to the end they might by that means weaken them, and chaſe them with more eaſe out of the Territories of Morocco. The King, who at that time held the Scepter of Fez, (ſeeing nothing but the out-ſide of the Xerifs Deſigns) ſuffered his three Sons to diſplay their Standard againſt the Chriſtian Portugals in the Realm of Morocco: Innovations and Novelties are commonly pleaſing to the common People.

The Children of the Xerif grow potent.

At this beginning, theſe three Leaders were followed by a great number of Souldiers: they vanquiſhed in many Encounters; and the bruit of their new Victories flying into the Realm of Morocco, retired the Moors from the Portugals Service, whom they defeated ſoon after, with their Commander Lopes Bariga. True it is, that it was to their loſs; for Abdalla, the eldeſt of theſe three Brethren, loſt his Life in this Combate. But they ſeiſed upon the great Town of Taradente in the Province of Sus, and of the Provinces of Herra, Idevaca, Ubidevaca, Cus, Guzule, and in a manner of the whole Country betwixt Morocco and Mount Atlas, ſettling their Principality in Taradente, whereas the Xerif their Father carried the Name of the Governour of the Province of Sus.

They kill the King of Morocco.

The King of Morocco, fearing the Greatneſs of theſe new Conquerours, diſſembled the deſire he had to bring them under, aſſuring himſelf that Time would preſent him ſome good occaſion; ſo ſuffered them to enter into Morocco: but they prevented him; they took away his Life by Poyſon, and ſeiſed upon his Realm.

The King of Fez begins to fear them.

The King of Fez, who had by an indiſcreet Simplicity ſuffered them to take Arms, and by that means to open the way to a great Fortune, he ſaw a far off the Tempeſt of theſe unjuſt Spoilers to fall upon Morocco and other Places. The fear of the like Calamity did much afflict his Mind: but the Xerifs entertained this idle Prince with fair ſhews; they abuſed his Bounty, and with the fourth part of the rich Spoils which they had taken in ſo many Towns and Provinces, they lull his diſtruſt aſleep; moreover, they ſend him the Tribute due for the Realm of Morocco. Hamet takes upon him the Name of King of Morocco; Mahomet that of King of Sus, in the Town of Taradente; and by a good Intelligence betwixt them, they make themſelves fearful to all thoſe Countries; ſo as they have nothing more to fear, than the Threats and Vengeance of Heaven. They then began to contemn the King of Fez, and plainly to deny the Tribute of Morocco, pretending for their Reaſon, that they were iſſued from the Line of Mahomet.

The King of Fez beſiegeth Morocco, and is defeated.

This Contempt made the King of Fez to open his Eyes: he finds the Faults paſt, by the Intereſt of the preſent: he ſees the Xerifs had abuſed the Liberty which he had given them: whereupon, he went to Field with an Army of eighteen thouſand men, and planted his Siege before Morocco; but, as his Enemies Party was ſtronger than his, ſo he was chaſed away, and his Army defeated at the Paſſage of a River. Thus the Xerifs became peaceable Poſſeſſors of Morocco.

Quarrels betwixt the Xerifs, and the eldeſt taken by his Brother.

The Peace of the Country made theſe men idle, and Idleneſs drew the two Brethren into Quarrel: they muſtered up their Forces and came to fight; where, after two bloody Battels, Mahomet being Victor, he took his eldeſt Brother Hamet, deprived him of his Realm and Liberty, and made him end his days miſerably in Priſon. Thus God doth puniſh the unjuſt Spoiler of another mans Good. We ſhall ſee in their Poſterity the continuance of the ſame Quarrel.

The Xerifs aſſault the King of Fez.

Mahomet, ſettled Sovereign in Morocco by Blood and Fratricide, as monſtrous in Ambition as in Cruelty, he turned the ſame Arms wherewith he had beaten and vanquiſhed his Eldeſt Brother againſt the King of Fez, (whoſe Improvidence had ſuffered Mahomet and his Brethren to take Arms, under the deceitful Title and Pretence of making War againſt the Chriſtian Portugals) he aſſaulted him with great Forces, vanquiſhed him, took him Priſoner, and deprived him both of Realm and Life. Thus the Xerifs, in the Perſon of this Mahomet, became Sovereign Princes of Fez and Morocco. The Victory ſo happily gotten of ſo many Nations, made him fearful; but by his Cruelty he drew upon his Deſcendants the juſt Judgment of him who puniſheth the exceſs and enormity of Crimes unto the fourth Generation.

Cidan and Kequi, Brethren, expell one another.

His Poſterity was miſerable, the unjuſt deſire of Reign, (one ruining another) entertained the Brethren in perpetual Diſcord: for Cidan, now King of Fez and Morocco, was lately expelled by his Brother Kequi; but afterwards, Fortune changing her inconſtant Favour, Kequi was purſued by Cidan, defeated, and forced in the Year 1610 to ſave his Life in Algarbe in Portugal. Abdalla, the Son of Kequi, ſeeing his Fathers Affairs thus deſolate, retires himſelf towards the Mountains in the Province of Sus; where, finding opportunity to annoy his Uncle Cidan, he made daily Incurſions upon his Territories, with ſome Troops of Arabians, who had joyned with him, being two hundred Horſe and two hundred Foot. But finding this to be a long courſe to attain unto the Conqueſt of the Realm from whence he had been expelled, he bethought himſelf, that ſome certain counterfeit Fictions in Religion, had in former times brought in his Grand-father, and made him abſolute Lord of a great Country; wherefore he made uſe of a Prophecy, forged in his ambitious Spirit: and to work an Impreſſion in the Peoples Minds (eaſie to be moved with a Paſſion of Religion) he ſent certain religious Mahometans through the Country, with a ſhew of holy Simplicity, who went preaching from place to place, That one Falquere, a Man of holy Life, had given unto a Son of his a Drum of an admirable power and vertue, commanding him expreſly, to keep it carefully, untill that a Prince called Abdalla ſhould come into Morocco, being expelled by the Injuſtice of his own Blood; and that then he ſhould beat his Drum, and that the People at the ſound thereof might go to the War with all ſafety; that it ſhould be helpful to them, give Peace to the Realm, and ſettle all the Cuſtoms and ancient Laws to their common content. Thus they preached this Prophecy, the which they ſaid was now accompliſhed, ſeeing that this Prophetical Drum had been found, that Abdalla, the eldeſt Prince of the Houſe of the Xerifs, had cauſed it to be beaten, exhorting all men to follow the War for the common good of the Country.

A Prophecy invented by Kequi, and preached by religious Turks.

Theſe Vanities being preached by theſe ignorant and malicious religious Turks, increaſed the Number of Abdalla's Party: whereof Cydan being advertiſed, he ſent a great Army againſt him into the the Province of Sus, under the command of Alcas Elmye, to hinder the progreſs of his Deſigns: But Abdalla finding theſe Forces to approach, retired himſelf towards the Mountains, from whence he might charge the Enemies Army; the which he did ſo happily, as within few dayes he cut off five thouſand of his men. This ſucceſs did ſo advance his Affairs, as his Troops increaſed daily, ſo as Cydan was forced to go with new Forces to fight with him, the which was the cauſe of his ruin: for at this time he was inveſted, and notwithſtanding the good ſucceſs of his falſe Propheſies, lightly grounded upon the ſound of a Drum, he was defeated, and ſlain in this year one thouſand ſix hundred and twelve.

Abdalla defeated and ſlain notwithſtanding his falſe Propheſies.

The miraculous King of Mauritania.

Gotardus, diſcourſing of this miraculous King of Mauritania, whom he calls Muley Hamet, writeth, that he was charmed with deviliſh Incantations, and freed from all outward force, carrying himſelf for a Divine Prophet; That with one hundred and eighty Horſe, and two hundred Foot, he went to make Head againſt Cidan King of Morocco, having forty thouſand men; That his Souldiers, (who were ſo few in number) being ready to flye, he perſuaded them with a cunning ſpeech to prepare to fight; That comming near to Cidan's Camp, they might ſee a great Army of Enemies fighting againſt them, in which there were five thouſand of Cydan's Army overthrown, and the reſt in great diſorder put to flight, and yet Muley Hamet had not advanced with his Troops; That within a few dayes after, comming with his Troops tired to a River ſide, he commanded them not to drink, nor waſh in that River, which if they did they would die: but ſome neglecting his command, thinking to quench their thirſt, died ſuddenly. He took many places in thoſe mountainous Regions, which no man had formerly ſubdued; his Forces increaſing daily, having five and twenty thouſand men, and vowing to go againſt the Chriſtians, more came unto him; ſo as he went againſt Cidan with a good Army, who likewiſe attended him, Hamet perſuaded his Souldiers that no ſhot could hurt them; ſo as they aſſaulted Cydan's Camp with ſuch fury, as within leſs than an hours ſpace they had ſlain above ſix thouſand men, and put the reſt to flight. They write, that Hamet loſt not above four or five, and that ſuch as were ſtruck with any Bullet, ſhewed Marks but no Wounds; and that the great Ordnance either ſhot over them, or the Powder vented out at the Touch-hole, and wrought no effect. Cydan, having loſt his Brother in the Fight, fled with all his Treaſure, to recover new Forces, and in the mean time Hamet made himſelf Maſter of the whole Country. There were certain Hollanders admitted unto him, whom they found ſitting upon a Carpet made of the Bark of Trees, having a white Shirt, and a long Garment upon it, a red Cap on his Head, bare Thighs and red Shooes, a Bag about his Neck, and in it he hid his Alcoran, a ſhort crooked Sword and a Dagger hanging by him. Being ſaluted by the Hollanders, he willed them to ſit down by him, telling them that he was ſent from Heaven, to purge the World from evil, and to prepare the Law of God; to expel Cydan out of his Kingdom, and to reſtore Peace unto the World: wherefore he adviſed them not to have any commerce with Cydan, nor to aſſiſt him in any ſort. They obſerved many marks upon his body; he had one blue Tooth, all the reſt being white. Hair upon either Shoulder, a red Circle in the Palm of his right-hand, and the proportion of a Spur upon his right foot. Having gotten ſome Victories againſt Cydan, and taken the Town of Morocco, in the end his deviliſh Art failing him, he was ſlain, as you have heard. Such were the Affairs of Africk, in the Realms of Fez and Morocco.

Cydan, King of Fez, overthrown.

A great Drought and Sterility at Algier.

But in Algier a wonderful drought had cauſed cruel Combuſtions; it had ſo devoured the fruits of the Earth before their Maturity, as there followed a wonderful Famine throughout the whole Land. The Turks attributed the cauſe of their Miſery ſometimes to their Sins; then to the coming of the Moors, who had been expelled out of Spain, as a pernicious Vermin; and ſometimes to the licentiouſneſs of Chriſtians, which lived in thoſe Places. Wherefore in the beginning of May this Year, the Judge of the Town ordained, That all the Turks ſhould make their devout Prayers to Mahomet their Prophet, to obtain Rain, ſo neceſſary in that Country; that the Moors ſhould depart the Town within three days upon pain of death; and that all the Chriſtians, as well free as bond ſlaves, ſhould cauſe their Heads and their Beards to be ſhaven: this was ſpeedily executed; for the Turks Decrees require a prompt Obedience. But the miſerable Moors, which could not get out of Algier within their three days prefixed, detained either by Sickneſs, or ſome other Impediment, were all cut in pieces. For thirteen days, there was nothing ſeen within the Town but Proceſſions of Turks without Turbants, crying and howling, after their manner, to obtain Rain from their falſe Prophet: but he which commands Soveretgnty over times, from whoſe hand proceeds fair Weather and Rain, and which makes the Earth fruitful, held the Pipes of Heaven yet ſtopped, to open them at more religious and holy Vows than the ſuperſtitious Clamours of theſe Infidels. For Bernard Murroy, of the Order of the Redemption of Captives, hearing that the Turks meant to revenge their Miſeries upon them, and to ruine a little Chappel which the Chriſtian Slaves had in the Priſon, for the pious Exerciſes of their Religion, obtained (by the means of Bius, Conſul of the French in Algier) permiſſion from the Dovan, or Turkiſh Judge, to make Proceſſions, and to pray unto God to ſend them the dew of Heaven, which was ſo neceſſary for them. All the Chriſtian Slaves which were Priſoners continued their Devotions for the ſpace of five days: but on the fourth day, being the Eighth of May, there fell ſuch abundance of Rain upon Algier, as theſe poor Chriſtians, ſeeing their Prayers heard in the midſt of the Enemies of their Faith, gave infinite Thanks unto God for his great Mercy and Grace.

Proceſſions of the Turks.

The devout Prayers of the Chriſtians obtain rain.

Theſe miſerable Chriſtian Slaves were ſtill detained in Irons and cruel Servitude, by this Accident. This Murroy, of the Order of the Redemption of Captives, accompanied with two others of the ſame Order, had redeemed to the number of one hundred thirty and ſix: but when he was ready to embarque them, their evil Fortune would have it, that the Gallies of Genoa running along that Coaſt, landed ſome men near unto Algier, where they took the Baſſa's Son of that Town, with many other Turks, and amongſt this number a Virgin of Algier, of a very noble Family, and of as rare a Beauty, for the miſery of theſe Slaves: for that when as the Baſſa's Son and the others were redeemed by a Frigot which the Father had ſent, the fair Algerian Virgin was ſtill detained by a Captain of the Genowayes, who had retired to Calvy, an Iſland adjoyning, there to ſatiſfie his Deſires with more eaſe, upon the frail and fading perfection of this fair Slave, which had deprived him of his Liberty. In the mean time the Baſſa of Algier, ſeeing his Son returned with the other Turks, and not the Algerian Virgin, commanded that the hundred thirty and ſix

Slaves ſhould be put again into Irons, with the three religious men which had redeemed them. Thus this feminine Beauty, or rather, the Paſſion of this Genoways, who holds the Poſſeſſion ſo dear, makes a great number of Chriſtian Souls to ſuffer by inſupportable Servitude, howſoever they of his Nation (flattering his diſordered luſt) ſay, that his Deſire to win her to God, and to make her a Chriſtian, cauſed him to keep her ſo carefully.

A Capuchen of Florence in captivity at Tunes.

Theſe ſuffered in Algier the loſs of their Liberty; but a Capuchen Friar, a Florentine by Nation, endured at Tunes the loſs of his Life, by the Cruelty of the Moors chaſed out of Spain, and retired into thoſe Countries. This religious Man, being a Slave among the Turks, attended daily from Florence, or from ſome other place, money to redeem his Liberty: but it happened, one day diſputing in a Barbers Houſe with a Moriſque concerning Chriſtian Religion, the Zeal of his Faith tranſported him ſo far, as to ſay among divers Turks, That his Religion was better than that of Mahomet's. Theſe Words, took criminouſly in that place, were reported by the Moriſques to the Cadi, or Judge of the Town, whom they preſt with ſuch horrible Clamours and Cries, as he pronounced Sentence of Death againſt this Capuchen. He was delivered unto them, and they ſtripped him naked, leading him with Infamy through Tunes, ſome ſpitting in his Face, others caſting Dirt at him, and ſo they led him out of the Town, where they tied him unto a Poſt; and they, being cruelly incenſed by a Speech which a Morrabout or religious Turk ſaid unto them, That he among them that gave him not one Blow with a Stone, ſhould be no good Turk, ſtoned him to death, where afterwards they burnt his Body, and threw the Aſhes into the Wind.

He dies gloriouſly for the faith.

An enterprize of four ſlaves.

The Martyrdom of this Capuchen was followed by the conſtant Confeſſion (amidſt the violence of Torments) of a penitent Renegado, a Florentine by Nation, and Captain of the chief Gally of Chio: Four French-men being Slaves in the Iſland of Chio, in the Patron or chief Gally, belonging to the Bey or Governour of the Iſland, they reſolved to recover their Liberty with the hazard of their Lives, to return into France, and carry into ſome Port of Chriſtendome that Gally, being the beſt appointed. in the whole Haven. They drew unto their Party the Captain which commanded, being a Florentine Renegado. Their Enterpriſe ſhould have been executed when as they ſhould go to Land to cut Wood. But whether that the Scribe were treacherous to his Companions, or tranſported with ſome raſh Indiſcretion, being on Land, he ſpake theſe Words aloud, the which overthrew both the deſign, and them that projected it; Ho, we ſhall return into Chriſtendom. A Turk which was near, taking hold of theſe words, reported them unto the Patron; who preſently laid hold upon the Scribe, and drew from him the confeſſion of all the Enterpriſe. He preſently ſends an hundred Men towards the Gally, to ſeiſe upon the four French Slaves and the Captain. But theſe five made ſuch a generous reſiſtance, as if the other Slaves, who were for the moſt part Moldavians, or of the Provinces which border upon the black Sea, had had the Courage to fight for their Liberty, without doubt the French mens Enterpriſe had ſucceeded happily. But what could five Men do againſt an hundred? yet they ſlew fifteen, and wounded many: the four French-men were all ſlain, and the Florentine Captain was taken alive, and reſerved to the rigour of a cruel Death. For they continued him ſix hours together in moſt violent Torments, he ſtill calling upon the holy and ſacred name. of Jeſus Chriſt, even to the laſt gaſp, and deteſting the Errours and falſhood of the Law of Mahomet. This happened in October this Year.

They are diſcover'd.

They defend themſelves, and kill many.

The Captain cruelly executed.

The United Eſtates ſend an Ambaſſadour to Conſtantinople.

A little before, the Eſtates of the united Provinces, and Count Maurice, ſeeing the loſſes which the Ships of Holland ſuffered in the Mediterranean Sea, many of them being taken by the Turkiſh Gallies, and a great number of their men made ſlaves; to the end they might be freed from that danger, and have a ſafe Paſſage for their Ships, and procure liberty for their Captives, they reſolved to make a League with the Turk. Wherefore they ſent Cornelius Hage to Conſtantinople; who, not only willingly accepted of that Embaſſy, but performed it with ſuch diſcretion, as he purchaſed great credit and commendation to himſelf, and much profit to the Provinces. He had reſolved at firſt to paſs through Hungary; but he found ſo many croſſes and obſtacles, by ſome that were Creatures to the Pope and Spaniard, as he was forced to turn out of the way, and fetch a great Circuit. Firſt of all, he fell into the hands of the Arch-duke Ferdinand, who cauſed him to be examined, and admoniſhed to deſiſt from his purpoſe: After which he was toſt at Sea, and in the end, having ſurmounted all dangers, he recovered Conſtantinople the firſt of May. He had expreſs charge from the United Eſtates to labour for three things. The firſt was, to treat of the deliverance of the Hollanders that were Slaves. The ſecond, to make a League with the Turk. And the third, to obtain from him a free Navigation for the Hollanders throughout all the Seas and Ports of his Empire.

Preſents ſent from the United Eſtates to the Turk.

This Ambaſſador was brought to kiſs the Sultan's hands, and was favourably received; he preſented unto his Majeſty, in the name of the Eſtates of the United Provinces, his Letters of Embaſſy, with the Preſents which follow: Three Birds of Paradice, of rare and precious Plumes, wonderful goodly to behold, and valued at eight hundred pound ſterling; two Veſſels of Chriſtal, wonderful rich and beautiful; four other Veſſels made of Fiſhes Bones, whereas the art ſeemed miraculous in the graving; forty pieces of Cloth of Gold of divers colours; five pieces of Silk, five of Damask, five of Silk watered, and five plain; a Staff of an Elephants Tooth graven with admirable induſtry; a Parrat ſhut in a Cage of Chriſtal, ſo artificially done, as no man could diſcern the entry; and many fair and rich Table-cloths of Holland Cloth, moſt part powdred with flowers to the Life, and wrought in their lively colours. The which the Sultan did accept with admiration. All theſe things ſhew ſufficiently, That the Eſtates from the beginning, or ſoon after, have raiſed Handy-works as well as Traffick and Navigation to the higheſt point of Perfection.

A League betwixt the Turk and the Hollanders.

The ſixth of July following, the League was ſworn betwixt the Othoman Emperour and the United Provinces of the Low-Countries, by the which Achmat promiſed to cauſe to be ſet at liberty all the Hollanders that were detained ſlaves within his Empire: That the Traffick ſhould be free for the Hollanders Ships throughout all his Seas and Havens; and moreover he granted, That the Eſtates ſhould have an Ambaſſador reſiding at his Port. This alliance with the Turk, for the which they have ſo often, and with little reaſon blamed the French, hath been affected and ſought by the Engliſh and Spaniards, as we have ſaid elſewhere; and now by the Hollanders, whoſe Eſtates proceed in all their Affairs with ſuch weight and meaſure, as it ſeems they do nothing but with great Reaſon, and to good purpoſe.

The Moriſques chaſe the Jews out of Pera.

About the end of this Year, the Jews, whoſe long Slavery throughout the World reproacheth their wretched and miſerable Obſtinacy, received at Pera, near Conſtantinople, the weight of a furious Tempeſt which fell upon them, ſtirred up againſt them by the malice of the Moriſques Granadines chaſed out of Spain, and retired into the Levant. Theſe, having by Preſents won the favour of the Cadi, or Judge of the Place, who was a Negro, newly ſettled in that Charge by the Grand Viſier Naſſuf; they obtained Power from him to thruſt all the Jews out of Pera, and to ruine their Synagogues. This Power they executed with all violence: And yet theſe miſerable Jews durſt not make their Complaints unto the Magiſtrate, except one of their Sect which dwelt in the Iſle of Chio; who, being then at Conſtantinople, and ſuppoſing he had more credit than the reſt, went to complain to this Cadi Negro, who preſently cauſed to be given unto him five hundred Blows with a Cudgel, inſtead of doing him Juſtice; ſo dangerous a thing it is to have to do with ſuch unjuſt Magiſtrates.

The Practices of the Moriſques againſt the Chriſtians of Pera.

The Inſolencies of the Moriſques tranſported them farther; for after they had expelled the Jews out of their Dwellings, they threatned to do unto the Chriſtians at Pera as much as had been done unto them in Spain; and they bragged, That they would ſeiſe upon their Churches, and eſpecially on that of the Franciſcan Friars, the which was reaſonable fair for the Place. But the French Ambaſſador, having made his Complaint to the chief Viſier, he prohibited them to make any attempt againſt the Chriſtians, upon pain of rigorous Puniſhment. This Prohibition ſtayed their fury; but th[illegible] did not forbear in all other occaſions to ſhew the cruel Hatred they owe unto Chriſtians: ſo as through all the Levant, in all Encounters where they came, they did a thouſand times more miſchief than the Turks themſelves.

The Turks Army for Tranſilvania.

At the ſame time the Sultan Achmat had drawn together a mighty Army to go into Tranſilvania; he cauſed it to camp in Tents near unto Conſtantinople, about his Palace, called Darut Baſſa, whither the People of Conſtantinople went to walk, and to ſee his Forces; within few days after, he went to Adrianople, meaning from thence to proceed in his Voyage, carrying with him all the chief Men of his Port, except the Baſſa of the Sea, or Admiral, who remained at Conſtantinople, to have a care of the City. And, for the greater ſafety thereof, this Baſſa cauſed an Edict to be publiſhed, That no man ſhould go out of his Houſe, nor keep any Light in it after the ordinary Cry, which is made an hour within night, when as the Taliſmans crying from the tops of their Moſques, invite the People to make the Sala, or Prayer. After the Publication of this Ordinance, he ſent certain Chaoux to intreat all the Ambaſſadors reſiding at the Port, not to ſuffer their People to go out by night, to the end that their liberty might not ſerve as a dangerous Example to others. But notwithſtanding all the Baſſa's Entreaties and Prohibitions, three Engliſh-men of the Ambaſſador's Train went out by night into the Street, where they were met by the Provoſt of Pera, who took them, and preſently (without reſpect of the quality) cauſed either of them to have an hundred and fifty blows with a Cudgel, and then committed them to Priſon, the doors whereof are never opened but with a ſilver Key: ſo ſtrictly do they obſerve in Turkey the orders of the Princes Lieutenants, without exception of Perſons.

A Queſtion for the Patriarchſhip of Conſtantinople.

About the end of the Year, the Patriarch of Conſtantinople (by reaſon of divers Complaints made againſt him, was deprived by the Grand Viſier, and one Cyrillus, Patriarch of Alexandria, (a learned and religious Biſhop) was (much againſt his Will) preferred to the place. The former Patriarch hereupon excommunicated all ſuch as had wrought his Overthrow, but he himſelf was baniſhed into the Iſle of Rhodes. In his Paſſage, the Bark wherein he went was caſt upon Mytilene, in which Place he renounced all Right and Claim to the Patriarchſhip before the Biſhop of that Place, and reſigned it to the Biſhop of Patras: whereupon the Biſhop came from Patras to Conſtantinople, and laboured with the Viſier Naſſuf for the place; who, upon promiſe to pay him fifteen thouſand Chequines (which is ten thouſand more than they were wont to pay) made him a Grant thereof: which Cyrillus, the late elected Patriarch, underſtanding, he came with all the Grecians to expoſtulate the Buſineſs with the Grand Viſier; who anſwered, That he was to do what he could for the Emperour's Profit, and nothing againſt it; wherefore, if they would give ſo much as the other had promiſed, Cyrillus ſhould continue in the Place: which the People were very willing to perform, but Cyrillus refuſed it; and ſo the other was made Patriarch; who preſently ſent for the old Patriarch to come from Rhodes to make Peace with him, for that they held not his Excommunication juſt, being not deprived by a Council, but only by the King. About the ſame time, Naſſuf the Grand Viſier, ſent for the four Ambaſſadors, of England, France, Venice, and the States of the Low-Countries; and the reaſon why he ſent for them, was, to raiſe their Cuſtom One in the Hundred more than the Merchants had formerly paid.

The Enterpriſe of the Great Duke of Tuſcany upon Agliman

Whilſt that the Sultan Achmat's Army drew near to Tranſilvania, and fortified the Places which he held in thoſe Countries, Coſmo de Medicis, Great Duke of Tuſcany, bent his generous Deſigns againſt the Fort of Agliman in Caramania, in old time called Cilicia, a Province, which in the Writings of Antients, hath been honoured with two famous Cities, that is to ſay, Tharſis, the Country of St. Paul, and Seleucia, the Fort and Port whereof is called Agliman, a Haven which in old time hath contained within its boſome the fearful Forces of the Pyrates of thoſe days; from thence, in former times, hath come forth a powerful Army of Pyrates with a thouſand Sail, ſo proudly rigged, as many of them had their Sails of Purple, the Tackling of Gold Thread, and the Oars garniſhed with Silver, marks of the Spoils of above four hundred Cities ruined by thoſe Pyrates, who ſtruck a terror even to the Romans, and forced them, to avoid their Fury, to ſet to Sea that great Fleet whereof Pompey the Great was General.

The number of the Dukes Gallies, and the Commanders.

The Trophy, erected upon the Walls of Agliman, of the Heads of forty Florentines, loſt in a Ship called the Proſper, by the ignorance of the Captain which commanded in it, made the Great Duke to ſtudy to have his Revenge for this Affront; and his deſire to abate the Pride of the common Enemy, elevated his Mind to generous Enterpriſes. In the end of March, this preſent Year 1613, he armed ſix Gallies, under the Command of the Admiral Inghirami, the which he manned with ſix Companies of Foot, commanded by Julio de Conty, called Montano, General at Land, beſides forty Knights of the Order of S. Stephen, and a good number of Gentlemen Adventurers, among the which was Don Petro de Medicis. This Fleet parted from Ligorne, and came to Civita Vecchia. In the beginning of April they took in many Noblemen and Gentlemen of France, which attended them, and would be Partakers in the Enterpriſe; the which were, the Earl of Candale, eldeſt Son to the Duke of Eſpernon, Cipierre, Themines, De Vic, Monterrault, De la Tour, and his Brother Boiſſiere, Villandre, Vernegue, Du pleſſis, De la

The Chriſtians land at Agliman.

Motte magnus, Avenes, Del Tour, Sainct Cyre, Monplaiſir, and Loyres. About mid April the Gallies landed in the night near unto a little Town in Aſia the Leſs, called Jeronda, held for that Geronda of the Antients: but their Deſcent was fruitleſs, they found it deſart by the flight of the Inhabitants, who had prevented all Surpriſes. They returned again to their Gallies, and ſailing towards the Eaſt, they encountred three Veſſels like unto their Caramouſals, the which they ſet upon and took; and about the Fifteenth of May, having ſcoured the Levant Seas, they reſolved to attempt Agliman. Upon the way they took a Veſſel called Grippe, which inſtructed them of the Eſtate of the Fortreſs. They underſtood there were two Gallies of Cyprus in the Port, that the Place was well furniſhed with all things neceſſary, and guarded without by a good number of Horſe-men, and that within few days after, one of the ſaid Gallies ſhould come out of the Port of Agliman, and go to the Iſland of Pappadula, to fetch a new Maſt. Inghirami thought to prevent it, carrying his whole Fleet thither, the which he laid cloſe in the Iſland to ſurpriſe the Turkiſh Galley; but it having diſcovered his Fleet, put out to Sea, and with ſpeed returned to the Port of Agliman; to give the alarm unto the Country. Notwithſtanding the Chriſtians reſolved to aſſault it, they went with their Fleet to the Port Cavalier, twelve miles from Agliman, from whence they ſent a Long-boat to diſcover; the which brings them word, that the whole Country was in Arms. Theſe News might well have daunted the Courages of ſome that had been leſs generous; yet they paſs on, and about three of the Clock in the Morning they came near the Shore, being covered with the ſilence of the Night, ſo as before ſix of the Clock they had made their Landing about a mile and a half from the Port. The Seignior of Montano, and the Earl of Candale, with ſome few choice men, landed firſt, to diſcover: a mile from the ſhore they encountered the Turkiſh Horſe-men, yet notwithſtanding Montano commanded they ſhould finiſh their landing, leaving twenty men for the Guard of every Gally.

The Deſcription of Agliman.

The Fortifications of the place.

The Order given to aſſault the Fort.

This Fort of Agliman is ſeated upon a little pleaſant Hill, which looks towards the South. It extends from the Hill unto the Sea-ſhore: the form is oval: that part which is next to the Sea is altogether Meridional, and the other, which riſeth upon the top of the Hill, looks towards the North. The Walls are built of good Stone and Lime, the which are five Fathom high, and one broad. Within there was a Wall drawn from the Eaſt to the Weſt, which divides it into two unequal parts, the which they enter by a Port ſet in the midſt. The Circuit of the Wall is fortified with eight Towers, whereof five be whole, and three are but half Towers; thoſe which be whole are of a ſquare form, and have five fathom in breadth on either ſide; the half Towers have the ſame greatneſs on the one ſide, and half as much on the other: their height exceeds not the Wall, unleſs it be that which is built on the top of the Hill, which is raiſed about eight foot above the Wall. Within the place were above three hundred fighting men, with ſtore of Victuals, Munitions for War, and many pieces of Ordnance; without, there were an hundred Horſe ſcouring up and down for the Guard of the Place; and within the Port there were two Gallies, a Caramouſal, and a Greek Brigandine, with ſome hundred and fifty fighting men. The Order of the Combate was divided after this manner, by the Seignior Montano, General at Land. For the principal Port, and that of the Retreat, he ſent two Companies of Foot, which were thoſe of the Admiral's Gally, of the Captains Gally, and of S. Stephen, with the Petards, all under the charge of the Earl of Candale, who leading this forward, diſcovered a Corps de gard of Turks, Horſe and Foot together; whereof he preſently advertiſed the General, ſending him word, That he would march on towards the Fort, and if the Turks came to charge him, he would cut them all in pieces. Many adviſed him to return to the Gallies: but Montano allowed the Reſolution of the Earl of Candale, who paſt on without Charge untill he came within one hundred and twenty Paces of the Wall, where he was charged before by the Muſket-ſhot of the Fort, behind by the Gallies, and in flank by them of the Mountain, with ſuch horrible howling and crying out, as the Marriners which carried the Petards being wonderfully amazed and terrified, let them fall to the Ground, and fled away. The Baron of Mont Terault, and Tiel, a Souldier of Langueza, took them up. They continued their way untill they came within fifteen Paces of the Walls, whenas twenty Turks ſallied forth, with a ſhew to make Head againſt the Earl of Candale's Troops: but ſeeing themſelves too weak, they fled preſently again back to the Town. The Earl advanced to enter with them, but the Port was ſo ſoon ſhut as they were in; wherefore they muſt of force ſet the Petard to work. But whilſt they were making it faſt unto the Gate, there fell a ſhower of great Stones upon the Troop, wherewith Don Pedro de Medicis (who would needs be preſent) was overthrown and half ſlain; Callonge, Mont-terault, La Tour, Davanes, and Deltour, had taken upon them the Charge of the Petard, every one carrying a part, to put it ſpeedily in Execution.

The Turks come from their Gallies to charge the Chriſtians.

Whilſt they were thus buſied to force [illegible]e Port, the Serjeant-Major came unto the Earl of Candale, and told him, that there was a Troop of three hundred Muſqueteers come to charge him: theſe were two Beys which came out of the Gallies with their Troops, by reaſon of the bad Guard which the two Companies that Montano had left to hinder their Landing, had kept. The Earl of Candale had left part of his Troop with the Petard, and turned Head with the reſt againſt theſe Beys, to charge them; but they had no meaning to fight, but only to make a ſhew; and ſeeing they ſhould be forced, if they ſtaid longer, they took their way towards the Mountain, and in their Retreat made many ſhot. The Chriſtians purſued them not, holding it fitter to return to the Petard, the which played ſo happily, as it made a Breach capable for three men to enter in front.

The Turks retire to their Towers and Walls.

The Squadron of the Knights of S. Stephen, commanded by the Commiſſary Lenzoni, and the Company of the Gallies of S. Mary Magdalen, with two Ladders were to aſſault the High Tower. The Company of the Admiral-Gally, with one Ladder, had Charge to force the Port of the Retreat; and the Company of the Gally of S. Jean was to fight with the Gallies and Veſſels in the Haven: all theſe Troops (being led by the General Montano, and by Captain Alexander of Tarentum, Serjeant-Major) marched in order towards the Fort. But the Petard, having effected, as we have ſaid, the Earl of Candale entered firſt with all his Troop, and ſuddenly ran unto the Port of the Retreat, there to apply a Petard, the which alſo very fortunately made a Breach. The Turks, amazed at the noiſe and forcing of their Gates, fled unto their Walls; ſome retiring into their Towers, and others into the Barricadoes which they had made in the Street. At the ſame inſtant they planted two Ladders on the lower part of the Town ſomewhat near adjoyning to the Sea, whereof one was broken, with the loſs of them that were upon it; by the other (notwithſtanding that the Turks Horſemen charged them behind) a good number of Chriſtians got up to the Walls, making their way by their Arms, whilſt that the reſt put the Turks to rout; having taken their Cornet, they forced the reſt for to flie unto the Mountains. The ſquadron of Knights, with the Company of the Gally of Saint Mary, having had a longer way to march, came not to the Tower upon the Hill, until that after the Petards had wrought their Effects; ſo as the Turks being retired thither, they found very great reſiſtance, beſides the attempts of the Enemies Horſe which charged them behind; thrice they planted their Ladders againſt the Wall, and could not make them hold. Wherefore the Commiſſary Lanzoni, having performed as much as a brave and reſolute Man could do in that Extremity, reſolved to leave that Place, and go unto ſome other where he might be more neceſſary; but being the laſt to make the retreat, he was ſhot through with two Muſquet Bullets, and ſuddenly ſlain. The Company of the Gally of Saint John vanquiſhed the two Gallies in the Port, whereof Inghirami the Admiral at Sea went to take poſſeſſion as ſoon as they had given him a ſign, having the other two Veſſels at Liberty.

The Commiſſary of the Knights of St. Stephen ſlain.

A bloody Combat within the Fort.

Within the Fort, in the Towers, and at the Barricadoes, the Combat was hot and dangerous, the Turks had deſpair and the advantage of the place on their ſides, The Chriſtians, thruſt on by their Valour and conſtant Reſolution, preſt them on all ſides; there was nothing to be ſeen but Blood, wounded or dead men; but much more of the Turks ſide than of the Chriſtians. In the end, after a Combat of four hours, the Turks fainted, ſome were taken, many were ſlain, and the Chriſtians obtained an abſolute Victory; but as it could not be made without loſs of their Enemies, who made great reſiſtance; ſo there were five and fifty Chriſtians wounded, of which number De Vic, a French Gentleman was one, who had a Muſquet ſhot through his Thigh, going to charge a Troop of Turks which were retired into a Tower; and ſome Gentlemen were ſlain; among the which was young Boiſſierre, a French Man, whoſe Valour in this Action made them that ſaw him fight ſo generouſly, conceive a certain hope, that he would have proved a valiant Captain, if Heaven had lent him longer Life. The ſorrow for his Death was general, as well among the Italian Troops, as among thoſe of his own Nation. Vernegue and Villandre, two other brave French Gentlemen were alſo ſlain. The dead and the wounded were carried unto their Gallies; they emptied the Fort of all the Artillery, Munition for War, and Victuals; the Trophy of forty Florentines Heads was beaten down, and all the Houſes ſet on fire. Agliman being thus ruined, they ſhipped their Booty, with three hundred and fifty Turkiſh Slaves, having freed about two hundred and forty Chriſtians which were in Irons. The two Turkiſh Gallies were drawn out of the Port, and carried away with eight other Veſſels. In this Triumph, as the Admiral Inghirami bent his Courſe towards Ligorn, upon the way a Turkiſh Caramouſal came into the midſt of the Fleet, as into a Toil; it prepared to defend it ſelf, the Patrons Gally inveſted it, but not without loſs; for the Turks made ſo great reſiſtance, as there were above fourſcore Chriſtians hurt or ſlain; the Earl of Candale fighting alone at the Prow of the Gallie, by the Permiſſion of the General. But this Caramouſal being taken, and the Florentine Mariners entered, it ſplit and ſunk ſuddenly. The great Dukes Gallies encountered ſome other ſmaller Veſſels, the which they took, and afterwards arrived happily at their Port.

The Chriſtians get the Victory.

The Voyage of the Gallies of Sicily in the Levant.

The twelfth of Auguſt following, Octavio of Arragon, General of the Gallies of Sicily, by the Commandment of the Duke of Oſſunna, Viceroy in that Realm, parted from the Haven of Palermo, with eight Gallies well armed and manned, to ſail into the Levant. His firſt touch was upon the Iſland of Cerigo, where he underſtood that the Admiral Baſſa of the Sea was gon from Conſtantinople with thirty Gallies, bending his Courſe to the Iſland of Negropont, whereas ſixty others attended him in the Haven; and moreover, that the Gallies of Rhodes prepared to go and joyn with him, all which Naval Fleet was to fall upon Soria, againſt the Turks Rebels.

They ſet upon the Turkiſh Gallies.

Notwithſtanding theſe News, Octavio continues his Courſe unto the Iſland of Nicaria, where he underſtood by a Greek Veſſel, that the Turkiſh Admiral meant to ſend twelve Gallies to Rhodes, to guard certain Veſſels of the Fleet, which came from Alexandria by the Channel of Samos. True it is, that of twelve which were together when they parted, two were ſent by the Bey, or Captain which commanded them, into the Iſland of Chio, ſo as there remained but ten together. Octavio reſolved to charge theſe ten, cauſing his Fleet to row that Day, and almoſt a whole Night as ſecretly as they could, along the Shore of the firm Land of Natolia, and at the break of day he arrived at the Cape of Corvo, twenty Miles from Chio; from whence he ſent his long Boat to diſcover. But in the mean time he himſelf eſpied the ten Turkiſh Gallies not far from him; at ſight whereof he ordered his Gallies for Battel, with ſuch Diligence, as at Sun riſing he was about the Enemies Gallies, and had inveſted them. At his firſt approch he diſcharged all his Ordnance, and then with his Admiral-Gallie he joyned with the Turks Gallie which carried the Standard; the Spaniards entered, ſlew and maſſacred all that made reſiſtance; the Combat began at the Prow, from whence they went to the Poop, whereas the Bey, or Commander of the ten Gallies ſtood, whom they forced to yield. In the mean time the other Gallies of Sicily charged the Turks ſo furiouſly, as they took five, all great Veſſels carrying Lanthorns; two fled towards the Land, hoping to ſave themſelves, but the Turks had ſcarce lieſure to leap to Land, and to flie into the Country, abandoning their Veſſels to the Spaniards, who purſued them; the other three Gallies having gotten ſome advantage eſcaped by flight; ſo ſeven only came into the Spaniards Power, in the which they had a very rich Booty, freeing above a thouſand Chriſtian Slaves, which were at the Chain, and by a ſtrange change of Fortune, putting into their Places the Turks which had inchained them. Among the moſt remarkable of the Priſoners, were the Commanders of the ten Gallies, called Sinan, Bey of Grigna, in the Iſland of Cyprus; the Bey of Alexandria, (Son to Pial Baſſa, who was defeated in the Battel of Lepanto, by Don John of Auſtria) and ſome Beyes or Captains, and Patrons of Gallies.

Sigiſmund Battori, Prince of Tranſilvania dies at Prague.

This Summer, the Emperour Matthias being gon to an Aſſembly of the States at Presburg in Hungary, in the mean time Sigiſmund Battori, who had been Prince of Tranſilvania, and ſo great a Terror and Scourge unto the Turks, as he made Sinan Baſſa, having an Army of one hundred and fifty thouſand Men, to flie thrice within ten days from before him, and would never endure the ſight of him, he having but forty thouſand Men in his Army. But afterwards, being the Author of his own Misfortunes and Miſeries, by his inconſtant Humors, he came and lived a private Life at Prague; and there died of an Apoplexy. At the Eſtates of Presburg they conſulted of the fortifying of their Frontier Towns, and manning them with good Garriſons, knowing the Infidelity of the Turks, and doubting they would not obſerve the Truce. But there was ſome queſtion in the Aſſembly, touching the Admiſſions of Germans into their Garriſons; for that the Hungarians maintained they had a decree to the contrary; and yet they could not defend themſelves without the aſſiſtance of Germans; but in the end it was concluded, That the Germans ſhould be admitted equally with the Hungarians into their Garriſons, but all other ſtrange Souldiers ſhould be excluded. The Turks in the mean time had burnt and ſpoiled many Villages in Hungary and Tranſilvania, carried away many Chriſtians captive, and committed many other Acts of Hoſtility, ſo as all Men feared a new War in Hungary, but by the Providence of God it was diverted. For Sultan Achmat, marching toward Tranſilvania with a mighty Army, hearing upon the way that Bethlem Gabor was acknowledged Prince, under his Protection, he turned head toward Conſtantinople. But rather for the Affairs of Aſia, whereas the Rebels of Natolia had ſpoiled and burnt many Places; and a certain Arabian had revolted againſt him, and uſurped the Title of King, having drawn unto his party fifty thouſand Rebels, the which did over-run and ſpoil the Country which yielded Obedience unto him, threatning his Dominions with a greater Ruine. Moreover, the Portugals and Spaniards had made many Incurſions upon his Places joyning to the Red-Sea, and had taken and ſpoiled Aden, a Place of importance; ſo as all theſe Diſorders haſtened his return into Thrace, to ſend Forces againſt his Turkiſh Rebels, and his Spaniſh Enemies. But approaching near unto the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, the Plague was ſo violent, as he ſtayed at Adrianople until the end of this year, when as that horrible Contagion ceaſed. He then came unto the City, whereas he made a very ſtately entry; before him there marched his ordinary Guard of five and twenty or thirty thouſand Janizaries, all the Baſſaes of the Court followed him in very great Pomp, and before him there marched on Horſeback two of his Sons, the Pillars and hope of his Affairs, the eldeſt being about ſeven or eight years old. Paſſing before the Moſques, the Taliſmans or Prieſts of his Law, made Sacrifices in his Preſence for his Proſperity, they ſlew Sheep and Oxen upon Altars erected for that purpoſe, then they cut them in pieces, and gave them unto the People.

The Turks threaten War in Hungary.

A great Plague at Conſtantinople.

The Grand Seignior being returned to Conſtantinople after the great Plague, notwithſtanding the Turks hold a firm Opinion of Predeſtination, and that they ſhall not die before their appointed time, and that the time of their Death is written in their Fore-heads; yet, apprehending the Infection, by the Advice of ſome about him, he commanded all the Dogs in the City of Conſtantinople to be tranſported unto Scutary in Aſia (a Town antiently called Chriſopolis) and for the due Execution thereof, every Houſholder was to bring his Dog firſt to the Cadi (which is the Judge of the Place) and to receive from him a Tuſcary or Ticket for his Paſſage, or elſe he was to pay four Chequines; by which means there were tranſported to the number of fifty thouſand Dogs. The reaſon of his ſending them away, was, for that reading the Acts of his Father, he found, that thirty years before, he had ſent away all the Dogs for fear of the Infection. The Sultan commanded allowance of Bread and Fleſh to be carried every day to ſuſtain them, which not ſufficing, the Inhabitants were much oppreſſed, and ready to fall into Mutiny; but by the Advice of his Muphti, they were at length tranſported from thence to an Iſland that was not inhabited, ſome ſixteen miles from Conſtantinople, where they all periſhed. Before their ſending away, the Grand Seignior had propounded to his Muphti, to have them all ſlain; who made anſwer, That every Dog had a Soul, and therefore it was not fit to kill them.

All the Dogs ſent out of Conſtantinople.

The care of the Turks to win Men to their Religion.

The Turks are wonderful glad when they win any one to their Religion, and ſeek by all means to ſeduce Men either by Force or by fair Perſwaſion; whereof you may ſee an aſſured Proof, by a Jew, who being turned Turk, ſoon after buying of Grapes of another Turk, fell at variance with him about the weighing of his Grapes; from words they fell to blows, and the Jew-Turk beat the other, which he endured very patiently, to encourage him as it ſeemed in his new Religion. Soon after, another Jew came to the Turk who had been beaten, and demanded of him why he had ſuffered himſelf to be ſo abuſed? Who anſwered, You ſhall beat me as much if you will turn Muſulman; ſo zealous they are to win Proſelites.

A ſevere Puniſhment of a Drunkard.

This year, in October, the Turks obſerving their Feaſts of Bairan, (which is our Eaſter) the which they obſerve twice a year; a Turk having drunk Wine too freely (the drinking whereof is forbidden amongſt them, although they love it well, and drink in private) was apprehended, and carried before the Grand Viſier; who ſeeing the fact verified, inflicted this Puniſhment upon him, to have boiling Lead poured into his Mouth and Ears, the which was ſpeedily executed.

Bethlem Gabor, as you have heard, was ſeated quietly in the Principality of Tranſilvania, the Sultan ſupported him, and had ſent Sarder Baſſa with an Army againſt Gabriel Battori, who was then in Poſſeſſion; but, weak both of Men, Money, and Friends, he was not able to make head againſt them; ſo as being abandoned of his Friends, and hated of his Subjects for his Tyranny, he grew into deſpair, and was ſlain by his own Souldiers. Whereupon, the Country yielding Obedience to Gabor, Sarder Baſſa retired out of Tranſilvania with his Turks. Yet afterwards, ſome neerly allied to Battori, (deſiring to revenge his death) cauſed ſome alterations; and others, ſeeking to get the Province from the Emperour, had ſurpriſed Huſt and other Places in his Name. The Sultan hearing this, wrote his Letters to the Noblemen and States of the Province. They were not ignorant, he ſaid, that ſince the time that Tranſilvania yielded obedience to his Predeceſſors and him, they had always lived in peace under his Protection, and had often deſired and obtained Succour againſt their Enemies: That, when as Botſcay had been annoied by the Germans, aſſiſting him with great Forces, he had ſhaken off the Yoke: That when as Battori, his Succeſſor, had lived after his own Will, they ſent Bethlem Gabor with Complaints to his Court by their general conſent, and did eaſily obtain Forces to free the Province from Tyranny. He being taken away, now a wiſhed day began to ſhine, the Clouds of Tribulation being all diſperſed; That he had held Bethlem worthy to ſucceed Battori, and to enjoy that Province: Wherefore he had commanded all the Noblemen to ſubmit themſelves unto him, and to enjoy a wiſhed Peace: That Bethlem had ſent to advertiſe him of the new Practices of the Germans; wherefore he had given charge to the Baſſaes of Temeſwar and Agria, and to the Prince of Valachia to be watchful to repell all theſe Injuries; admoniſhing the Noblemen to yield ſpeedy Obedience to Bethlem; to which end he had ſent them thoſe Letters, that upon the ſight thereof they might be admoniſhed of their Duties; and if the Germans ſhould attempt any thing, they ſhould make reſiſtance until the coming of his Forces: and following Bethlem in all things, they ſhould acknowledge him for their true and lawful Prince, and continue conſtant in their Fidelity, leſt they ſhould provoke his wrath againſt them, and draw upon themſelves ſome great miſery; writing much more to the like effect; concluding, That he had fully purpoſed and reſolved, not to ſpoil any one Village, or any Fort in Tranſilvania, nor to do any wrong to any man, nor ſuffer it to be done by any other, but would defend that Province from all oppreſſion. Wherefore he would have the Emperour advertiſed, that if he meant to have the Peace inviolably kept, he ſhould cauſe the ſaid Places of Tranſilvania to be preſently reſtored unto the Prince, or ſignifie his mind unto him by Letters.

Emir Facardin abandoned Sidon.

Of theſe Rebels of Aſia, whereof we have made mention, the Governour of Sarepta or Sidon in Syria, called Armil or Emir Facardin, he, who gave entrance into his Port to the Florentines, and received them in their Courſes to the Levant; hearing that the Baſſa of Damas, and the Baſſa of the Sea, with the Gallies which he brought from Conſtantinople, and the threeſcore which he took at Negropont (whereof we have made mention) came to fall upon him with a mighty and fearful Army, he left his eldeſt Son within Sidon with Forces to command there, and in other Forts about it, and, flying from a furious tempeſt of Enemies, he went to Sea with three Ships, to retire himſelf into Europe, with his four Wives, ten Children, ſeventy Turks, and fourteen thouſand pound weight in Gold. He arrived at Legorn, and went from thence to Florence, under the Protection of Coſmo de Medicis, Great Duke of Tuſcany, whoſe hands he kiſſed, preſenting unto him a Cuttelas very curiouſly wrought, and inriched with Stone, and two Jewels to the Great Dutcheſs, to the value of ſix thouſand Crowns. This Turk, though he had no Faith, yet he found Faith with this Prince of Tuſcany. Coſmo received him, defraied him and all his Train, furniſhed him with Money, whether it were by way of Gratification, or that Emir had conſumed his own; and by all kind of Courteſies made this Infidel ſee what difference there is to fly unto the Protection of a Chriſtian Prince, or to have recourſe unto a Mahometan. They ſay that Emir made many goodly overtures for the ſettling of the Chriſtians in Aſia; but to attempt it with a good and happy Succeſs, it ſhould be neceſſary that moſt of the Chriſtian Princes would joyn their Wills and Arms together for the general good of Chriſtendom. It is true, that the Great Duke Ferdinand, deceaſed, and Coſmo his Succeſſor had made proof of their good Intentions, by many generous Enterpriſes againſt the Turk. But one Prince alone cannot do all.

Emir retires to Florence.

The great Duke receives him courteouſly.

A horrible tempeſt in the Mediterranean Sea.

Theſe things paſt in the Year 1613, the end whereof concludes with the Fury of terrible Tempeſts in the Mediterranean Sea. The Tenth of November, a fearful Tempeſt, full of Lightning, Thunder, and furious Winds, was the cauſe of the loſs of many Gallies and Ships in the Port of Genoa, with a great number of Perſons which were miſerably drowned; which loſs was valued at above 800000 Crowns. The Port of Naples was not free from this Storm, and the Gallies of Malta, with a great number of other Veſſels received great loſs.

The Grand Seignior, having this Year and the Year before ſuſtained great loſs of his Gallies and Frigots in the Mediterranean Sea, by the Gallies of Naples, Malta, and Florence; and in the black Sea by the Coſſacks, who had taken two Gallies well manned and richly laden; he now impoſed a great Tax upon all his Chriſtian Subjects towards the reparation of that loſs, ſo as he charged the Armenians to build him nine Gallies at their own coſts, and the Grecians twenty; ſuch is the Tyranny of the Turk, as he ſuffers not the poor Chriſtians to injoy any thing, but he finds means to pull it from them.

A conſpiracy againſt the Viſier Naſſuf.

The Grand Viſier Naſſuff held his credit with the Prince, at whoſe return from Adrianople, many Janizaries (to whom the Viſier was very odious) conſpired to kill him as he ſhould enter in at the North Gate coming from Adrianople, and had placed themſelves there for the effecting of what they had intended; but coming near unto the Gate, the Sultan (being ignorant of what was intended againſt the Viſier) called for him to ſpeak with him, keeping him by him until he was entred into the City, by which means he eſcaped the pretended practice. Soon after, Naſſuff invited the Sultan to a ſumptuous Feaſt, and within few days after the Emperour feaſted the Viſier; who, preſuming upon his great credit, cauſed all the Croſſes in the Church of St. Sophia (which is one of the goodlieſt Monuments in Conſtantinople) to be thrown down, and all the Images to be defaced, the which had ſtood intire ever ſince the Chriſtians Government.

The King of Perſia's cruelty againſt the Armenians.

The Year before, the King of Perſia had put to death 1200 Armenians upon a falſe Sugeſtion, as if they had intended to reconcile themſelves to the Pope: that King hating the Papiſts, and yet ſuffers divers Jeſuits to live in his Dominions. The Engliſh Ambaſſador's Chaplain, deſirous to know the reaſon of the Perſians Cruelty, conferred with the Patriarch of the Armenians which reſided at Conſtantinople, (for there are two Patriarchs, whereof the one is under the Perſian, and the other at Conſtantinople under the Turk) who told him, that it was true he had miſerably ſlain many of their Nation by the cunning practiſes of an Armenian, who had counterfeited Letters from the Patriarch of Armenia to the Pope, by which the Patriarch, with his whole Church of Armenians, made offer to reconcile themſelves to the Church of Rome, and to acknowledge the Pope as their head; intreating the Pope to write to the King of Perſia to give them leave to do it freely; which Letters the Pope receiving, he rewarded the Meſſenger bountifully, and returned Letters by him to the King of Perſia, whereby he intreated him to ſuffer the Armenians in his Country to uſe their Conſciences freely. The King of Perſia having received theſe Letters, grew into a great rage, cauſing many of them to be put to death, ſaying, That if they would be obedient to the Pope, he could expect no ſervice nor obedience from them; notwithſtanding the Papiſts ſaid that this was done directly by the Patriarch; but the Armenians affirm that it was the practice of a counterfeit Rogue. Soon after there arrived three Ambaſſadors at Conſtantinople; the one was a Circaſſian, the ſecond a Georgian, (and this was a Biſhop) and the third a Mingrelian, all of them to complain of the Perſians Oppreſſion and Cruelty, imploring Succours from the Grand Seignior for their ſupport. Preſently after them arrived a Perſian Ambaſſador, whom the Sultan would not admit to Audience, until all Controverſies were concluded betwixt himſelf and the Emperour, which was then in queſtion, the Sultan having ſent one Gaſparo (ſometime a Servant in the Engliſh Ambaſſador's Houſe) to treat with the Emperour, by whoſe means at length all matters were reconciled betwixt them.

The fall of Naſſufs fortune.

The Year 1614 began by the horror of great Prodigies, which were ſeen in divers parts of Hungary and Sileſia. Over the Town of Vienna in Auſtria, the Heavens grew ſo red and fearfully darkdarkned, as they feared that either the laſt day was come, or elſe there would follow ſome horrible Effuſion of Blood. But all theſe ſigns had no other effect this year, than the ruine of the great Fortune and prodigious Authority of Naſſuf Baſſa, Grand Viſier of the Turkiſh Empire, formerly one of the greateſt and moſt fearful Rebels which had carried Arms in Aſia againſt the ſoveraign Power of their Sultan; but to comprehend more plainly the fall and declining of his Fortune, let us behold him in his beginning and firſt riſing. He was the Son of a Greek Prieſt, born in a little Village near unto Solonica, and having been taken by the Tribute, which the Turks exact from Chriſtians upon their miſerable Children, taking one of three; he was carried very young to Conſtantinople, and there ſold for three Chequines or Sultanins (every one of which is not above eight Shillings ſterling) to an Eunuch of the Sultans, who nouriſhed and bred him up till he came to the age of twenty years, and afterwards ſold him to a Steward of the Sultanaes Houſe, to ſerve him in his charge; who finding this Slave to have a Spirit capable of greater Affairs than the Houſehold, employed him in the overſight of the building of a rich and ſtately Moſque, which the Sultana cauſed to be erected at her charge: In this place he gave ſuch proof of his Wit and Judgment, to the Sultanaes content, that ſoon after ſhe gave him the Government of her Houſhold.

He is made Governour of Meſopotamia.

Naſſuf made Grand Viſier and General of the Army.

The Sultan had a will to employ him in his Service, and retired him from the Sultanaes Houſe into his Seraglio, where he was honoured with the charge of the Capigi Baſſa, or Captain of the Porters or Uſhers of the Seraglio; from thence he was advanced to the Dignity of the Baſſa of Aleppo, and ſoon after he was made Governour General of Meſopotamia. The Commodity of his Government (frontiring upon Perſia) ſtirred up his ambitious Thoughts, and his diſordinate deſire to become Sovereign of that Country, and made him to entertain many Practices with the King of Perſia, an antient Enemy to his Maſter. The report of his Practices came to Conſtantinople, the Sultan is advertiſed, he knows the ambitious and ſtirring Spirit of this Naſſuf, and finds that he is very profitable for his Service, if he can by any mild courſe withdraw him from his Diſloyalties and Intelligences with the Perſian: wherefore he diſſembled the Knowledge of his treacherous Deſigns, and to gain him the more powerfully, he gorged his ambitious Appetite with the greateſt Dignity of his Empire. After the Death of Murath Baſſa, he honoured him with the Place of Grand Viſier, and gave him all his Goods, and in his Place made him General of the Army againſt the Perſian, with promiſe to give him his Daughter in Marriage. Thus was Naſſuf advanced by his Dexterity, Wit, Diligence, and Treachery, to the greateſt Charges of the greateſt Empire of the World.

He forceth the Perſian to a Peace.

The Sultan reſolves to be rid of him, and concludes his Ruin.

He entered into Perſia, as Lieutenant General of his Maſters Army, with the which he made ſo great a ſpoil, as he forced Ka Abbas, King of Perſia then reigning, to demand a Peace; and after that he had granted him a ſurceaſe of Arms, he brought his Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople, to conclude this Peace to his Maſters benefit, as we have formerly obſerved. He enters in Pomp, preſents a Million of Gold unto his Emperour, is well received at the Seraglio, much made of by the Baſſaes, but more by the Sultan, who cauſed him to marry his Daughter. Fortune having thus advanced him to the height of Greatneſs, not being poſſible to climb higher, ſhe overthrows him, and doth precipitate him to the loweſt degrees of Miſery. The Sultan fears his Spirit, too head-ſtrong by reaſon of his Ambition; he grows jealous of his Actions, and about the end of the year concludes his Ruine and Death. The commandment is given to Boſtangi Baſſa, that is to ſay, the Sultans chief Gardiner, and overſeer of his Seraglio, and all his Houſes, one of the goodlieſt Dignities of the Court. Naſſuf was at that time ſick in his Houſe, Boſtangi goes thither to viſit him, and to cauſe him to be ſtrangled, being accompanied only with ſeven or eight Men; for that he would not give any ſuſpition of the commandment he had received from his Maſter. Being come unto his Lodging, he demanded to ſpeak with him, and Naſſuf excuſed himſelf by his Servants, by reaſon of the diſcommodity of his Health; but the Boſtangi (who would needs execute his Commiſſion) replied, that he could not return to the Sultan (who had ſent him to have certain News of his Health) before he had ſeen him, to be the better aſſured. At this reply Naſſuf grew diſtruſtful, and would without all doubt have been far from thence in ſome place of Meſopotamia; but, believing whatſoever happened to him was inevitable, he commanded them to ſuffer the Boſtangi to enter; who at his firſt approach entertained him with many Complements of Courteſie; and having demanded ſome queſtions of him touching his Health, he drew out of his Pocket a commandment from the Sultan to Naſſuf, to deliver unto him the Seals of the Empire; the which being preſently done, he drew out another commandment unto him, by the which he was enjoyned to ſend him his Head; then Naſſuf cryed out aloud, and deſired to ſpeak with the Sultan; but the Boſtangi anſwered, that he had no Commiſſion to conduct him to the Seraglio, but to cauſe his Life to be taken away preſently: upon this refuſal, he intreats him to give him leave to waſh himſelf in the next Chamber, to the end that his Soul (ſaid he) ſhould not depart this World in the Eſtate of Pollution, according to the Turks belief, who hold the waſhing of the Body for a true Purification. This Favour was alſo denied him; he ſaw there was no Remedy in his Miſery, nor any hope of Grace; Boſtangi Baſſa's Followers (which were ſeven or eight Capigies) being come to take away his Life, and environing his Bed, which was an undoubted ſummons that he muſt die; in the end he reſolves, and turning himſelf unto theſe Executioners, he willed them to do their Duties; whereupon they fell to work, and caſting themſelves upon him, they put a Cord about his Neck, and ſought to ſtrangle him; but ſeeing that the fatneſs of his repleat Body would not ſuffer them to take away his Life preſently, they cut his Throat with a Knife. His Death could not be diſpleaſing to the Chriſtians, ſeeing that all his Deſigns tended to their Ruine; he had perſwaded his Maſter to break the Peace with the Emperour, the French King, and the Venetians, promiſing him to make him Sovereign Monarch of the whole World, to the end he might keep his Spirit in Action, and make himſelf neceſſary to his Maſter, and live more ſafely in Combuſtions than in a Calm; whereas the Envy and Malice of his Enemies gave him a thouſand furious Aſſaults. Thus Naſſuf Baſſa ended his Days and Fortune; before Governour of Meſopotamia, General of an Imperial Army, and Grand Viſier of the Turkiſh Empire; advanced to theſe ſupream Dignities, by the great Actions of his Mind, but overthrown ſhamefully to his Ruine by his boundleſs Ambition. Doubtleſs it is a difficult thing for a Favorite that is inſolently audacious, to continue long in Grace with his Prince, eſpecially when his unreſtrained Ambition hath once broken the Bounds which Reaſon preſcribeth to thoſe that Fortune advanceth by the Favour of her blaſts; and that he follows obſtinately that pernicious Curioſity to know by Experience how high Fortune can advance him; for then the deſire to enjoy that which is above his Condition, blinding the Eyes of Reaſon, he doth precipitate himſelf by his raſh and inſolent Actions, to the loweſt ſtep of ſhameful ruine. The Riches of Naſſuf were ſo great and proportionable to his Fortune, as after his Death they found about two Buſhels of Diamonds and Pearls. Doubtleſs this rich and ſtately ſpoil deſerved to be enjoyed by ſome great Prince. So the Emperour Achmat ſeiſed thereon, and applyed it to his Chaſna, or Treaſury.

Naſſufs Throat cut.

An inſolent Favorite continues little.

The Treaſures of Naſſuf.

Another Diſcourſe of Naſſufs Death.

This Death of Naſſuf is related after another manner by one who was then preſent in Conſtantinople, the which I have thought good to ſet down as I have received it from him. The Grand Seignior being much diſcontented with his Viſier; whether incenſed with ſuch as were near about him, who both hated and feared Naſſuf, or doubting his great Power; he diſſembled his ſpleen, until he might find ſome Opportunity for Revenge; yet it was not ſo ſecretly carried, but Naſſuf had diſcovered the Sultans Diſcontent, and laboured by great Gifts both to the Sultana and others to pacifie him, providing notwithſtanding in the mean time for his own ſafety, ſending Horſemen daily over into Aſia, meaning to paſs himſelf when he had gathered together a ſufficient ſtrength. But it fell out on the ſeventh day of October, it being the Turks Sabboth, that the Moon about eight a Clock at Night was much eclipſed, which made the Turks expect ſome great accident. The Grand Seignior having formerly cauſed it to be bruted, That he would about that time paſs to viſit a new Moſque which was then in building; whereupon all the Streets were hanged with Cloth and Arras, and as the Cuſtom was, a cry went before, that The King cometh; at the noiſe whereof Naſſuf (being then in his Houſe) could not but deſcend to ſalute the Sultan as he paſſed by: But it was not the Grand Seignior himſelf, but his Boſtangi Baſſa, whom he had cauſed to be attired like himſelf, who being come before Naſſufs Door, and finding him ſtanding there, he ſuddenly leapt unto him, and told him that the Sultans Pleaſure was he ſhould deliver up his Seal; whereat Naſſuf being amazed, demanded what the Sultan meant to do? to whom the Boſtangi Baſſa replied, That he knew not what the Princes Pleaſure was, but if he would not deliver it, he would return with that Meſſage unto him. Whereupon Naſſuf drew the Seal out of his Boſom, and delivered it. Then the Boſtangi Baſſa ſhewed him a Warrant for his Head, whereunto he preſently ſubmitted himſelf, and then two Jamoglans ſtrangled him; his Head was preſently cut off, and carried to the Grand Seignior, and his Body thrown into the Street to be trampled on.

It was thought his Death was procured by the Wife of Cicala, Baſſa of Babylon, who had been manzoled or depoſed from his Government there by Naſſuf, and was a little before returned to Conſtantinople, but could not be allowed by Naſſuf to have any acceſs unto the Grand Seigniors Preſence; whereupon he wrote a Letter unto the Sultan, wherein he accuſed Naſſuf to have conſpired with the Perſian to kill him, charging him with many things that were Capital. This Letter he ſent by his Wife, who was Siſter to the Grand Seignior; who coming to his ſpeech (although ſhe were watchfully obſerved by Naſſuf who was then preſent) left the Letter in his Chamber, and ſo departed. The Grand Seignior finding this Letter, and reading it, was much incenſed againſt Naſſuf, and never quiet in Mind until he had his Head. He writes, that there were found in Naſſufs Houſe eighty Bags of Gold, each Bag containing ten thouſand Chequinos. After Naſſufs Death, Mechmet Baſſa, Admiral at Sea (who had married Sultan Achmats eldeſt Daughter) was made chief Viſier; he was born in Conſtantinople, and the firſt natural Turk that was ever Viſier ſince Conſtantinople was won.

You have heard in the laſt years Relation, of ſome Combuſtions which were growing in Tranſilvania, and how the Sultan had written his Letters of an imperious ſtile unto the Nobility and States of the Country, which Letters were fixed up in form of a mandate throughout all Tranſilvania, and in Places that were neareſt unto thoſe Noblemen which held the Emperours party againſt Bethlem. At the ſame time Bethlem defeated certain Troops of the Garriſons at Lippa and Genoa, which over-ran and ſpoiled the Country, ſo as the Governours of thoſe Places were forced to ſend to Vienna, to demand Succours of Men and Money. A Chiaus arrived at that time at Lintz, bringing Letters unto the Emperour from the Grand Seignior; the firſt point contained in them, was, That his Imperial Majeſty ſhould have a care, that the Peace made betwixt them for twenty years ſhould not be violated; and that for his part he deſired to obſerve it faithfully. Secondly, That in the name of his Imperial Majeſty they had ſeiſed upon certain Places in Tranſilvania, a Province which had been always under his Protection, which received her Princes from his Hand, and the which he was bound to defend againſt all her Enemies. Thirdly, That the Tyranny of Prince Battori had conſtrained him to give Forces to Bethlem Gabor to diſpoſſeſs him of the Principality of Tranſilvania: That after the death of the ſaid Battori, he had inveſted Bethlem to govern it in Peace. Fourthly, That ſince he had been advertiſed how that ſome Troops of Souldiers in the Name of his Imperial Majeſty, contrary to the Articles of Peace, had by force ſeiſed upon the Forts of Huſt and Vivar, and the Towns of Nagipan and Tonaſe. Fifthly, That he had given expreſs charge to Bethlem, not to ſuffer any Enterpriſe, no not upon the leaſt Village of his Principality, to the end that nothing might be ſeparated; but that he ſhould repell the Injury of the Aggreſſor by force. Sixthly, That he exhorted his Imperial Majeſty, if he deſired the continuance of the Peace, to command his People to make Reſtitution of the places uſurped, or to ſignifie his Intention by the ſame Chiaus which he had ſent, to the end he might be fully aſſured: for the miſchief increaſing daily, the affection which he bare to the good of Peace might grow cold:

Letters from the Sultan to the Emperour.

The Emperours anſwer to the Turk.

The Emperour received the Chiaus at Lintz very honourably, and gave him an anſwer to his Letter wrapt in a piece of Cloth of Gold; the ſence whereof was, That this buſineſs being of great importance, his Imperial Majeſty deſired to confer with the Princes Electors, and States of the Empire to hear their Advice; after which he would acquaint him with his laſt Reſolution; and finally, that he ſhould reſt aſſured, that for his part he would not attempt any thing contrary to the Peace. In the mean time there was a petty War in Hungary, the Incurſions and Spoils betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks beginning again. The Turks of the Garriſon of Agria going forth, took a great number of Cattel from the Chriſtians; eight hundred Haiducks advertiſed of this Spoil, purſued them ſo ſpeedily, as they met them before they came within half a League of their retreat, when they made them to leave their their prize, and put them to flight. The Baſſa of Agria advertiſed of the defeat of his out-riders, goeth forth with one thouſand Men, to recover the Booty from the Haiducks, which they had newly taken from his Souldiers; but after a ſharp encounter he loſt his Horſe, and two hundred of his Men, being forced to make his retreat. From thence the Haiducks went and ſpoiled the Country about Solnoc; ſome others holding the ways of Strigonium or Gran, took a Turkiſh Bride with her Baggage, who was going from Gran to Buda; and four hundred Boothalers (ſome of them Haiducks, and the reſt Turks, Men which hold no party but their own, to rob with the more impunity) ſeiſed upon Balaſter, Micolut, and Felac; but at the recovery of them, they were ſo ill intreated by the Hungarians, as moſt of them loſt their Lives there, and the reſt were taken Priſoners.

The Eſtates of Bohemia, Auſtria, Stiria, and others.

But the Emperour, who deſired to be reſolved in the important Buſineſs of Tranſilvania, aſſembled the Eſtates of Bohemia, Auſtria, Stiria, Carinthia, Carniola, Sileſia, Luſatia, Moravia, and Hungary, his Hereditary Countries; whom he gave to underſtand, That the Peace was violated in Hungary, by the Hoſtilities of the Turks upon the Chriſtians; to whoſe Prejudice Sultan Achmat had ſubjected unto himſelf the Provinces of Valachia, Moldavia, and Tranſilvania; this laſt, under the Government of Bethlem Gabor, who had made himſelf his Vaſſal. That the Sultan had ſent word unto his Imperial Majeſty, that he ſhould not pretend any thing there, to the end this Country might be wholly united to the Turks Empire. Whereupon he earneſtly exhorted the Aſſembly to conſider wiſely: Firſt, whether Tranſilvania ſhould be left wholly in the Turks Power: Secondly, why the Sultan would not conſent to the ratification of the Truce: Thirdly, of the means to make War, if the Neceſſity of his Affairs ſhould force him: Fourthly, to what end the Turk would hinder his Imperial Majeſty, that he ſhould pretend no right to Tranſilvania: Fifthly, that the Turk had ſent him an Ambaſſador, who, contrary to the Articles of Peace, had not brought any Preſents: Sixthly, if they ſhould make a new accord with the Turk, to conſider adviſedly, what aſſurance they might take, ſeeing that he would not conſent unto the ſixth Article of the Peace.

The Reſolution of the Eſtates.

Their opinions were divers upon theſe Propoſitions; but all joyntly conſented to maintain the Authority of the Imperial Majeſty. The Hungarians, only intereſſed in their reſolutions to War, by reaſon of the Spoil of their Countrey, as a paſſage for all their Troops, they beſought the Emperour, that if he meant to ſend any Forces into Tranſilvania, they might have commandment to march ſome other way, and not over their Lands. Bethlem Gabor in the mean time laboured to recover thoſe places which had been loſt. Wherefore he provided himſelf to make ſome attempts upon Lippa and other places; as at Borene, Genoe, and Arach. The Governours of theſe places gave advice unto Forgatſie, Lieutenant General to the Emperour in high Hungary, repreſenting unto him the eſtate of their Gariſon, and the fear they had, that if Bethlem ſhould once get them into his poſſeſſion and power, he would deliver them over unto the Turk: That if they would ſend them Succours, they would rather endure all extremities than yield to the Enemy. Yet for all this they made no haſte to ſend them Succours; and Sander Baſſa, according to the commandment he had received from the Sultan, having brought Forces to Bethlem, the ſiege of Lippa was reſolved in the Eſtates of Tranſilvania. On the five and twentieth of October, the Cannon being drawn out of Veradin to batter the Fort, Bethlem went to inveſt it, made his approches, and battered it ſo furiouſly, as having made a reaſonable breach, it ſerved firſt for a Paſſage for four hundred Men to eſcape, who left the Governour with very ſmall means to defend the Place, and without hope of Succours from Hungary; which made him come to a Parley, promiſing to yield the Place, to have their Lives and Goods ſaved. The Forts of Genoe and Arach, were delivered by the ſame Capitulation. That theſe three Places ſhould not be put into the Turks Hands, but ſhould remain perpetually united to the Principality of Tranſilvania: and to take all intereſt from the Turks, the Eſtates of the Country ſhould pay unto Sander Baſſa the Charges and Entertainment of his Troops. Theſe Places thus gotten by Bethlem, he manned them with new Garriſons; the Imperials which were within them being retired to Forgatſie, the Emperours Lieutenant in High Hungary. But the Eſtates of Tranſilvania being aſſembled at Veradin, diſputed diverſly, whether they ſhould reſign theſe three Places into the Sultans Power; ſome repreſented the Diſcontentment he would have if they were refuſed, and the Inconveniency that might enſue; others were not of Opinion that the Province ſhould be ſo diſmembred, giving the moſt important Places thereof unto Infidels. Thus without conſenting or refuſing the delivery of theſe Places to the Turk, the Eſtates concluded, that Prince Bethlem ſhould do therein what he held moſt Neceſſary for the Tranquility of the Country; beſeeching him moſt humbly, to free them from the Imperials, who had ſeiſed upon Huſt and Vivar. Such were the Affairs of Tranſilvania this Year, a Province diſtracted from the Emperours Power by the Turks Practices.

The Sultan cauſeth a Platform to be made at Conſtantinople.

At Conſtantinople, Sultan Achmat, deſirous to beautifie the outward part of his Seraigle with a goodly and Spacious Place upon the Sea ſhore, he cauſed a Platform to be made within the Sea, being eight hundred Paces long, and one hundred and twenty broad. The Provoſt of Conſtantinople cauſed this Reſolution to be proclaimed, when as preſently every Houſe ſent forth a Man, and the chief of Families themſelves laboured there in Perſon. There might you ſee the Baſſaes ſerve as overſeers of the Workmen, and the Janizaries and Spahies carrying Scuttles with a wonderful Alacrity; and at all hours of the day there was Muſick of divers ſorts of Inſtruments, to eaſe their Labour, and to encourage them to continue. The Viſiers going to viſit the Work-men, cauſed a largeſs of pieces of Silver to be caſt amongſt them. Thus the Sultan being ſerved with admirable Diligence in this his work of Pleaſure, he ſaw it finiſhed in three Months, having been begun in October this year.

Certain Jeſuits go to Mingrelia or Cholcos.

Whilſt that the Sultan imployed his leiſure after this manner, in the ſtructure of a Platform within the Sea of Conſtantinople, certain religious Men parting from Pera, had a deſign to build another in the Waves of Infidelity; but more profitable for the Health of Souls. This was an Imployment of Jeſuits into the Country of Mingrelia, in old time called Cholcos; Lewis Grangier, a Prieſt of this Society, with two others of his Order, and an Armenian for their Interpreter, parted from Thrace with this godly Reſolution, to preach unto the People far from God, the Truth of his Holy Word, and to guide them happily in the way to Heaven. He paſſed the the Boſphorus of Thrace, and the famous Caſtles of Leander and Hero, and cut through thoſe Waves, whereas he that could not quench the Fire of his Paſſion,

Paſſion, quenched the flame of his Life; he paſſed beyond Pompey's Pillar, or rather that of the moſt happy Daniel Stylita, who erected his towards this Mouth of the Sea: and about the ſixth of June this ſame year they arrived at Verna, a famous Town in Thrace, whereas a Company of French Souldiers (whom the violence of Neceſſity had ſome years ſince forced to leave the Emperours Service in Hungary) were in Garriſon for the Turk, to defend his Subjects againſt the Incurſions of the Coſſacks; yet theſe Frenchmen do ſtill obſerve the Catholick Religion inviolably. From thence he ſailed towards Cordula, and by the encounter of a little Gallion he entered into the Port of Trabizond. Within few days after he was carried in the ſame Veſſel to Eriſſa in the Country of Laxia or Laſſia, which on the one ſide looks towards the Country of the Georgians, and the other that of Trabizond. The Chriſtian Religion hath been for a long time planted among thoſe People, but very ill manured; for the Fathers, to free their miſerable Children from the Tribute wherewith the Turks oppreſs them, cauſe their Children to be circumciſed after the Mahometan manner, and for the ſame Conſideration they marry their Daughters unto Janizaries. Moreover they abandon themſelves to the Mahometan Impiety, to the end they may be delivered from their inſupportable Oppreſſions, and their Turkiſh Yoke. The Jeſuits found there a good Subject to work upon for the Health of Souls; during their abode there for certain days they catechiſed the Men, baptized the Children, and advertiſed the Women married unto Turks, what they were to do for the maintenance of their Faith: But for that their Commiſſion or Charge was to go unto Mingrelia or Cholcos, they went again to Sea, and ſailed towards Govea, which is the furtheſt Corner of the Black Sea: this Haven being very unfit to caſt Anchor in, they followed the Gallies which carried a Baſſa called Oneze from Conſtantinople, who ſhould treat a Peace on the behalf of Sultan Achmat, with the Prince of the Mingrelians, and diſpoſe him to pay a Tribute; with theſe Veſſels they went into a Port called Macrogalo, nine Miles from that of Govea, holding this Place more ſafe than the other: but in Truth there is little aſſurance whereas the Waves and Winds command Soveraignty. A North-weſt wind riſing about Midnight on the fifteenth of September, drave their Gallies near unto the Shelfs and Rocks, whereas one was broken and caſt away. This Tempeſt continued many days, and during the Violence thereof, another Gallie was loſt, in the which the Jeſuits had been, by good advice they had retired to Land during the Fury of the Sea and Winds. The Jeſuits imputed the cauſe of this loſs, to the Prohibition which Oneze the Baſſa had made unto them, not to paſs into Mingrelia before the Peace were concluded with the Princes of that Country; the which grew long, by reaſon of the Difficulties which happened in the Treaty. In the end thoſe Princes reſolving to pay the Tribute unto the Turk, it was concluded.

A Peace betwixt the Turks and the Georgians.

The Salutation of the Georgians.

The Liberty of Travel follows Peace, Grangier and his Companions proceeded in their Journey; twenty days after their departure from Macrogalo, they arrived at Satrapella, a place of Georgia, whereas the Prince's Viſier came to viſit them, and after the Georgian manner ſaluted them, bare headed, and kneeling upon one knee. Gorel, Prince of the Georgians (who was then at Barlet, whereas the Court was to paſs the Feaſts of Chriſtenmas) being advertiſed of the arrival of theſe new Chriſtian and French Preachers, ſent for them, received them favourably, and ſaluted them bare-headed, and kneeling. After that he had made them to bleſs his Court, he held many Diſcourſes with them of the Truth of the Roman Church: and of the Popes Power, as the Father of all Chriſtendom; being moved partly thereunto by a feeling of Piety to the Church, and partly from the Inſtructions he received from theſe Jeſuits, ſo as enlightned with a new Beam of the true Light, he intreated Grangier to crave Abſolution of his Sins from the Pope, the which (ſaid he) he may give me by the Power he hath from God; promiſing to ſend him his Confeſſion in writing. But underſtanding that the Jeſuit had Power from the Pope to abſolve him, he purged his Conſcience of all his Sins, by a general Confeſſion of his Life. Without doubt the Zeal of theſe Souls, ſo far from Succour, ſhews plainly what the Harveſt would be, if ſo many Labourers were ſent as are neceſſary. A Monk of Georgia, who had lived at Rome for the ſpace of twelve years, had in former times planted Piety there; the which they of this miſſion did now alter. This Prince Gorel intreated the Jeſuits, to ſend him ſome of their Company at their return into Europe, promiſing to make great eſteem of them, and to give them a Church, a Houſe, and all things neceſſary for their maintenance. The Prince offered them Silver, which they refuſed, modeſtly excuſing themſelves upon the Rules of their Inſtitution, which forbids them to receive any temporal recompence for the Adminiſtration of Holy things. Thus they parted from this Prince, who commended much their manner of living, and cauſed them to be conducted to Satrapella, to continue on their Journey into Mingrelia.

The third of February, in the year 1615, they parted from this Town with the Turks who came to conclude the Peace, and paſſing by the Banks of Faſſo (a River which doth water the Country of Cholchos, now called Mingrelia) they arrived at Herailcano, otherwiſe called Heraclia, and from thence to Margoula, whereas the Prince of the Mingrelians (called Dodran) then remained, being buſie in the Reception of Threbis Cham, King of Georgia, who was come thither to viſit him, being expelled his Country by the King of Perſia. The Jeſuits were brought to kiſs the Hands of Prince Dodran, and of Lipartia his Uncle, who was Regent of the Realm during his Minority. They both promiſed them aſſiſtance in their Affairs, ſending them to the Town of Macaury, to make their abode there whilſt they were buſied in the Affairs of their Country, the which at that time were ſomewhat confuſed. The Biſhop of that Place entertained them with great Demonſtration of Love, and ſoon after, making a Feaſt to Threbis Cham, or Prince of the Georgians, he would needs have the Jeſuits aſſiſt at this Banquet, for a great Teſtimony of his Love. It is the manner of thoſe of Cholchos, or the Mingrelians, as well as the Georgians, to ſing at their Meat. The Threbis Cham deſired, that the Jeſuits might ſing ſome note when it came to their turn, whereof they excuſed themſelves divers times; But there was no Remedy, they muſt do as others have done; whereupon they ſung the Hymn of Plange lingua, &c. appointed for Holy Thurſday. Being thus favourably entertained in Mingrelia, they make their reſidence at Macaury, with hope to labour profitably for the Health of Souls, which err in that Country through the Darkneſs of Ignorance, for want of Men to teach them the way of Truth. They are Chriſtians of the Greek Profeſſion, under the command of divers Princes, always in war either againſt the Turk or the Perſian: They carry the Name of Cham, which is as much to ſay, as King or Soveraign Prince. The Sophy had diſpoſſeſt Threbis Cham, chief King of Georgia, of all his Countries, in the Year 1613, who had retired himſelf into Mingrelia, as you have heard.

The Hiſtory of Sultan Jacaia, held by many to be Emperour Achmat's Brother.

Whilſt thoſe men labour to ſow the Seeds of true Doctrine of the Apoſtles in the Soil of Mahometiſm, a Turk paſſing out of Aſia, comes into Chriſtendome to ſeek the light of Truth, and demands favourable aſſiſtance and ſuccours from Chriſtian Princes, to enter into the Poſſeſſion of the Empire, whereunto his Birth and the degrees of a lawful Succeſſion ſeemed to call him by a juſt Title. The diſcourſe of his Birth, of his Fortunes, and of his Pretenſions to the Turkiſh Empire, is comprehended in this following Relation. He termed himſelf the Son of Mahomet the Third, Father to Achmat, now ſitting in the Imperial Throne at Conſtantinople; he maintained, That his Father by four Wives, or Concubines, had had four Sons; that is to ſay, Muſtapha, who was ſtrangled, for that he would have diſpoſſeſſed his Father of his Kingdom; Jacaia (which was himſelf) Achmat now reigning, and Oſman: yet it ſeems, by the ſequel of the Hiſtory, that he had another Muſtapha; that having been ſent for to come out of Magneſia to Conſtantinople, his Mother (who had been a Chriſtian, and baptized under the Name of Hellen, but was afterward engaged in the Company of Mahomet the Third, for the worth of her Beauty, and known in Turkey by the Name of the Sultana Lalpare) could not conduct him to his Father, for that he was dangerouſly ſick of the Small Pox. And this Princeſs deſired much to find ſome favourable occaſion, whereby ſhe might be freed from the damnable Errors of Mahomet's Law, and return to the wholſome way of the Chriſtian Faith, and retire her Son Jacaia far from the power of thoſe bloody Laws, which ſprinkle the Imperial Scepter of him that comes unto the Crown with the blood of his Brethren; ſhe well foreſaw, that Jacaia, being but the ſecond of Mahomet's Sons, ſhould one day by his Death ſecure the life of Muſtapha his elder, and that the only means to preſerve him, was to retire him into Chriſtendom: wherefore ſhe laboured ſeriouſly in this Deſign, and made uſe of a favourable Fiction; giving it out, that her Son Jacaia was dead of the Small Pox; and having ſuppoſed in his place the Son of an Eunuch dead of the ſame Diſeaſe aſſiſted at his Funeral, and by her conſtrained tears ſubtilly diſguiſed her deſign. An Eunuch, called Aſtam Mehemet was the faithful Secretary of her Enterpriſe; with him ſhe leaves Magneſia, a Province in Aſia, and under Pretext to go unto certain Baths thereby, ſhe gets her down to the Sea-ſide, paſſes into Europe, and tranſports her Son into Morea, ſometimes called Helleſpont, and lodgeth him (as unknown) in the Biſhop's Palace in the Town of Miclo. Jacaia was above nine years old; ſhe held him not ſecure at Miclo, but tranſported him into Macedonia, under the Habit of a Greek Monk, and retires him into the Town of Caſſandria, where ſhe diſcovers unto the Arch-biſhop of Theſſalonica, a Man learned and of a holy Life, the quality of her Son, and the deſire ſhe had to make him a Chriſtian; intreating him, in Charity, to take them both into his Protection. This Arch-biſhop lodgeth the Mother in the Monaſtery of religious Women of our Lady of Theſſalonica, and gives the cuſtody of the Son unto an Abbot of St. Michael, a man learned in all the Sciences, under whom he profited wonderfully, as well in the Greek Tongue as in many goodly Arts. I do well know this to be true, for that I have converſed with him for the ſpace of ſix months, and have ſeen him often in the Company of learned men ſpeak the Greek, with as great facility as his Turkiſh and Mother Tongue. He continued in this Monaſtery, under the Care and Government of this learned Abbot, untill the Age of ſeventeen Years; that is to ſay, for the ſpace of eight whole Years; during which time, his Mothers Tears, the holy Inſtructions of the Abbot (but rather the Divine Favour) made him to enter into the way of his Souls Health, and become a Chriſtian. The Arch-biſhop of Theſſalonica cleanſed his Soul from the Pollutions of the Law of Mahomet, and baptiſed him in the Church of St. Anaſtaſius, without the City of Theſſalonica; yet ſecretly, for fear leſt the Eunuch coming to diſcover this Myſtery, ſhould abandon him, and publiſh abroad the place and eſtate of his ſolitary abode, and ſo be miſerably taken. Thus Jacaia calling himſelf Sultan, being already in ſome aſſurance of the Crown of Heaven by the promiſes of holy Baptiſm, whilſt that he was in the beginning of his Pretenſions to that of the Turkiſh Empire, he leaves the Monaſtery where he had been inſtructed, and in the Company of the Eunuch travels up and down Greece, paſſing away (in the length and variety of his Voyage) the impatiency of his Age and Deſires; and for that he would not be known, he takes upon him the Habit and the Licenſe of a Dervis or religious Turk. But when he came to the City of Siopia, he underſtood the News of the Death of the Emperour Mahomet the Third, his Father, and the rejoycing for the new Advancement of Sultan Achmat to the Empire; learning at the ſame inſtant, that Muſtapha, his elder Brother, had been ſtangled by the Commandment of his Father. The Diſpleaſure which he conceived for that he had not been bred up at Conſtantinople with the reſt, to receive ſo rich a Crown as that of the Turkiſh Empire, made him to waver in divers irreſolutions: ſometimes he would go into Perſia to the Sophy, to have Succours from him, and with him to make War againſt his Brother: ſometimes he would ſerve for a ſupport and countenance to the Rebels of Aſia, and juſtifie their Party. After many Diſcourſes with the Eunuch touching his Affairs, he ſends him unto the Son of Peri Baſſa, a Rebel againſt the Emperour Achmat: the Eunuch treats for his Maſter, and receives for him the Rebels Oath; and returning to Tarlis, where the Sultan Jacaia remained, he conducted him to Peri Baſſa, to be the Head of his Troops. Jacaia arrives and ſees himſelf obeyed by an Army ready to fight: for the Deſtarden or Treaſurer being ſent againſt the Rebel Peri by the Grand Seignior, with ſeven thouſand Horſe and three thouſand Foot, was already upon the Banks of the River Bardate ready to give him Battel. The Baſſa's Troops (being leſs in number of fighting men) went to aſſail him. There was a ſharp Encounter; but in the end the Deſtarden was Victor, and the Troops of Peri Baſſa defeated, and Jacaia being wounded in four places of his Body, was forced to ſave himſelf on the other ſide of the River, where, wandring up and down the Fields, he found relief with a poor Peaſant, and ſoon after with an Abbot there by, who entertained him, and cauſed him to be cured, holding him to be one of the Deſtardens Pages, as he himſelf ſaid.

He joyns with the Rebels of Aſia.

The Rebels defeated, and Jacaia wounded.

He ſends to Conſtantinople, and corrupted the Viſier.

His Wounds being cured, Jacaia returns again towards Greece, where he finds his Mother, confers with her, and ſoon after with the Eunuch, of the eſtate of his Affairs; and concludes with both of them, to ſend to Conſtantinople, to the Viſier Dervis (who at that time was diſcontented with the Emperour Achmat) to ſound his Diſpoſition, and to ſee if he might gain him to his Party. The Eunuch undertakes the Voyage; he ſpeaks with the Dervis, and finds him diſpoſed to entertain the Offers of Jacaia. The Conſpiracy was concluded, and they ſwear to kill Achmat, and to ſettle Jacaia in the Imperial Throne. Hereupon he tranſports himſelf to Conſtantinople, in a diſguiſed Habit: but when as they were ready to execute their Enterpriſe (ſay they) the Dervis died, be it that the Emperour Achmat had diſcovered their Deſign, or otherwiſe. Thus Jacaia, being fruſtrate of his hope to effect any thing by this means, left the City, and fled towards the black Sea, and then wandred into the Countries of Valachia and Moldavia, following the Carock of a Poland Ambaſſador on foot, untill he came unto the City of Cracovia, whereas Fortune had laid a ſnare for him, which brought him in danger of his life; for a Chiaus being come from Conſtantinople, and knowing him, he deſired the King of Poland, in his Maſters Name, to ſtay him, aſſuring him, that by this means he ſhould ſtrictly bind unto him the Affections of Sultan Achmat: The King refuſed his unjuſt Demand, holding himſelf much honoured to ſee his Court the Refuge of unfortunate Princes. After this Refuſal, the Chiaus flies to Treachery: he corrupts certain Tartarians of the King's Guard with money, who promiſed to murther Jacaia; and doubtleſs they had performed it, if a Flemiſh Embroitherer had not advertiſed him, and lent him his Lodging for certain days to hide himſelf; after which he freed himſelf from danger, and paſt to Prague towards the Emperour Rodolphus, who was then living.

and

Jacaia in danger of his life at Cracovia.

He retires to Prague to the Emperour.

In this Imperial Court he found Relief, and means to eaſe his fore-paſt Miſeries: The Emperour furniſhed him with all things neceſſary: He ſpent a whole year there, and was acknowledged during his Abode, by many Turks which came to Prague, for Brother to their Emperour Achmat. There wanted nothing but Succours to effect his Deſigns; but he finds nothing but fair Words and good Wiſhes at Prague, ſo as he was forced to ſeek the effects elſewhere. Certain Saxons, that were his Friends, adviſed him to paſs to Florence to Ferdinand the great Duke of Tuſcany: He takes Directions from that Prince's Ambaſſador reſiding at Prague, and goes on his Journey; but entering into Italy, he hears that Ferdinand was dead: theſe mournful News made him to reſolve to ſeek ſome other place, if Coſmo, Succeſſor to Ferdinand, and the great Dutcheſs his Mother, had not called him back. He came then to Florence, where he was honourably entertained, and lodged, for the ſafety of his Perſon, in the Fort of S. John, where he was ſupplied with all ſorts of Commodities. The great Duke Coſmo gave him the Title of Excellency, appointed him Horſes and Caroches, and ſuch Company as he delighted in, for the Pleaſure of Hunting. He had not ſtaid long at Florence but he ſaw himſelf aſſiſted with ſuch Forces as he deſired. The great Duke Coſmo cauſed his Gallions to be armed, ſending them into the Levant, under the Command of the Knight Beauregard, where he had Conference with Naſſuf Baſſa, at that time chief of the Rebels of Aſia. He offers him Men, Arms, and Money, if he would come to land and march towards Perſia, whither many Rebels were retired. But he who commanded the Florentine Gallions had no Commiſſion to leave him in the hands of Naſſuf, wherefore he carried him back to Florence to his Highneſs.

He comes to Florence to the great Duke of Tuſcany.

He maketh a Voyage into the Levant in the Duke's Gallions.

During the time that Jacaia was aboard the Gallions, the great Duke ſent divers Perſons into many parts of the Levant, to inform themſelves carefully of theſe things which he had delivered, not only touching his own Perſon, but alſo of his Mother; and they all brought back certain proofs of the truth of his Diſcourſes. This gave the great Duke ſubject to impart this fair occaſion unto Spain, to labour for the common Good of Chriſtendome. He wrote unto the Catholick King, and informed him of the quality of Jacaia, to the end, that contributing Succours to his Perſonage, they might undertake ſome happy Enterpriſe againſt the Turk. The King of Spain was content he ſhould be ſent to Naples; commanding the Viceroy to give him a Reception fit for his Quality. Jacaia went on his Journey, being accompanied by ſome, by the great Duke's Commandment; but according to the News which he received from Naples, he ſtayed at Averſo, where he was received by the Governour with much Honour. The Viceroy came to viſit him, gave him the right-hand, and the Title of Excellency. But as the Counſel of Spain was tedious in their Reſolutions, and delayed too long (as Jacaia ſuppoſed) the Succours which he expected; he parted from Averſo to go to Millan, and from thence in a diſguiſed Habit paſt again into the Levant, to ſound their Wills that might advance his Pretenſions, and bring them to a happy end: but he prevailed as little as he had done before. Beſides all theſe Voyages which we have deſcribed, to the end he might leave no means unattempted to advance his Affairs, he went to Rome to kiſs his Holineſs's feet. Cardinal Bellarmine received him, gave him the right-hand, and the Title of Excellency. the Pope aſſured him of his Affection and Succours; but it was neceſſary the ſecular Powers ſhould begin to levy men, and make the firſt Overture to War.

Jacaia goes to Naples and Millan.

He comes to Rome.

Since, we have ſeen him in France, and at Paris, under the Protection of the Duke of Nevers, entertained by the Bounty of this Prince, and aſſiſted by his Council; and doubtleſs if the troubleſome Combuſtions of a Civil War had not directed the Armies of this Duke, we had ſeen ſome happy ſucceſs of the Affairs which he treated in Lorain, Germany, and other Places, to the ruine of the Turks, and the good of Chriſtendome. Finally, as for this Turk called Jacaia, terming himſelf eldeſt Brother to the Emperour Achmat now reigning at Conſtantinople, and for ſuch acknowledged by many; yet ſome affirm (yea ſuch as have converſed in the Eaſt) that Sultan Mahomet had but three Sons, which were Muſtapha, Achmat, and Oſman; notwithſtanding, it is hard to diſcover in this Perſonage any ſigns of an Impoſture: I have often frequented with him, and carefully obſerved his Carriage and Actions; and have always noted in him a Carriage and Mind borne to great matters. This is all that we could learn of this man.

Tyrannies of Stephano.

Stephano or Tomſho, of whom we have made mention in the year 1612, having overthrown Conſtantine the lawful Prince, and made himſelf Vayvod of Moldavia by the Support and Tyranny of the Turk; as he held it by Uſurpation, without any juſt Title, ſo he governed with all Cruelty and Inhumanity, preferring Cruelty before Clemency, and imitating that Tyrant, who ſaid openly, That he reſpected not the Love of his Subjects ſo as they feared him. Even ſo this Stephano, at his firſt Entrance, plotted how he might root out all the Noblemen in the Country, whom in their Language they call Boyers, with all others of Credit and Authority in the Country, both for that they ſupported Conſtantine, as for the Jealouſie he had of them, being beſt able to reſiſt his tyrannous Deſigns; being alſo the common Diſpoſition of ſuch as uſurp any Eſtate by wicked Practices, to be always in fear to be diſpoſſeſſed, and to be entreated according to their Merits. He began firſt with the Lord of Botaean, Brother to the Princeſs, Widow of Jeremy, whom he cauſed with two others of the chief Noblemen to be miſerably and inhumanely impailed, as if they had been two notable Thieves and Murderers; and not content herewith, ſoon after he cauſed threeſcore and fifteen Boyers to be apprehended, cutting off all their Heads, and would not pardon any one, notwithſtanding the great inſtance that was made by their Kinſfolks, charging them with the Crime of Treaſon, as if they had conſpired againſt his Perſon, having no proof at all: but theſe his Cruelties did nothing daunt the Boyers, as Stephano had perſuaded himſelf, but contrariwiſe, they were the more incenſed, and many of them took Arms openly, and had then ſeiſed upon him, been revenged of his Cruelties, and ſet their Country at liberty (which had not been ruined as it was afterwards) if he had not been aſſiſted by the Citizens of Yas, whom he conjured to ſecond him in this occaſion, promiſing them immunities of all Subſidies; in regard of which promiſe, theſe poor Wretches, preferring their private Profit before their publick Safety, employed themſelves in the Service of this Tyrant, and fought valiantly againſt the Boyers, who were come to aſſault him in the City of Yas: but finding that he was better aſſiſted than they expected, after ſome light Skirmiſh they retired as well as they could, whereof many were taken Priſoners, whom the Tyrant cauſed to be ſlain in cold blood, or empailed to terrifie the reſt.

The Noblemen revolt againſt Stephano.

Prince Alexander called into Moldavia by the Boyers.

The Boyers which eſcaped from this Defeat, knowing that there was no hope of Mercy in Stephano, who was full of Revenge, nor by conſequence any Safety in Moldavia during his Government, they reſolved to have recourſe unto the Princeſs (Widow to Jeremy) who had fled into Polonia when as ſhe received News of the taking of her Son Conſtantine. This Princeſs, underſtanding from the Boyers of the tyrannous Government of Stephano, and that moſt of the Moldavians were reſolved to ſhake off the Yoke of his Tyranny, and deſired to have Prince Alexander in his place, remembring the good uſage they had received from the deceaſed Prince Jeremy his Father. Theſe Conſiderations, together with a deſire of Command under her Son (who was then but ſixteen years old) were ſtrong Motives to perſwade both her and her Son to embrace this occaſion, the which they imparted to Prince Viſinouisky, Son in law to the Princeſs, and to Prince Corresky, who at that time aſpired to marry her youngeſt Daughter: Theſe Princes not only allowed of this Deſign, but they offered themſelves willingly to accompany Prince Alexander into Moldavia, and to take the whole care of his Army. This Reſolution being taken, they preſently employed all their credit to levy men, and had within leſs than two Months drawn together ten or twelve thouſand Foot and Horſe, Polonians, Coſſacks, and Tranſilvanians: whereof the Vayvod Stephano being advertiſed, he preſently levied what Forces he could, of Moldavians, Tartarians, and Valachians, having drawn together an Army of almoſt twenty thouſand men, which he kept about Yas, and there reſolved to attend the Princes of Polonia.

The fort of Cochina yielded unto Prince Alexander

Prince Alexander being advanced with his Army within two Leagues of Caminithe in Podolia, he was much troubled to paſs the River of Nieſtre, which divides that Country from Moldavia, fearing the Fort of Cochina, in the which there was a ſtrong Garriſon of Moldavians, and ſtore of Munition to defend the Paſſage of the ſaid River: but it fell out happily for Prince Alexander; for the Captain which commanded in the ſaid Fort being much diſcontented at the Cruelties of the Vayvod Stephano, came voluntarily of himſelf to offer his Service to Alexander, and brought him the Keys of the Fort, leaving all to his Diſpoſition; ſo as he paſt his Army eaſily into Moldavia, and in ſign of joy diſcharged many Vollies of his great Ordnance, which made Stephano diſtruſt the Affections of the Moldavians, and to feel a pricking in his Conſcience, which doth never abandon Tyrants and Uſurpers.

Fifteen hundred Tartarians defeated by the Coſſacks.

Prince Alexander, making ſome ſtay with his Army at Cochina, in the year 1615, advanced towards Yas, and being come within half a days Journey, he ſent forth eight hundred Coſſacks, (choſen out of a great number) to diſcover the Countenance of his Enemies Army: but they were not far advanced, before they encountered fifteen hundred Tartarians, ſent by Stephano to give ſome charge to the Polonians. Although the Coſſacks were fewer in number, yet finding the Tartarians in diſorder, they charged them ſo reſolutely as they defeated a great part, and put the reſt to rout. After which Exploit, they brought word to Prince Alexander, that Stephano's Army might be about the number of fifteen thouſand men; but they were ſuch as were gathered up in the Country, and not trained up to Arms, who were rather drawn to it by conſtraint than of their free will, and therefore were not much to be feared. This happy Succeſs, together with the Report made by the Coſſacks, did greatly encourage Alexander's Army, being alſo much incenſed againſt Stephano for certain Letters which he had written to their Prince, full of Threats, as if both he and they had been already at his mercy; the which did the more encourage the Polonians, and made them reſolve rather to dye fighting, than to fall into the hands of this cruel Tyrant. The ſame day there came certain Deputies of the Moldavians to Prince Alexander, without the privity of Stephano, to know what his Deſign was, and to intreat him to take pity of Moldavia, which was threatned with a ſpeedy ruine, if the War continued any longer; to whom the Prince made Anſwer, That his Intent was not to oppreſs Moldavia, but to free it from the Tyranny of Stephano; that he had been invited by a great number of the Boyers, who had come unto him into Polonia to that end, and had given him aſſurance, that it was the common deſire of the Moldavians: That upon this confidence he had marched with what Forces he could draw together; and that if he did prevail in his Deſigns (as he aſſured himſelf with their aſſiſtance) he would govern them with no leſs mildneſs than his Father Prince Jeremy had done, whoſe Son and lawful Succeſſor he was. The Deputies returned well ſatisfied with this Anſwer, and having publiſhed it in divers places, many Moldavians came and joyned with the Prince's Army, and aſſiſted him faithfully in this Action.

Deputies ſent from the Moldavians to Prince Alexander.

In October, Prince Alexander advancing about three Leagues with his Army, he made a ſtand in a fair Champian, where there were good Springs to refreſh them; and in the mean time he called a Council at War, to reſolve what courſe he ſhould take, and when he ſhould draw the Enemy to fight. In the mean time he had ſent a Troop of Coſſacks to diſcover the Army, who brought word that they were ranged in Battel, and that they had twenty Cannons ready in front, the which did not much amaze Prince Alexander, for that ſome days before, the General of Stephano's Artillery had ſent to aſſure him, That if he gave Battel, he would annoy his Men as little as he could, having a deſire to ſerve the Prince, and by this means be revenged of Stephano, who had cauſed his Brother-in-law's Head to be cut off, upon a falſe ſuſpect which he had conceived againſt him being innocent. The which ſhould teach Princes, that nothing doth procure them more ſecret Enemies than Cruelty, and that at one time or other they in whom they moſt relye abandon them when as they leaſt expect it. The Vayvod Stephano phano meaning to make a ſecond Diſcovery of the Prince's Army, ſent twelve hundred Tartarians, and two or three hundred Moldavians, who being ſeen afar off (for that it was in a plain Champain) the Prince ſent five hundred Coſſacks with four hundred Polonian Lances, to encounter them: The Tartarians perceiving it, made a ſhew at the firſt, as if they would retire, to draw them by little and little from their Camp; and being about a League off, they made a ſtand, thinking that they durſt not charge them: but they were ſoon deceived; for, the Polonians fell upon the Tartarians with ſuch fury, as they overthrew them, and ſlew moſt of them, ſo as there eſcaped not above five or ſix hundred, who retiring to their Camp, cauſed a great Amaſement. The Prince's Army was much encouraged by this Exploit, and increaſed daily in number, as it is uſual in Civil War to follow that Party which hath the firſt advanced.

A thouſand of Stephano's Horſe defeated.

Preſently after this Execution, the Prince, meaning to advance his Army towards the Enemies Camp, his foreward was ſtayed by a Battalion of one thouſand Horſe, who had the night before ſeiſed upon a narrow Paſſage, betwixt a Pool and a Mariſh, by the which they knew the Polonian Army muſt paſs: but this Obſtacle was ſoon taken away, by the Advice which was given by certain Moldavians, to ſend a Company of Horſemen by a way unknown to the Enemy; by which means they might ſurpriſe them behind, before they ſhould be diſcovered. The Execution of this Stratagem was given to the Coſſacks, who ſpeedily went, being guided by certain Moldavians; who coming within fifty Paces of the Enemy undiſcovered, they charged them, and were ſeconded ſo fitly by the forward, that ſtaid on the other ſide, as of one thouſand Horſe there returned not above fifty to their Camp, to carry news of their bad Succeſs.

Prince Alexander, having happily opened this Paſſage, advanced with his Army within Cannon-ſhot of Stephano's Camp. Prince Viſnouisky was of opinion, that they ſhould make a kind of Incloſure with their Carts, which might ſerve them as a Fort, having no place of Retreat within ten Leagues; the which being diſcovered by Stephano, he ſhot certain Vollies of Cannon through their Fort, ſo as there were ſome Souldiers ſlain, and ſome hurt: and the Prince anſwered him with the like, but to ſmall effect, for that night ſurpriſed them, neither had they above eight ſmall Pieces. Prince Viſnouisky ſpent the night to encourage his Souldiers, letting them underſtand that they had no reaſon to be amaſed, although their Enemies were more in number, for that moſt of them were Peaſants, never trained up in Arms nor ſeen Battel; whereof they had had good proof in many Encounters, where they had ever been Victors over their Enemies, although they were inferiour in number: That they were ſo many Teſtimonies and Aſſurances that God did fight for them, and would uſe them to puniſh the Tyrannies of Stephano, and his Cruelties againſt Moldavia. Finally, if they were Victors (whereof he doubted not, if they did their Duties) there was not any one but ſhould return loaden with rich Spoils and Recompences from Prince Alexander. This did ſo encourage the Souldiers, as they proteſted all with one Voice, rather to dye than to fail of their Duties. Moreover, the Princes gave the Collonels and Captains to underſtand of the Intelligence they had with the General of Stephano's Artillery, wherewith they were much comforted.

The diſpoſition of the two Armies.

The next day, being the Eleventh of October, they began to put their Armies in Battel, during the which there were divers Skirmiſhes, wherein Alexander's Party had ſtill the Advantage; ſo as it ſeemed they were ſo many Preſages of good Fortune which ſhould befall them that day. The Prince's Army was ordered by Viſnouisky, to whom Prince Alexander had given the Charge of General, as moſt capable, having ſundry times given ſufficient Proofs of his Sufficiency and Valour in other Battels. This General, ſeeing Stephano's Horſe-men divided into three Squadrons, and the Tartarians moſt advanced, he appointed the Coſſacks to encounter with them; the which was judiciouſly and diſcreetly done, for they both go freely to the Charge, neither are they covered with any Arms, but only with the Skins of certain Beaſts, wherewith they make themſelves to ſeem as fearful as they can, obſerving no order in their fighting, and uſing Cries which are fearful to ſuch as are not accuſtomed unto them; and being once broken, they ſeldom return again to the Charge. The Polonian Lanciers, called in their Language Houſſarsky, being about one thouſand and five hundred men well armed, made the ſecond Battalion of Alexander's Army, led by Prince Coresky, and were placed on the right hand againſt three thouſand Tartarian, Valachian, and Moldavian Horſe-men. The Hungarian Foot, being about three thouſand men, were in the midſt of Prince Alexander's Army, with the Cannon, upon a little Hill of ſome advantage; and on the left hand was the reſt of the Chavalry, who were led by the Princes Alexander and Viſnouisky; and the Baggage was a little behind the Foot in the Camp where they had lodged the night before.

The Battel betwixt Prince Alexander and the Vayvod Stephano.

The Tyrant Stephano, having diſpoſed his Army into divers Squadrons, began, about Nine of the Clock in the Morning, to play with his Cannon upon Alexander's Army, who found that the General of the Artillery had kept his Promiſe, for moſt of the Bullets flew over his men, and hurt them not; upon which Confidence, he commanded the Coſſacks to charge the Tartarians which were advanced, whom they ſoon defeated. At the ſame Inſtant two thouſand light Horſe gave charge to the Hungarian Foot-men which guarded Stephano's Cannon, and in an inſtant cut moſt of them in pieces, and the reſt yielded themſelves; ſo as Alexander became Maſter of his Cannon. The Tyrant, ſeeing his Infantery in danger to be defeated, and his Cannon loſt, cauſed a Battalion of three thouſand Valachian and Moldavian Horſemen to advance, who without doubt had recovered the Cannon, but the generous Prince Coresky, with his Polonian Launciers, charged them ſo furiouſly in the Flank, as that they ſlew almoſt the one half of them upon the place, and put the reſt that remained to rout. Preſently after this followed another Squadron; the which Coresky perceiving, he wiſely retired towards his Camp, ſeeing his men wearied and tired with the ſlaughter of their Enemies, and not able to maintain the Fight without ſome reſt. Then came Prince Alexander, and Viſnouisky who was his faithful Guide, with the reſt of his Horſe-men, to encounter this laſt Battalion of the Enemy, whereunto they went with greater Courage, for that they were aſſured the Vayvod Stephano was there preſent; which Charge continued for the ſpace of a quarter of an hour, during which time Prince Coresky had leiſure to take breath, and to gather together what poſſibly he could of thoſe of his Party, to ſuccour them that were then in fight, who were almoſt tired, and Prince Alexander far engaged. But ſeeing theſe unexpected Succours, he and his Men recovered their Forces, and their Enemies were ſo much amaſed at it, as that all them that remained alive were put to rout, and fled.

Stephano's Army defeated.

But

The flight of Stephano.

Alexander proclaimed Prince of Moldavia.

But Stephano (being naturally a Coward) apprehending blows, had retired himſelf to the reſt of his Foot-men, who had not yet come to fight, making a ſhew that he would rather dye with them than fly away: but ſeeing the Event of this laſt Charge, and his Horſemen all in rout, he ſoon reſolved to ſave himſelf by flight, having never given one ſtroke in this Battel. The Footmen which remained, being about four thouſand men, ſeeing the ſucceſs of the Battel, yielded to the mercy of the Victors, and cryed out, God ſave Alexander, Vayvod of Moldavia. The day of the Victory, Prince Alexander made his Entry into the City of Yas, having the Princes Coresky and Viſnouisky on either ſide, after whom followed his whole Army. Entering into the Caſtle, he was there proclaimed Prince and Vayvod of Moldavia by all the Nobles and Boyers of the Country, the which he would never accept untill that time. The next day, Prince Alexander underſtanding that a great number of the chiefeſt of the Inhabitants of Yas were fled into the Mountains and Forreſts to attend the Events of theſe Troubles, he ſent certain Boyers to invite them to return back again (with all aſſurance) to their Houſes, cauſing part of his Army to diſlodge, and to be quartered in the Country thereabouts; and there were one thouſand and five hundred Foot, and five hundred Horſe (under the leading of Prince Coresky) ſent to the City of Vaſſelloy, for that Stephano had fled that way, and might return back again into Moldavia. As for the Artillery, ſome were ſent into Polonia, and ſome were put into the Fort of Cochina, the which is as it were the Arſenal of Moldavia.

Ambaſſadors ſent by Prince Alexander to the Grand Seignior.

At the ſame time, Prince Alexander, knowing that it was no leſs Glory to preſerve than to get, he called the chief Noblemen of his Court to Counſel, to reſolve what was fit to do to maintain him in his Eſtate, which he had newly gotten by the Sword: where it was concluded among other things, that he ſhould ſpeedily ſend an Ambaſſador to the Grand Seignior, to let him underſtand that he had never any intent to take Arms againſt his Majeſty, nor to withdraw Moldavia from his Obedience; but that he had been ſought unto being in Polonia, and invited by the Boyers of Moldavia, for the unſpeakable Cruelties of the Vayvod Stephano, who had reſolved to root out the Nobility of the ſaid Country, having put many of the chief to death without any occaſion. They had alſo charge to give the Sultan to underſtand, That when his Majeſty advanced Stephano to be Vayvod of Moldavia, he had falſely ſuggeſted that he was Son to a Prince of Moldavia; that he was not truly advertiſed by his Baſſaes and Counſellors, that his Predeceſſor had promiſed to the deceaſed Father of Prince Alexander, and to Prince Simeon his Uncle, that after his Deceaſe his Sons ſhould ſucceed him in the ſaid Eſtate, if they ſhewed not themſelves unworthy, and did pay the yearly Tribute of forty thouſand Chequines, which Tribute, ſince the Death of Jeremy, had been offered by Prince Conſtantine his eldeſt Son, to Houſſine Aga, when as he was ſent to ſettle the ſaid Stephano, as alſo that Prince Alexander promiſed to pay it hereafter; and if need ſhould be, he would give Prince Bougdan, his Brother, as a ſure and certain pledge for the performance of his Promiſes during the firſt year.

Prince Alexander's Ambaſſadors put to Death by Stephano.

The Ambaſſadors having received theſe Inſtructions, they took their Journey ſpeedily to Conſtantinople; but inſtead of paſſing through Thrace, which was their directeſt courſe, they were forced to go by Tranſilvania, fearing to be hindered by the men of War which then troubled all Thrace. Coming to Buda, they went to ſalute the Baſſa which commanded there, who being a ſpecial Friend to Stephano, put them in Priſon, violating the Law of Nations obſerved by the moſt barbarous; and afterwards he ſent them to Braille, whither the Tyrant Stephano had fled. They ſay he gave fifteen thouſand Chequino's in recompence to the Baſſa, and to revenge himſelf in ſome ſort of Prince Alexander in the Perſons of his Ambaſſadors, he cauſed their Heads to be cut off one night after Supper, and their Bodies to be caſt into the Danowe. The Deaths of theſe Ambaſſadors were very prejudicial to Prince Alexander, by means whereof the Grand Seignior was not truly advertiſed of what had paſt in Moldavia, nor received the Complements, Offers, and Submiſſion of Prince Alexander, ſo as he was wonderfully incenſed againſt him, and ſware his Ruine, as you ſhall hear hereafter.

Stephano returns into Moldavia.

Stephano having received four thouſand men from Michna Prince of Valachia, and gathered together the Relicks of his ſcattered Army, he marched toward Valachia; whereof Prince Alexander being advertiſed, he ſent Prince Coresky with ſix thouſand Horſe, Polonians and Coſſacks, to Ticouch, a ſtrong Frontier Town, to guard that Paſſage: And Prince Alexander and Viſnouisky they ſtayed at Yas with the reſt of the Army to preſerve the Country, and to prevent all Alterations in favour of Stephano, who had ſome Intelligencers. Within few days after, the Prince had news that the Inhabitants of Horreova (a Country in Moldavia containing about fifteen or ſixteen French Leagues in Circuit) were in Arms, and had joyned with a great Troop of Tartarians to come and inveſt him, knowing well that Prince Coresky was otherwiſe employed with part of the Polonian Army. Alexander ſtayed not to have theſe Rebels come to Yas, but ſent Viſnouisky, his Brother-in-law, with ſuch Forces as he could draw together, to encounter with them. They met together within two Leagues of the City, where Viſnouisky charged the Tartarians with ſuch fury, as half of them were ſlain upon the place, and the reſt of them fled: there were a great number of Priſoners taken, and all the poor Inhabitants of Horreova were brought unto Yas in token of triumph. The dead being numbered, there were found about eight hundred Tartarians and others ſlain, and of the Polonians only fifty, and ſome hundred hurt.

The Inhabitants of Horreova defeated with the Tartarians.

Prince Alexander, having received News of this Defeat, was wonderfully glad, and went preſently to Horſe-back with his Company of French, which he had only reſerved about him, to go and meet with Viſnouisky, and to congratulate his happy Victory. This being done with many Complements and Embracings, he caſt his eye upon the poor Inhabitants of Horreova, whom they led like a Troop of Sheep, and had ſuch Commiſeration on them, as he preſently ſent them back again, having taken their Oath of Fidelity, hoping that this his Clemency would draw the moſt Factious to Obedience, having formerly tried the Oppreſſions of a moſt cruel Prince. Prince Alexander having given Thanks to God for this new and unexpected Victory, he ſent a Gentleman unto Prince Coresky, to advertiſe him thereof, who at the ſame inſtant was buſie to diſpoſe of his Troops to meet with Stephano, who returned into Moldavia. The Encounter was in a plain Champaine, having on the one ſide the River of Sirette, the which divides Moldavia from Valachia: the Skirmiſh continued from ten of the Clock untill it was Noon, with like advantage; but Prince Coresky being advertiſed that Stephano was in a Squadron of Horſe which was ſome two hundred Paces diſtant from him, he joyned unto his Troop four hundred Gerbeys, who were well armed, and led by a very valiant Captain, with the which he charged him with ſuch violence and fury, as he forced them to give back, yet fighting in ſuch ſort, as the Event ſeemed to be doubtful: the which being diſcovered by another of the Prince's Captains, who led a Troop of five hundred light horſe, he came ſo fitly to ſuccour him, as Stephano and his Horſe-men were forced to fly, whom the Prince purſued and cut in pieces. Stephano eſcaped with a Troop which he had reſerved rather for the guard of his Perſon than to fight. Prince Coresky, at his return from the chaſe of his Enemies, cauſed the dead to be numbred, where he found, that of Stephano's ſide were three thouſand and four hundred men ſlain upon the place, beſides thoſe that were Priſoners and wounded; and of his part only three hundred and fifty.

Stephano defeated the ſecond time.

Preſently after this Victory, the ſeaſon of the year being cold (it being the twelfth of November) Prince Coresky put his Troops into Garriſon, and returned with one hundred and fifty Horſe to Yas, where he was received with much Honour and Joy. The Princeſs, Mother to Alexander, was yet in Poland; but being advertiſed of her Sons fortunate Succeſs, ſhe returned to Yas, and brought with her Prince Bougdan her youngeſt Son, with Alexandrina her Daughter, who was yet to marry. At whoſe Arrival there was great feaſting and joy; then they began to treat of a Marriage betwixt Prince Coresky and the Princeſs Alexandrina, the which had been then conſummated, if Bellona had not oppoſed it, ſtirring up new and more powerful Armies than the precedent, to exerciſe the Virtues and Valours of the ſaid Princes, and to try the Patience of the two Lovers, who loved one another reciprocally from their Youth.

A falſe Alarm given to Alexander.

To continue the deduction of new Affairs which troubled the quiet of the ſaid Princes more than ever, you muſt underſtand, That about the end of November this Year 1615, they were advertiſed, that Michna Prince of Valachia, with a Baſſa called Hebraim, came againſt them with an Army of forty thouſand men, Turks, Tartarians, and Valachians, to ſuccour the Vayvod Stephano; and moreover, that Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Tranſilvania, had Charge from the Grand Seignior to arm againſt them, and to aſſail them; which in effect was a falſe Alarm; for the ſaid Baſſa had been ſent by the Grand Seignior to bring Caphtanes (which are Robes of Cloth of Gold which the Grand Seignior doth uſually ſend in favour to Princes that are under his power) both to Michna and Stephano, who he held to be in peaceable poſſeſſion of Moldavia, but not with any Army, nor with an intent to make War againſt the ſaid Princes; for he was yet ignorant what had paſſed againſt Stephano. Notwithſtanding, the Princes holding this Advertiſement to be true, aſſembled a Council of the chief Noblemen in Court, where it was reſolved, That an Ambaſſador ſhould be ſpeedily ſent to Prince Michna, both to know his Intent, and to diſcover whether he marched toward Moldavia, and with what Forces. This Charge was given unto a brave Gentleman of Polonia called Boyartſtky, who parted preſently from Yas; and being entered into Valachia, he underſtood that Prince Michna was then in his Town of Bonza, ſome twenty French Leagues diſtant from the Frontiers of Moldavia. The Ambaſſador being arrived, demanded Audience before Michna, by whom he was ſent unto the Baſſa, who at his firſt Entrance (without hearing the Subject of his Ambaſſage) demanded who had made his Maſter Alexander ſo bold, as to carry Arms in the Country of the Grand Seignior without his Authority; for the which he ſhould be puniſhed, and thoſe that did aſſiſt him; commanding the Ambaſſador preſently to be put in Irons, as if he had been a Thief, or ſome miſerable Caitiff. The Ambaſſador's Servants, ſeeing how they entreated their Maſter, eſcaped as they could, fearing the like; who returning to Yas, informed Prince Alexander what had paſſed, aſſuring him, that Michna had no Army ready, nor any intent to enter into Moldavia at that time. The Baſſa, diſdaining to ſpeak any more to the ſaid Ambaſſador, he gave charge to ſome of his Officers to examine him particularly of all matters concerning Alexander, and what Forces he had: and within few days after he returned to Conſtantinople, leading the ſaid Ambaſſador thither with him. But as ſoon as they were arrived, they ſent the Ambaſſador unto the Divano, where he was again examined by a Viſier, and in the end he was condemned by him to the Gallies, there to remain perpetually. So little account do theſe barbarous People make to violate the Law of Nations, eſpecially with Chriſtians, preſuming that all the World ſhould bow unto them, as if they were Gods upon Earth.

An Ambaſſador from Prince Alexander to Prince Michna.

Alexander's Ambaſſador put in Priſon by the Baſſa.

Prince Alexander ſends an Ambaſſador to Bethlem Gabor.

There was another Ambaſſador ſent by Prince Alexander unto Bethlem Gabor, who was Prince of Tranſilvania, being at Furevar or Alba-Julia, whom he received very courteouſly; to whom the Ambaſſador delivered the Subject of his Charge: That Prince Alexander, his Maſter, had been advertiſed, that he made ſome levy of men to joyn with Michna Prince of Valachia, and to make War againſt him; the which he could not eaſily believe, for that he had made profeſſion of Friendſhip to his deceaſed Father, and had no cauſe now to leave it; intreating and conjuring him, not to meddle in the Affairs which he had to decide with Michna; and that in requital (if any occaſion were offered to ſerve him) he would employ all his means. The Ambaſſador having ended his Speech, he delivered his Princes Letters of Credit; to whom Bethlem Gabor made this Anſwer, That he never had any intent to take Arms, nor to attempt any thing againſt Prince Alexander, whoſe Father was his true Friend; neither would he ever give any cauſe to diſcontinue this Love and Friendſhip betwixt them, whereof he would give good proof in all occaſions, eſpecially in this Subject now in queſtion. The Ambaſſador was much ſatisfied with this Anſwer, the which was alſo confirmed by Letters; yet notwithſtanding he afterwards levied Forces againſt Prince Alexander, but he would not joyn with Michna's Army.

To return to the courſe of our Hiſtory; Preſently after the Baſſa's Departure from Cicouch to return to Conſtantinople, Prince Michna ſent an Ambaſſador to Alexander with Letters, by the which he excuſed himſelf for the ill uſage of his Ambaſſador by the Baſſa, proteſting, that he was much grieved, and that it was not with his Conſent that he had carried him with him, promiſing him to employ his beſt means to mediate his Delivery. Moreover, that he was not ignorant what Authority and Power the Grand Seignior had over him, whom he might not reſiſt, nor by conſequence his Baſſaes; that he had no Army on foot, as he was given to underſtand, and that his deſign was not to ſupport the Cauſe of the Vayvod Stephano, unleſs he were forced by the Commandment of the Grand Seignior. And whereas he intreated him to deliver his Enemy Stephano into his hands, he could not do it, unleſs he ſhould violate the Laws of Hoſpitality, in betraying his Friend, who had fled unto him for ſuccour, and withal, he ſhould incur the Indignation of the Sultan, and be in danger to be diſpoſſeſſed of his own Eſtate, having no ſufficient means to maintain himſelf againſt ſo great a Power. Prince Alexander, having heard this Ambaſſador, and received an Anſwer from the Prince of Tranſilvania, by the Advice of his Council diſmiſſed all his Foot-men, and part of the Coſſacks, retaining only five or ſix thouſand men with him during the Winter.

Prince Viſnouisky poiſoned by a Prieſt.

Skinder Baſſa comes with an Army againſt Prince Alexander.

Stephano's men defeated by the Coſſacks.

About this time there was one of the moſt curſed and impious Acts committed that ever was heard of. Prince Viſnouisky, who was a Proteſtant of the Greek Church, having prepared at Chriſtmas to receive the Communion after their manner, the Prieſt (who had uſually ſerved him in that Devotion, being corrupted with money by his Enemies) poiſoned the Bread; which the Prince having received, he ſuddenly fell ſick, and his Torments were ſo violent, as he died the next day. This bred a ſuſpition that he had been poiſoned; whereupon the Prieſt was apprehended, who preſently confeſſed that he was guilty, and had been provoked by his Enemies. As his offence was terrible, being committed by a man of that Coat, who had made uſe of ſo reverent a Sacrament to poiſon a Prince beloved of all men for his rare Virtues; ſo his Puniſhment was very ſevere and long, being bound in a Chair made of Copper-wire, and a fire made round about him, ſo as he was heard for twelve hours crying out fearfully for the inſupportable Pains which he endured. Whilſt that Prince Alexander and his whole Court mourned for this fatal and unexpected accident, there arrived a Spy which he had ſent into Valachia to obſerve the Actions of Prince Michna, who gave him to underſtand, that there was a Baſſa arrived called Skinder, with a great and powerful Army, and that Stephano was there in like manner, who preſſed them daily to march into Moldavia; and to begin the War, he ſent four hundred men to ſurpriſe the Town of Berlada, whereas Prince Coresky had left part of his men in Garriſon during the Winter; who keeping bad guard, were ſurpriſed, and moſt of them cut in pieces; which ſo puffed up Stephano with Pride, as he aſſured himſelf of an eaſie Victory. But Prince Alexander, hearing of this Defeat, he ſent four hundred Coſſacks, who made ſuch ſpeed, as within three days after they arrived at Berlada, a Town not walled, no more than the reſt; where, having ſet fire in many places, they forced his men to come forth, cutting them in pieces, and the reſt were burnt; ſo as there eſcaped not above five or ſix to carry this bad news unto their Maſter, who was much afflicted.

A Defeat of Turks at Vaſſelloy.

The Baſſa's Kinſman taken.

At the ſame inſtant, when as the Coſſacks were ſent upon this Expedition, Prince Coresky, deſiring to be revenged for the Defeat of his men, took two thouſand and five hundred choice Horſe, and put himſelf into Vaſſelloy, fearing the Garriſon he had left there would be in like manner ſurpriſed; whereof the Baſſa being advertiſed by ſome of the Country-men, he ſent his Son (being twelve or thirteen years old) and gave him an old Turk, of great experience, for his Conductor, with ſeven thouſand men, holding this a good occaſion to get Reputation to his Son. Prince Coresky being advertiſed of his March by ſome Moldavians, and that they ſhould ſurpriſe them early in the morning, knowing that they were of neceſſity to paſs a Bridge of Wood over a River that runs by the Town, he diſpoſed his men in ſuch ſort, as that the Enemy could hardly diſcover them; ſome of them were lodged within Vaſſelloy, and the reſt were covered with a little mountain that adjoyned upon the Town: when as ſome of the Turks had paſſed the Bridge, two Squadrons ſallied from the Town, and charged their forward ſo furiouſly, as they were in a manner all put to the Sword, and amongſt them the Conductor of the whole Troop, the which was no difficult thing to execute; for that the Turks, who had marched in a manner all night, to arrive early in the morning, were benummed and half dead with Cold: the reſt of the Turks which had not yet paſt, hearing the noiſe of this hot Alarm, durſt not advance, but retired ſpeedily, fearing perchance that the Baſſa's Son might be loſt as well as his Conductor. Prince Coresky purſued them unto a Village four Leagues diſtant from Vaſſelloy, killing and taking Priſoners all he found in the way. Among the Priſoners there was one who gave it out that he was near Kinſman unto the Baſſa; who being brought to Prince Alexander, he received him very courteouſly, and gave him a Garment fit for him, having been ſtript of his own; he alſo gave him a Horſe, and ſent him back unto the Baſſa with a good Convoy, to whom he ſent a Letter, by the which he intreated him not to advance in favour of Stephano, promiſing, that if the Grand Seignior would ſuffer him to enjoy Moldavia quietly, he would be moſt faithful unto him afterwards, and pay him the yearly accuſtomed Tribute: whereof the Baſſa made no great account; for he was wonderfully incenſed, both for his Sons bad ſucceſs in this Enterpriſe, and for the death of his Turkiſh Captain.

Eight hundred of Prince Alexander's men ſlain by their Hoſts for their Inſolencies.

Upon the day of this Victory, Prince Alexander ſent fifteen hundred Horſe to fortifie Prince Coresky, whereof eight hundred were lodged in a certain Borough ſix Leagues from Ticouth, whereas the Baſſa and Michna were then with their Army; being about five and twenty thouſand men. Theſe eight hundred men neglecting their Guards, did nothing but drink drunk, and moleſt their Hoſts with all kind of Inſolencies, and forcing their Wives and Daughters, which made them take a Reſolution to be revenged, and to that end they called unto them certain Boyers out of the Country, who chuſing their time, cut all their Throats when they were aſleep, and moſt of them drunk.

Prince Alexander retires to Cochina.

About the end of this Year, Prince Alexander called a General Council, whereas the Princeſs, his Mother, Prince Coresky, and all the chief Noblemen and Captains aſſiſted, where it was reſolved that they ſhould retire to Cochina, being thirty French Leagues off; for that it was the ſtrongeſt place and the beſt furniſhed of all Moldavia, and withal they ſhould be far from their Enemies, and near unto Polonia. According to this Reſolution, Prince Alexander parted the next day with his whole Army, and came in four days march to Cochina, in the extreameſt cold Seaſon that could be; having lodged his Troops, the Princes ſent divers Gentlemen to all their Friends and Confederates, to conjure them to come ſpeedily to ſuccour them; and in the mean time they gave order to make proviſion of Victuals, and of all other things neceſſary for their Army. The Baſſa being advertiſed of this Retreat, he marched with Michna and Stephano towards Yas, notwithſtanding the extremity of the Cold, which was ſo violent, that many died upon the way; whereupon they ſtayed untill the time was more mild.

Succours come to Prince Alexander.

In the beginning of March, the Lord of Tiſchevich, came unto Prince Alexander with 3500 Coſſacks, and within few days after arrived the Lord Potosky, Nephew to him who had been taken at the firſt Battel, and carried Priſoner to Conſtantinople, who brought with him a Troop of fifteen hundred Polonians well armed; there came alſo other Succours unto him, ſo as by the end of that Month

Month the Princes Army was ten or twelve thouſand ſtrong Foot and Horſe.

Some of them defeated.

Prince Alexander, hearing of the Enemies approach, ſent forth 1000 Horſe with his Company of French Cavaliers to diſcover the Enemies Army, who ſtaying to refreſh themſelves within half a League of the Town of Eſpanocha, whereas Michna's Tartarians were lodged: they were diſcovered and preſently inveſted by them and by a great number of Turks; and although that there were little hope to reſiſt ſo great a Multitude, yet Alexanders Men (who had always been accuſtomed to vanquiſh) behaved themſelves very valiantly, deſiring rather to die, than to yield baſely without giving proofs of their Valour. This fight continued from ten of the Clock in the Morning, until Night; and of the whole Troop there eſcaped but twelve, ſeven Polonians, and five French, the reſt were either ſlain or taken Priſoners, among the which was the Captain of the French Company called Mounteſpin, whom they would have ſent with the reſt unto the Grand Seigniors Gallies: But Stephano preſerved him, upon promiſe that he would do him good Service. Here Fortune (which hath hitherto been favourable unto Prince Alexander) began to ſhew her Inconſtancy, to teach Princes not to run raſhly into Dangers, although they have had ſome Advantage over their Enemies.

Jeſuits at Conſtantinople accuſed.

At Conſtantinople, about the end of Auguſt this Year 1616, Envy, the moſt furious of all the Winds that ſhake the Affairs of the World, ſtirred up a horrible Tempeſt, whoſe violent Guſts fell dangerouſly upon the Jeſuits ſetled at Pera by the Sultans Permiſſion, at the Perſwaſion of Henry the Fourth, the French King; and labours to caſt them upon the Rocks where they might ſuffer Shipwrack, ſhameful to their Order, and prejudicial to the Chriſtians, which live in the midſt of Mahometiſm. And to ruine them without all hope of help or relief, they accuſed them before the Grand Viſier, to be Spies to Spain; to give Abſolution to Renegadoes; to baptize Turks, to conceal fugitive Slaves, and to ſend them into Chriſtendom; and withal they objected the Doctrine of killing of Kings, if they were Tyrants, the which had been raſhly written by a Spaniard of their Coat: all which Crimes are commonly puniſhed at Conſtantinople with Death. They ſeiſed upon their Perſons, and lodged them in a Dungeon, they were ſix in number, that is to ſay, Francis Bouton, Denis Guilier, Dominick Maurice of Chio, and John Baptiſta Jobert their Superiour, all four Prieſts, and two Aſſiſtants, and with them a Franciſcan Friar, Vicar to the Patriarch of Conſtantinople. A ſuſpition of Danger in an Eſtate is eaſily believed upon the leaſt accident. In the mean time the Emperours Ambaſſador came to Conſtantinople, to renew the Truce; they entered with their Drums beating, and their Enſigns diſplayed. They which thought to erect Trophies to their Glory by their Ruine of the Jeſuits, made uſe of this entry, and gave falſe Advertiſements to the Seraglio, that there were in Conſtantinople, and at Pera, many thouſands of Chriſtians diſguiſed in the Habits of Greeks and Turks, which came with this Ambaſſadour, with an intent to put that in Execution which the Jeſuits had projected. Moreover, they informed the Grand Viſier, and the Muphti, that the Churches in Pera, and the Ambaſſadors Houſes were full of Arms; and that now when as the Turks Eſtate, and eſpecially Conſtantinople, was unprovided of Forces, having employed their Armies in divers Places, and at one inſtant, as in Poland, Perſia, and both the Seas, that they meant to draw the Greeks into Rebellion, and give an entry to the Coſſacks, by the black Sea. The Sultan and his Baſſaes took an alarm, they commanded every man to wear the Habit of his own Nation, with a prohibition to wear any Hat except the Franks, and they to wear a Grecian Habit; they alſo enrolled all the Chriſtians in Conſtantinople and Pera. But the Sultan did not think his City of Conſtantinople free from the danger of ſurpriſe by this diligent ſearch, but he would ſeek his aſſurance in the Blood of Chriſtians; ſo as he commanded that all the Franks ſhould be ſlain, without exception. But yet this Commandment took no effect, by reaſon of the Remonſtrances which the Grand Viſier and the Muphti made him, repreſenting unto him, that by this Cruelty he ſhould draw upon his Eſtate a dangerous War from all the Chriſtian Princes in General. But all this freed him not from fear, he walks all Night on Horſeback up and down the City, contrary to his Cuſtom, and he cauſeth a Friar, Vicar to the Patriarch, who had been taken with the Jeſuits, to be executed in his Preſence; and he doth expreſly forbid the Paſſage from Conſtantinople to Pera, and from Pera to Conſtantinople. During this Prohibition, the French Ambaſſador had paſt from Pera to the City, to ſollicite the Jeſuits Liberty. At his return he found the Paſſage ſtopt, he goes unto the Muphti, and leaves his People in the mean time at the Sea ſide (for it is the Cuſtom, to go to the Soveraign of Mahomets Law with a ſmall Train) during the time of his being there, a Multitude of People ran down to the Shore, to ſee theſe Men, thinking for certain, that they went to put them to Death: They lamenting their miſerable Fortune, and the Turks charging them furiouſly with Injuries, as the Men whom they thought practiſed by Conſpiracy their ruine. But the Grand Viſier having written with his own Hand, and ſent one of his People to them that kept the Paſſage, the Ambaſſador with his whole Train was ſuffered to paſs to Pera, but he found the Storm as raging at Pera, as from whence he came: for one Night after, the People of that Place fell into ſuch a Fury, as it was to be feared the Law of Nations would have been violated by the Inſolency of ſome furious People, although the Subject were of ſmall Importance. About five hundred Paces from the French Ambaſſadours quarter, there fell out a Diſpute in a Lodging, betwixt ſome who ſpent the Night in ſome kind of Employment; the Turks that dwelt near, being awaked with this Noiſe, ran to Arms, and trooped together in the Street, being in all 1000 men armed, crying out, that this Noiſe came from the Francks, (that is to ſay, from the Chriſtians in the Weſt, as Italians, French, Spaniſh, Engliſh, and others) who meant to riſe; and they reſolved to force the Ambaſſadors Houſes, and to put all to Fire and Sword, if ſome better adviſed of the Troop had not perſwaded them to delay the Execution until day, the which being come, the French Ambaſſador had means to get the Sultan to interpoſe his Sovereign Authority, to bridle the Inſolency of a Multitude inconſiderately incenſed. Such is the danger, in the which many times the Miniſters of Chriſtian Princes find themſelves, who for their Maſters Service live at the Mercy of a Nation barbarouſly furious, as the Turkiſh:

They are impriſoned.

A Tumult at Pera.

The Jeſuits ſet at Liberty.

The Jeſuits in the mean time continued Priſoners in the Dungeon, until that the Baron of Sanſy, Ambaſſadour for France, had let the Grand Viſier ſee their Innocency, and procured their Liberty, and the Sultan by his Letters Patents did publiſh the falſhood of the malicious Accuſations invented againſt them; but to avoid the Fury of a Multitude, blind in their Paſſions, and dangerous in their fury, they went to Sea, to return to France; but after they had ſojourned ſometime at the Dardanels, they were again committed to Priſon, by reaſon of ſome certain advertiſement that was given to the Sultan of the ſame ſubſtance: The Sultan informed himſelf truly of their Probity, gave them their liberty, calling back two to Pera, to live there, with the ſame Priviledges they formerly had, and ſuffered the reſt to return into France.

Alexander, Prince of Moldavia, having loſt a thouſand Horſe near unto Cochina, the laſt year, as you have heard, the Baſſa and Stephano were puft up with this good Succeſs; but Michna had no joy of it, who, hearing that the Princes attended him at Cochina, with a Reſolution to defend themſelves, remembring that a certain Italian making a Profeſſion to foretell future things, had told him, That if he ever came to fight with the Polonians, he would be in danger of his life: wherefore, by the Advice of his Chancellor and Camp-Maſter, called Spaterlecha, he pretended, that he had received News from his Lieutenant, that there was a great Troop of Tartarians entred into Valachia, and ſpoiled the Country; upon which Pretext he took leave of the Baſſa, and returned, leaving all his Souldiers in the Army, reſerving only an hundred Horſe for his Guard. Being in Valachia, Stephano wrote unto him, that he had defeated the Polonians in Battel, in the which there were ſlain ſix thouſand men upon the place, and had taken a great number of Priſoners, which they meant to ſend to the Grand Seignior: all which was but a meer Invention to mock Michna, and to make him ſorry that he was not in the Action: whereupon he was ſo much diſcontented, as he cauſed the Heads of his Chancellor and Camp-maſter to be cut off, for their bad Counſel, charging them that they had ſome ſecret Intelligence with the Polonians.

Michna fears to fight with the Polonians.

The Baſſa and Stephano defeated at Cochina.

About the end of March, the Baſſa, with Stephano, and a Tartarian Prince called Monoza, reſolved to advance with their whole Army (being twenty thouſand men) towards Cochina; and being within two Leagues, they made a ſtand a whole day to refreſh their men. In the mean time the Princes put their Army in order of Battel, in a little Plain within a quarter of a League of Cochina, leaving a thouſand choice Horſe within the Town under the Command of Prince Coresky, aſſuring themſelves that the Turks would not fail to camp betwixt the Town and the Prince's Army, that if they were defeated, they might have no means to retire into the Fort, which was held impregnable. The Princes drew eight pieces of Cannon out of the Fort, which they planted within a Trench which was covered with a Wood. The Baſſa on the other ſide thought that he had the Princes at his mercy, being advertiſed that they had not half ſo many men in their Army: early in the morning he cauſed his men to march in good order, who arrived near to Cochina by ſeven of the clock in the morning, where, having made a ſtand to diſcover the Princes Army, he went and incamped betwixt them and the Town, as it had been foreſeen. His men being put in order, the Tartarians, who had a great deſire to be revenged of the Coſſacks, who had defeated them in many Encounters, intreated to have the Point; the which was granted, and the Trumpets ſounding, they advanced towards a Battalion of Coſſacks, nothing diſtruſting the Cannon which was planted on that ſide, and not ſeen. Coming within the ſhot, they preſently played upon them, and overthrew a great number of the Tartarians, and terrified the reſt, the which the Coſſacks perceiving, they charged them furiouſly, and cut the reſt in pieces, and ſo retired towards their Army, ſeeing another Squadron of Valachians and Moldavians come to ſuccour the Tartarians. The Lord of Tiſchevich, with his Troop of fifteen or ſixteen hundred Horſe well armed, went to encounter the ſaid Squadron, which advanced bravely towards the Princes Cannon. The Combate was long without any ſhew of Advantage, which made the Marſhal of the Turks Army to ſend three thouſand Turks to ſuccour them: and the Princes cauſed a Squadron of Coſſacks and Moldavians to advance, who carried themſelves ſo valiantly, as they forced the Turks to retire above an hundred Paces. Then Prince Alexander cried out, Now my Companions, behold the Enemy is in diſorder, let us charge them reſolutely, and the Victory is certain. After which he advanced with the reſt of his Army, commanding two Cannons to be ſhot off together, for a ſign to Prince Coresky that he might ſally forth, and charge the Turks Rereward, as it had been reſolved: but he ſtayed not for the Signal, being already advanced above three hundred Paces, fearing that the Party would be ended without him, or that he ſhould fail at need.

The Baſſa ſeeing this Stratagem, which he feared not, and the bad ſucceſs of his men which he had ſent to fight, and that he was charged both before and behind, he began to be amazed, and having cauſed a Squadron of two thouſand Horſe, Turks and Valachians, to advance to ſecond his Troops, he retired apart with Stephano (who was no leſs afraid than himſelf) with the reſt of the Turkiſh Cavalry, to attend the event of the Battel. There was never a more furious Combate ſeen (which continued for the ſpace of two hours) full of fearful Howlings of Turks, who in the end fainted, ſeeing no Succours come unto them; whereas if the Baſſa and the cowardly Stephano had joyned with them, they had without doubt fortified their Carriages, and renewed their Forces, and by all appearance won the Victory, which they loſt beyond all mens Expectation. When as the Baſſa and Stephano ſaw that their Forces were in rout, and no means to draw them again together, they began to make a Retreat with above two thouſand Horſe, which had not yet fought: in the mean time, the Princes Tiſchevich and Coresky, (like two Thunderbolts of War) cut all in pieces they could meet; and fearing leſt they ſhould make a new head, the Princes drew all their men together, and made a ſtand upon the Place of Battel, not ſuffering their Souldiers to go to the Spoil, before they were aſſured that the Enemy was retired in great haſte, fearing the Princes would have purſued them, the which they would willingly have done, if their Men and Horſes had not been almoſt tired in the former Battel, in which there was ſlain above twelve thouſand men, beſides the Wounded and Priſoners.

Flight of the Baſſa and Stephano.

Prince Alexander being returned to Cochina, with the other Princes and Noblemen, they gave Thanks to God for the Victory they had obtained againſt the Turks and their Confederates; and there was much joy with the Princeſs and all the Ladies, who were retired into the Fort, attending the Event of this fearful Battel. Prince Coresky burned with deſire to enjoy his Miſtreſs, whom he loved as his own life; ſo as by a free conſent of all Parties, they were married within two days after the Victory, to the great content of all the Court.

Prince Coresky marries with the Princeſs Alexandrina.

Whilſt that the Princes began to enjoy the Fruits of their Victory, the Baſſa and wretched Stephano returned to Yas, but finding no ſafety there, they parted preſently; the Baſſa to Conſtantinople, and the Tyrant into Valachia to Prince

Michna,

A Defeat of 400 of Michna's men.

Prince Michna and Stephano fly from Bonza.

Michna, who was his only ſupport, notwithſtanding that he had mocked him apparently. But before this Wretch departed from Yas (having no hope ever to return again) he cauſed the Town to be ſet on fire in many places; ſo as of two and twenty thouſand Houſes, there were not above ſix hundred untouched. The Princes having advice hereof, in the beginning of April, they marched ſpeedily thither; where finding it ſo deſolate, they reſolved to purſue Stephano into Valachia, and puniſh him according to his deſerving. The next day they marched towards Valachia, being to paſs the River of Siretta, there being on the other ſide a Borough in which Michna had four hundred men in Garriſon, to keep the Frontiers. The Princes arriving at this place, the Garriſon put themſelves in defence; but they were ſoon forced and cut in pieces, ſo as there eſcaped not one; and as for the Inhabitants, they were well intreated, having made no reſiſtance, and withal, they hated Michna for the Vexations they received from the ſaid Garriſon. The Army having reſted there three days, advanced with all ſpeed towards the City of Bonza, whereas Michna then remained with wretched Stephano, who had no care but to make good cheer. The Army being come within a League of Bonza, it was diſcovered by ſome Country-men, who ran to advertiſe their Prince, wiſhing him to ſave himſelf ſpeedily, for that they had diſcovered the Polonian Army near the City. Michna was ready to ſit down to dinner, having invited Stephano to accompany him; but he was ſo amazed at this unexpected coming of the Princes, as he ran himſelf to his Stable, and mounted upon the firſt Horſe he could find, without Saddle, and ſo took his way towards Tergoviſt, being followed by few of his People, one of which gave him his own Horſe, which was better furniſhed; and as for Stephano, having ſadled his own Horſe, he fled all alone towards Nicopolis.

Prince Alexander refuſeth the Eſtate of Valachia.

The Princes being entred Bonza without reſiſtance, they were wonderfully grieved that they had not found Stephano, which was their whole Deſign, and that Prince Michna (to whom they intended no harm) had been ſo amazed. The Army, at their firſt Entrance, ſpoiled the City, which the Princes could not hinder, nor yet the raviſhing of many Wives and Virgins, which drew the Wrath of God upon them, and in all appearance was the true cauſe of the Miſeries which afterward befell the Princes. During their Abode at Bonza to refreſh their men, many Boyers or Noblemen of the Country (deſiring to ſhake off the Yoke of Prince Michna's Command, who governed inſolently) came unto Prince Alexander, beſeeching him to ſtay in Valachia, promiſing that the whole Nobility would willingly yield him all Obedience and Fidelity. But the Prince (having no intent to diſpoſſeſs Michna) thanked them for their good will; the which the Boyers underſtanding, they told him, that they would be glad (ſeeing he refuſed it) that Prince Cherbanne (who had been their Vayvod before Michna, and had been expelled Valachia by Bethlem Gabor, and forced to retire into Germany to the Emperour) might return and take upon him the Government of Valachia, intreating him to give him Paſſage through Moldavia if he preſented himſelf; the which Prince Alexander willingly granted, deſiring much that Prince Cherbanne were reſtored, for that Michna favoured his Enemy, and had himſelf a deſign upon the Eſtate of Moldavia, which in the end he obtained.

Michna ſends an Ambaſſador to Prince Alexander.

Prince Michna being come to Playa, which is betwixt Bonza and Tergoviſt, he ſtayed ſome days there attending his Train, during the which he ſent ſpeedily to his Wife, being at Tergoviſt, willing her to go with all ſpeed to Nicopolis, for that he feared the Princes would ſeiſe both upon them and their Eſtates, as they might eaſily have done if they had foreſeen what afterwards befell them. Michna being come to Tergoviſt, he preſently ſent an Ambaſſador to Prince Alexander, to know upon what Deſign he had entered Valachia with an Army, having no cauſe; but contrariwiſe, that he had given good Teſtimony that he was his Friend, for that he would not aſſiſt the Baſſa and Stephano when they purſued him to Cochina, notwithſtanding that they were much ſtronger in ſhew; That if his Intent were only to ſeiſe upon Stephano, he aſſured him that he was not with him, but was fled another way, promiſing, that if he could ever take him, he would deliver him into his hands; intreating him withal, to retire out of his Eſtate, not ſuffering his Army to ſpoil it any more, and that they might continue good Friends. Prince Alexander received this Ambaſſador very courteouſly, who hearing the Subject of his Embaſſy, made Anſwer, That he had the day before ſent unto his Maſter to inform him of his Intent, which was, not to attempt any thing againſt his Perſon nor Eſtate, but only to purſue Stephano, who had ſet fire on the City of Yas before he parted; and to let Michna know, That he meant not to wrong him, nor to inrich himſelf with any thing that was his, he had ſent him back his Plate, with all his rich Moveables. Michna's Ambaſſador having thanked Prince Alexander, returned to Tergoviſta, and found all true that the Prince had ſaid; the which freed Michna from farther fear.

Fifteen hundred Tartarians defeated by Troianoskey.

Before Prince Alexander's Departure from Bonza, he ſent the Lord Troianosky with two thouſand Horſe to purſue Stephano: but it was without effect; for he underſtood that he had paſſed the River of Danow with his Wife, and a ſmall train. At the ſame time a Troop of fifteen hundred Tartarians, being advertiſed that the Polonians purſued Stephano only with a thouſand Horſe, and that they were tired with their long Marches, advanced to charge them; but it was not with that Succeſs they expected: for Troianosky diſcovering them afar off in a plain champian Field, had leiſure to put his men into four Squadrons, and there attended them, who approaching near to diſcover the number of the Polonians, would gladly return without blows, but it was too late; for Troianosky commanded two of his Squadrons to charge them ſuddenly, ſo as within leſs than a quarter of an hour they were defeated, and above four hundred ſlain upon the place; the reſt fled the ſame way that they came: of the Polonians there were not above five and twenty ſlain, and about fifty hurt.

The Inhabitants of Horreova revolt the ſecond time.

The Princes had reſolved to leave Valachia, forbidding all Captains and Souldiers, upon pain of death, to carry away any Valachian of either Sex with them, hearing they had ſeiſed upon ſome, and meant to draw a Ranſome from them: after which they began to march; and being upon the way, they were advertiſed that the Inhabitants of Horreova were again revolted, and in Arms, refuſing to acknowledge Prince Alexander, or to pay the accuſtomed Tribute, unleſs he would make it appear that he was confirmed by the Grand Seignior. Prince Coresky was ſent thither with five thouſand men; whoſe coming did ſo amaze them, as they yielded without any reſiſtance. This Prince, being loth to loſe any time, laid Siege to the Town and Fort of Bialigront, ſeated upon the River of Bokou, the which was held by the Tartarians Precopences, in which Fort there was a Garriſon of Janizaries, and many Boyers of Moldavia, who defended themſelves valiantly, and made many Sallies, in which they ſlew above three hundred of the Prince's men, and he himſelf was in danger to be taken, if he had not been ſpeedily delivered by the Lord of Tiſchevich and his Troop, who charged the Janizaries ſo reſolutely, as they forced them to retire, leaving many of their men dead upon the place. The Prince ſeeing there was no hope to take the place without Cannon, raiſed his Siege, and returned to Yas to Prince Alexander.

Hebraim Baſſa writes to Prince Alexander.

Soon after, Hebraim Baſſa wrote to Prince Alexander, (as if he had been his friend) giving him to underſtand, That from thenceforth he ſhould live quietly in Moldavia, for that the Grand Seigniot's Lieutenant-General, or chief Viſier (from whom Stephano had always drawn his chief ſupport) was in diſgrace, promiſing the Prince to imploy himſelf for him to his Maſter: the which he did either to make him careleſs of his own Strength, or to draw ſome Recompence or Reward from him, if the Grand Seignior ſhould confirm him in Moldavia, as there was ſome likelihood, ſeeing that Stephano had made himſelf altogether unworthy, as well by his flight, as by his wicked Actions, which made him in the end ſo odious to the Grand Seignior, as he reſolved to ruine him. So as ſoon after they were advertiſed, that the Grand Seignior had given Commandment unto the ſaid Baſſa to ſeize upon Stephano, who had retired himſelf to Brahile, and to bring him unto him alive or dead, with whatſoever did belong unto him; the which he executed after this manner: The ſaid Baſſa marched with all diligence towards Brahile, carrying a Chiaus with him; and being within four or five Leagues of the Town, he ſent one of his people to advertiſe Stephano of his coming, and that he meant the next day to dine with him. Stephano (who diſtruſted nothing) holding the Viſier to be ſtill his friend, parted early in the morning to meet him, and coming near him he alighted from his Horſe to do him reverence, and the Baſſa did the like; where, after ſome little Conference together, he drew out the Commiſſion he had to ſeiſe upon his Perſon, and to carry him to Conſtantinople: the which Stephano perceiving, he turned him to his Servants, and willed them to ſhift for themſelves, for that he ſaw he went to his death. His men being retired, the Chiaus, who had his Mace in his hand, gave him a blow betwixt the Shoulders, and then cauſed him to be bound hand and foot, and caſt into a Cart drawn by four good Horſes: and in this manner they carried him to Conſtantinople; where being arrived, to avoid the Puniſhment he had deſerved, he denied his Faith, and became a Renegado: and withal, he became very poor and miſerable; for at the ſame inſtant that he was taken, the Baſſa ſent to ſeiſe and carry away whatſoever he had at Brahile and Nicopolis, where his Wife remained, ſo as he had nothing left him but the remorſe of Conſcience that tormented him continually, for the barbarous Cruelties which he had practiſed in Moldavia. Some of his men returned to Yas, and there declared what had befallen Stephano in their Preſence, for which they generally gave thanks unto God, and were very joyful.

Stephano in diſgrace with the Sultan.

Stephano carried to Conſtantinople and turns Turk.

Soon after, News came to Yas, that the Sultan had appointed Prince Michna to ſucceed Stephano in the Principality of Moldavia (which is very much better than that of Valachia) and that he ſent Skinder Baſſa, his General in Europe, with a powerful Army to ſettle the ſaid Michna, and to expell Alexander: the which proved ſo true, as on the 25*th* of June this year 1616, the ſaid Baſſa came to Tergoviſt, where Prince Michna attended him, with great Preparatives both to receive him, and to refreſh his Army. The Baſſa making his entry into Tergoviſt, had amongſt other things of note, thirty or forty Muſicians on Horſe-back, playing upon certain Inſtruments almoſt like unto Gitterns, which made but ſilly Muſick; he had alſo many Pages, who inſtead of Cloaks ware the Skins of Leopards, Lions, and Tygres, as if they meant to terrifie the World; and his Army conſiſted of about twenty thouſand men, ſome Turks, ſome Tartarians, to whom Michna joyned his Forces, having 10000 Horſe and Foot, which he had drawn from Valachia and the neighbour Countries. The Baſſa being entred the Caſtle, whereas Prince Michna attended him, after many Complements, they entred into a great Hall well appointed, where the Baſſa preſented him his Letters Patents, and a Robe which his Maſter had ſent to Michna, which he cauſed to be put on in the preſence of all the Noblemen of his Court, proclaiming him Prince and Vayvod of Moldavia, with many Ceremonies too long to relate. After which, Prince Michna led the Baſſa into another great Hall where a Feaſt was prepared, as well for himſelf, as for ſuch as he would admit to his Table; Michna offering to ſerve the ſaid Baſſa, but he would not ſuffer him, cauſing him to ſit down right againſt him. On the Second of July they parted from Tergoviſt, and marched into Moldavia, whereof the Polonian Princes were advertiſed: but the Princeſs, Mother to Alexander, maintained, That the Baſſa came only to bring the Patents to Prince Alexander her Son; which dangerous Opinion of hers grew by reaſon of the Letters which Hebraim Baſſa had ſent to Prince Alexander, not remembring that it came from a Turk, his ſworn Enemy, and therefore not to be credited, eſpecially in a matter of that importance, ſo as ſhe was the cauſe of their utter ruine.

Michna proclaimed Prince of Moldavia.

The Treachery of the General of Polonia.

About this time, the General of the King of Polonia's Army, called Zolkelchy, envying the Honour which the Polonian Princes had gotten by ſo many Victories, and withal drawn by his own private Intereſt, writ to Prince Michna and the Baſſa, that if they would promiſe to procure the Sultan to advance the eldeſt Son of the deceaſed Prince Simeon (who lived with him) to be Prince of Valachia (whereof his Father had been formerly Vayvod) he would ſo weaken the Prince's Army, as they ſhould be forced to yield or fly. Whoſe Demand being eaſily granted, this Traitor writ to certain Captains of the Coſſacks, that they ſhould leave the Prince's Army, and come with all ſpeed into Poland, to accompany Vladiſlaus their King's Son, who had been choſen Duke of Muſcovy, and meant to go thither with a great Army by reaſon of ſome Croſſes, and that they ſhould be very well paid. The Coſſacks (who depend upon the Crown of Poland, ſerving thoſe that promiſe moſt) began to mutiny, ſaying plainly, That if they had not money ſpeedily, they would retire into their Country, yet concealing that they had been called to any other Service; and without any long ſtay, there parted early in a morning about 8000, carrying with them great ſtore of Oxen, Sheep, and other Cattel, with all the Spoils they had got in the precedent Victories.

The Coſſacks mutiny, and leave Prince Alexander.

Bicho, General of Prince Alexander's Army, forſakes him treacherouſly.

After their Example, Bicho, General of Prince Alexander's Army, whether corrupted by Bribes, or for that he had an apprehenſion of this powerful Army which came againſt them, retired alſo ſecretly toward Michna and the Baſſa, being followed by 2000 Horſe. This was a Subject of great amazement to the Prince's Army; and yet, as if they had been inchanted by ſome devilliſh Charms, they could not reſolve to make a Retreat as they might eaſily have done without danger. Many adviſed Prince Alexander to this courſe, even Prince Michna writ unto him, adviſing him to retire into Polonia before that his Army approached nearer to Yas; the which he did for fear of the Succeſs, whereof his falſe Prophet had forewarned him, as we have formerly obſerved: whereupon Alexander went to Council on the 25*th* of July, but they could not reſolve, the Commanders and Souldiers being much divided, moſt of them demanding their Pay, elſe they would not fight; the which they took for a Pretext of their Retreat. In the mean time the Tartarians, which made the Vantguard of Prince Michna's Army, approached; which made the Princes to leave Yas, and to march toward Cochina: but they could not do it ſo ſecretly, but the Tartarians were advertiſed, who paſt ſpeedily through the City, and charged them in the Rear, in which Encounter George Potosky, Nephew to him that was taken with Conſtantine, having fought valiantly, and ſlain many Tartarians with his own hand, was in the end ſhot thorow the body with an Arrow, whereof he died preſently. The Lord of Tiſcheuich came ſpeedily to the Charge with a Troop of Coſſacks which he had ſtayed, and charged the Tartarians ſo furiouſly, as he ſlew eight hundred upon the place, and put the reſt to rout.

Prince Alexander's Anſwer to Prince Michna.

Alexander, having received the Letter above mentioned from Prince Michna, made Anſwer, that (contrary to his promiſe to continue his friend, and never to take Arms againſt him) he had craved aid from the Turk to diſpoſſeſs him of Moldavia, to the which his Predeceſſor had never pretended, neither could they according to the fundamental Laws of the Country, and the Conventions accorded by the Grand Seignior, when as the Moldavians ſubmitted themſelves under his Sovereignty, by the which no man could be Vayvod of Moldavia unleſs he were born in the Country. Moreover, he ſhould remember, that it was in his power to diſpoſſeſs him of Valachia, when as he entred Bonza with his Army in purſuit of Stephano; the which he would not do, nor detain any of his precious Moveables, which he had reſerved and ſent unto him; that if he abuſed the Power which he then had, God would not ſuffer ſo great an Ingratitude and Uſurpation to remain unpuniſhed. And although his Army were far inferiour to his, yet he would let him know, that he neither feared him nor the Baſſa, putting his chief Confidence in the aſſiſtance of the Almighty, who had in many occaſions uſed them to abate the Turks pride, which he ſhould abhor, if he were a true Chriſtian, rather than to joyn with them to ſatisfie his Ambition.

Prince Michna having ſent this Letter to Skinder Baſſa, General of the Turks Army, he was ſo incenſed, as he preſently commanded his Lieutenant to purſue the Polonians with twelve thouſand choice men, they being then at Cotnard, betwixt Yas and Cochina. Prince Alexander being advertiſed hereof, he ſuddenly cauſed his Army to advance towards the Fort of Cochina. At the ſame time, the Chancellor to Prince Cherbanne, who came with one hundred and fifty Horſe to Prince Alexander, to aſſure him that his Maſter was coming to his aid with five or ſix thouſand men, was purſued by the Turks near unto Yas, whereas he thought to have found the ſaid Prince, and of all his Troop only himſelf and one more eſcaped, ſo as the Prince could have no certain news of the ſaid Cherbanne. Prince Coresky, who had remained with two thouſand five hundred Horſe not far from Cotnard, was alſo encountred by a great Troop of Turks and Tartarians, which he could not well diſcover by reaſon of a little Mountain that covered them: the Prince ſeeing ſome of them appear, charged them; but finding, that as he defeated one Troop, a freſh ſucceeded in his place, he was forced to make his Retreat, with this advantage, that he had almoſt ſlain ſix thouſand of his Enemies, having not loſt above two hundred and fifty of his own men. But the Prince was wounded with two Arrows, one in the Thigh, and the other in the Back, which was a great diſaſter for himſelf and for the whole Army. He which commanded this Troop of Turks being much amazed at this unexpected Encounter, having gathered his men together, and joyned them to fifteen thouſand others whom the Baſſa had ſent, he being yet at Yas, he cauſed this Army to approach within a quarter of a League to the Polonians, where, having encouraged his men in what he could, he told them, that to ſhew his Affection unto the Sultan's Service in this occaſion, he was reſolved to ſend a Challenge to Prince Coresky, whom he confeſt to be the moſt valiant of all the Polonian Army, ſo as he preſently diſpatched one of his Captains to go unto the Prince, and to call him in the behalf of his General. The Captain coming to Alexander's Camp, demanded to ſpeak with Prince Coresky, who being brought unto him, delivered the Charge he had from his General. The Prince, although he were neither able to ſtand nor to ſit on Horſe-back, by reaſon of his Wounds, yet would he needs have accepted this Challenge, if Prince Alexander, and the chief Noblemen of the Army, had not conjured him to excuſe himſelf by reaſon of his Indiſpoſition; letting him know, that the event of ſuch a Combat did not only import him, but all thoſe of his Party who had their chief hope in him; whereunto the Princeſſes added their inſtant Intreaties; and among others, his dear Spouſe, who was much afflicted for his Wounds. The Lord of Tiſcheuich (a brave and valiant Gentleman) being then preſent, intreated Prince Alexander to give him leave to accept of the Challenge for Prince Coresky his Couſin; the which was willingly granted: ſo as he ſent a Gentleman with the ſaid Turk, to know if the General would yield thereunto, which he did willingly, not being ignorant of the Quality and Valour of the ſaid Tiſcheuich. It was agreed that the Combate ſhould be betwixt both Armies, lying in a plain open Field, within a quarter of a League one of another, with promiſe, that neither Party ſhould be aſſiſted.

A Challenge ſent to Prince Coresky from the Turks General.

A Combat betwixt Tiſcheuich and the General of the Turks Army.

Theſe two brave Warriours having taken leave of their Friends, came to the place appointed, in view of both Armies. The Turks General being about fifty Paces from his Army, cauſed Water to be brought, with the which he waſhed his Mouth, Eyes, Noſe, Ears, and Privy Parts, believing (according to his Law) that this waſhing would ſerve as a purifying; then turning toward the Eaſt, he made his Prayer: after which he went to Horſe-back, being richly armed and furniſhed, and then marched ſoftly towards his Adverſary, who attended him well mounted and armed, and ſo they began their Combat, their chief Arms being Bows and Arrows, which they ſpent without hurting one another; till at laſt Tiſcheuich, having a Petronel, ſhot the Turk thorow the Body, and overthrew him, who ſtriving to riſe again, Tiſcheuich paſſed over him with his Horſe, and wounded him in the right Arm, and at the next blow ſlew him: after which he cut off his head, and carried it to Prince Alexander.

The Princes of Polonia environed by their Enemies.

The Polonians were very joyful of the happy Succeſs of this famous Combate; and the Turks being much amazed, advertiſed the Baſſa and Michna, that it was neceſſary they ſhould bring the reſt of their Army and their Cannon, if they would be revenged of the Polonians. In the mean time the Traitor Bicho, who had abandoned Prince Alexander, with a Troop of two thouſand Tartarians and Moldavians, found means to get before the Polonian Army, and to cut off the way betwixt Cotnarde and the Town of Bothocan ſix Leagues off. The Valachians and Tranſilvanians, led by the General of Michna's Army, inveſted them upon the right hand, and the body of the Turks Army followed behind; ſo as there remained nothing but upon the left hand a Wood of Timber-trees which might favour their Retreat. Skinder Baſſa, hearing the Succeſs of the Combate, commanded his Army to advance preſently with ſixteen Cannons. The Princes ſeeing themſelves environed by ſo many Enemies, they reſolved to fortifie themſelves with their Carts and Carriages, and to defend themſelves; but what could five or ſix thouſand men prevail againſt two or three and twenty thouſand; for ſo many were thought to be in the Turks Army: True it is, they expected daily Prince Cherbanne, and the Lord Boſſi, who were within two days Journey, and brought with them ten or twelve thouſand men. This made the Baſſa and Michna to advance, to force the Polonians to yield or fight. Coming near unto their Camp, and ſeeing them inveſted on all ſides but towards the Wood, they approached their Cannon, which had been able to have ſpoiled their Camp, but it was not their deſign; they only deſired to take the Princes and Princeſſes Priſoners, with the chief Noble-men: Whereupon they ſent to ſummon the Polonian Army to deliver into their hands the ſaid Princes and Lords, promiſing that the reſt of the Army ſhould depart with Bag and Baggage; whereunto they would not yield, but made an Anſwer all with one conſent, That they would rather dye than commit ſuch Baſeneſs and Treachery. This being reported to the Baſſa and Prince Michna, they commanded that ſome of their Cannon ſhould be charged with ſmall Bullets, and diſcharged through the Polonian Army; whereby there were a great number ſlain and wounded. The Princes, who had but ſome ſmall pieces, made certain Vollies, but to ſmall purpoſe; neither had they any more Bullets left, and little Powder; for that by ill chance part had been burnt ſome few days before; ſo as all things ſeemed to foretell their ruine at hand The Lord of Tiſchevich, having judiciouſly obſerved, that remaining in that incloſure, he could not eſcape Death, or at leaſt Captivity, reſolved with five hundred Horſe (the moſt valiant among the Polonians) to force through three or four Squadrons which were ſet in guard by the Wood ſide, to the end none might eſcape, that Place being moſt ſuſpected to the Turks; the which they executed with ſuch fury, as they overthrew all they encountered; ſhewing, that it is a very dangerous thing to make head againſt thoſe who are reduced to that Extremity, as they muſt either vanquiſh or dye. Prince Coreskie would not have failed to have made the like Retreat, and to have carried Prince Alexander with him; but he could not ſit on Horſe-back by reaſon of his Wounds; and beſides, he had rather have died than to leave his Wife in that Extremity. His laſt refuge was to diſguiſe himſelf as well as he could, giving it out, that he had eſcaped with Tiſchevich, to the end he might paſs for a common Souldier, if the Priſoners were put to Ranſome. In like manner the Princeſſes diſguiſed themſelves in the beſt manner they could, for the like intent.

The Princes Army ſummoned to yield.

A brave retreat made by Tiſchevich.

The Turks Cannon having overthrown many of their Carriages, which ſerved as a Rampier, two Squadrons, one of Tartarians, and the other of Turks, preſented themſelves at one inſtant in two ſeveral places to force the Polonians Camp; who ſeeing no means to make reſiſtance, and to repell the Enemy, laid down their Arms, crying out with a loud Voice, That they yielded; whereat their Enemies were exceeding glad, deſiring nothing more than to take theſe Noble Princes Priſoners, and to diſpoſe of the reſt at their pleaſures. The Turks and Tartarians having entred their Camp, making ſpoil of all, and ſeiſing upon what they could lay their hands on, beginning to ſhare their Priſoners, the Princes Alexander and Bougdan, with their Mother, were delivered unto Skinder Baſſa, who led them to Conſtantinople, whereas ſoon after their arrival they forſook their God, denied their Faith, and became Renegadoes, for fear of perpetual Impriſonment, wherewith they were threatned. For which Infidelity Bougdan was preſently puniſhed; for having cauſed himſelf to be Circumciſed according to the Law of Mahomet, he died, and the Princeſs his Mother was confined to the old Seraglio. As for Prince Coreskie (in this general ruine of a Chriſtian Army being forced to yield and ſubmit it ſelf to the Turks Tyranny) he had ſo diſguiſed himſelf, as he paſt for a time unknown, and was led to Tas among the common Souldiers, where he was afterward diſcovered by a Souldier of his own Party, who obtained his liberty by this baſe treachery. The Turkiſh Captain who had gotten this Prince, hearing of his quality by the aforeſaid Villain, he led him to Skinder Baſſa his General, who recompenced him well, and made both him and the Souldier who diſcovered him, to take ſolemn Oaths not to impart it to any man; for he had an intent to draw ſome great Ranſome from this Prince, and to reſtore him to his former liberty, knowing well, that if he carried him to Conſtantinople, the Grand Seignior would confine him into his Priſons, by which means he ſhould make no uſe nor benefit by his taking. But it happened, that another perfidious of the Polonian Army advertiſed Michna of Coreskie's Captivity, and in whoſe hands he was; who was ſo jealous, as he croſt and overthrew the good deſign of Skinder Baſſa, telling him plainly in the preſence of many, that he knew for certain, Prince Coresky was amongſt his ſlaves, and that he ſhould beware he did not eſcape, for that the Grand Seignior would call him to account. The General made anſwer, that he would be glad it were ſo, but he had not yet any notice of him, thanking Michna for his good advice. But, fearing that if he did what he intended, ſuffering Prince Coresky to eſcape for a Ranſom, the Sultan coming to the knowledge thereof, would be much incenſed, and puniſh him with diſgrace or death, the next day he told Prince Michna plainly, that the advice he had given him was true, and that Coresky had been found diſguiſed among his other Priſoners, whom he would preſent unto his Maſter, with the Princes Alexander and Bougdan, as he did, of whoſe delivery you ſhall hear hereafter. The young Princeſs, Wife to Coresky, having diſguiſed her ſelf, and diſfigured her face with her Nayls, and other helps, fell into the hands of a Tartarian Captain, with many others, who carried her into Tartaria, whereas ſhe was moſt inhumanely intreated.

The Princes taken Priſoners, and carried to Conſtantinople.

Prince Coreskie being diſguiſed is diſcovered.

The courſes of the Florentine Gallies.

In the Mediterranean Sea, Coſmo great Duke of Tuſcany continued his Enterpriſes this year againſt the Turks: his Gallies part from Ligorn, and run into the Levant, in queſt of ſome occaſions to annoy theſe Infidels. They drew near unto Cerigo, in old time *Cithar*ea, the five and twentieth of April, where, meeting with certain Chriſtian Ships, ſome Venetians advertiſed them, that in the Iſland of Chio, the Turks had prepared two Gallies to paſs into Barbary. Inghirami (Admiral to the Great Duke) reſolved to ſet upon them; being on the way, he turned with his Fleet where they were to paſs, and being covered by the Night, he caſt Anchor under Caſtle Roux. But as he attended a favourable Occaſion, the Moon ſhining, diſcovered him to the Turks, and the Guards having advertiſed the Turks Gallies, they preſently began to fly, the one rowing amain towards Land, and the other continued her courſe at Sea with all ſpeed. Inghirami with his Admiral Gallie got before that which was going to Land, inveſted it, being followed by the Gallie called St. Stephen, and three hours within Night grapled with it, and laboured to enter it; but the Turks (who were all good Souldiers) defended it valiantly, ſo as they were above an hour faſtned together, hewing one another furiouſly; yea, the Turks (who were entered into Inghirami's Gallie) fought valiantly upon the Hatches; but in the end the Florentines had the Victory, and took this Gallie, yet with much loſs of Chriſtian Blood. It was the Patron Gallie of that famous Pirate Amurath Raiſe, which was commanded by the Son of Mammi, a Portugal, called Muſtapha Celebi, who was taken alive, but ſore wounded. The other Gallie which had fled to Sea, and was the Captain Gallie of the ſaid Amurath Raiſe, commanded by the Bey of Mitilene, Nephew and Son-in-Law to that Pirate, called Amurath, who had married his Daughter, being his Mothers Son, was inveſted by the Gallies of Saint Marie Magdalene, and the Patron Saint Coſmo; the Combat was no leſs furious than the other, the Turks making a wonderful defence; but after ſome hours fight, in the which the Blood of either ſide was abundantly ſpilt, the Florentines had the Victory; Amurath, Bey of Mitilene, was ſlain, and Muſtapha, whom theſe Turkiſh Gallies carried to Algier in Barbary. They were of five and twenty banks a piece, carrying Lanthorns, and furniſhed with all things neceſſary, and manned with four hundred and twenty Janizaries, all men of Action, and practiſed in Piracies with that Pyrat Amurath Rats. In this prize the Florentines took two hundred and forty Turks, and free'd four hundred and thirty Chriſtians; among the Artillery of theſe Gallies, they recovered a Cannon and two Sacres of the Gallie of Saint John, and a Sail belonging to the Great Dukes Captain Gallie, which the Pyrat Amurath Rais had formerly ſpoiled. Theſe Turkiſh Gallies were laden with great ſtore of rich Commodities, the which was valued at two hundred thouſand Crowns. But this Conqueſt was gotten with the loſs of much Blood; for the Florentines had two hundred twenty three men wounded, and five and thirty ſlain in thoſe two Combats; the which made the Admiral Inghirami to reſt ſatisfied in this Voyage with the taking of two Gallies, after which he returned to Ligorn.

The Turkiſh Gallies taken by the Florentines.

Deputies meet at Vienna to confirm the Peace betwixt the Emperour and the Turk.

We have formerly made mention in the Jeſuits Buſineſs, being preſented at Conſtantinople, of the entry which the Emperors Ambaſſador made into that City. And this was the Effect of his Ambaſſage. The Peace concluded at Situa Torok, in the year 1606, betwixt the Emperour and the Sultan, was ſomewhat altered by the divers Interpretations and Explications, which they made of the Articles therein contained. But this year 1616, in the Month of March, the Ambaſſadors of both their Imperial Majeſties aſſembled at Vienna in Auſtria; that is to ſay, the Cardinal Forgatſie, Arch-biſhop of Strigonium, and Chancellor to the Emperour, the Cardinal Kleſſel, Biſhop of Vienna, the Baron of Rainek, Count Adolph Althen, the Earl of Solmes, the Earl of Thoron, and Pauli Apponi Nagi, for the Emperour; Hali Baſſa of Buda, Achmat Tihaia, and Gaſper Gratſiani, for the Turk; where they concluded theſe following Articles, to take away all pretext of Controverſie in the Explication of thoſe which were agreed upon at Situa Torok. But it was after that Ambaſſadors had been ſent of either ſide, as well to Conſtantinople as to Prague, with royal and rich Preſents.

Articles extracted out of the Letters Patents of Achmat Emperour of the Turks.

Articles touching the differences of the Peace.

1. Foraſmuch as many things have happened of either ſide, contrary to the Peace concluded at Situa Torok, it hath been neceſſary to confirm it anew, and to reduce it into the right courſe: Wherefore this holy Peace, made and concluded at Situa Torok, ſhall be obſerved for twenty years compleat, to begin at the date of theſe preſents. Given in the month of Chomazilabil, in the year of the Prophet, 1024.

2. That the Peace heretofore concluded at Situa Torok, ſhall remain firm in all its Articles, according to the Treaty which the Emperour Rodulphus did ſend unto Us, ſigned with his hand, and ſealed with his ſeal, the which we have received willingly, and the ſame Treaty we alſo ſent back confirmed to the Emperour of the Romans, the which he received in like manner. And this Treaty which was ſent unto Us bare date the ninth of December, in the year 1606 of Jeſus, of reverend and happy memory; and that which we ſent unto the Emperour of Romans, wherewith he was ſatisfied, was dated in the year of the Prophet One thouſand twenty one.

3. Since the time that Agria, Caniſe, Alba-Regalis, Peſth, Buda, Zolnok, Hatwan, and other places have been taken, that the Villages which were of their appurtenances ſhall hereafter remain annexed unto them. But thoſe Villages, which ſince the Peace of Situa Torok have been hindred from paying their Tribute by either ſide, or have been held by force, contrary to the Treaty of Peace, that thoſe Villages ſhall be viewed by Commiſſaries appointed by Us and the Emperour of the Romans, and preſently ſhall be ſet at liberty, and reſtored to their Lords and right owners. As for the Villages which pay Tribute to either part, thoſe which are ſcituate upon the Frontiers of the Emperour of the Romans, towards Novigrade and other Places, ſhall be viewed by Commiſſaries thereunto deputed, who ſhall take a Regiſter, to the end thoſe Villages may not be moleſted by our Neighbours. In like manner, the Commiſſary ſhall make a Regiſter of the Villages which pay to both ſides, lying near the Towns of the Emperour of Romans, of Strigonium and other Places; to the end they may take notice what Villages are bound to the one or the other Party, that hereafter there might grow no Controverſie. And for that which concerned the 158 Villages about Strigonium, for the which there was ſome controverſie, the ſixty lying neareſt to the ſaid Town ſhall be adjudged as it hath been agreed, and the Commiſſaries of either ſide ſhall take order for it. The foreſaid Villages lying near to Strigonium, and all others of the Realm of Hungary, which ſhall be adjudged to the one or other Party, ſhall not in any ſort be diſquieted, more than of ancient Cuſtom, and there ſhall be nothing exacted from them more than the Tribute.

The Judges of Villages ſhall pay unto the Lord the Tributes according to the ancient Cuſtom; if the Judges do not bring the Tribute, the Baſſa or Beg of the Place ſhall ſummon the Inhabitants thrice, to the end their Judges may come and pay the Tribute, and if they do it not after theſe ſummonings, he ſhall write unto the next Governour for the Roman Emperour, that the Judges of the Villages may be ſent unto him with the Tribute: And finally, if after all theſe Formalities it be not paid, the Baſſa or Beg may uſe force to fetch in theſe Inhabitants, and make them Slaves; the which ſhall be obſerved throughout all the villages which owe us tribute in the Realm of Hungary, yet nothing ſhall be exacted or demanded of them more than they have been accuſtomed to pay in antient times. The Commiſſaries deputed ſhall view and ſet down by a joynt conſent the limits and bounds of the Lands and Seigniories, which are held by either part in the upper or lower Hungary, and in the Realms of Croatia and Sclavonia.

4. They that ſhall break the Peace of either part, if they cannot be convicted and puniſhed inſtantly; we have decreed, that there ſhall be order taken of either ſide, and Juſtice ſhall be done within three Months. All Priſoners of War and others which have been taken ſince the Peace of Situa Torok, ſhall be ſet at liberty without ranſome.

5. Achmet Tahaia hath preſented unto us a Roll of Places built and fortified ſince the Peace, for the retreat of Souldiers. Whereupon we have ordained, that Informations ſhould be taken of all Fortifications made on either ſide ſince the Peace of Situa Torok; and if it be found that any Fortification hath been made contrary to the Peace, it ſhall be viſited within four Months by the Captains on both ſides, or by a Nobleman of either Party, and the Fortifications which ſhall be found to have been thus made contrary to the Peace, ſhall be demoliſhed.

6. And, for that ſome wicked and malicious Spirits have attempted many things unjuſtly to infringe this holy Peace and good Amity; we have ordained, that if hereafter any Perſons of either ſide ſhall attempt or practiſe any thing that is wicked and lewd, contrary to the Peace and mutual Correſpondency, we will advertiſe the Emperour of the Romans thereof; and in like manner the Roman Emperour, King of Hungary and Bohemia, ſhall write unto us to our Court, and no credit ſhall be given to the Reports of ſuch Perſons.

7. The Prieſts, religious Men, and Jeſuits, among the People of holy Jeſus, which follow the Popes Religion, may build Temples in our Realms, there to ſay divine Service after their manner, and read the Goſpel. We will yield them all favour, and will not ſuffer any one to diſturb them contrary to Law and Equity.

8. It ſhall be lawful for the Inhabitants born in the Realm of Hungary of either part, to re-edifie the Villages ruined and laid waſte, and after they are inhabited, they ſhall pay Tribute to the one and the other, if they be ſuch Villages as have been accuſtomed to pay to both.

9. Merchants ſhall have free leave to traffick, paſſing from our Port into thoſe Countries, and the tranſport of Merchandiſe ſhall be free to ſuch as ſhall take Letters from the Governours of the Frontiers, or from the Receivers of the thirties; the which they ſhall repreſent in paſſing, and the Lord of the Place or the Receiver ſhall atteſt the ſaid Letters by his manual ſign or ſeal; for the which they ſhall not take any thing of the Merchant. If the Merchant be to paſs by any dangerous Place, they ſhall give him a ſufficient Convoy to conduct him in ſafety; and after that the Merchant hath paied of either ſide the thirtieth, which is the full due, no man ſhall moleſt him nor hinder him to go where he pleaſeth.

10. The Merchants which would paſs from the Realms and Seigniories of the Emperor of the Romans, and the Houſe of Auſtria, into our Kingdoms, with Merchandiſe or Money, ſhall come under the Enſign of the Emperour of Romans, and ſhall have his Letters patents to us, without the which they ſhall not be ſuffered to paſs. And if they enter without Enſign, or the ſaid Patents, the Agents and Conſuls of the Roman Emperour may ſeiſe upon their Veſſels, Merchandiſe, and Money, and ſhall give advice thereof unto their Emperour; wherefore all the Merchants of the Emperours Countries, of the Houſe of Auſtria, and of the King of Spain, both as well thoſe of the Low-Countries, as his other Realms, may come with all aſſurance into our Realms, with their Ships, Money, and Merchandiſe, paying three in the hundred. And as for the Agents and Conſuls of the Roman Emperour, they ſhall pay unto them two Aſpers for the hundred; and in doing ſo the ſaid Agents and Conſuls of the Roman Emperour ſhall have a care of the Merchants Affairs. If any Merchant chance to die, the Emperours Agent and Conſul ſhall cauſe his Goods to be ſealed up, and ſhall take them into their Poſſeſſion, to the which our Treaſurer ſhall have no colour or pretenſion. And when as the Merchants have paid the Cuſtom of three for the hundred in one place, they ſhall not be bound to pay it in another for the ſame Merchandiſe. If the Merchants have any Controverſie amongſt themſelves, or with others, the Cadi, or Judge of that Place, may take knowledge of the cauſe, if it exceed not the value of 4000 Aſpers, but it ſhall be judged by the Cadi of our Port.

11. As long as this holy Peace ſhall continue, the Poſts which ſhall be ſent with Letters by the Baſſaes, Begues, Lords and Agents, or by the Viſiers, on our behalf to the Emperour of the Romans; and reſpectively from him to our Court, ſhall be honourably entertained by our Officers; and if the way be dangerous, they ſhall give them aſſiſtance to conduct them into a place of ſafety with their Letters. And if the Agent which is with us deſire to write any particular Letter unto the Emperour, and not ſend an expreſs Meſſenger, that this Letter ſhall be carried by the poſt, and delivered ſafely where it is directed. That the Meſſengers of the Baſſaes and Begues ſhall go no more into the Villages, but the Judges ſhall bring the Tribute and deliver it where they ought.

An Accord for the Execution of the Articles touching the Villages in Controverſie, and the raiſing of Fortifications.

TO conclude all Differences touching the diviſion of Villages, and demolition of Fortifications made in prejudice of the Peace of Situa Torok: We the Commiſſaries deputed, had agreed upon the time of four Months: But, for that all Controverſies cannot be decided within that time, by a common conſent we have concluded the time of twelve Months, for the Expedition of all that ſhall remain undecided; all things remaining in the ſame Eſtate during the time. For the ending of theſe Affairs on the behalf of the Maieſty of the Roman Emperour, ſhall be ſent the Noble Lord Adolph of Althen, Earl of the ſacred Empire, with others, according to his Maieſties good Pleaſure. And on the behalf of the Othoman Emperour hath been named the Noble Lord Ali Viſier Baſſa.

For the greater aſſurance of theſe things, we the ſaid Commiſſioners have cauſed ſix Copies of this Treaty to be diſpatch'd, in the Italian, Hungarian, and Turkiſh Tongues. And we the Director or Preſident of the Privy Council to his Imperial Majeſty, and Cardinal, with other Counſellors of his Privy Council and Commiſſioners, having full Power and Authority, have confirmed theſe Preſents under our Hands, and the Seals of our Arms.

As alſo We Ali Baſſa of Buda, Viſier to the moſt powerful Sultan Achmat, Tyhaia Mutafaraga, and Gaſper Gratiani, Ambaſſadors to the Turkiſh Emperour, with the Imperial Majeſty of the Roman Emperour, having full Power and Authority to conclude this Treaty, have ſigned it with our Hands, and ſealed it with our ordinary Seals; whereof there were three Copies delivered to either party. Given at Vienna the firſt of March, 1616.

This new Declaration of the Othoman Emperour, upon the firſt Articles concluded at Situa Torok, ſhews plainly how much the Turks are of late days refined from their antient barbariſm and rudeneſs, having made themſelves capable of great Affairs. And theſe frequent meetings betwixt the Emperour of the Romans, and the Sultan, by their Ambaſſadors, as a holy watering of the Olive Tree of Peace, ſeems to make it ſo flouriſhing, as the ſweet ſavour may pierce further, and make us hope that God will make uſe of this peaceful Union, to prepare unto himſelf ſome means to a new Harveſt, or a healthful Conqueſt of Souls wandering amidſt the falſhoods of the Alchoran.

Prince Coreſkie's Wife carried into Tartaria.

Alexandrina, Wife to Prince Coreſkie, having been taken at that unfortunate overthrow of the Polonian Princes in Moldavia, by Skinder Baſſa and Prince Michna; ſhe was carried away (as you have formerly heard) by a Tartarian Captain, and led Captive unknown to Bialigrot, where ſhe received many Indignities, being with Child; yea during the time of her lying in, which was five or ſix Months after her taking: all which time ſhe bethought her ſelf of a means to haſten her own Delivery, and withal, to free a Polonian Souldier called Jaques, who had carried Arms under Prince Coreſkie. This man, although he knew the Princeſs well, and might by her diſcovery have purchaſed his own Liberty, yet he would not do it; wherefore the Princeſs having tried his Fidelity, taught him a means how to work his own Liberty, and hers in the end, by his Care and Diligence. The Tartarian being one day abſent from his Lodging, Alexandrina took occaſion to talk with Jaques the Polonian; telling him, That having found him faithful unto her, ſhe would direct him a courſe whereby he might redeem himſelf from Captivity; ſo as he would principally obſerve what ſhe did preſcribe. Jaques having promiſed to execute whatſoever this Lady ſhould enjoyn him, yea, with the hazard of his Life; ſhe then ſaid unto him: You know the Tartarian, whoſe Captives we are, hath an elder Brother, a very rich Man, who of late is become blind and deaf, by reaſon of a great Catarr and Defluction which is fallen down into his Eyes and Ears, wherewith his Brother ſeems to be much afflicted: I have a Jewel, which my great Lord and Husband gave me when we were made ſure, the which I have kept carefully, hiding it ſometimes in my Hair, ſometimes in my old tatter'd Rags which I have worn ſince my Captivity, the which I have much eſteemed; for that my dear Spouſe had aſſured me, that the Stone which was ſet in this Jewel had many and ſingular Virtues, and amongſt others, that it would reſtore the ſight, which had been loſt by Defluction, and cure Deafneſs, ſo as it were not natural, or too inveterate. I am reſolved to take out the Stone, and deliver it thee; after thou haſt ſounded the Tartarian, whether he will ſet thee at Liberty if thou doſt cure his Brother of his Infirmities; making him ſwear ſolemnly not to retain the Stone, but to ſuffer thee to carry it away, to the end thou mayeſt reſtore it unto me without his knowledge. Having reſolved upon this Plot, the Lady ſaid unto him, You muſt alſo demand of the ſick Man a Horſe, and ſome Money, with Paſs-ports to go into your Country, to the end thou mayeſt go ſpeedily to my dear Husband, whereſoever thou ſhalt hear of him, and to deliver him my Letters, and bring me an anſwer if it be poſſible. The Polonian having ſworn to perform whatſoever the Lady commanded him, being at Liberty; the Princeſs delivered him the Stone, he ſwearing to reſtore it unto her again, as ſoon as he had done his cure, if it were not taken from him by Violence.

The Polonian attended with impatience until the Tartarian did talk unto him of his Brothers Infirmity; who finding him one day much afflicted, took occaſion to tell him, that he knew a certain means how to cure his Brother, without any Pain, or taking any thing inwardly; I believe nothing, reply'd the Tartarian; for all the Phyſicians in the Country could not do it; but if he could effect his ſaying, he promiſed to ſet him at Liberty without ranſome, and to give him wherewithal to conduct him into his Country; It is the recompence, ſaid the Priſoner, I meant to demand, and that you ſwear unto me by your great God, not to fail of your promiſe when I have performed mine, and not to retain, nor ſuffer any one to take from me the thing I ſhall uſe in the cure. The Tartarian having ſolemnly ſworn, and laid his right Hand upon his Heart, the Polonian took a time to make preparation for his cure. The Tartarian, although he diſtruſted his new Phyſitian, yet he acquainted his Brother with the Project, who, being deſirous to recover his Sences, intreated his Brother not to neglect the offer, promiſing to ſave him harmeleſs, both in regard of the ranſome which he expected from the Polonian, and for the Money he ſhould give him. The day appointed being come, the Tartarian preſt the Priſoner to perform his Promiſe; to whom the ſick man alſo promiſed a Horſe and fifty Chequines to return into his Country, taking the ſame Oath which his Brother had formerly done. All things being ready, he applyed his phyſical Stone, binding it faſt to one of his Eyes for the ſpace of ſeven hours, after which, being taken away he ſaw clearly, and in like manner he recovered his other Eye, and afterwards his hearing by the like Application: whereat the Tartarians much rejoyced; giving unto the Polonian what they had promiſed, and procuring him paſs-ports from the Governour, without which he could hardly get out of the Country.

The Polonian before his departure told the Tartarian Captain that he had a ſuit unto him, that was, that the Polonian Woman, which was alſo his Priſoner, was his near Kinſwoman, intreating him that in reſpect of his good Office he had done to his Brother, he would uſe her and her little Infant better, and that as ſoon as he were returned into his Country, he would take a courſe for her ranſome, and it might be would bring it himſelf. The Polonian, having acquainted the Lady with what had paſt, and delivered her Jewel faithfully unto her, having received her Letters to Prince Coreſkie, and vowed to find him out, he took his leave. This Polonian travelling towards his Country, met with one of the ſame Nation, who having been taken Priſoner with Prince Alexander, made an eſcape; theſe two diſcourſing freely of their Adventures, Jaques inquired carefully what was become of the Princes which had been carried Priſoners to Conſtantinople by Skinder Baſſa, and eſpecially of Coreſkie; and hearing that he was in the Priſons of the Black Sea, he inquired by what means he might ſpeak with this Prince, or at leaſt how he might convey ſome Letters unto him; to whom he anſwered, that it was very difficult, for that he was ſtraightly guarded. But he underſtood that the French Ambaſſador had ſometimes leave to ſend to viſit him, whereof he might inform himſelf more particularly. After this, Jaques intreated his Countrymen to deliver certain Letters which the Princeſs had written unto her Kinsfolk, the which he promiſed to perform faithfully, and ſo they parted. Jaques coming to Conſtantinople, he grew acquainted with one of the French Ambaſſadors Men, who was ſometimes employed to viſit the Prince, and to carry him Money and other Neceſſaries; by whoſe means he got acceſs unto the Prince, and delivered his Letters, the which he received with much Joy, hearing of his Wives Health. Eight days after, the Polonian coming to viſit the Prince, he received from him an anſwer to his Wife, and ſo took his leave; who after many troubleſome Encounters, returned to Bialigrot, where, finding the Lady all alone (the Tartarian and his Servants being gone a hunting) he gave an account unto her of his Negotiation, and delivered his Letters, whereat ſhe was much joyed, hearing that he was alive, though infinitely grieved for his Captivity, underſtanding that the Grand Seignior had refuſed to put him to ranſome. After their Diſcourſe, the Princeſs advertiſed her faithful Agent, That ſince his departure, the Tartar had grown jealous of her Quality, and had enquired of her what her Husband, her Kinsfolks, and their Eſtates were; to whom ſhe had anſwered, that her Husband was a Captain who had been taken Priſoner with Prince Alexander, and carried with him into Turkey; and as for her other Kinsfolks they were all Souldiers, which had been ruined during the Troubles of Moldavia: deſiring the Polonian to remember it well, leſt they ſhould be found to differ when they ſhould come to treat of her Ranſome. The Tartarian returning ſoon after to his Houſe, he found Jaques the Polonian there, whom he entertained very kindly, both in reward of the good Offices he had done to his Brother, and for the hope he had of his Priſoners ranſome, remembring that Jaques had told him that ſhe was his Kinſwoman, and that it might be he would bring it. After ſome little Diſcourſe, Jaques asked him, What ranſome he would require for his Polonian Priſoner? To whom the Tartarian anſwered, That he would have ſix thouſand Chequines for her and her Son, unleſs he would give him the Stone with the which he had cured his Brother; to whom the Polonian replyed, That as for the Stone it was not in his Power, having reſtored it to a Nobleman whom he had followed when he was taken Priſoner. And as for the ranſome which he demanded for his Priſoner and her Child, it was more than ſhe and all her Kindred were worth, ſhe being Wife to a Captain who had been taken Priſoner at the defeat of Alexander, and for want of means was ſtill detained. The Tartarian interrupted him, ſaying, That he underſtood ſhe was of noble extraction, and that ſhe had rich Kinsfolks, who would not ſuffer her to ſpend her Life in Captivity. I confeſs, ſaid the Polonian, that ſhe is iſſued from Noble Parents, but they are ruined during the Troubles of Moldavia; adding withal, that he would not have returned if he had thought he would have demanded above a thouſand Chequines, the which he offered him, intreating him to accept it, in regard ſhe was his Kinſwoman, and for the good Office he had done for his Brother. You have been ſatisfied, reply'd the Tartarian, and have no cauſe to complain: Notwithſtanding, after ſome conteſting, by the mediation of the Captains Brother, who had been ſo well cured, the Ladies ranſome was ſet at three thouſand Chequines, whereof her faithful Agent gave preſent Intelligence to Prince Charles, Brother to prince Coreskie, who ſent this ſum with all poſſible ſpeed; and ſo the Princeſs and her little Infant were redeemed from Captivity, and conducted into Polonia by their faithful Sollicitor: From whence ſhe advertiſed the Prince, by Letters, of her delivery. This relation was written by a Frenchman, who, by his report, was preſent in all the Troubles of Moldavia: but as touching her delivery by means of the Cure, I cannot warrant it, but leave it to the cenſure of Phyſicians and Naturaliſts, who can beſt judge of the Virtues of Stones, Herbs, and Plants; but it is certain that ſhe was impriſoned and ranſomed as an unknown Perſon.

Prince Coreskie's Wife redeemed from the Tartarians.

In the year 1617, there came to Paris a Chiaus, a Spaniſh Renegado, called Solyman, ſent from Conſtantinople with Letters from the Emperour Achmat to the King, for the delivery of eight and twenty Slaves, who had redeemed their Liberty for Money in divers Ports of Italy, and in their return to Conſtantinople had been taken by the Ships of Merceilles; the King cauſed them to be ſet at Liberty. But the Chiaus had alſo charge to intreat his Majeſty to cauſe Juſtice to be done unto the Moors Grannadines, expelled out of Spain, and wronged in their Goods and Perſons, upon their Paſſage into France; wherein he had what contentment he could expect of Juſtice. Notwithſtanding he did witneſs openly his amazement at their long delays in the diſpatch of Suits; ſaying plainly, That France, which had the Reputation throughout the World, to maintain every mans right inviolably, did no Juſtice, but after long and tedious Purſuits; and that the Execution of decrees, was many times longer than the Suit it ſelf. Whereas the Turks Juſtice (ſaid he) was ſpeedily adminiſtred to every Man; and within eight days they ſaw an end of the greateſt and moſt important Suits. This Chiaus was favourably entertained, and defraied with his Train for the ſpace of ſix or ſeven Months at the Kings Charge.

A Chiaus ſent from Conſtantinople to Paris.

The cauſe of the Voyage.

As the Turks Eſtate hath not grown great but by Combuſtions, ſo it is ordinarily full of Troubles; whereby it ſeems that the Preſervation thereof depends in making War upon others, or to ſupport it, when as neighbour Princes ſeek to recover that which they had unjuſtly wreſted from them by the Othoman Force. So this great Eſtate entertained this year four great Armies, two at Land, the one againſt the Perſians, his antient Enemy, the other (conſiſting in a manner all of Tartarians) againſt the King of Poland, as ſupporting the part of the Vayvod of Moldavia againſt the Turk, who had ſettled another in that Province: And two naval Armies, the one in the Black Sea againſt the Coſſacks or Ruſſians, who made daily Incurſions into the Othomans Country, Men wholly given to Arms, which go to Sea in ſmall Boats, able to carry but five or ſix Men, made of the Bodies of hollow Trees; but they are in a manner invincible with theſe kind of Boats; for when as the diſadvantage of a Combat forces them to ſound a retreat, they retire near unto the Land, and in ſuch Places whereas the Turkiſh Gallies cannot approach; and ſo they eaſily prevent a total overthrow. Finally, in caſe of Neceſſity they carry their Veſſels with them. For in the end of the laſt year, finding the paſſage of the Black Sea ſtopped at the mouth of the River of Danow by the Turkiſh Gallies, they put their Boats into Carts, and taking the way by the Mountains, they brought them eaſily into the Sea. The Turks fourth Army is in the white Sea, as they call it, employed either to conduct the Caravan, which brings brings the Tribute from Egypt to Conſtantinople, or in ſearch of the Gallies of Malta and Florence, which ſcoure thoſe Seas continually to annoy the Turk. The Army againſt the Perſian is led by Haly Baſſa, Succeſſor to Mehemet Baſſa, he who fled into Perſia after that he had loſt threeſcore thouſand men in a ſet Battel; after which, being ſent for to come unto Conſtantinople, fearing that the Sultan would take revenge of ſo great a loſs upon his life, he retired to the Sophy, where he now remains.

The Turks complain to the Venetians of the Vſcoques Spoils.

The Turks being much annoyed both at Sea and Land by the Vſcoques, made great Complaint to the Eſtate of Venice, with whom they are in League, being greatly grieved at their Thefts, and complaining much that they could not paſs by Sea without danger of Servitude or Death: adding withal, that theſe Pyrates having gotten a way into Turkey by the Venetians Territories, they were by them made Slaves, and ſlain in their own Countries: and although they went not from their Houſes, nor undertook any Voyages, yet they were ſtill in alarm, and ſubject unto ruine: That the ſmall Reſiſtance which was made, gave great cauſe of jealouſie, that there was ſome ſecret Intelligence betwixt the Subjects of the Seigniory of Venice and the Vſcoques, and that they divided the Spoil betwixt them: finally, That in what ſort ſoever the matter paſt, they held them inſupportable to all men, but eſpecially to themſelves. The Turks threatned to take their juſt Revenge; the which being impoſſible to effect in the Country of the Vſcoques (for that by the Letters of the Commonwealth of Venice their Paſſage was ſtopped) they reſolved to be revenged upon their Subjects, and recover a part of their Goods which they had loſt. Finally, they prepared to come into the Gulph of Venice with a mighty Army; the which, without doubt, had brought that State into great Extremities, and been very prejudicial to many Provinces of Chriſtendome. But, for that the Inſolencies and Thefts of the Vſcoques had like to have ingaged the Venetians in a dangerous War againſt the Turk with whom they were in League, it ſhall neither be unpleaſant nor unprofitable to make a little Digreſſion, and ſhew what theſe Vſcoques were. About the Year 1550, there aſſembled together in certain places near the Sea belonging to the Princes of the Houſe of Auſtria, People (who were cruel, violent, and infamous) from divers parts of the Country of Chimera; Dalmatia; and the other Confines of Hungary, and ſuch as had been baniſhed from the State of Venice; whoſe delight was only to live upon Spoil and Blood. All theſe Thieves being thus gathered together (whom they called by a general Name Vſcoques) as enemies to all Art and Induſtry to live honeſtly by their Labours, retired themſelves into a deſart Country, receiving no Pay from the Princes of Auſtria who command there. Being thus by their natural Inclination given to Spoil, adding thereunto the ſpur of Poverty, nothing moved them to ſtay in thoſe places, but all liberty was left them to rob and ſpoil: whereupon they applied all their Minds and Forces; ſo as having made certain light Foiſts, they began to make Courſes at Sea, with the moſt barbarous and impious Cruelty that ever was practiſed amongſt the Scythians, Tartarians, or any other inhumane Nation whatſoever. And, for that it is an ordinary courſe for any one that will commit a great Villany, to ſeek out ſome goodly Pretext to cover it; ſo they concluded among themſelves, to ſhadow their Inſolencies and Thefts with a colour to go againſt the Infidels: wherefore, in the beginning, there were no Merchants, were they Turks, Jews, or Subjects to the Turk, although they were Chriſtians, but if they entred into the Gulf, either to traffick, or to furniſh Venice with Proviſion and Merchandiſe, they were taken by them, their Goods divided amongſt them, and they forced to pay a great Ranſome, or to dye miſerably. All the Ports of the State of Venice, both of Iſtria, Dalmatia, and the Iſlands from whence they received their Victuals and Proviſion, were ſoon after ſhut up by theſe Pyrates, who, not content to ſpoil the Turks (which trafficked no more by reaſon of their great Dangers and Loſs) allured by the rich Spoils which they took, and the deſire they had to encounter them, they began to ſet upon the Venetian Ships, forcing the Merchants whom they took, to confeſs by Torments, that the Goods belonged to Turks, although in effect their chief Booty came from Chriſtians. Having drawn many unto them of their own Humours, and thinking their Spoils at Sea not ſufficient to ſatisfie their covetous Deſires, nor the Preſents which they were to give to others, to be favoured and ſupported in the Courts of Princes, they ſtayed not long before they entered with all violence into the Turks Country, through the Venetian Territory, to whom they were as hurtful as to the Turks; from whence they carried away rich Spoils and many Priſoners. There was nothing that was precious, rich, or good, but was ſubject to the inſatiable greedineſs of thoſe pittileſs Thieves and Pirates, if paſſing by Sea they came near unto the Maritine Coaſts. Whereupon grew the great Complaint you have heard made by the Turks, threatning to be revenged upon the Eſtate of Venice for the inſolency of the Vſcoques, which afterward bred a cruel War betwixt that State and the Arch-duke Ferdinand of Grets, now Emperour, who ſeemed to ſupport them, thereby to ingage the State in a War with the Turk. But for that the Succeſs thereof doth not belong to our Hiſtory, we will leave it to them that have written it at large.

Death of Achmat.

The Diſpoſition of Sultan Achmat.

On the fifteenth of November this year, Sultan Achmat Chan, having lived thirty years, and governed that great Empire of Turkey fifteen, died. When he came to the Empire he was but fifteen years old. He was of a good Conſtitution, well complexioned, and ſomewhat inclined to be fat, ſtrong, and active, which appeared by his Exerciſe in caſting of a Horſe-mans Mace of nine or ten pounds weight, wherein he exceeded any one of his Court; in memory whereof there are two Pillars ſet up in one of the Courts of the Seraglio at Conſtantinople, with an Inſcription, as marks of his Dexterity. He was by nature ambitious and proud, which ſome hold qualities befitting his great Eſtate. He was not ſo cruel as many of his Predeceſſors: but he was much given to Senſuality and Pleaſure; for the which he entertained three thouſand Concubines and Virgins in a Seraglio, being the faireſt Daughters of the Chriſtians. His Mother was a Chriſtian of Boſna, or of Cyprus; and therefore it is thought he was ſomewhat favourable to Chriſtians. He was much delighted in Hawking and Hunting; and namely for Hawking he kept in Grecia and Natolia 40000 Faulkoners, who attended his coming, and kept his Hawks in their ſeveral places of Charge, and had good yearly Penſions. Neither were his Huntſmen much fewer in number, or of leſs Charge. As the Turkiſh Emperours are bound, by the Law of their Religion, once every day to practiſe ſome manual Trade, ſo Mahomet, his Father, gave himſelf to the making of Arrows, and Achmat to the faſhioning horn Rings, ſuch as the Turks wear when they draw their Bows. This they do in the morning: after they are ready and have ſaid their Prayers, then they call for their Exerciſe, but it is only for form, for they ſcarce make an Arrow or a Ring in a whole year.

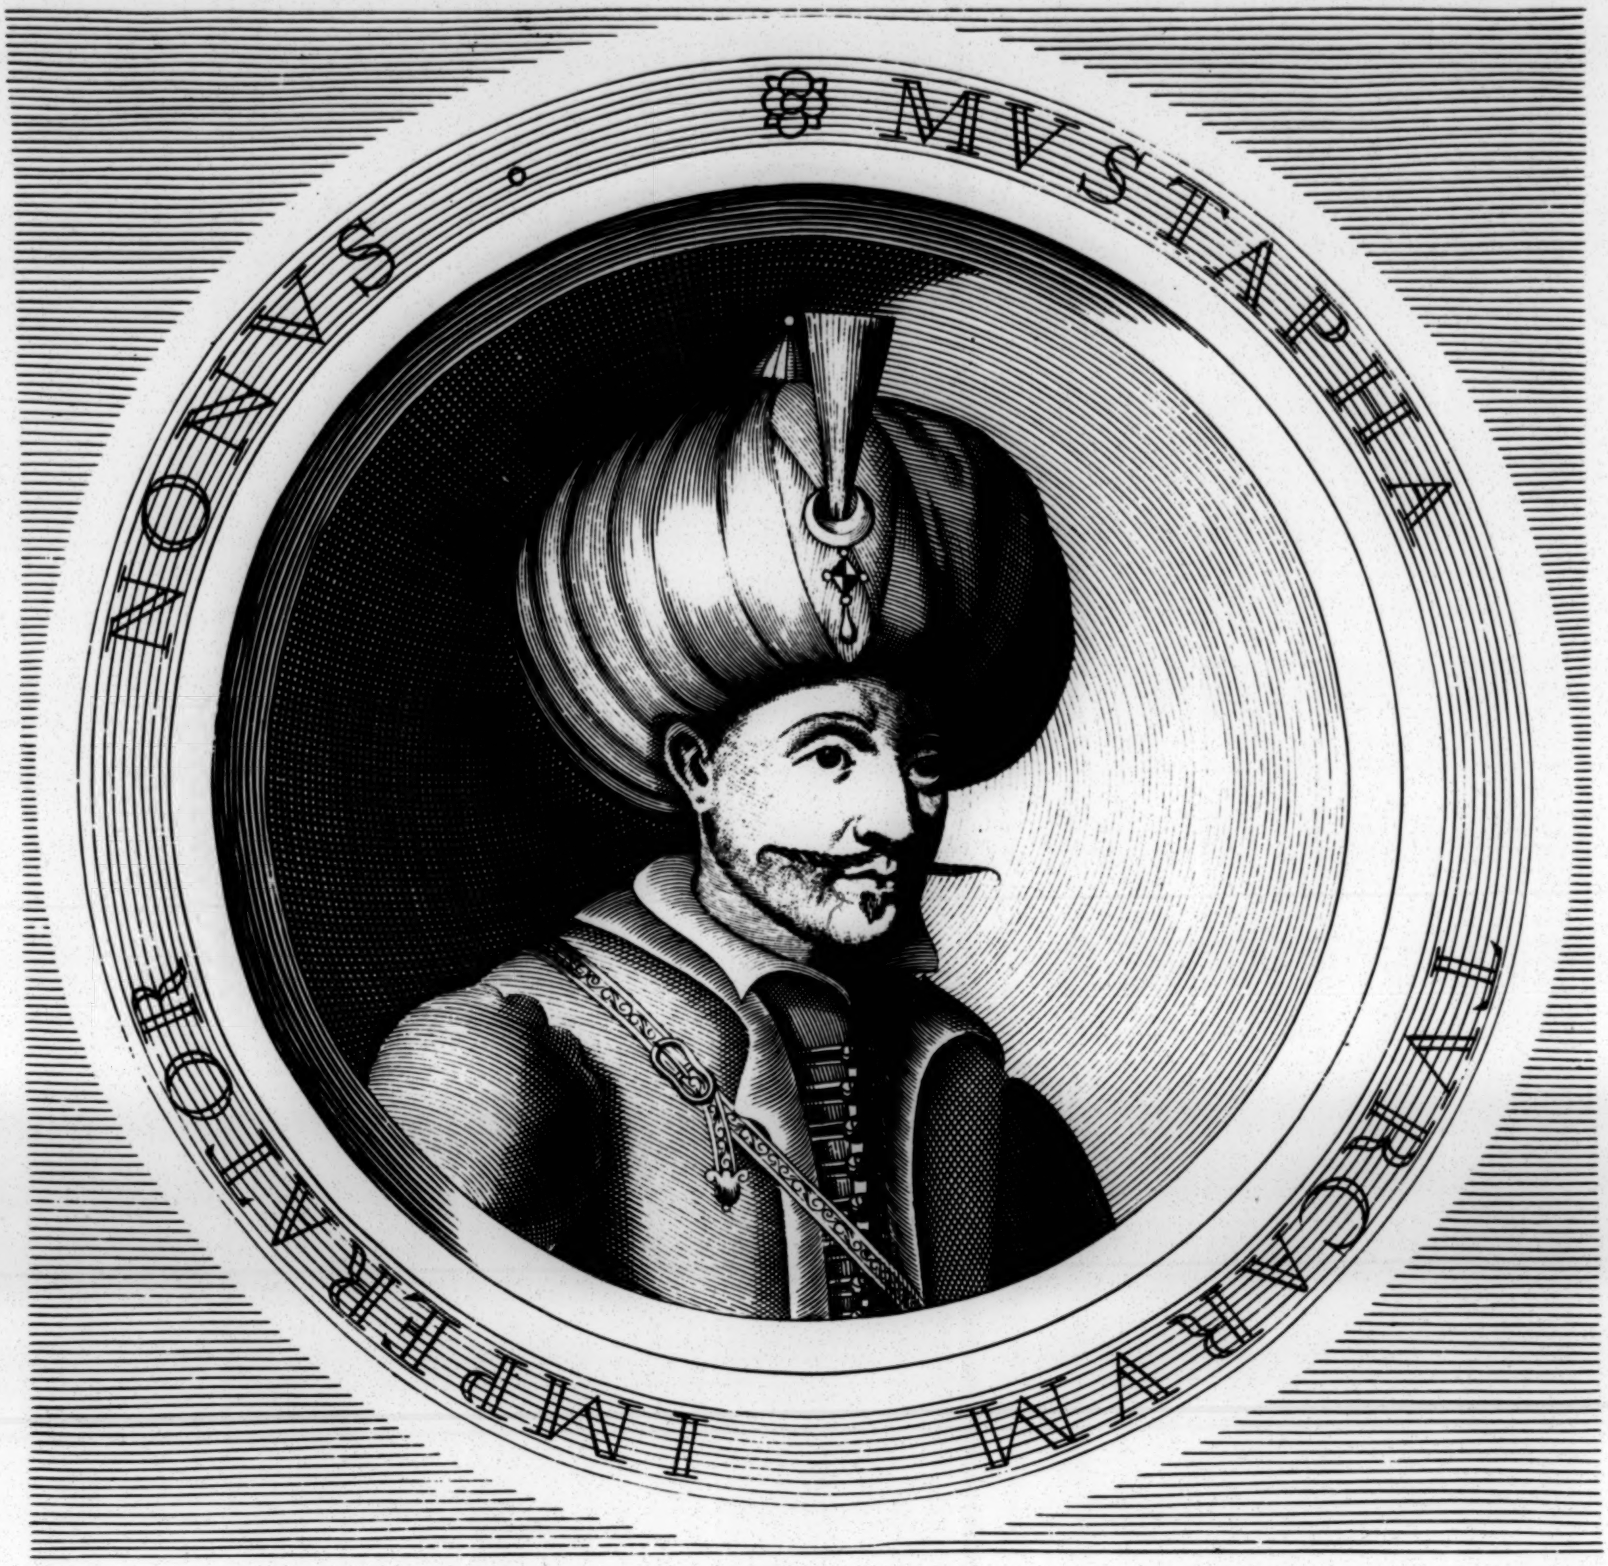
THE



Nought but affliction thundring out of Heaven,
Makes men on earth to any goodneſs given.
Nor longer than she thunders, any fear
That any heav'n holds any Thunderer.
So Mustapha, while heaven restrain'd his state,
And held him fetter'd in his brothers hate;
To vertuous actions did his studies drive,
Was curteous, pious, and contemplative.
But when his brother could no longer live,
And liberty did to him power give;
Then pride and tyrannie his horses were,
And drive him alwaies past heav'ns love or fear,
Greatneſs, on Goodneſs loves to slide, not stand,
And leaves, for fortunes ice, vertues firm land.
Honour had rather be with danger driven,
Than stay with vertue on the hand of Heaven.

THE REIGN OF MUSTAPHA,

The Firſt of that Name, Ninth Emperour of the Turks.

Muſtapha advanced to the Empire.

Depoſed again.

OSMAN, the eldeſt Son of Achmat, being not above twelve years old, Muſtapha, Brother to Achmat, being five and twenty, was drawn out of a Cell where he lived as it were religiouſly and in Contemplation, and proclaimed Sultan Muſtapha Chan. They write of him, that he grew cruel, cauſing young Oſman to be kept under ſure Guards, putting to death his Brethren: He alſo did many indignities unto the Chriſtian Ambaſſadours; and to confirm him in his Throne, he gave great Sums of Money to the Janizaries and Spahies; and ſent a Meſſenger to Vienna to the Emperour, to aſſure him, that he would maintain inviolably whatſoever had been concluded betwixt him and his deceaſed Brother Achmat. But, growing odious by reaſon of his Tyranny, the Grand Viſier came out of Perſia with an Army and depoſed him, forcing him to return to his Cell, ſetting Prince Oſman at liberty, and ſeating him in the Imperial Throne. But, for that it may ſeem ſtrange, that Muſtapha ſhould be preſerved alive during the Reign of his Brother Achmat, (contrary to the cuſtom of the Othoman Emperours, who do uſually kill all their Brethren at their firſt coming to the Crown, thinking thereby the better to aſſure their Eſtates) it ſhall be fit to make mention thereof. Mahomet, the third of that name, dying in the year 1602. and leaving Achmat and Muſtapha, his Sons by the Sultana Flatra, a Lady of Cyprus, ſome ſay of Boſna, Achmat, the eldeſt, was ſent for ſpeedily out of Magneſia, by the Baſſaes, to take poſſeſſion of his Father's Crown, being the firſt Emperour of that Name. And, for that the cuſtom of the Turkiſh Emperours was (as we have ſaid) to have neither Brother nor Nephew alive, unleſs they could ſave themſelves by flight; yet the Viſier Baſſaes, and other Officers of the Court, concluded in Council, that it was not fit that Muſtapha Brother to Achmat ſhould dye; grounding their opinion upon a good reaſon of State, for that their Emperour being but fifteen years old, they feared (that dying in his Nonage, without children able to govern) the Empire might fall into Combuſtion, and ruine it ſelf by reaſon of Civil Wars. Whereupon they decreed, that Muſtapha's Life ſhould be preſerved; but with that caution and reſtriction, that he ſhould remain ſtill a Priſoner in ſome Chambers of the Emperour's Seraglio at Conſtantinople.

During Achmat's minority, and before he had Children, there was no cruel Decree made againſt Muſtapha, but he only continued in his Contemplation without any liberty: But when as the Emperour ſaw himſelf fortified with Iſſue, and remembring the cruel Cuſtom of his Predeceſſors, he many times propounded the putting of his Brother to death to his Council; the which may ſeem very ſtrange it took not effect, having been often concluded. Among others, it is written, that his Death was concluded one Evening, and that it ſhould have been put in Execution the next day: But Achmat was ſo frighted in the Night with Apparitions and fearful Dreams, as day being come, he ſaid, Seeing that the only Reſolution to put his Brother to death had ſo terrified him, he did believe that his Torments would much increaſe if he ſhould put it in Execution; and therefore he commanded his Brother ſhould live, more in regard of the Terror of his Mind than for any brotherly Affection. Another time, Sultan Achmat being in one of the Windows of his Seraglio, he beheld his Brother Muſtapha, who by his permiſſion was walking in the Gardens with his Guard: Some one of his Baſſaes or other Officer that was near unto him, and willing to flatter his Humor, told him, that it was a matter of dangerous Conſequence to ſuffer him to have ſo great Liberty. Achmat (moved with jealouſie and diſtruſt) grew into rage at his Words, whereupon he ſuddenly took his Bow and Arrow, (being a very expert Archer, as all the Turkiſh Nation generally are) and aimed at his Brother to kill him; but at that very inſtant he felt ſo great a pain in his Arm and Shoulder, as, not able to let looſe his Arrow, nor to perform what he had intended, he ſaid with a loud Voice, That Mahomet would not have Muſtapha to dye. This Prince had three Chambers in the Seraglio, where he remained a Priſoner fifteen years, and ſpent his time in a Contemplative kind of Life, after the manner of the Muſulmans; his whole delight was to read the Arabian Books of their Doctors in divers Sciences. The Grand Seignior gave him leave ſometimes to take the Air of his Gardens with his Guard, and called him to conſult with him of Affairs of Eſtate, taking his Advice many times, knowing him to be of a ſound Judgment.

After a long impriſonment, and a daily apprehenſion of death, the Emperour Achmat falling grievouſly ſick in November, as you have heard, his Baſſaes and other Counſellors about him (ſeeing the danger he was in) perſwaded him to take ſome good courſe for the ſucceſſion of his Empire. He had Children by the Sultana, but they ſo young as they were not capable to govern the Empire. Moreover, this Sultana was dead, and the Children left Friendleſs, and none to ſpeak for them. But on the other ſide, the Sultana Flatra, Mother to the Emperour Muſtapha, was yet living, who thought, that if the Baſſaes ſhould ſhould undertake to govern the State during the minority of the Emperour's Children, her Honour would be much eclipſed: wherefore ſhe favoured Muſtapha, and perſuaded the dying Emperour to make him his Succeſſor. On the fifteenth of November, Achmat, ſeeing his End grow near, he called for his Brother, and told him, That ſeeing Death approached, he deſired to provide for the Preſervation of the Empire, and therefore had made choice of him to ſucceed him, intreating him to take the Government upon him preſently after his death. Muſtapha was much amazed at his Speech, and anſwered him with Words full of Fear and Humility, That he might not accept of the Honour which he did him, ſeeing that the Empire did rightly belong unto his eldeſt Son. Achmat diſabled his Son for ſo great a Government, both for his Age and Capacity; being neceſſary for the maintenance of ſo great a Monarchy, that he (who was of ripe years and deep judgment) ſhould take upon him the managing thereof; recommending the Children he had by the Sultana, unto him; intreating him to uſe them in the ſame manner that he had uſed him; leaving the other Children which he had by Concubines, being his Slaves, to his Diſcretion. Soon after theſe Words, Achmat dyed, and Muſtapha was generally acknowledged for Succeſſor to the Turkiſh Empire; who at the firſt was ſo amazed, as he thought he had been in a Dream, to ſee himſelf advanced to ſo great a Power and Sovereignty, from a ſtraight Priſon, and a daily apprehenſion of Death. At his firſt coming to the Empire, he cauſed the Perſian Ambaſſador to be ſet at liberty, whom his Brother Achmat had cauſed to be reſtrained, contrary to the publick Faith; for that News came unto the Court of ſome Combuſtions raiſed by the Perſian. After which he ſent ſpeedily to the Baſſa of Buda in Hungary, commanding him to entertain the Treaty of Peace, made by his Predeceſſor with the Emperour, inviolably. Yet notwithſtanding he carried himſelf, during the ſmall time of his Reign, inſolently and cruelly; for, violating the Laws of Nations, he had ill intreated the Baron of Mole or Sancy, Ambaſſador to the moſt Chriſtian King, ſetting Guards upon him as a Priſoner, having cauſed his People to be put in Priſon, and tortured after their manner. The reaſon of this Indignity which Muſtapha did unto the French Ambaſſador, and to his People, grew upon an occaſion which will require an ample Diſcourſe, for the better underſtanding of that which hath gone before. After the Overthrow and taking of the Princes of Moldavia, Prince Coreſky, as you have heard, was brought by Skinder Baſſa to Conſtantinople, whereat the Grand Seignior was wonderfully well pleaſed, for that he was held (even by his Enemies) for one of the moſt valiant and redoubted Princes of Chriſtendom; wherefore he was ſent away Priſoner, and confined to the Towers of the black Sea, the which are diſtant five miles from Conſtantinople; a place appointed for the guard of Priſoners of great Quality and Importance, ſuch as he was. He was ſhut up with a French Captain called Rigaut, in a little Chamber which was on the top of one of thoſe Towers, in which Chamber there was a Window capable for a Man to paſs through, and yet it had no bars, for that the height of the place freed it from all ſuſpicion. This Prince was much ſollicited by the Turk to become a Renegado, as the Princes Alexander and Bougdan, his Brothers-in-law, had done; but he reſiſted it with a generous Reſolution, reſolving rather to die in that tedious Captivity, than to commit ſo baſe an Act againſt God and his Conſcience: The which being made known unto the King of Polonia, it moved him to compaſſion, and made him write to the French Ambaſſador, and to intreat him to be a means that this Prince might be put to Ranſome, and freed from Captivity, at what price ſoever; the which the Ambaſſador durſt not undertake, although he deſired it much, for that he had no Charge from the King his Maſter. The Emperour's Ambaſſador did what poſſibly he could, knowing how much the Liberty of this Prince might be available to Chriſtendome: for which Conſiderations, the Turk would not yield in any ſort to ſuffer him to be releaſed; ſo as the Friends of this Captive Prince were out of hope ever to ſee him at liberty. But moſt commonly in ſuch Extremities the Almighty works by the ſecret Inſtruments of his divine Providence, and gives aſſiſtance unto them that fear him, when as all humane help and hope fails, as you may underſtand in the ſequel of this Hiſtory: whence grew the Ambaſſador's Affront which he received.

The generous Reſolution of Prince Coreſkie.

About the ſame time, there had been a Lady taken out of Podolia, with a fair young Daughter of hers and a Maid-Servant, by the Tartarians, who ſold them unto a Turk, and he brought them unto Conſtantinople to make his Profit. This Lady, who was a Chriſtian, hearing nothing from her Husband for the ſpace of nine months, went, accompanied with her Daughter, to the French Ambaſſador's Houſe, which was at Pera, to crave his Aid and Aſſiſtance; where his Secretary (who was called Martine) moved with Compaſſion and Love, promiſed unto them all Service, and afterwards aſſured the Mother, That if ſhe would promiſe he ſhould marry her Daughter, he would endeavour to redeem them from Captivity: whereunto the Ladies yielded, and they paſſed their Promiſe in Writing to the Secretary; whereupon he payed two thouſand and five hundred Crowns for their Ranſome, and ſent them home into their Country. Being returned, the Lady made her Husband and the reſt of her Friends acquainted how they had been freed from Captivity, and of the Contract of Marriage which was paſt between her Daughter and the French Ambaſſador's Secretary; but the Father did altogether diſlike of this Marriage, for that Martine, he ſaid, was no Gentleman, and had not an Eſtate to entertain his Daughter according to her Quality. The Mother advertiſed Martine ſoon after of the Father's Refuſal, proteſting unto him, That he alone was the hinderance: and as for the Mony which he had diſburſed for their Ranſome, they would ſend it unto him, if he pleaſed, to Conſtantinople, with Intereſt. Martine was much diſcontented, and divers Letters and Expoſtulations paſt betwixt them, but he could not obtain the Execution of his deſire, and their promiſe; whereupon he grew full of Grief and Melancholy, and thereupon went to viſit Prince Coreſky who was in the Black Tower, to make his Complaint unto him, and to take his Advice what courſe were beſt for him to follow. He made his Excuſe that he had been ſent by his Maſter to carry the Prince ſome Money, as he had done at other times, who making the Prince acquainted with his Diſcontent (for that he knew theſe Podolians, and had formerly allowed of the Suit which he had made to this Virgin) he comforted him, ſaying, That if he might by any means get out of Priſon, he would willingly ſupply the Defects which they objected againſt him, and would maintain him againſt

all that ſhould oppoſe themſelves againſt his accompliſhing of his Deſires. This made Martine ſtudy by what means he might free the Prince, to the end he might bind him to ſuccour him when he was at liberty, and Love, which is many times the Author of many goodly Inventions, ſuggeſted one unto him which was very ſubtile and difficult to execute; which was, to ſend unto Prince Coresky a bottom of Packthread in a little Pye, which he ſent him with other meat, advertiſing him by a Letter, that upon a certain night concluded betwixt them, he ſhould put down the Packthread at his Chamber-Window, whereunto a Ladder of Cords ſhould be tied, by the which he might deſcend from the Tower: the which was afterwards punctually effected, not by Martine himſelf, but by a Greek Prieſt, who lived in Conſtantinople, to whom he had imparted his Enterpriſe, and had ingaged him upon hope of great reward from the Prince. In the mean time, Martine, doubting that he ſhould be ſuſpected to practiſe this Eſcape, reſolved to be gone, and took leave of the Ambaſſador, whom he gave to underſtand, that he had ſome ſpecial urgent Affairs which did preſs his ſpeedy Return into France; and therefore he left the Execution of his Deſign to the Greek Prieſt, who failed not at the time appointed to do as the Secretary had directed him. The Prince having drawn up this Ladder of Ropes with the help of his Packthread, and being come to the foot of the Tower, with his Chamber-Fellow, he found the Greek Prieſt attending for them, who told him, that he had charge from Martine to conduct them to a certain Cave, which was in a great Rock a League from thence, where they muſt remain all the day, and that in the Evening he would not fail to come unto them and bring them Habits like unto his own, that being ſo diſguiſed, he might conduct them to his Lodging in Conſtantinople, and there conceal them as long as they ſhould think fit. This Device pleaſed them well, and ſo they went all three unto the ſaid Cave, whereas the two Cameradoes hid themſelves, and the Prieſt returned to his Houſe.

Prince Coreskie eſcapes out of Priſon.

At the break of day, it being the three and twentieth of November 1617, ſome of the Guards entering the Priſoners Chamber, ſaw that they were eſcaped, and found the Ladder of Ropes which they had uſed tied to the Window; whereat they were much amazed, knowing well that they ſhould ſmart for it: notwithſtanding, he who had charge of the Priſons, ſent ſpeedily to Conſtantinople, to give notice of their Eſcapes. As ſoon as this was known, they ſent Poſts ſpeedily to all parts, to make inquiry of theſe Fugitives, eſpecially at the ports and paſſages, giving them ſpecial charge to obſerve all men that paſſed, if there were not one who had the little finger of his right hand ſhrunk up, as Prince Coresky had by a Wound which he had received. Within few days after, the Turk ſeiſed upon the Servants of the Baron of Sancy or Mole, Ambaſſador for the French, torturing two of them after their manner; which is, to lay the Party upon a Table on his Belly, and to give him three or four hundred blows with a ſtaff upon the ſoles of their Feet, the calves of their Legs, and their Buttocks, yet could they not make them ſay any thing that might charge their Maſter, as theſe Turkiſh Tormentors did hope. Not content herewith, they did as much to a poor Turk, who was a Weaver by his Trade, and dwelt near unto the Ambaſſador, thinking to force him by this cruel torture to depoſe falſly, that he had ſeen the Secretary Martine going and coming to his Maſter's Lodging, untill the time of the Priſoner's Eſcape: but God would not ſuffer the Weaver to depoſe any thing but the Truth, notwithſtanding all the miſerable and cruel Torments which he had ſuffered. The which is worthy the Obſervation, for that the Turks do generally hate Chriſtians mortally, and do greatly rejoyce at their Diſaſters. As for the Guards of the Towers, ſome of them were empailed, and ſome were pounded or beaten to pieces in great Mortars of Iron, wherein they do uſually pound their Rice to reduce it to Meal.

Three days after, the Chiaus Baſſa had charge to ſeiſe upon the Perſon of the French Ambaſſador, the which he performed very ſeverely and uncivilly, without any reſpect unto his quality. Having taken him, the ſaid Chiaus led him unto the Viſier's Houſe, where, having been examined upon many Circumſtances touching the Eſcape of Prince Coresky, they left him as a Priſoner in the hands of the ſaid Chiaus, where he continued for the ſpace of three days; during the which, the ſaid Ambaſſador deſiring to write to ſome of his Friends, and alſo to ſpeak with the Mufti, which is the Turks High-prieſt, to acquaint him with his juſt grievances, he could not obtain leave, but by giving two thouſand Crowns unto his Jaylor: True it is, that this Preſent made the Chiaus tell the Ambaſſador, that if he would obtain any favour from the Mufti, he muſt procure it by Money; according to which Advice, he gave three or four thouſand Crowns, whereupon the Mufti became tractable, acquainting the Grand Seignior Muſtapha with the Ambaſſador's juſt Complaints, and of what Importance his Detention was, ſeeing there was nothing found to charge him, That he had favoured the Eſcape of Prince Coresky, as it was ſuſpected; and that his Secretary, who had practiſed it for his own private profit, had left his Maſter above ten or twelve days before the ſaid Eſcape, with an intent, as he ſaid, to return into France. Finally, That all the World would tax him to have violated the Law of Nations, and that no Chriſtian Prince, nor other, would hereafter put any confidence in him; and it was to be feared, that they would all joyn together, and make War againſt him; and in truth the Ambaſſadors, both the King of England's and the Low Countries, were much diſcontented at this unworthy uſage of the French, proteſting openly, That if he were not ſpeedily ſet at liberty, they would retire themſelves into their Countries. All which Conſiderations, repreſented by the Mufti, moved the Grand Seignior to command, that the ſaid Baron of Mole or Sancy, ſhould be ſent back to his Houſe without any farther Diſpleaſure. But all this could not free his Houſhold Servants from their Impriſonment, but he was forced to pay two or three and twenty thouſand Crowns for their Redemption; for elſe they ſhould have been ſo tormented, as their Lives had been in danger; for ſo they were threatned. Soon after, the Grand Viſier hearing of the tyrannous Government of Sultan Muſtapha, returned from Perſia with his whole Army towards Conſtantinople, where he forced him to leave the Empire, and to retire to his Cell, having reigned but two months and ſome odd days.

The Ambaſſador ſet at liberty.

1618 But to return to Prince Coresky, whom we left with Captain Rigaut in the Lodging of the Greek Prieſt at Conſtantinople, whereas they lay hidden for the ſpace of two Months, untill that their good Hoſt got leave from the Patriarch of Alexandria, as well for himſelf, as for two others (who he ſaid were of his Society) to go and confine themſelves in the Deſarts of the Archipelagus, with many Hermits which lived there after the manner of the ancient Anchorites. Having gotten this leave and paſport, they embarqued, being diſguiſed like Prieſts, and arrived at Etchut, where they found an Engliſh Ship ready to ſet ſail for Meſſina in Cicily, from whence he went by Land to Naples, where he made himſelf known to the King of Poland's Ambaſſador, who was wonderful glad of his Liberty, leading him to the Duke of Oſſuna, then Viceroy of Naples, who furniſhed him with all things neceſſary, and a good Convoy to go to Rome, where the Pope received ſingular content to ſee him, and to hear of his ſtrange Adventures. From thence he paſt to Vienna, where the Emperour entertained him according to his merits: after which, he retired to his own houſe, full of Honour, gotten by his Valour and Conſtancy in his Afflictions. Our Ambaſſador that was lately in Conſtantinople ſaith, he eſcaped by the black Sea, and ſo into Polonia. 1618

Osman, thy gentle nature far declin'd
From Turkish tyranny, and pride of mind;
Which made heaven raise, thee and extirpat them,
The proud Usurpers, of thy Diadem.
O! would all Princes, when their States are blest
With power, and empire, think their interest
In those their bleſsings, held but by the grace
Of Gratitude, and Goodneſse, and no place
Is held without them long, they soone would trie,
That Truth prevailes past all their Policie.

THE REIGN OF OSMAN,

The Firſt of that Name, Tenth Emperour of the Turks.

1618 PRince Oſman being ſet at Liberty by the Grand Viſier, he cauſed him to be proclaimed Sultan, and ſeated in the Imperial Throne of the Othomans, with the general Applauſe of all the Baſſaes and Army. The French Ambaſſador being by the ſame means freed from his Guard, advertiſed the King his Maſter, how barbarouſly he had been entreated by Muſtapha, entreating his Majeſty to revoke him from that charge. Whereupon the King ſent two Gentlemen to Conſtantinople to the new Emperour Oſman, to demand reparation of the Indignity done unto his Ambaſſador and Secretary; and to let him underſtand, that he could not ſend any other Ambaſſador to his Court to condole the Death of Sultan Achmat his Father, nor congratulate his coming to the Eaſt, until that he had received ſatisfaction from him befitting his Dignity, and the wrongs he had received in his Ambaſſador. The Grand Viſier and the Muphty hearing this Embaſſy, and conſidering of the Actions which had paſſed, adviſed the Emperour Oſman to ſend an Ambaſſador to the moſt Chriſtian King, to confirm their League, and to teſtifie both by Word and Letters how much he was diſpleaſed for his Diſcontent.

The French King ſends to Conſtantinople.

The Turk ſends an Ambaſſador into France.

The Grand Seignior, by the Advice of his Viſier and others, ſent Uri Chiaus into France, to confirm the Articles of Peace betwixt the French and the Turks. At his firſt Audience he preſented a Letter unto his Majeſty with this Superſcription.

> To the moſt glorious and puiſſant Prince of the belief of Jeſus, Arbitrator of all the Differences which happen among the Chriſtian Nations, and of all the moſt noble, and the moſt antient, the Emperour of France, to whom we wiſh the end of his Days to be happy, and his Deſires accompliſhed.

His Letter to the French King.

KNow, that I ſend unto you the Capitulations and Treaties of Peace which are betwixt our Majeſties; giving you to underſtand, that there is not any thing firm or ſtable in this World, neither King nor Beggar, although they live long; that which pleaſeth God cannot fail. If all Mens deſires ſhould ſucceed, without doubt all men would go to Heaven. Man whatſoever he doth, or in what Dignity ſoever he be, ſhall not remain in this frail Life; wiſe men know it, and it is apparent to the learned. By that which we have ſaid, we deſire to let you know, that he who was in Health, hath encountred Death, and is gone to a goodlier Place, to Paradiſe, my Father Sultan Achmat Chan; the God which hath no reſemblance, have mercy on him. No man ſhall remain in this lying World: And in Paradiſe are the Approaches to the Almighty God, where there is no Death. Finally he is gone.

1618 Since the beginning of the Othomans, until this preſent, the Empire of my Fathers and their Countries from Father and Son, from Hand to Hand, and from Father to Son, the Inheritance coming ſo unto us; Our Uncle Sultan Muſtapha Chan, for that he was elder than our ſelf, was preferred before us to the Throne of the Othomans, and was ſome days in peaceable poſſeſſion of the Empire, yielding Juſtice equally to all men both great and ſmall. But as he was ſhut up many years in ſecret Places, praying unto God continually; ſo of himſelf he hath relinquiſhed the Dignity of the Emperour, and contemned it. The Empire then belonging to thoſe of our high Lineage, and for that by right it ſhould come unto me, the Almighty God by his infinite Bounty and Mercy hath reſtored it into my Hands, my Viſiers, Baſſaes, Lieutenants, the Muſti, and other great Perſonages, and they that are in any reſpect with me; and finally, all my Subjects and Vaſſals, by a general conſent have acknowledged me for Emperour, in the happy year 1027, about the firſt day of the Moon of January, in a good hour. Wherefore I am ſeated in the great Throne of the Othomans, like unto that of Solomon, a powerful and able Emperour, and in all our Countries and Cities; All the Muſulmans being aſſembled together in their Churches to preach, the greatneſs of my Name hath been proclaimed, and through all the Mints of mine Empire they have graven it in their Stamps, to coin pieces of Gold and Silver. Finally, whereſoever there are any Muſulmans, and in what Places there are Men, my Name ſhines like Gold. Hereafter Injuſtice nor Impiety ſhall have no Place, but Juſtice ſhall be done equally. Now we are in Joy, and for that our natural Diſpoſition is good, and the ancient Friendſhip betwixt us is perfect, I therefore thought good to advertiſe you of all that hath paſſed here, and to ſend you our Letters of Imperial Alliance by Urciu Chiaus, who is my antient Servant, having had the managing of my Treaſure, whereof he hath given me good account, being arrived at your Court, carrying my ſaid Letter, he deſerves to be received with Honour: ſwearing and proteſting again unto you, to obſerve in all points the full Capitulation made betwixt my Predeceſſors and your Great Grandfathers, and for Our part, you may be aſſured, that the Faith promiſed ſhall be maintained as it hath been heretofore by our Predeceſſors. And from the day I entered into my Throne, I have made my will known to all my Viceroys, and other Officers which do my Juſtice, and generally to all thoſe of my Obedience; intreating you to give the like Commandment to your Governours of Provinces, and other Officers of Juſtice, as in like manner to all your Subjects. And as your Grandfathers have taken the Faith of our High Family, ſo it may pleaſe you to continue with me, and we deſire that on both ſides it may be good and firm. Know then that for my part it ſhall be obſerved, ſo as of your ſide, there be nothing done contrary to the promiſed Faith.

And if before we came unto the Imperial Throne, your Ambaſſador, which did your Affairs, hath received received any diſtaſte, and hath not received the Honour and Friendſhip accuſtomed, in my time he ſhall be the more honoured and reſpected, as the chiefeſt Ambaſſadors have been: I have commanded, that he ſhall be greatly favoured, and our Reſpect ſhall be unto him as Quineo, that is to ſay, Gold, and doubt nothing of it: for I do certifie you.

The French King having received by this Action a full ſatisfaction for the Indignity done unto his Ambaſſador, ſoon after he called the Baron of Mole, or Sancy, home into France, ſending the Earl of Sezi to ſucceed him as Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople.

A Battel betwixt the Turks and the Perſians.

The War continuing ſtill betwixt the Turks and the Perſians, the Grand Viſier was ſent to invade Perſia with a great Army; where, after many Exploits of War, News came to Conſtantinople, That the Viſier had gotten a great advantage upon the Sophy of Perſia in a Battel which had been fought, wherein there had been an hundred thouſand men ſlain. And although the Turks loſt the greateſt number, yet they remained Maſters of the Field, and ſpoiled the Perſians Camp, who was retired or fled: for that the manner of the Sophy is, to fight with the Turks in retiring or giving way a little; and with this manner of fighting they have always made Head againſt the Turks. After this Overthrow, the Viſier advanced with his Army, and entred far into Perſia, which made many doubt that his Return would prove difficult: yet ſoon after there came Letters to Conſtantinople, importing, That the Turks being in Perſia in great diſtreſs for Victuals, the Sophy had ſent an Ambaſſador to the Viſier to demand Peace, promiſing hereafter to ſatisfie the Tributes of Silk which he ought yearly unto the Turk; and that the Viſier (in regard of the neceſſity of his Army) had accepted his Offer, and granted him Peace, the which Sultan Oſman did afterwards ratifie. After the concluſion whereof, the Sophy ſent many Camels loaden with Victuals unto the Turks Army, which was in great diſtreſs and want.

A Peace concluded betwixt them.

A Comet ſeen over Conſtantinople.

During the Turks War in Perſia, upon the Anniverſary day of Sultan Achmat, there appeared in the Night a Comet over the City of Conſtantinople, in form like unto a crooked Sword, or Turks Scimiter; and it was ſo great as it extended from the Meridian near unto our Zenith, unto the Horizon: the point began to ſhew it ſelf an hour after midnight, and then it appeared little and ſomewhat whitiſh, and gave but a glimpſe; after an hour it was more apparent, and of a deeper colour, and the more it did riſe, the redder it was, and like unto blood; but at the break of day it vaniſhed by little and little in the light; and it was ſo big when the point approached near unto the Zenith, as the Hilt was hidden under the Horizon: The Mathematicians did obſerve, that it followed the motions of the Heavens; it did always riſe in one place, and the bending of the ſaid Sword was toward Crates, more Southerly than it. It did appear directly in the Eaſt a quarter toward the South, the point coming directly towards Conſtantinople, and the Blade extending it ſelf to the ſaid Eaſt a quarter to the South, which is juſtly the part where Perſia is ſituated. The Edge looked directly towards Conſtantinople, the which made men diſcourſe diverſly, and many were amazed, fearing that it did ſignifie the loſs and defeat of their Army in Perſia, whoſe Return they feared much.

Vri or Huſſeine Chiaus, having finiſhed his Embaſſy in France, came into England with the like Charge, and had Audience from his Majeſty at White-hall, Sir Thomas Glover being Interpreter; from whom I received a true diſcourſe of his whole Speech, as followeth.

The Turkiſh Ambaſſador's Speech to his Majeſty.

The Interpretation hereof is thus:

THat moſt true, incomprehenſible, and moſt high God, increaſe and multiply your Majeſties Years in all Happineſs and Felicity: Amen, oh thou Lord of the World.

The moſt invincible, moſt mighty, and moſt happy Sultan Oſman Chan, of the Othoman Empire Monarch, ſendeth unto your excellent Majeſty a hundred thouſand Salutations and Greetings, evermore praying the moſt high God for your Majeſties Happineſs, ſendeth unto your Highneſs, with all poſſible Honour and Renown, this his Imperial and moſt noble Letter, and withal hopeth, that the ſacred bond of Peace, which hath been hitherto inviolably on your Majeſties parts kept and obſerved; your Majeſty will be well pleaſed ſtill on your part, with daily increaſe more and more of Friendſhip, earneſtly to continue therein. And his Imperial Majeſty, on his behalf, is alſo reſolved in like manner evermore punctually to keep and obſerve the ſame.

Alſo the moſt mighty Emperour's Tutor, and his chief Viſier Baſſa, hath addreſſed to the duſt of your noble Feet, this his moſt honourable Letter, with a thouſand Commendations, praying everlaſtingly that mighty God for your Majeſties long Life and Happineſs.

Alſo your Majeſties Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople, your Slave Paul Pinder, bowing his Forehead to the duſt of your Majeſties Feet, and moſt humbly kiſſing your Highneſs bleſſed Feet, hath directed unto your Majeſty this his ſubmiſſive Letter.

The Interpretation verbatim is thus:

MOST happy Emperour, As I have with mine own Hands, bowing my ſelf to the duſt of your Princely Feet, appreſented unto your excellent Majeſty the moſt mighty and high Sultan Oſman, my Lord and Maſter, his Imperial Letter; ſo likewiſe, I moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty, that you will be pleaſed, in conformity thereof, to vouchſafe your princely Anſwer by your noble Letter, and to deliver the ſame into the hands of me your Slave; and be ever Partaker of all Bleſſedneſs and Happineſs.

A Copy of the Letter of Sultan Oſman, the Othoman Emperour, written to the King's Majeſty, and preſented by Huſſein Chiaus.

Although in this tranſitory World, if the King or the Beggar ſhould enjoy the longeſt term of Life that might be, and obtain all that his heart could wiſh, yet it is moſt certain, that in the end he muſt depart, and be tranſported to the World Eternal; and it is well known unto the wiſe, that it is impoſſible for man to abide for ever in this World. The occaſion of this Prologue is, that the immortal, omnipotent, and only God, hath, by his divine Will and Pleaſure, called unto himſelf our Father, of bleſſed Memory, Sultan Achmat Chan, who in life was happy, and in death laudable; and departing out of this momentary World to be nearer the merciful Creator, being changed into perfect Glory and eternal Bliſs, hath his habitation on high, and his reſt in Paradiſe. This Paternal Empire and Monarchical Kingdom, hath almoſt untill this preſent bleſſed time been always hereditary, from Grandfather to Father, from Father to Son, and ſo curſively on that manner: but, having regard unto the Age and Years of our great and noble Uncle Sultan Muſtapha, he was preferred and honoured to ſit on the Othoman Throne, and being ſettled for ſome time, took care for the Affairs of the Empire, and for all that might concern the People both in general and particular. But he, having been many years retired in Solitarineſs, and given to Devotion and Divine Obedience, being alſo as it were wearied with the cares of the Empire, of his own accord withdrew himſelf from the Government, for that the Diadem and Scepter of the Empire of the ſeven Climates, was the true Right and Inheritance of our moſt excellent Majeſty, of the which (with the meeting and conſent of all the Viſiers, and other Deputies of State, of the Primate of the Muſſulman Law, and of the other honourable Doctors, of the Souldiers, and of all Subjects both publick and private) the Almighty God hath made an high Preſent and worthy Gift unto us. And in the happy day in the beginning of the Moon Rebea-il-evel of this preſent Year 1027, in an expected time, and in an acceptable hour, was our bleſſed and happy ſitting eſtabliſh'd upon the moſt fortunate Othoman Throne, the Seat and Wiſdom of Solomon. In the Pulpits of all the Moſques, the Congregations of the faithful, and Devotion of the Muſſelmen, throughout all our Dominions, is read to our Imperial Name the * Hutbeh. And in the Mints (where innumerable Sums of money are coined, as well upon the Silver as the Gold) our happy Name and Stamp is ſigned. And our moſt powerful Commandments are obeyed in all the Parts and Dominions of the World: and the brightneſs of the Light of the Sun of Juſtice and Equity, hath cauſed the darkneſs of Injuries and Moleſtations to vaniſh away.

Now ſeeing it hath been an ancient Cuſtom of our famous Predeceſſors to give notice of the ſame unto ſuch Princes as are in ſincere Friendſhip, and do continue it with the Houſe of great Majeſty and our Imperial Court; We alſo have written theſe our princely Letters, and appointed for their Bearer the choice among his Equals Huſſein Chiaus (whoſe Power is great) one of the honoured and reſpected Servants of our magnificent Port, the refuge of the World, to the end that ſuch News might cauſe great joy of our moſt honourable Aſſumption. And we do hope, that when they ſhall come to your hands (in conformity of the well grounded friendſhip upon the ſure League, Articles, and Writings which hath been eſtabliſhed of old with our moſt Royal Race and permanent Empire) you will manifeſt infinite Joy and Gladneſs, and certifie as much to the Rulers and Governours of the Dominions and Countries under you, that they may know, that the Articles of Peace and League, and the points of the Oath which are firm and to be deſired on both parts, from the time of our Grand-father and Predeceſſor of Royal Stock, now in Paradiſe (whoſe Souls God inlighten) undoubtedly, during the time of our Reign, ſhall be obſerved with all reſpect. And let there not be the leaſt imagination of any want of due obſervance of the ſigns of Friendſhip on our part, or by any manner of means on your part, for the violating the Foundation of the Peace and League. 1618

* Hutbeh is a Prayer only for the Proſperity of the King.

The Copy of a Letter written by Halil Baſſa, chief Viſier, and General in the Expedition againſt the Perſian, at his Return from the Wars to the City of Senit, in April 1618, unto Sir Paul Pinder, Knight, then Ambaſſador for the King's Majeſty at Conſtantinople.

The Humble Viſier Halil Baſſa,

To the courteous Lord of the Nation of the Meſſiah, both great and honourable among the people of Jeſus, and the true Determiner of Chriſtian Affairs, our good Friend Paul Pinder, the Engliſh Ambaſſador, whoſe latter days be with all felicity: To whoſe noble preſence (after our many kind Salutations tending to all good Affection and manifeſtation of Joy, worthy and beſeeming our Friendſhip) our loving Advice is this, That if you deſire to hear of our Eſtate and Being, you ſhall underſtand, that after we departed from the happy Port with the Army for the Wars of Aſia, we arrived and wintered in Meſopotamia, and removing thence in the Spring with all the Muſſelman Hoſt (always victorious) we went to Van, from which place, untill we came to Tauris, the Muſſulman Army went on always ſacking and deſtroying all thoſe Places and Towns of the Perſians which we met withal by the way in thoſe parts, where were burnt, pillaged, and ruined, ſome thouſands of Villages, and tormenting all thoſe people that came to hand. And when we were come near to Tauris, the General of the Perſian Forces (of perverſe Religion) called Carelghai Han (the accurſed) retired himſelf into the ſaid Tauris, where, beating up his Drums in every quarter, he made a ſhew that he had a will to fight: ſo we ſent a little before us ſome Tartars and others of our Army to hearken out and take notice of the Enemy; who meeting with ſeven or eight hundred Perſians of note, put them to the Sword, very few eſcaping, and that with very great difficulty and hazard: by which the ſaid General finding himſelf unable to reſiſt the power and fury of the Muſſulman Hoſt, or to ſtay any longer in the ſaid place, the very ſame day that we arrived there, the ſaid General, having ſpoiled all the City, fled away; ſo we took the place, ranſacked it, and burned all the Buildings, Towers, Gardens, and whatſoever elſe we found in it. And thus the great City Tauris, by Divine Favour and Grace, became ours. Then forthwith we ſent after the Enemy, the Tartar with ſome Beglerbegs, who overtaking them gave them Battel: and albeit ſome of ours did fall, yet they which fell on the Enemies ſide were innumerable. And ſo going forward

1618 towards Erdevil (their obſcure Reſidence) about ten days Journey of the Country, we went burning and ſpoiling it, and killing all the Perſians that we met, that indeed there was ſo much glory and honour won, as that all the ancient men of the Country do affirm, there was never ſeen the like; inſomuch, that from the Confines of Erdevil, twenty days Journey of the Country was on that manner by us deſtroyed. Thus afterward the King cauſed to empty the ſaid place of Erdevil, and fled into a place called Hulchal, and cauſed his Army to go to the top of a high Mountain, from whence, having ſent three or four times men of Quality unto us, ſeeking and intreating for peace, with promiſe to give yearly to our Emperour an hundred Somes of Silk, and all ſuch places as are upon the Confines gotten in the time of Sultan Solyman, except Der Ne and Der Tink; wherewith we were contented with the peace, and his Ambaſſador is upon the way coming toward us. And ſo we returning the ſame way again (always ſpoiling) we came to Erzirum. And this our preſent Letter is written unto you for the Reſpect and Preſervation of our Friendſhip: and even as our Amity hath ever been hitherto ſincere and firm, ſo likewiſe, by the Grace of God, at our arrival in the happy Port, it ſhall be in like manner maintained and continued, that more cannot poſſibly be. And ſo God keep you in Health.

Bethlem Gabor undertakes to ſuccour the Bohemians with the Turks conſent.

The Wars growing hot in Bohemia againſt the Proteſtants, and the Emperour raiſing what Forces he could to ſuppreſs them, the Directors or Governours of the Country wrote their Letters to Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Tranſilvania, to acquaint him with the eſtate of their Affairs. To whom he made anſwer, That his Country ſtanding even in the very Jaws of the Turks, whoſe Councils were never quiet, but ever working like to the Waves of the vaſt Ocean, and always watchful to embrace all occaſions upon any diſcord of the Chriſtians, eſpecially now when they had pacified all Quarrels with the Perſian, and had no Rebels in Aſia, againſt whom they might imploy their Forces; he had propounded to himſelf to attend the Conſent and Favour of the Othoman Emperour, whereby he might take from him all occaſion to make any irruption into the neighbour Countries, and have the better means to imploy his beſt means to reconcile the Diſcords among the Chriſtians: wherefore having ſent unto Conſtantinople to acquaint the Grand Seignior with his Intent, and to crave his Favour, he received Letters from thence the 17*th* of Auguſt, whereby he was aſſured of the Grand Seignior's Conſent and Favour. Whereupon, he reſolved (notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the Houſe of Auſtria, the Pope of Rome, and others of that Faction) to take Arms in defence of the Bohemians, promiſing to be in September following upon the Confines of Moravia, unleſs he found ſome ſtay in Hungary. Being advertiſed of the State of Bohemia and Moravia, he levied an Army at Clauſenburg, and entered into the Upper Hungary, whereas moſt of the Barons ſubmitted themſelves unto him; only Humanoie, a great man in that Country, oppoſed himſelf: but not able to make his party good, he fled into Polonia. After which, he ſent his Army (being eighteen thouſand ſtrong) and took Filek, Ternau, Vacci, Novigrade, and others: after which he ſeiſed upon Neuheuſal, the Governour being delivered bound unto him. The Palatine of Hungary wrote Letters to Redei, General of the Prince of Tranſilvania's Army, wiſhing him to conſider what the Forces of the Kings of Spain and France were, with the Houſe of Auſtria and their Allies, and that the Electors of the Empire (ſome excepted) would ſend Aid unto the Emperour: who anſwered, That he doubted not of the Power of thoſe Kings, and that the Electors would ſend Supplies unto the Emperour; yet he hoped that before they came, all ſhould be ended, and their Dinners ſhould be provided. 1619

Bethlem Gabor takes many Towns in Hungary.

Soon after, the Prince of Tranſilvania came to Presburg with his Army, a Town of note in Hungary, whereas their Kings are uſually crowned. The News thereof coming to Vienna, they ſent 3000 Souldiers with three pieces of Ordnance down the River of Danow, who entred the Suburbs on the 13*th* of October, the Night was very ſtormy and rainy, and the Tranſilvanians taking this Opportunity, charged them, and ſlew the greateſt part, their Commander flying away with ſome few. The Suburbs being taken, Bethlem Gabor ſent to the Palatine, to know whether he would yield the Town and Caſtle without force, giving him ſome time to reſolve; who, after Conſultation with ſome Noble-men, they reſolved to yield, and ſo the Town was delivered into his hands. After which he ſent part of his Army under good Commanders into Auſtria, to the Gates of Vienna, where they committed great ſpoil, the particular relation whereof I leave to the Hiſtory of the Emperour's Lives, to which it doth properly belong.

Propoſitions made by the Tranſilvanians and Hungarians to the Bohemians.

In November, Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Tranſilvania, and the Eſtates of Hungary, ſent Ambaſſadors to Prague, where they propounded divers Articles unto the Council, and amongſt others, That they ſhould joyntly ſend Ambaſſadors to the Grand Seignior, and that the Prince of Tranſilvania ſhould negotiate the Buſineſs. And for that the Kingdom of Hungary was much exhauſted, whatſoever ſhould be taken in Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola, ſhould be united unto it, to the end it might be the better able to reſiſt the Turk; all which tended to the prejudice and ruine of the Houſe of Auſtria. The Prince of Tranſilvania having taken divers Towns in Hungary, belonging to the Emperour as King of Hungary, and entred Auſtria in hoſtile manner in favour of the Bohemians; knowing that he had thereby much incenſed the Emperour, and the whole Houſe of Auſtria, and that if he ſhould prevail over the Bohemians, the whole burthen of the War would lye upon him, he therefore in the end of this year ſent an Ambaſſador with Preſents to Conſtantinople, to crave aſſurance of the Grand Seignior's Aid and Support (upon whoſe Favour he had always depended) in caſe the Emperour ſhould invade Tranſilvania; where, being countenanced by many of the chief Baſſaes, he had aſſurance of Sultan Oſman's Support and Protection, the which he confirmed by a ſolemn Oath under his hand, as followeth.

The Great Turk's Oath to Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Tranſilvania.

Sultan Oſman,

B*Y the Grace of God unconquerable* Turkiſh Emperour, ſwears by the Higheſt, Almightieſt, and Almighty Gods Holineſs, by his Kingdom, by the ſubſtance of the Heavens, the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, by the Earth, and by all under the Earth, by the Brains and all the hairy Scalp of my Mother, by my Head, and all the ſtrength of my Soul and Body, by the holy great Mahomet, and by my Circumciſion, That I, thee my Brother and Son Bethlem Gabor, ſucceeding King of Hungary, in no manner of way, in thy great and weighty Affairs will leave, though it be to the Overthrow of my Kingdom, to be brought to nothing, untill there ſhall be no more left but my ſelf, or four or five Turks at the moſt, yet will I be ſtill obli-

And in caſe this my promiſe ſhall in any wiſe be fruſtrated, then let Gods Juſtice fall upon my Head and deſtroy me and my Poſterity, and wipe away whatſoever belongeth unto me, and gather it together into a Rock of Stone, or ſubſtance of Earth, and that the Earth may cleave in ſunder, and ſwallow me up Body and Soul.*

A League betwixt the Prince of Tranſilvania, Bohemians, and Hungarians.

Bethlem Gabor, being aſſured by this Oath of Protection made by the Grand Seignior, in the beginning of the year 1620, he called an Aſſembly of the Eſtates of Hungary at Presburg, whither Ambaſſadors were ſent from the King of Bohemia, and the States of that Country, with the incorporated Provinces, where a perpetual League was concluded betwixt them, and afterwards concluded at Prague; where, among other Articles, it was concluded, that foraſmuch as Neceſſity did chiefly require, that a Peace ſhould be concluded and inviolably kept with the Turk, therefore a new Ambaſſie ſhould be ſent to the Grand Seignior from all the confederate Kingdoms and Provinces; and that Bethlem Gabor ſhould take upon him the chief care of that buſineſs; but yet in ſuch ſort, as the Bohemians and incorporated Provinces ſhould ſend their Ambaſſadors with the Hungarians, and bear their ſhares of all that ſhould be diſburſed, as well for the Preſents, as for the Ambaſſadors Charges.

An Aſſembly of the Eſtates of Hungary at Neuhuſal.

In June following, Bethlem Gabor went to an Aſſembly of the Eſtates of Hungary at Neuhuſal, where he propounded divers heads unto the States: That he deſired nothing more than to reſtore the Kingdom of Hungary, ſo miſerably afflicted, to Liberty; and that they might enjoy their Religion and Priviledges: That he had ſpared no coſt for the lawful defence of the Country; and for a Teſtimony that he deſired Peace, he had refuſed the Crown which the Eſtates offered him at Presburg: That the ground of Peace was to maintain the League which they had begun with the Bohemians: That he had always deſired Peace with the help of other Princes, ſo as it were ſincere and without Fraud or Deceit, for the obtaining whereof he had aſſiſted his Confederates miſerably afflicted: That he knew for certain the Emperour deſired not Peace, but War, having ſuffered the Coſſacks to enter into Hungary, and to ſpoil many Places with Fire and Sword, and denied paſſage for the Ambaſſadors of Bohemia and Auſtria; for this cauſe they were not now to treat of Peace, but of War, and to conſult how it might be begun and maintained; for the levying of Money, which is the ſinews of War; for the furniſhing of their Forts upon the Frontiers, and for the ſpeedy ſending of Ambaſſadors to the Turkiſh Emperour, leſt being engaged in an inteſtine War, there might be ſome attempts made upon thoſe bordering Forts. Having delivered his Mind unto the Eſtates, there came divers Ambaſſadors thither from Bohemia, Auſtria, Sileſia, and Luſatia, Venice, Poland, and Turky: The Venetian Ambaſſador was content their Commonwealth ſhould enter into the League, and the Turk made offer to conclude a perpetual League with them.

Bethlem Gabor* proclaimed King of Hungary.

On the five and twentieth day of Auguſt, Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Tranſilvania, was proclaimed King of Hungary by the Palatine, at the inſtance of the Turkiſh Ambaſſador, and with the conſent and applauſe of moſt part of the Eſtates of the Country: After which, he levied a great Army of thirty (ſome ſay fifty) thouſand Horſe and Foot, and made many Enſigns with divers Emblems and Devices; which being known, the Proteſtants of Vienna, with the Conſent of the Emperour, wrote unto him, humbly entreating him to ſpare the City and Country, for their innocent Wives and Childrens ſakes; but in the mean time all the Citizens were commanded to make Proviſion of Victuals for ſix Months.

A Viſion ſeen at Medina Talnabi.

There came News to Conſtantinople of a ſtrange Apparition or Viſion, which was ſeen at Medina Talnabi in Arabia, whereas Mahomet their great Prophet was buried; to viſit whoſe Tomb the Turks uſe to go in Pilgrimage, but they muſt firſt go to Mecha, which is ſome few days Journey off, and there they take a Ticket from the Grand Seigniors Beglerbeg, elſe they are not allowed to go to Medina. This Viſion continued three Weeks together, which terrified the whole Country, for that no Man could diſcover the truth thereof. About the twentieth of September, there fell ſo great a Tempeſt, and ſo fearful a Thunder about Midnight, as the Heavens were darkned, and thoſe that were awake, almoſt diſtracted; but the Vapours being diſperſed, and the Element clear, the People might read in Arabian Characters theſe words in the Firmament, O why will you believe in Lies! Between two and three in the Morning, there was ſeen a Woman in white, compaſſed about with the Sun, having a cheerful Countenance, and holding in her Hand a Book; coming from the North-weſt, oppoſite againſt her were Armies of Turks, Perſians, Arabians, and other Mahometans, ranged in order of Battel, and ready to charge her; but ſhe kept her ſtanding, and only opened the Book, at the ſight whereof theſe Armies fled; and preſently all the Lamps about Mahomets Tomb went out; for as ſoon as ever the Viſion vaniſhed (which was commonly an hour before Sun riſing) a murmuring Wind was heard, whereunto they imputed the extinguiſhing of the Lamps. The antient Pilgrims of Mahomets Race, who after they have viſited this Place, never uſe to cut their Hair, were much amazed, for that they could not conceive the meaning of this Viſion; only one of the Dervices (which is a ſtrict religious order amongſt the Turks, like unto the Catuchins among the Papiſts, and live in contemplation) ſtepped up very boldly, and made a Speech unto the Company, which incenſed them much againſt him, ſo as this poor Prieſt for his plain dealing loſt his Life, as you ſhall hear.

A Dervice Speech unto the Turks.

The ſum of his Speech was this: “ That the “ World had never but three true Religions,
“ every one of which had a Prophet; firſt, God “ choſe the Jews, and did Wonders for them in “ Ægypt, and brought them forth by their Pro“ phet Moſes, who preſcribed them a Law, “ wherein he would have maintained them, if “ they had not been obſtinate and rebellious,
“ and fallen to Idolatry; whereupon he gave “ them over, and ſcattered them upon the face
“ of the Earth. Then preſently after he raiſed
“ a new Prophet, who taught the Chriſtian
“ Religion. This good man the Jews condem“ ned and crucified for a ſeducer of the People,
“ not moved with the Piety of his Life, his great “ Miracles, nor his Doctrine. Yet after his “ Death, the preaching of a few Fiſhermen, did
“ ſo move the Hearts of Men, as the greateſt “ Monarchs of the World bowed to his very “ Title, and yielded to the command of his Mi“ niſters. But it ſeems they grew as corrupt as the Jews, their Church being diſmembred with the diſtinction of the Eaſt and Weſt, committing Idolatry again by ſetting up of Images, with many other idle Ceremonies, beſide the corruption of their Lives, ſo as God was weary of them too, and not only ſent diviſions among them, but forſook them, diſpoſſeſſing them of their chiefeſt Cities, Hieruſalem and Conſtantinople; yet God is ſtill the Governour of the World, and provides himſelf of another Prophet and People, raiſing our great Mahomet, and giving way to our Nation, ſo as no doubt we ſhall be happy for ever, if we can ſerve this God aright, and take Example by the fall of others. But, alas! I tremble to ſpeak it, we have erred in every point, and wilfully broken our firſt Inſtitutions, ſo as God hath manifeſted his Wrath by many evident ſigns and tokens, keeping our Prophet from us, who prefixed a time to return with all happineſs to his People, ſo as there are now forty years paſt by our account: Wherefore this ſtrange and fearful Viſion is a Prediction of ſome great Troubles and Alterations. For, either the opening of this Book in the Womans hand, doth foretel our falling away from the firſt intent of our Law, whereat theſe armed Men departed, as confounded with the guilt of their own Conſciences; or elſe it ſignifies ſome other Book in which we have not yet read, and againſt which no power ſhall prevail; ſo as I fear our Religion will be proved corrupt, and our Prophet an Impoſtor, and then this Chriſt whom they talk of, ſhall ſhine like the Sun, and ſet up his Name everlaſtingly. Hitherto the Company was ſilent, but hearing him ſpeak ſo boldly, they charged him with Blaſphemy; and knowing their Law, which makes all Blaſphemy capital, they preſently condemned him, and having the Beglerbegs conſent and Warrant, they put him to death.

The Dervice put to death for his Speech.

As their Rage againſt him was violent, ſo their Execution was extraordinary, for they neither cut off his Head nor ſtrangled him, as they uſually do to Malefactors, but they tortured him by degrees; for, ſtripping him firſt naked, they gave him an hundred blows on the ſoles of his Feet with a flat Cudgel, until the Blood iſſued forth, the poor Prieſt crying continually on the Woman that opened the Book. After which they took a Bull's Pizzle, and beat all his body until the Sinews crack'd, and in the end they laid him upon a Wheel, and with an Indian Sword made of Sinews, they brake his Bones to pieces, the poor Man crying to the laſt gaſp, O thou Woman with the Book, ſave me, and ſo he dyed: At which time there was a fearful Tempeſt. The Beglerbeg ſent certain Spahies to the Port of Sidon to imbark for Conſtantinople, to the end, they might advertiſe the Emperour of theſe Tidings.

Sultan Oſman, from the firſt entrance into his Reign, was freed from all Cares of foreign War, or inteſtine Combuſtions; for he had that happineſs. (being himſelf very young, and not able to Govern ſo potent an Eſtate) as by the Counſel and Aſſiſtance of Halil Baſſa, his Grand Viſier, he had forced the King of Perſia to demand a Peace, and to pay the Tribute which had been formerly promiſed. His Rebels in Aſia were all pacified, and the Truce with the Emperour (which had been ſomewhat interrupted by miſinterpretation, or the practiſe of bad Miniſters) was newly confirmed a little before his coming to the Crown, onely Moldavia had been the Theatre of War for ſome years, where his Father had exerciſed his Arms, and imployed his Forces, to advance whom he pleaſed to be Vayvod of that Countrey, againſt another party that was ſupported by the Polonians, as you have formerly heard. Michna, Prince of Valachia, being made Vayvod of Moldavia by Achmat, and the Polonian party wholly overthrown in the Year 1616, he enjoyed it not long; but whether he dyed of a natural Death, or fell into diſgrace with the Grand Seignior, I do not read; yet I find, that after him there was another Vayvod or Prince of Moldavia, who is yet living, but in diſgrace with the Sultan, his Name is Caſparo Gratſiani; and to the end you may underſtand, that the Turks never reſpect the Birth and Quality of any Man in their Advancements, I will relate what this Man was from the mouth of him that knew him very well.

This Caſparo was born at Gretz (a Town of great ſtrength belonging unto the Arch-dukes of Auſtria, by the which a Branch of that Houſe is diſtinguiſhed from the reſt, and whereof the Emperour now reigning is the head) but being a Man of ſmall Fortune, and little expectance in his own Countrey, he went to Conſtantinople, and put himſelf in Service with Sir Thomas Glover, before that he was Ambaſſador for his Majeſty to the Grand Siegnior, under whom he learned both to write and read the Turkiſh Tongue. After which he came with him into England, and there by his recommendation was imployed to Conſtantinople for the redeeming of young Sir Thomas Sherley, who was then a Priſoner among the Turks. Having performed his Charge orderly, and being come to Venice with the young Knight, hearing that Sir Thomas Glover was ſent Ambaſſador to the Grand Seignior, he left Sir Thomas Sherley, and went to Conſtantinople to his old Maſter, where he was imployed yearly to buy or exchange Chriſtians for Turks, carrying the Chriſtians into Italy, and ſo returning Turks for them. About the end of Achmat's Reign, arriving at Conſtantinople with a Ship full of Turks, which he had exchanged, he acquainted the Baſſa Viſier with the good Service he had done unto the Grand Seignior; who, demanding of what Countrey he was and his Breeding, asked him if he would undertake a Service which ſhould be for his Advancement, which was to go unto the Emperour to reconcile all Difficulties concerning the Peace, wherein he carried himſelf ſo diſcreetly, as Commiſſioners were appointed, who concluded all Difficulties, as you have heard. But before his return home, the Grand Seignior was dead; yet he preſſed the Baſſa for the performance of his Promiſe, deſiring him, that he might be made Vayvod of Moldavia, which the Baſſa effected; but the Preſents he gave advanced him more than his Merits. Since he grew into ſome diſgrace; ſo as the Grand Seignior, making choice of another Vayvod, gave Charge to certain Capigies, to go into Moldavia to ſtrangle Caſparo, and that they ſhould take four hundred Turks upon the Frontiers to aſſiſt them: But Caſparo having good Spies at Conſtantinople, who advertiſed him of their Deſign, reſolved to prevent them; wherefore, taking ſome Troops with him, he met them upon the way, and cut them all in pieces; then returning to Yas, he ſlew one thouſand Turks. After which he fled into Poland with two thouſand Horſe; from whence they write, that he hath made divers Incurſions into Moldavia, and committed great Spoils upon the Turks, being aſſiſted by the Coſſacks, Caſparo made Vayvod of Moldavia.

He is in diſgrace, and flies into Polonia.

and

and keeps poſſeſſion of the Countrey, although there be another Vayvod made by the Turk.

The Turks preparation to Arms.

Sultan Oſman ſeems to be much incenſed againſt the Polonians, as well for this ſupport, as for former quarrels, making it his colour for the levying of the greateſt Army that hath been ſeen ſince that Solyman went unto the Siege of Agria, conſiſting, as it is ſaid, of three hundred thouſand Men, having drawn down all his Forces out of Aſia, God knows where he will imploy it, but it is much to be feared, that he will make uſe of this diviſion betwixt Chriſtian Princes, who ſhould unite their Wills and Forces, to oppoſe them againſt the common Enemy of Chriſtendom, who watcheth only to get an Advantage, little regarding his Word and Promiſe.

Manfredonia* taken by the Turks.

The Turk, having no imployment for his Forces by Land, ſent threeſcore Gallies to Sea, to make ſome Enterpriſe upon the Chriſtians. They came into the Mediterranean Sea, and having coaſted the Iſland of Sicily, they ſent twenty Gallies to land in the Kingdom of Naples, where they ſurpriſed the Town of Manfredonia, and ſpoiled it, carrying away fourteen or fifteen hundred Captives, and ſo retired again to Sea. The reſt of their Fleet lay about Vellona in the Gulf, which made the Spaniards jealous that the Venetian had been acquainted with this Enterpriſe. And ſince there is News, That the Gallions and Galliots of Algiers, have taken Iuiſa, a ſmall Iland of four miles compaſs, near unto Majorca: It is a Place of great Importance, for that it hath a Haven able to contain much Shipping; for the Guard whereof the King of Spain entertains a great Garriſon, and it did much annoy them of Algiers. They took the Town; but it is not yet certain whether they have taken the Caſtle.

Iuiſa* taken by the Turks.

The greatneſs of the Turks Empire.

This is all I could learn of the Turks Affairs ſince the Year one thouſand ſix hundred and nine untill this preſent. The Reader may obſerve, that ſince the Reign of Ottoman their firſt Emperour, this great Empire of the Turks is proudly built upon the four Monarchies of the World; that is to ſay, of the Aſſirian, Perſian, Greek, and Roman. For they injoy Babylon, and all Chaldæ, with the Countrey of the Medes: We have ſeen them in Tauris, the Capital City of Perſia; Greece is ſubject to the yoke of their Command; Conſtantinople, ſometimes called New Rome, by the tranſport of the Imperial Seat, is now made their Throne; and ſo many Provinces and Realms which in former times depended upon the Roman Empire, do now acknowledge their power; they are Maſters of the Realms of Ægypt and Cyprus; the Iſlands of Rhodes, Metelene, Negropont, Chio, and many others acknowledge them; the Empire of Trebiſond is theirs; the Realm of Colchos, now called Mingrelia, pays them Tribute; they of Tunis and Algier in Affrica obey them; Dalmatia, the Illyrians, Triballians, the Countries of Tranſilvania, Valachia, and Moldavia do them Homage; and we ſee them Command even in the chief Towns of the Realms of Hungary: But all this Power of the Ottomans had never been ſo great nor ſo fearful, but by the diſcord, diviſion, and bad intelligence betwixt Chriſtian Princes, as you may read in the Courſe of this Hiſtory, as well in Greece, at Conſtantinople, as in other parts of Europe, whereas theſe Princes, contending one with another, have furniſhed matter and means to the Turk to diſpoſſeſs them of the chief pieces of their Monarchies. They meaſure the continuance of their Empire by the diſcord betwixt the Princes of the Belief of the Name of Jeſus, and they confeſs truely, that this Diviſion is the onely cauſe of their Greatneſs, the which hath made them believe, that among Chriſtians there was a bad Angel, enemy to peace, which they call the ſtronge or powerful Spirit, which, kindling the fire of Revenge and Ambition in the Hearts of great Men, draws from their Affections the good of their Belief, to entertain them in perpetual Diſcord; during the which, they promiſe unto themſelves a firm and an aſſured Reign. So the Mufti, and the Taliſmans praying on Friday in their Moſques, demand of their Prophet the Circumſtance of this bad Intelligence betwixt the Chriſtian Princes, to the end they may injoy the Empire which they have unjuſtly uſurped. Yet their Prophecies do not promiſe them a perpetual Poſſeſſion; behold one in their own Tongue, which hath always made them fear the union of Chriſtians.

A Turkiſh Prophecy.

Patiſſæ homomos ghelur, caiferun menleker alur kenzul almai alur kapze iler ie di yladegh Giaur Keleci cſikmaſſe on ikigladegh on laron Begbhgheder. Enſi iapar, baghi diker bathеſai baglar, ogli keſi olar; onichi yldderſora Hriſtianon-keleci cſcchar, al Turkci ghereſſine Tuſchure.

That is to ſay:

Our Emperour ſhall come, he ſhall poſſeſs the Realm of an Infidel Prince, he ſhall take the Red Apple, and make it ſubject to his Power; if, at the ſeventh Year of his Command the Chriſtians Sword doth not advance, he ſhall Rule unto the twelfth Year, he ſhall build Houſes, plant Vines, compaſs in Gardens with Hedges, and beget Children; but after the twelfth Year that he hath held the Red Apple, the Chriſtians Sword ſhall appear and put the Turk to flight.

The Expoſition of their Prophecy.

By the Infidel Prince, they underſtand a Chriſtian Prince, (for ſo they call them) and by the Red Apple an Imperial Town, ſtrong and important; in the which, and elſewhere the Turks ſhall build Houſes; that is to ſay, convert Holy Temples to the Uſe of the Mahometan Impiety; for by this Word to build, they that have Commented upon this Propheſie underſtand, Uſurpation of the Houſes of God: Plant Vines, by theſe Words they ſignifie the Extent of the Turkiſh Empire, and the ſettling of their Colonies, as we ſee in Hungary and Tranſilvania: Compaſſing in Gardens, that is to ſay, they ſhall fortifie the Towns which they have taken from their Enemies: Beget Children, extend the Mahometan Religion, far in the Chriſtians Countries. But after the twelfth Year, &c. within a certain time beſt known to God, his Divine Majeſty opening the Eyes of his Clemency upon the Chriſtians, will unite the Wills of their Princes, kindle their affections with a holy zeal, and, bleſſing their Arms, will make them victorious over the Turk, whom he will baniſh out of the Eaſt, and chaſe into Scythia from whence they came to be a ſcourge unto Chriſtendom. Theſe are my Wiſhes, wherein I hope all good Chriſtians do concurr.

The Beginning of the Turkiſh EMPIRE.

HAving run over the Occurrents which have happened in the Turks Eſtate for the ſpace of eleven years, I muſt, according to Maſter Knolles his Method, conclude the Work with a deſcription of the Grand Seignior's Port or Court, of his Government, Officers, Riches, Force, and Religion.

The Turks, (a People of Scythia) having like a violent Deluge overthrown a great part of the Eaſt, and taken divers Provinces, being expelled from Hieruſalem by Godfrey of Bouillon, and the Chriſtians, their remainder retired to Nicea, where they lived without any head or ſovereign Commander, until that Ottoman, about the Year of our Redeemer one thouſand three hundred, by Practice, made himſelf ſole and abſolute Monarch. His Son conquering divers Provinces, removed his Imperial Seat to Pruſia, now called Burſia, the chief Abode of the Kings of Bythinia. Amurath the Firſt (being drawn in by the Emperour of Conſtantinople to ſuccour him, and allured with the Wealth of Europe) turned his Arms againſt him, taking divers Provinces and Towns from him, amongſt others, Adrianopolis, which he made the Seat and reſidence of the Turkiſh Emperours, in the Year one thouſand three hundred ſixty three. But Mahomet the Second, having taken the City of Conſtantinople, and expelled the Emperour, in the Year one thouſand four hundred fifty three, he made it the Royal Seat of the Othomans, fot which he had great reaſon, being one of the faireſt and ſweeteſt Seats of the World.

Conſtantinople hath in circuit, by the opinion of ſome Writers, fifteen or ſixteen miles, and is called by the Turks themſelves Stambull, or Stambolda, the Sea beating upon it upon the North and South ſides: Towards the Eaſt it is divided from Aſia by a large Channel, which runneth from the one Sea to the other, and is about ſeven miles in length. The City is built upon the declining of a Hill, in which there are many rare ſingularities, which I omit, being deſcribed elſewhere. There are in this City ſeven little Hills, upon the which are built ſeven principal Moſques or Churches, by ſeveral Emperours, whereof, the faireſt and moſt ſtately is that of Sultan Solyman. Upon the North ſide of the City ſtandeth the Grand Seignior's Palace or Seraglio, commonly called by the Name of the Port: The which hath on the one ſide thereof the Sea, and on the other ſide of it the Haven, the other two being towards the City, being about three miles in compaſs, ſome write of four. It is walled about, and within it are many Gardens, Orchards, Medows, and Woods. Being entred into the firſt Port (which hath double Gates of Iron) into a large Court, on the left hand there ſtands a building like unto a Turkiſh Moſque, which now the Grand Seignior uſeth for a Store-houſe, wherein are great ſtore of Arms, which are for the defence of his Seraglio. And on the other ſide of this Court are ſeveral Gardens walled in, from which they paſs to another Court with a Gate like unto the former, where are Targuets and Cimitars hanging, and many Porters attending, as at the former. After this, they paſs into another large Court, which is planted with Cypreſs Trees, and full of Graſs, where Deer feed; but round about it is a Cloiſter, which is in length about ſix hundred and fourſcore Foot, and above five hundred in breadth, paved with Stone, and covered with Lead, it being ſupported with one hundred and forty Pillars of white and gray Marble, ſtanding upon Baſes of Copper, with Capitals of the ſame; upon the North ſide whereof ſtands the Divano, whereas the Viſier Baſſa and the other Baſſaes ſit in Council, and hear Cauſes of Importance, whereof we will ſpeak hereafter. In this Seraglio the Grand Seignior hath many Chambers, which are richly appointed, wherein he remains; and there he hath ſix young Men which attend his Perſon and the Service of his Chamber, whereof two wait daily, and at Night they watch when he ſleeps, the one of them at his Head, the other at his Feet, with two Torches burning in their Hands. In the Morning (as Sanzovino writes) when the Grand Seignior attires himſelf, they put into one of his Pockets a thouſand Aſpers, and into the other Pocket twenty Duckets of Gold, the which, if he give not away that Day, is their Fee at Night, neither (as they ſay) doth he ever put on the ſame Clothes: and whenſoever he goes to Hunting, or to any other Exerciſe, (beſides the Money which he hath with him) his Caſnadar Baſſa, or chief Treaſurer, ſtill follows him with great ſtore of Money to give away. The Office of theſe ſix young Men, (who are changed as it pleaſeth the Grand Seignior) is diſtinct, for the one carries his Shooes, the ſecond his Bow and Arrows, the third his Veſt, the fourth a Veſſel with Water, the fifth carries a Seat, and the ſixth, called Oda Baſſa, is head of the Chamber.

Attendants upon the Grand Seignior.

He hath daily a great number of Perſons reſident in his Palace, imployed in their ſeveral Charges, ſome in one place, ſome in another, under their ſeveral Commanders. But among all the great Men in his Court, theſe are ot chiefeſt Eminency and Note.

Firſt, the Capi Aga, that is to ſay, the mouth of the Grand Seignior, by whom the Sultan ſpeaketh to ſuch as have any great ſuit unto him; for no Ambaſſadour is admitted unto him, but at his firſt arrival, when he delivers his Letters of credit and his Preſents, and when he hath any buſineſs to treat of, he repairs to the Viſier Baſſa or his Aga.

The ſecond is Caſnadar Baſſa, the chief Treaſurer of the Houſhold, or Superintendent of the Treaſure.

The third, Chilergi Baſſa, chief Cup-bearer.

The fourth is Seraglio Agaſi, Steward or Maſter of the Houſhold.

The fifth is Chiller Agaſi, or Saraidar Baſſa, Overſeer of his Seraglio of Concubines, who is always an Eunuch as the reſt be.

The ſixth and laſt is Boſtangi Baſſa, chief Gardiner, and Overſeer of all his Gardens, Captain of his Jamoglans, and Steerer of his Barge whenſoever he goeth by Water. He hath a Protogero or Lieutenant, and many Gardiners under him, which are called Boſtangi, who, when they come out of the Seraglio, become Janizaries, Solacchi, or Capigi, according to their Qualities.

Theſe ſix Officers of the Sultans Houſe above mentioned have no authority out of his Palace, yet the greateſt Baſſaes ſtand in awe of them, and fear them, for that they have free acceſs unto the Sultan, and have daily opportunity to incenſe him againſt them; for by their ſecret Suggeſtion and falſe Informations, many of the greateſt Baſſaes are many times ſuddenly and undeſervedly cut off in the height of all their pomp and glory.

The Sultan's dumb Men.

He hath many Mutes or dumb Men attending about him, whereof eight be his daily Companions and Play-fellows in the Seraglio, in whoſe company he takes great delight: beſides many others to the number of forty, which attend upon him as Pages. They are all born deaf and dumb, yet by long Practice they grow ſo perfect, as they will underſtand any thing that ſhall be acted unto them by Signs and Geſtures; and will themſelves by the geſture of their Eyes, Bodies, Hands, and Feet, deliver matters of great difficulty, to the great admiration of ſtrangers.

A Seraglio of young Men.

The Grand Seignior hath within his Palace a Seraglio of young Men, to the number of five hundred, from eight years of Age to twenty; theſe are the well-favouredſt and beſt proportioned of all the Tribute Children which he draweth from Græcia and Natolia, and they are choſen out of his Seraglioes at Pera, Adrianopolis, and other Places, and brought to this to be bred up, where they are inſtructed in divers Arts, according to their Diſpoſition, but eſpecially to Read and Write, and in the Doctrine of their Law, and to Ride, there being a great number of Horſes kept within this Seraglio, for their Exerciſe, and for the Eunuchs. They never go out of the Seraglio till the Sultan thinks them to be of fit Age to undergo ſome Charge, and then he makes them Spacoglani, or Silichtari, and to ſome he gives greater Places, according to their Valour, or the favour they have gotten with him.

They that carry his Lance.

He hath in like manner about fourſcore Mutaſerache, that is to ſay, Lance-bearers to the Grand Seignior; which carry his Lance whenſoever he goeth to field, and acknowledge no other Commander, and in time, by his Favour or their Merits, are made Captains.

The Sultan's Eunuchs.

He hath always above one thouſand Eunuchs entertained in ſeveral Places, whereof ſome of them are in very great credit with him, and can prevail much; they are called Hudurni, many of them are employed to attend his Concubines and Virgins in his Seraglio. They are not only deprived of their Genitors, but in their Youth they have their whole Privities ſmoothed off by their Bellies, and in their Turbants they bear ſhort Quills of ſilver, through which they make Water. This inhumane Cuſtom was firſt invented by Sultan Solyman, who ſeeing a Gelding make offer to cover a Mare, grew ſuſpitious that they were able to do ſome ſmall thing, notwithſtanding the loſs of their Genitors.

The Sultan's Seraglio of Women.

The Grand Senior hath a Seraglio for his Women without his Palace, in the which there are always four or five hundred young Virgins, the faireſt of the Chriſtians Children, which he gathereth up out of Græcia for Tribute. The Sultan repairs ſometime thither to make choice of ſuch as he ſhall like beſt for his Pleaſure; whereof they are advertiſed the day before by the Eunuchs, that they may prepare themſelves in their beſt Habits to give him content. Being all in a Room, and ſtanding upon either ſide, the Sultan enters, attended by an Eunuch or two, and views them; to her that he likes he caſts a Handkercher, (whereof he hath many hanging at his Girdle) and in this manner it may be he makes choice of half a dozen, the which his Eunuchs obſerving, they put them preſently into a Coach, and are carried into another little Seraglio within his Palace. In this Seraglio they have good Entertainment, and are apparelled in Silk twice a Year, and are taught to make divers Works by ancient Matrons, and are attended on by the younger ſort. They have many Eunuchs with their Aga or Captain, and they have one hundred Capigies and Janizaries, which keep their Gates. When as the number of theſe Virgin ſlaves decreaſeth, and they have not wherewithal to ſupply them with their Tributary Children, they ſend to the Market in Conſtantinople, where they ſay there are daily ten thouſand Slaves of all Ages and Sexes to be ſold; and there they buy the faireſt they can get, but they will not have them above eight Years old, leſt they ſhould be corrupted before they come into the Turks Seraglio.

The eſtate of his Concubines.

As for the other Seraglio within the Sultan's Palace, there remains the Sultanaes with their Children, and ſuch other Concubines as he hath made choice of for his Delight. He never marries, but when any one is brought unto him, he gives her an attire for her Head, of Gold, and ten thouſand Aſpers, cauſing her to live in a Chamber a-part, increaſing her daily Maintenance. The firſt that bears him a Child, is called Sultana, and is Miſtreſs of all the reſt, and moſt favoured by him, as the chiefeſt of all his Women, the reſt, as they are favoured by the Prince, are brought unto him to have his Pleaſure, and then returned back again; if they chance to be with Child, they are put into the number of the Sultanaes, and are much reſpected by him. Such as the Prince hath had the uſe of, but no Children by them, are given in marriage to his Slaves, who are advanced to Dignities, and made Governours of Countries.

His Guard, Foot-men, and Porters.

He has three hundred Sollacchi, which march continually about his Perſon, and make as it were his Guard, being under the command of the Aga of Janizaries; they are richly attired, having Lawn Garments hanging down beneath their Knees, and over it a quilted Waſtcoat with half ſleeves of Taffaty, Damask, or Satten, and on their Heads, Caps and Feathers, like unto the Captain of the Janizaries, and they attend on him with Bows and Arrows. He hath alſo ſtill about him when he Rides abroad forty Peichi, that is to ſay, Foot-men or Poſts, which run wonderful ſwiftly, and are ſtill at hand to attend his Commandments where he ſhall pleaſe to imploy them; they wear long Coats of Cloth of Gold, with a broad Girdle of the ſame, and Caps like unto Womens Thimbles, with a Horn of Silver and gilt ſtanding up before. There are about four thouſand Capigies or Porters which continually attend his Palace and Seraglioes, they are attired like unto the Janizaries, and have over them three Capigi Baſſaes. Theſe Men are many times imployed to execute the Grand Siegnior's Commandments, when he will have any great Mans Head, or his Throat cut, as we have ſeen of late years in Gambolat Baſſa, and in Naſſuf Baſſa, who was Grand Viſier to Achmat.

The Turks Government.

The Grand Seignior's Government is ſo abſolute, as they all term themſelves his Slaves, and no Man, how great ſoever, can aſſure himſelf of his Eſtate, no not of his Life, but by the Great Turks ſpecial Favour. He commits the managing of his Eſtate to ſuch as have abjured the Chriſtian Religion, and have been brought by way of Tything in their Infancies from Greece and Natolia, and afterwards, for their Merits, are advanced to great Dignities, as Baſſaes, Beglerbegs, and ſuch other. The Prince hath a Court or Council, which they call Divano, and this is held within the Seraglio four days in the Week; that is to ſay, Saturday, Sunday, Munday, and Tueſday, where they treat of matters of State, and afterwards of the Affairs of private Men. To this Council are admitted the Grand Viſier, eight or nine Baſſaes, who are alſo called Viſiers, and are continually reſident at Conſtantinople, (for there are many more which are imployed abroad in the Conduct of Armies or Government of Countries) the Beglerbegs and others. At the riſing of the Court or Council, the Grand Viſier informs the Sultan of all the Proceedings in particular; wherein he dares not diſſemble, for that the Prince hath a Window joyning to the Divano, where he may hear and ſee any thing and not be ſeen. He ſeldom impugns what they have reſolved, unleſs it be to moderate ſome rigorous Sentence, or to give anſwer to ſome Ambaſſadour, and what he himſelf concludes is irrevokable.

The Turks Juſtice.

Their Suits are very ſhort, for they have no Advocates to breed delaies, as they have in Chriſtendom; yet commonly he that bribes moſt ſpeeds beſt; for the Turks are the moſt covetous and corrupt Nation in the World, neither will they do any man a kindneſs without a Fee; and yet they are not ſure to injoy any thing they get no longer than it ſhall pleaſe the Prince. They puniſh Crimes with great ſeverity, and ſpeedily, the Fact being proved, which doth ſo terrifie them, as by the report of ſuch as have converſed long there, you ſhall ſeldom ſee a Murther or a Theft committed by any Turk; and if any foul Fact be committed, it is moſt commonly done by Grecians.

The Grand Viſier.

The chief of the Grand Seignior's Council, is the Grand Viſier, who wears the Princes Signet, and is as it were the Lieutenant-General of the whole Monarchy; he hath authority over the other Baſſaes, and they are bound to yield him an account of their Imployments. He is ſtill about the Prince's Perſon, and is not ſent abroad for any Imployment, unleſs it be for an important War, as they have done of late years againſt the Perſian. When the Viſier is ſent abroad, he makes choice of one of the Baſſaes to be his Lieutenant, and to execute his Authority, and he is called Chimacham. Mechmet Baſſa, was at that preſent chief Viſier.

The Beglerbegs and Sanzacks.

Next unto the Baſſa (which is as much as to ſay, great Lord) follow the Beglerbegs, and have their places in Court next unto them. They are Men of great Authority, and have the command of great Kingdoms and Armies, under whoſe Obedience are divers Sanzacks, which are ſent as Governours into Provinces during the Princes Pleaſure. Theſe are Men of great Experience, and have command over the Spahi and Timariots, the Turks chief Forces on Horſe-back, whom they call continually to exerciſe their Arms. There is one Beglerbeg of Greece, which hath all the Countries in Europe in the Turks Dominions under his Charge, and this is the firſt of all the Beglerbegs, who hath under him above thirty Sanzacks. There are ſix other Beglerbegs in Aſia, whereof the firſt is he of Natolia, or Aſia the leſs. He hath the Government of Pontus, Bythinia, and other Kingdoms, and hath under him twelve Sanzacks. The Beglerbeg of Caramania with ſeven Sanzacks. The Beglerbeg of Aladuley, under whoſe Command are ſeven Sanzacks. The Beglerbeg of Amazia and Toccato, having four Sanzacks. There is alſo one in Meſopotamia, and under his command twelve Sanzacks or Governours of Provinces. There is likewiſe a Beglerbeg of Damas, Suria, and Judæa, who hath under him twelve Sanzacks. And there is one of Caire, who commands over ſixteen Sanzacks, his Charge extends to the Arabians, but they are not ſo Obedient as the Turks other Countries.

The Great Turks Forces.

The Timariots.

The Spahi.

As for the Turks Forces, they conſiſt of Horſe-men, Foot-men, and Fleets at Sea. His Horſemen conſiſt of Spahi, Timari, Spachoglani, Silictari and Oloſagi, who have Aſſignations of Lands for the Entertainment of them and their Horſes. For no Man can injoy any Poſſeſſions, but he is injoyned to entertain a certain number of Souldiers proportionable to the Revenues of the Land; ſo as the Governour or Baſſa is always bound to have this number ready to march when they are called. Of theſe Timariots they are able to raiſe about an hundred and fifty thouſand Horſe, always ready at the firſt call, for the which the Prince disburſeth not a penny; for, in regard of the Land which is alotted them, they are bound to maintain themſelves, their Horſe and Arms in the War. Whereſoever the Turk conquereth any Countrey, he divides it among his Souldiers; aſſigning four thouſand Aſpers yearly (which is little above ten pound ſterling) to every one for himſelf and his Horſe, and ſo proportionably if he have more Land. Theſe Horſe-men are much peſtered with Arms when they go to War; for they have a Jack, a Spear with a little white Banner, a Caliver hanging under his left Arm, a Cimitar, a Bow and Arrows at his Girdle, and a Battel-axe at his Saddle bow. And of theſe kind of Horſe-men they ſay there are eighty thouſand in Greece, beſides an infinite number in his other Countries. This Turkiſh Cavalry work two great Effects, for they ſerve as a ſupport to his Eſtate, to ſuppreſs all Seditions, and they are ready to undertake any Enterpriſe. Beſides theſe, he entertains many Horſe-men about his Perſon, whereof ſome are Spahi, and theſe are Chriſtian Slaves bred up young in the Princes Seraglio, who by their Merits attain to that degree, and afterwards to greater Dignities. They are always attending about the Princes Perſon whereſoever he goes, being commonly thirteen hundred.

The Caripices and Spachoglani.

The Caripices are held for the flower of all his Horſe-men, being in number about eight hundred, who march ſtill about the Princes Perſon during the Wars. The Spachoglani which is as much as to ſay, young Men on Horſe-back, are above three thouſand, who have yearly penſions in Money, which they are bound to receive yearly at Conſtantinople, or elſe they are held as dead Men. In the Wars they march on the right Hand of the Grand Seignior, and are known from the Spahies by the Banners of their Lances, which have two 1620 points and of divers colours, the others being pointed and all white, but they are armed alike. They are Men at Arms of a good faſhion, and are commonly advanced by the Sultan to higher Places. They have a Captain or Aga of great Eſteem, with a Lieutenant, and every twenty have a Boluch Baſſa.

The Salichtari. The Salichtari are alſo Horſe-men, and lodge upon the left Hand of the Prince, being in number about three thouſand: Their Breeding is like unto the Spahi, and there is no difference betwixt them but in their March, the one having the right Hand, and the other the left, which is the more honourable among the Turks.

The Oloſagi. There is yet another ſort of Horſe-men, which they call Oloſagi, being about two thouſand in number, and they march on the right and left Hand of the Prince. Theſe ſeveral Troops are as it were a Nurſery for all the chief Officers of that Empire; out of which they do commonly chuſe their great Commanders. Beſides, they have their mercinary Souldiers, called Alcanziis, which come to ſerve the Turk from Tartaria, Valachia, and Moldavia.

The Janizaries, and their Breeding. As for his foot Forces, they conſiſt chiefly in Janizaries, into which number they have not uſed to inroll many of Aſia, whom they have held faint-hearted, but thoſe of Europe, who have always had the Reputation to be Valiant. Their manner to entertain this Diſcipline, is, to ſend every three years into all the Provinces of Europe, from whence they bring ten or twelve thouſand Chriſtian Children as a Tribute, making choice of ſuch as have any ſhew of Magnanimity, Agility, or Courage, which are Parts fit for a Souldier. Theſe Children being brought to Conſtantinople and viſited, ſome of them are ſent into Natolia, Caramania, and other Provinces, to dig and weed the Ground, where they forget their Parents, Countrey, and Faith, and learn the Language and Vices of them with whom they converſe, and ſo become Mahometans. They continue in thoſe places three or four years, without any charge to the Prince, being entertained by them for whom they Labour; after which time they are called home, and put into the Sultan's Seraglioes at Pera, Adrianopolis, and other Places. But they that have the beſt Faces, and are moſt active, are reſerved for their Princes Service.

The Aiamoglani. Theſe Children, being brought into the Princes Seraglioes, are of two ſorts; the one are called Aiamoglani, that is to ſay, ſimple Boy; they are inſtructed by ſevere Maſters in divers manual and painful Exerciſes, as Shoomakers, Gardiners, and ſuch like baſe Trades. Their Feeding and Apparel is very mean; and for the moſt part they lie in great and ſpacious Rooms, like unto Religious Men, having a Light continually burning, and Guards about them. Theſe have liberty to go abroad, who after the Age of twenty years, are diſmiſſed: whereof ſome are ſent into the Sultan's Gardens, which are many and great; others are imployed as Car-men to carry Wood, Hay, Water, and other Proviſion for the Palace, and ſome are ſent to the Kitchins and Stables; yet when Places fall, they are preferred to be Janizaries, and have competent Penſions to maintain them during their lives. The leaſt hath five Aſpers a day, and there's none have above eight, and the Spahies ten. They are attired in long blew Gowns girt with a broad Girdle, and on their Head they have long yellow Caps without brims, and ſharp like unto Sugar-loaves; and of theſe Aiamoglanes there are always above twenty thouſand which ſerve to ſupply his Armies. 1620

The Ich-Oglani. The other ſort of Youths, which are bred up in the Turks Seraglioes or Nurſeries, are called Ich-Oglani, that is to ſay, Chamber-Pages, being the choice of all the Chriſtians Children for Proportion and Favour, and theſe Ich-Oglani are better bred up than the Aiamoglani, and come to better Preferment, of whom we have formerly made mention; for the meaneſt Places theſe young Men attain unto at the firſt is to be Spahies, or to attend upon the Grand Seignior, as his Chamberlains and Pages. And many of them having extraordinary Parts are ſuddenly advanced to Places of great Dignity. Of theſe, the Prince hath ever five thouſand, who until they come unto the Age of twenty years are never ſuffered to go out of their Seraglio, nor to ſee any Perſon but ſuch as inſtruct them and attend upon them.

The Janizaries. The Janizaries (who are the Grand Seignior's chief ſtrength on foot) are raiſed out of Chriſtians Children, bred up in theſe Nurſeries, as we have ſaid, where they are taught to ſhoot with their Bows and Arrows, to uſe the Harquebuſe, and all other Weapons fit for Service; and are at length inrolled among the Janizaries, and are held the moſt valiant and reſolute Souldiers among all the Turks. There are commonly reſident in Conſtantinople and thereabouts twenty four thouſand of theſe Janizaries whenas the Grand Seignior is there, (for in his whole Eſtate he hath a far greater number) under their Aga or Captain General, which is a Place of great credit, but not like unto any of their Baſſaes; the Great Turk fearing to joyn Power and Authority together. Being once Janizaries, they are either ſent to the Wars, or put in Garriſon, or elſe they remain at the Sultan's Court, (which they call Port) where they have certain ſpacious Places for their Dwelling, like to religious Houſes, where they live under their Commanders; and the younger ſerve the ancient with great reſpect. All the Janizaries of one Squadron eat together at one Table, and ſleep in certain long Halls, and if any one chance to be abſent all Night, he ſhall (the next Night) be beaten with a Cudgel, which he takes ſo patiently, as he kiſſeth his Hand that hath thus corrected him. They are much reſpected and feared of all men, and are diverſly imployed in the City; as to ſee the Peace and good Orders kept, to look to the prices of things, to arreſt Malefactors, and to guard the Gates. If they buy any thing they will have it at their own rate; they cannot be judged but by their Aga or Captain. There is ſeldom any one puniſhed with death by the courſe of Juſtice, without danger of a Mutiny; and therefore they execute them very ſecretly. They have many means to get money; for ſome attend upon Ambaſſadours, and keep their Houſes; others go with Travellers, to guard them ſafely through the Turks Eſtate. They have a great power in their Princes Election; ſo as to win their loves, every new Emperour at his firſt coming to the Crown gives them a Donative, and increaſeth their Pay, preſuming upon their Valour and Multitude. They many times commit ſtrange Inſolencies upon any Diſcontents; as in firing of Houſes, braving the Baſſaes, and ſometimes bearding the Sultan himſelf, as you may read in this Hiſtory.

Azapi.

Topagi and Jebegi.

The chief ſtrength of the Turks Forces conſiſts in the Janizaries; and yet there are other ſorts of Foot-men, whereof ſome are called Acovizes, which is a forlorn Hope, and receive no Pay, but march before the Army, and have leave to ſpoil; ſo as they give the fifth part of their Booty to the Prince. There is another kind called Azapi; theſe are Souldiers of ſmall effect, and ſerve rather with the Pick-axe and Spade than with the Sword; they are fitter to tire an Enemy with their numbers, than to vanquiſh them with their Valour; and they are accuſtomed to fill up Ditches with their dead Bodies to make a Paſſage for the Janizaries to aſcend unto a Breach. The Grand Seignior hath ever ſix thouſand Gunners in pay whom they call Topagi. And for the Guard of the Powder and Shot when the Army marcheth, there are always twelve thouſand Men in pay, whom they call Jebegi.

The Chiaus.

The Grand Seignior hath alſo certain Officers attending on him to the number of three thouſand, whom they call Chiaus, which are as it were Sergeants at Arms. Theſe are Men well eſteemed, and are often imployed in Embaſſies to foreign Princes: They alſo carry Letters and Commendations from the Prince or his chief Viſier, and they apprehend Offenders. Theſe never go to the War but whenas the Sultan is there in Perſon. They are commanded by a Chiaus Baſſa, who is of ſo great credit with all men, (as Sanzovino writes) that when he is ſent by the Grand Seignior to any Baſſa, Sanzack, or Cadi, with order to have any Mans Head cut off, he is obeyed, although he have no Warrant in writing, as if the Prince were there himſelf, and commanded it.

The Turks Diſcipline in their Armies.

Thus we have ſet down the Grand Seignior's Forces at Land, whoſe numbers are ſo great, as in ſhew they ſhould breed confuſion and ruine themſelves; but they keep very good Order and Diſcipline, ſo as in that point they yield not to any. They live of a little Bread baked in the Aſhes, with Rice, and the powder of Fleſh dryed in the Sun: They may drink no Wine, and there are no Women ſeen in their Armies; they obſerve a wonderful Silence, and all the Souldiers are governed by the beck of the Hand, or any ſhew of the Countenance. Quarrels and Thefts are ſeverely puniſhed. When they March, they dare not enter into any Corn Fields nor Vines. The Valiant are aſſured of Preferments, and Cowards of Puniſhment.

Having ſpoken ſufficiently of their Land Forces, let us ſee what ſtrength he hath at Sea; they have great ſtore of Foreſts for the building of Ships; neither want they good Shipwrights, for that Covetouſneſs hath drawn many Chriſtian Carpenters into the Grand Seignior's Arſenal: And he hath great numbers of Men trained up in Marine Affairs, in regard of the Gallies which he hath at Mitilene, Rhodes, Cyprus, and Alexandria, and for the retreat he gives Pyrates at Tunis, Bona, Bugia and Algiers, from whence he draws Commanders and his beſt Mariners, as hath been ſeen by Experience in the Enterpriſes of Malta, Gulette, and elſewhere.

The Turks Revenues.

To maintain theſe great Forces, it is requiſite he ſhould have the ſinews of War; yet his ordinary Revenues (conſidering his large Dominions) are not ſo great, as in reaſon they ſhould be; for ſome are of opinion, that he hath not above eight millions of Gold for his ordinary Revenue; for which they give divers reaſons; firſt, That the Turks have no care but of Arms, the which do rather ruine than inrich a Country: ſecondly, They conſume ſo many men in their Enterpriſes, as they ſcarce leave ſufficient to manure their Land, ſo as the Subjects (deſpairing to enjoy their Wealth and neceſſary Commodities, which they might get by their Labour and Induſtry) imploy not themſelves to work nor traffick, no more than neceſſity ſhall conſtrain them; for to what purpoſe is it, ſay they, to ſow that another man muſt reap? or to reap that which another will conſume? And for this reaſon you ſhall ſee in the Turks Eſtate whole Countries lie waſte, and many times great Dearth, which grows by the want of Men to manure their Land; for that the Countrymen, for the moſt part, either die in the Voyages which they make, or in carrying of Victuals, and other neceſſary things for their Armies; for of ten thouſand which they draw from their Houſes to row in their Gallies, ſcarce the fourth part returns to their Houſes, by reaſon of the great Toyles they indure. Another reaſon why the Sultan's Revenues be no greater, is, for that when he conquers any Country, he aſſigns the Lands to his Timarri, who are bound to maintain ſo many Men, and ſo many Horſes, according to the proportion of Land which he gives them, reſerving no Rent.

But although his ordinary Revenues be no greater than we have ſpoken, yet he draws great profit by his Extraordinaries, eſpecially by Confiſcations and Preſents; for being all his Slaves, no man enjoyeth any thing longer than it pleaſeth him; yea, the Baſſaes and greateſt Officers of that Crown, which oppreſs his Subjects, and gather together ineſtimable Wealth, in the end, for the moſt part, it comes into the Turks Caſna or Treaſury. It is not ſtrange there to ſend for any Subjects Head, upon any ſuggeſtion whatſoever, which no man dare contradict; after which Execution, his Slaves and Goods are ſold in the Market at Conſtantinople, and the Money applyed to the Prince's Coffers. His Preſents alſo amount to great ſums, for no Ambaſſadour may come before him without a Preſent, neither may any man expect any Office or Dignity without Money; no Governour being returned from his Province, dares preſent himſelf to the Sultan empty handed, neither are their Preſents of ſmall price. The Sultan's Exchequer is governed by two Treaſurers called Deſtardari, who are more rightly governours of the Revenues, for that they keep an account of the Prince's Caſna or Treaſure, the one hath charge of the Revenues which are raiſed in Natolia, the other in Europe. Alſo they draw great profit from their tributary Provinces, eſpecially from Valachia, Moldavia, and Tranſilvania, where the Princes maintain themſelves by Preſents and Gifts: ſo as they change daily, for that they that offer moſt are advanced, whereby they are forced to ruine the Country to perform what they have promiſed.

The Laws whereby the Turks are governed.

But having ſpoken of the Turks Forces and Revenues, whereby they maintain their Armies to invade their Neighbours, we muſt now ſpeak ſomething of their Laws whereby the Subjects are governed, which are Inſtitutions and Anſwers of Wiſe men, the which they hold as an Interpretation of their Alcaron, which is the ground of their Law. Theſe Inſtitutions ſtitutions are contained in twelve Volumes, treating of all things belonging to civil Converſation. Some Provinces of Turkey are governed by Cuſtoms, and enjoy their Priviledges, and their Wiſe Judges ſupply many things which are not written. The Sultan makes choice of the wiſeſt and worthieſt Perſon that can be found, of a ſincere Life, according to their Law, and he is called Mufti, that is, Interpreter of their Alcaron; he is (as it were) their High-prieſt, attending only matters of Religion and Faith; he is Head of the Church among the Turks, and decideth all queſtions of their Law. He is of ſuch eminency, as all the Baſſaes are ſubject to his direction; he abaſeth not himſelf ſo much as to ſit in the Divano, only paſſeth through it when he is ſent for by the Sultan, who (ſo ſoon as he ſeeth him) riſeth from his ſeat, as it were to honour him, and then they both ſit down face to face, and ſo conferr together.

The Cadileſquiri.

They make trial of the ſufficienteſt of their Judges, before they chuſe any, for which there are two Cadileſquiri Taliſmani, that is, Doctors of the Law, and Examiners, at Conſtantinople, or whereſoever the Prince remains: Theſe examine the Judges or Cadies of divers Provinces. The one hath his charge over Europe, and is called Cadileſquirie Romly, before whom (after good information of his Life and ſufficiency) he ſwears that he will do Juſtice to all men, and yield an account of his Charge when he ſhall be called. The other Cadileſquirie is for Natolia; they are ſovereign Judges in all Cauſes, and, as it were Patriarchs. They are of great Authority, and have place in the Divano with the Baſſaes, to conſult of weighty matters.

The Mulli, Nuderiſi, and Cadi.

There is a Third degree of their Churchmen, belonging to their Law, called Mulli, which are Biſhops, and chief Governours under the Mufti; and their Office is to place and diſplace Church-men at their diſcretion. Next are the Nuderiſi, who are Suffragans to the Biſhops, and their Charge is to ſee the Cadies do their duties. Next come the Cadies, who are Judges to puniſh Offenders, of which there is one in every City under the Seignior's command.

The Naiſi.

Under theſe are another kind of young Doctors of the Law, called Naiſi, who are not ſo well read as to be abſolute Judges, but yet ſupply their places in their abſence.

The Hogi, Calſi, and Soſti.

After theſe are the Hogi, who write their Books, for that they allow no printing; and inferior unto them are the Calſi, who read unto them that write. And the youngeſt of all are called Soſti, who are young Students or Novices in their Law.

Theſe are their ſeveral degrees of Lawyers or Church-men; for the Turks are governed by a kind of Eccleſiaſtical Law, according to their Alcaron. They have Colledges (called Medreſſæ) at Conſtantinople, and in other places, where they live and ſtudy their Law and Divinity, and ſo they aſcend by degrees to the higheſt Dignity of their Profeſſion.

The Turks Religion.

As for their Religion, it began in the time of the Emperour Heraclius, whenas the Empire was much diſmembred by the Hereſies of Arrius and Neſtorius. Mahomet, born in Arabia, embraced this opportunity, ſeeking to overthrow the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, which was oppoſed by the Jews and Arabians; he was aſſiſted by two Hereticks, the one was John a Neſtorian, and the other Sergius an Arrian. After which (being aſſiſted by many ſlaves, to whom he allowed all that was pleaſing to the ſence and fleſh if they ſhould receive this Law) he obtained many Victories. By Mahomet's Law they make a Diſtinction of clean and unclean Meats to content the Jews, and alſo it maintains Circumciſion, but not at the eighth day of their Birth, as the Jews uſe it, but after the eighth year, when the Infant is able to make Confeſſion of his Faith, where, lifting up his Finger, he ſpeaks theſe Words, which are graven in their Temples in the Arabian Tongue: There is but one God, whoſe Prophet Mahomet is, one God and equal Prophets. The Circumciſion being ended, they feaſt three days together, and then they carry the Circumciſed to a Bath with great pomp; after which, the Gueſts conduct him to his Houſe, and preſent him with Gifts. The Women are not circumciſed, but onely ſpeak the words. If any Chriſtian abjure his Faith, and indure Circumciſion, (as they often do by reaſon of their Tributes and Vexations) they are led through the Town with great honour and rejoycing of the People, who do alſo give unto them, and they pay no Tributes. Mahomet's Law denies the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, to pleaſe the Arrians, who were then powerful: It is full of Fables to pleaſe Idolaters, and it gives liberty to the fleſh, which is pleaſing to moſt men.

They confeſs one God, and honour Jeſus Chriſt, not as the Son of God, but, as a Prophet, born of the Virgin Mary. They neither honour nor allow Images. Friday is their Sabbath, as Sunday is ours. They obſerve a Lent of thirty days, which they call Ramadan; during which, they eat nothing in the day time, but when night comes all meats are indifferent, but Swines fleſh; yet they abſtain from Wine and Women. They have their Eaſter, called Bayran, which continues three days, in which they enjoy all pleaſures; but this Feaſt is not always prefixed, for that they account not the day according to the courſe of the Sun, but of the Moon; and therefore they do carefully obſerve the New-Moon, and ſalute it.

They have no Bells in their Moſques, neither do they ſuffer the Chriſtians which live there to have any. They put off their Shooes when they go into their Moſques, and take them again at their coming forth. Whereſoever they ſit in their Churches or Houſes, they have Tapeſtry Coverlets or Mats under them; they are not much given to Contemplation or Learning, yet the Turkiſh Women, being married, and having Iſſue, are careful to breed up their Children, and to be inſtructed; for the which there are many Schools, where they read their Laws, to the end they may ſerve in their Moſques, and be able to govern the Common-weal.

The Turks, by Mahomet's Law, have leave to marry as many Wives as they can maintain; and a Turkiſh Woman being once with Child, her Husband never toucheth her untill ſhe be delivered, but lies with his ſlaves out of the Houſe where his Wife remains. They have a certain kind of marriage made at pleaſure, which they call Kebin, the which is many times practiſed by Strangers, who being out of their Country, contract with Women, whom they are to enjoy during their pleaſure, and when they caſt them off, they give them a certain ſum of Money, and keep the Children. The Cadies or Judges allow not this kind of contract, eſpecially amongſt 1620 Chriſtians, unleſs it be with an Oath of marriage. A Turk having had the Uſe of a Chriſtian Woman, they are both condemned to dye, unleſs ſhe will abjure her Faith; the like is obſerved betwixt a Chriſtian and a Turkiſh Woman, if they have been found together. Divorce is allowed among them in caſe of Barrenneſs and Incontinency.

There are four orders of Religious Men among the Turks, which differ in their Living, Habit, and Ceremonies. Theſe be the Terlaques, Deruis, Kalenders, and Huquiemales, and theſe laſt are very vicious, and wicked Impoſters, deceiving of the common People. The Deruis is a ſtrict Order, living in Contemplation, much like unto the Capuchins among the Romiſh Papiſts. The Turks forbear to blaſpheme either God, Chriſt, or Mahomet, or any other Saint whatſoever, and they puniſh blaſphemy ſeverely. They converſe with Chriſtians, and Eat and Traffick with them freely; yea ſometimes they marry their Daughters, and ſuffer them to live after their own Religion. But they hate the Jews, and deſpiſe them as the baſeſt people in the world. They have an aſſured Confidence, that he that ſhall duely obſerve the Laws of Mahomet, ſhall have eternal Life, and a Paradiſe full of Delights; and contrariwiſe they that ſhall break the Laws of their Alcaron are threatned with Hell and eternal Death; yet they have an Opinion, that he that believes in the Alcaron when he dyes, ſhall be undoubtedly ſaved.

1620 The diſpoſition of the Turks.

To conclude this Relation with ſome few lines of their Humours and Diſpoſitions; they write of them, that they are groſs witted, idle, and unfit for Labour. They are exceeding covetous and corrupt, above all other Nations; for Juſtice is ſold to him that offers moſt. They are humble among themſelves, and obey their Superiours with great ſilence. They are proud and inſupportable to Strangers, thinking none fit to be compared with them. They are given to Gluttony and Drunkenneſs, and will ſpend whole days together in Feaſting, and will drink with exceſs, if it be in private, for that it is forbidden by their Law. They are vain-glorious, proud, and deceitful, never keeping their words, but when it may be to their profit. They are much inclined to Venery, and are for the moſt part all Sodomites. They are very ſuperſtitious, giving credit to Dreams and Divinations; and they hold, that every mans Deſtiny is written in his Forehead, which cannot be altered or avoided.

Thus I have continued this Hiſtory for eleven Years, having informed my ſelf out of the beſt Authors and Intelligencers I could find that concern this ſubject; I ſhould have been glad that ſome which have reſided at Conſtantinople moſt part of this time, would have aſſiſted me with their Obſervations, which ſhould have been for the general good of our Nation; but I hope notwithſtanding the Reader ſhall find content and ſatisfaction.

CONTINUATION
TURKISH HISTORY,

From the beginning of the Year of Our Lord, 1620, until the ending of the Year of Our Lord, 1628.

Collected out of the Papers and Diſpatches of Sir Thomas Roe, Knight, his Majeſties Ambaſſador with the Grand Seignior, during that Time.

By M. B.

1620

BEfore we come to ſpeak of the great Preparations made by the Grand Seignior in the Year 1621, to invade the Kingdom of Poland, and thoſe by that King to reſiſt him; I hold it neceſſary briefly to ſet down the Cauſes and Reaſons of the enſuing War.

The cauſe of the War between the King of Poland and the Grand Seignior.

The Chrim Tartar, confining upon the Dukedom of Ruſſia, and Borders of Poland, made many Incurſions, and did great ſpoil upon the Coſſacks within that Province of Ruſſia, and other parts belonging to the Kingdom of Poland, and carrying away People of all Ages and Sexes, made ſale of them within the Turkiſh Empire. Now Jean-beagh-Ghiray-Han, Prince of the Tartars, being wholly dependent on the Ottoman Emperours, his Majeſty of Poland ſent many ſeveral Ambaſſadors to complain at that Port; That notwithſtanding the ancient League between him and the Ottoman Family, the Tartars greatly ſpoiled his Countries; which was both unjuſt and unreaſonable. Howſoever the Complaints were many and great, yet the King of Poland's Miniſters found no redreſs for thoſe their alledged Wrongs; but were anſwered, That the Tartars were abſolute Lords over themſelves, and that they pretended to have an annual Tribute of forty thouſand Dollars from the King of Poland; which being denied them, they had reaſon ſo to do; and that the Grand Seignior could only intreat, but not command them to ſurceaſe. The Tartars ſeeing the Polack thus ſlighted at the Port, grew more inſolent and outrageous; wherewith the Turks were well content, for the great benefit they received by Slaves which were continually brought to be ſold in their Dominions, finding for the moſt part, that thoſe men had able Bodies, and fit to be applied to the Oar. It is true, that the Chrim Tartars in antient time, being ſo near Neighbours, were wont to receive ſuch a ſum from the Crown of Poland, for which they were obliged to ſerve in every occaſion of War. But of later years that payment diſcontinued, becauſe they rather received hurt, than any aſſiſtance of that vagabond and predatory People.

When the Coſſacks ſaw, that after ſo many Complaints they could not live in quiet, nor procure Reſtitution of their Wrongs, nor take their Revenge upon the Tartar (being a flitting and fugitive People, who had no certain place of abode) they reſolved to fall into the Dominions of the Grand Seignior, who ſeemed, if not to protect, yet to connive at Injuries they received from theſe their Neighbours. The Coſſacks then that inhabited upon the Banks of the River Boriſthenes (which emptieth it ſelf into the Black Sea) were conjectured to be fitteſt for the Execution of this Revenge; and therefore they prepared a great number of well armed Barques, and falling down the ſaid River, did very great damage to the Turk, by robbing, burning, and ſpoiling divers Towns and Villages bordering upon the Black Sea. This News being brought to Conſtantinople, the Grand Seignior took it in great ſcorn, that ſuch a baſe and rude People ſhould come and affront him ſo near his Doors. Therefore he cauſed ſome Gallies to be armed forth with ſpeed to ſuppreſs them; but his Forces were four or five times valiantly repulſed, and ſtill the Coſſack went ſafely home with his Prey. Now the tide of Affairs was turned, and this great Emperour, who was formerly petitioned by the Polack, is now become a Suitor to him himſelf, and finds his Miniſters meaſured by the anſwer the Grand Seignior had given concerning the Wrongs done by the Tartars: That though the Coſſacks adhere to the Crown of Poland, yet they are free People of themſelves; but when the Tartar ſhall ceaſe from his Hoſtility, it is like enough the Pole will intreat the Coſſack to do the ſame; and that is all the Authority he can exerciſe over them.

The preparation of the Grand Seignior for the War with the King of Poland.

Affairs ſtanding thus, no accommodation for Wrongs on either ſide could be made; and the Grand Seignior, although he was but now fifteen years of age, yet was he ſtrong, vigorous, and of a high Spirit, and more than deſirous of a War, but eſpecially with the King of Poland, from whom he looked for better Satisfaction. This deſire was nouriſhed in him by the Counſels of Ali Baſſa, Great Viſier; and notwithſtanding it was utterly diſliked by all the reſt of the Miniſters of State, and Officers of War in that Empire. A War was nevertheleſs thereupon proclaimed throughout all the Turks Dominions, which did in general diſpleaſe the common Souldier alſo.

The Grand Seignior, the four and twentieth of April, commanded payment to be made to all the Souldiery, and the day following cauſed all his Tents and Pavilions, with thoſe of his Viſiers and other Officers, to be ſolemnly pitched without the City, with thoſe of all Trades that were to attend his Royal Camp.

The Grand Seignior, having now gathered of Foot and Horſe three hundred thouſand (though reported to be ſix hundred thouſand) ſet forward, together with his Court and Train, out of Conſtantinople, the Nine and twentieth of April; with three hundred Field-pieces, beſide an hundred double Cannon ſent unto the Frontiers by Sea; leaving Achmet Baſſa and the Boſtangi Baſſa Governours of the City till his return.

The beginning of the War with the King of Poland.

When he was arrived at the Confines of Poland, he firſt attempted the Fortreſs of Cotyn in the Province of Moldavia, lately given by Gaſparo Gratiani to the Polacks. The which being ſtrong of Scituation, and well furniſhed for defence, the Turk, finding it difficult to carry in few days, left it beſieged; and paſſing the River of Boriſthine, found there the Chancellor of Poland intrench'd upon the borders, in a ſtrong Place, and of good advantage, kept with forty thouſand Polacks and Coſſacks, and eight thouſand High Dutch ſent by the Emperour in Aid of the King of Poland. The Prince was incamped at Caminitza, and ſtrongly intrenched with ſixty thouſand Souldiers; the King abiding in Cracovia with the Nobility and his Court. The Grand Seignior, facing the Trenches upon Boriſthine, with the multitude of his Army incloſed them round, and ſhut up all the Paſſages; ſending preſently the Prince of the Tartars, Jeanbeagh-Ghiray-Han with thirty thouſand light-horſe to make Incurſions within the heart of Poland; who did great ſpoil, and brought away Captives twenty five thouſand Souls of all ſorts; which dammage did not ſo much proceed from the Will of the Prince, as from a Captain of his, a Nobleman of Tartary, called Kante-Emir-Emirze, in great Favour at that time with the Emperour; for it was thought that between the King of Poland and the Prince of Tartary, there was ſome ſecret Intelligence by the virtue of Money.

During the ſpace of four and thirty days that the Grand Seignior held theſe Trenches beſieged, almoſt every other day he gave them terrible aſſaults, but was alway forced to retire with loſs. The Polack in bravery making ſome ſallies and encounters, were alſo glad to recover their ſtrength; only once they ſo far advanced in the Evening with their ſhot upon the quarter of the Janizaries, that they made a great Execution, and almoſt put the whole Camp into diſorder; and, as the Turks themſelves did confeſs, if this ſally had been given in the Night, it had hazarded the Confuſion of the whole Army; All which being ſeen by the Grand Seignior, and little hope of advancing further, for divers reaſons he was enforced to treat a Ceſſation of Arms with the Chancellor. The firſt was, That conſidering he had ſpent ſo much time without any advantage, and the Winter approaching, whereby his Army ſuffered great Extremities of Cold and other Miſeries, by reaſon of terrible Rains which had carried away divers Tents, Horſes, and other Cattel, and ſome part of his Cannons. Secondly, the proviſion of fodder was become ſo dear, that divers forſook their Horſes for want of means to feed them; beſides the great Mortality of Men, of Fluxes, Feavers, and Colds, and the Horſes of Aſia not uſed to ſuch a Climate, that many Men of Quality that came out with ten and twelve, were compelled to return on foot. Thirdly, the Army, either for Wearineſs, or for diſcontent received from the Emperour himſelf, for his narrowneſs and Avarice ſhewed to the Souldier, contrary to the glorious Example of his Anceſtors in like Enterpriſes, not only refuſed to fight, but were little leſs than mutined. Fourthly, this attempt from the beginning, proceeding meerly from the obſtinacy of the Grand Seignior, contrary to the Counſel of all his Viſiers, who deſired generally a Peace; at their Sollicitation, and by the Mediation of Radula Prince of Valachia, both parts were eaſily induced to Treaty, and the Chancellor was drawn to ſend a Secretary to the Grand Seignior; where it was agreed, as followeth.

Firſt, That the Emperour ſhould raiſe his Army, and retire from the Confines of Poland; and the Tartars, as the occaſioners of this War, ſhould ſend an Emirze to reſide as a pledge from enſuing Incurſions. The Chancellor promiſing in the Name of the King of Poland, to keep another in the Court of the Prince of Tartary, with Condition to pay yearly as aforeſaid forty thouſand Florins (an antient pretenſion of the Tartars) as a donative from the King of Poland; promiſing moreover, for the better Confirmation of the future Peace, to maintain a Reſident in the Port of the Ottoman Court, and upon the arrival of every ſuch Ambaſſador to ſend a Preſent conformable to the Ledgiers of other Chriſtian Princes. And, as the Grand Seignior was obliged for the Tartars, that they ſhould forbear all Invaſions upon the Polack; ſo the Polacks ſhould bind themſelves in behalf of the Coſſacks, that they ſhould commit no Robberies in the Dominion of the Grand Seignior. And further covenanting in the Name of the Poliſh Merchants for the Priviledge of free Traffique, to make a preſent of an hundred thouſand Chequins in Plate, Sables, and Bulgary Hides; alway intended with this reſervation, that this Treaty ſhould not prejudice or bind, until the Grand Seignior did ſend a Chiaus to the King of Poland with theſe Overtures, that he might have time to aſſemble his Parliament, and there reſolve to ſend an Ambaſſador with ample Authority to treat and conclude a final Peace in the Port. Whereupon the Grand Seignior, being ſatisfied with theſe Conditions, did diſpatch preſently his Nuntio into Poland, and ſuddenly, to the great content of all his Army, he raiſed his Camp and returned to Adrianople.

The loſſes in the Turkiſh and Poliſh Armies.

By relation of divers preſent in that War, it was reported, That there died in the Turks Camp, by the Sword, Famine, Sickneſs, and Cold, about eighty thouſand Men, and above an hundred thouſand Horſe; and the remain at their return appearing ſo naked, ſickly, and poor, made evident demonſtration of the great loſs and miſery ſuſtained. The Polacks in their Trenches loſt above twenty thouſand by the famine ſuffered in their beſieging; ſo that if the Winter, and other wants had not conſtrained the Grand Seignior to riſe with ſome pretence of Honour, and that he had ſtaid a few days longer, they had been enforced to render or periſh; which is evident, in that they were glad and prompt to accept of any agreement, although as yet there was nothing fully concluded.

The Grand Seignior inraged that the Emperour had ſent Aids to the Pole.

The Grand Seignior, being informed that the Emperour of Germany had ſent Aid of eight thouſand Dutch to the King of Poland, and enraged that he had ſo little advanced in that attempt; pretending that the Emperour by giving Succors had broken the Peace; to vent his Choler, contrary to the advice of his Council, preſently upon his ariſing from the Confines of Poland, in his Camp proclaimed War againſt Germany for the next Spring; commanding upon great Penalty, all his Souldiers and Slaves to be ready for that Invaſion: Which gave great diſcontent to the Army, inſomuch as they did almoſt publickly profeſs, they neither could nor would follow him. And conformable to this his raſh Reſolution, he gave order to Kante-Emir-Emirze, a Tartarian Captain, then Baſſa of Siliſtra, to winter with twenty thouſand of his Souldiers in the Countrey. Preſently hereupon, Cæſar Gallo, the Emperour's Ambaſſadour, was ſtaid at Buda; the Grand Seignior pretending, that the ſaid Cæſar Gallo had promiſed upon his Life, That the Emperour would give no Aid to the King of Poland. Not conſidering, that he himſelf, contrary to the Peace, the Summer before had ſurpriſed Vatz, a Town of Hungary, and had permitted many of his Souldiers to follow the Prince of Tranſilvania, as Voluntiers againſt the Emperour.

The Grand Seignior changeth his Mind of making War againſt the Emperour.

The King of Poland, hearing of this Reſolution againſt the Emperour, called the Chiaus, ſent about the Treaty, before him, and told him, That if the Grand Seignior ſhould proceed to make War upon the Emperour for his occaſion, that he could conclude no Peace with him, being obliged to take part with the Emperour, as his dear Brother and Confederate. Which Meſſage the Chiaus ſent to the Grand Seignior, when he was yet at Adrianople, where he either purpoſed to winter to affright the Emperour, or to quicken the Polack to a concluſion of Peace; cold in his ſudden Pretence, by the perſwaſions of the Viſiers and Mufti, he changed his Reſolution, and took his way to Conſtantinople, where he entred the laſt of December.

Now it being given out, that the Emir of Sidon in Siria was in Rebellion, and that he had poſſeſſed himſelf of the City and Caſtle of Tripoly, the Grand Seignior pretended to go in Perſon againſt him, and gave out 60000 Chequines to prepare his Carriages and Pavilions; and took order to provide his Palace in Aleppo, determining to paſs that way to amuſe and raiſe ſuſpition in the Perſian; and likewiſe commanded the Army of Aſia to be in readineſs by the end of the Month of April; and gave out Commiſſion for Victuals, Munition, and other Neceſſaries. The Mufti, Hoja, and other the Viſiers (who knew not the myſtery) miſliking this Counſel, with great Inſtances and Reaſons diſſuaded him, as being a Courſe very dangerous to his Eſtate. Firſt, That his Majeſty ſhould go in Perſon, leaving all Greece deſolate, and commit the Care and Government of his Imperial Seat to a poor Chimacham or Lieutenant; it not being probable that the Emir of Sidon would ſtay to oppoſe himſelf againſt the force of his Royal Army, but rather make an eſcape, and retire himſelf to ſome part of Chriſtendom; and that a General by Land, and the Captain Baſſa, Admiral of the Sea, with his Fleet of Gallies, would ſuffice to puniſh and deſtroy him. Beſides, if his Majeſty undertook the Journey in Perſon, it was neceſſary that all his Souldiers ſhould attend him, which were a Charge ſuperfluous and above the Enterpriſe, and almoſt impoſſible for them, having been ſo harraſſed and diſtreſſed in the late Invaſion of Poland (who did even publickly murmure that they would not go.) For which reaſons the King ſeemed to change his Reſolution, and was content to make a General by Land with the Army of Aſia; to which charge was named the Baſſa of Cairo. The next day after the Grand Seignior's coming to the Arſenal, he called the Viſier Baſſa, the Admiral, and the great Treaſurer before him; where it was concluded to make ready at leaſt an hundred Gallies: for the preparation whereof ſixty thouſand Chequines were then delivered; the Viſier promiſing to furniſh the reſt of the whole charge with expedition, of his own purſe, and to take it up upon the King's Aſſignations. Whereupon, the Grand Seignior with great content did veſt them as a mark of favour, and gave preſent Commiſſion to the Admiral to be ready to depart by the midſt of April following; and for his better ſtrength, he gave a command to ſend for Aids to Tunis and Algier: which was thought requiſite, becauſe it was reported, that the Prince Philibert of Savoy, then Viceroy of Sicily, had in readineſs ſixty Gallies and ſix Gallions at Meſſina, which force was doubted would be employed to give Succour to the Emir of Sidon, or to revenge the attempt and late ſack of Manfredonia; ſo that they were with all expedition rigging and preparing the Armado in the Arſenal: and for proviſion and prevention of the worſt, there was ordained twelve ſmall Gallies, and the ordinary Fleet of Frigots, to keep the black Sea from the incurſion of the Coſſacks. And though it was given out, that this Army was only prepared againſt the Emir, yet many that underſtood the ſecrets of that Empire, knowing it to be too great, did believe it ſhould be ſent to prevent a general revolt, which was then murmured and ſuſpected in Aſia.

The Grand Seignior married.

About this time, contrary to the counſel and will of all his Miniſters, the Grand Seignior married the Grand-child of a Sultana, Wife to Pertau Baſſa, only for her Beauty, without any Pomp, which was ill interpreted in that Court; his Anceſtors of late years not uſually taking Wives, eſpecially of a Turkiſh race, for reſpect of Kindred. This and other inconſtancies, with extream Avarice, made him odious with the Souldier; and his daily haunting the Streets on foot, ſometimes diſguiſed, with a Page or two, prying into houſes and Taverns, like a petty Officer, increaſed his contempt even in the City.

Secret order to make War upon the Emperour.

Secret Order was given about the ſame time to Diac-Mahomet, the Baſſa of Caniſia, and to Gelut-Emirze, a Tartarian, to unite themſelves with Bethlem Gabor againſt the Emperour of Germany: But the Baſſa of Buda did advertiſe the Grand Seignior, that Bethlem Gabor had concluded Peace with the Emperour; which news did greatly diſpleaſe him, being ardent in the deſire of War.

His Majeſty of Great Britains Ambaſſador arrived at the Port.

The Peace between the Grand Seignior and the King of Poland was not yet fully concluded; but Ambaſſadours were weekly expected at the Port from Poland and other places, to haſten a full conſummation thereof. Amongſt which, Sir Thomas Roe, Knight, Ambaſſadour in ordinary from his Majeſty of Great Britain to the Grand Seignior, arrived there the firſt of January, and had his firſt audience of him ſpeedily, when he made this Speech unto him in Engliſh, which immediately followeth.

Moſt High and Mighty Emperour, his ſacred Majeſty the King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, my moſt gracious Lord and Sovereign, according to the antient League of Friendſhip and Amity, of long time begun and continued between the moſt noble Anceſtors of your Majeſties, and in his Royal Perſon confirmed by his ſundry Ambaſſadors and Letters, both to your renowned Father, and your Imperial Majeſty; being fully determined on his part, to maintain, and inviolably to hold a fair and good Peace and Correſpondency with your Majeſty: hath commanded and ſent me with his Letters of Credence and friendly Preſent, to reſide as his Ambaſſador in your Royal Court; Not doubting but your Imperial Majeſty will accept them, and receive me, his unworthy Servant, with your wonted Honour and Favour; and that you will give Credit unto me in divers matters of importance which he hath commanded me to deliver in his Name, comprehended in five Articles written in this Memorial. And that you will be pleaſed to do therein according to the Royal Friendſhip of his Majeſty, and your Princely Wiſdom and Juſtice.

The particulars whereof, I deſire your Majeſty to read and conſider at your eaſe and leiſure; and to afford me your Royal anſwer, his Majeſty reſting aſſured he ſhall receive Content and Satiſfaction worthy his Royal Friendſhip.

The Letter of Credence ſent by Sir Thomas Roe.

His Majeſties Letter to the Grand Seignior.

JAMES by the Grace of God King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Chriſtian Faith, againſt all thoſe that falſly profeſs the Name of Jeſus, &c. To the moſt High and Mighty Prince, Sultan Oſman Han, chief Lord and Commander of the Ottoman Kingdom and Empire of the Eaſt, ſendeth Health and Greeting.

WE doubt not but you received our Letters ſent you by our Subject John Chapman, whereby we ſignified unto you our Royal Pleaſure to recall and diſcharge our Ambaſſador Sir John Ayre from his Employment and Reſidency in your Court, whom we deſired you in your Princely Favour to diſmiſs for our eſpecial Service, and to receive the bearer of our ſaid Letters as Agent, to remain in your Protection; for the better ſupport and maintenance of our Subjects, which do trade and abide in your Dominions, and for the advancement and continuance of the mutual Commerce and Friendſhip, which hath been a long time contracted between your Predeceſſors and ours, until the arrival of our Servant Sir Thomas Roe; of whom as then we made choice to ſend unto your Port as Ambaſſador; as well to propound unto you divers things neceſſary for the general Peace, as to reſide in your Court for our particular Service. Notwithſtanding, leſt the ſaid Letters ſhould not come ſafely to your Royal Hands, we have thought fit again to make known our purpoſe of recalling our former Ambaſſador Sir John Ayre, and to deſire you to diſcharge and diſmiſs him from your Port, and to receive and admit in his room our truſty and well beloved Servant Sir Thomas Roe, one of the principal Gentlemen of our Court, and of our Privy Chamber, whom we have now expreſly ſent, and whom we authoriſe under our great Seal of England, as our Ambaſſador to reſide at your Port, and to negotiate in our Name, and in the behalf of our Subjects abiding within your Kingdoms; of whoſe Fidelity and Diſcretion, as we are well aſſured, ſo we doubt not but he will give you good content in his Demeanour and Negotiation with you. We have alſo thought fit to put you in mind of thoſe common Rovers upon the Seas, who are Enemies to the Laws of Nations, and ſpoilers of the quiet and peaceable Merchant, by whom Amity and Friendſhip is maintained between Kings and Princes: That you would pleaſe to exerciſe your Great and Mighty Power to chaſtiſe and deſtroy them, as Traitors to your Honour, and infringers of the ſacred and publick Peace. In full aſſurance that you will extend the ſame good reſpect unto us, as your Royal Anceſtors have done unto our moſt renowned Predeceſſors, whereby that antient League and Commerce may be inviolably maintained between both our Kingdoms, which on our part we ſhall be very loth to infringe or diſſolve. We do by theſe our Letters recommend unto your princely Favour, this our ſaid truſty Servant and Ambaſſador, to reſide and remain in your Port, on our behalf to treat with you in all Affairs for the publick Weal of our Dominons, and for the general Peace of us both, and our Allies and Friends, as alſo for the ſupport and aid of all our Subjects, which do live and trade within your Eſtates and Countries; to whoſe good Diſcretion we recommend their Affairs, and by whoſe Induſtry and Mediation we conceive our People may be relieved in their juſt and reaſonable demands, to the perfect maintenance and aſſurance of that mutual Commerce which hath ſo long time been continued between our Royal Progenitors. And as we have great cauſe to profeſs our grateful Acknowledgement for many Favours which our former Ambaſſadors and all other our Subjects have, and do receive from your Royal Hands, ſo in our Princely love we do intreat you to take knowledge of, and to command redreſs for divers Oppreſſions and Wrongs done unto ſome of our ſaid Subjects Perſons and Goods, that live under the aſſurance of your Friendſhip with us, which we have formerly ſignified to our Reſidents at your Port; but as we verily believe they have never come unto your Ears, that are open to the juſt Complaints of all Strangers; whereof we have now given charge to our Servant and Ambaſſador to acquaint you with more at large, unto whom we deſire you to give Protection and Credit in whatſoever he ſhall move and propound, for the eſtabliſhing, confirmation, and inlargement, in all Occaſions, of thoſe Liberties and Priviledges which our Subjects have antiently enjoyed by the Benignity of your ſelf, and of your Royal Anceſtors. And in all other things and occaſions, wherein he hath or ſhall receive our Commands, as if our ſelf did communicate them with you, which we doubt not ſhall redound to the great Utility and Honour of both our Empires. And ſo we wiſh you Health and true Felicity. Dated at our Royal City of London, the ſixth day of September, Anno Dom. 1621, and of our Reign of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, the nineteenth.

Articles propounded by the Ambaſſador to the Grand Seignior.

“ FIrſt, his Sacred Majeſty of Great Britain, according to the moſt noble and renowned League of Amity between your Majeſties and your Crowns and Dominions, hath commanded me to renew the antient Capitulations and Priviledges granted by your Imperial Majeſty and your Royal Anceſtors, and therein to move your Majeſty, that you will be pleaſed to inlarge and extend your Favour to our Nation that live under your Protection, and to give Remedy to divers Injuries done unto them by the Cuſtomers of this Royal Port, Aleppo, Smirna, Scio, Patras, and other Places, contrary to the Juſtice and Honour of your Majeſty; and that you will be pleaſed to give order for ſeveral Commands to theſe Places, in all our juſt Occaſions; that both the Fame of your Juſtice may be renowned, and the Friendſhip of your Majeſties confirmed, and the Correſpondence and Commerce between your Dominions eſtabliſhed and increaſed.

“ Secondly, his Majeſty hath commanded me to offer himſelf as a Mediator of Peace, to accommodate the late breach with the Kingdom of Poland, the King of Poland having ſent his Ambaſſador expreſs into England to deſire his Aid, he hath thought it more agreeable to his Honour, and to the antient League of Friendſhip, to uſe his Credit with your Majeſty to procure the general quiet and peace of the Princes of Chriſtendom, deſiring your Majeſty to conſider his Intereſt in the publick cauſe, and not to deſpiſe the Forces of ſo many as may partake in the quarrel; which if your Majeſty ſhall hearken unto, the rather for his ſake, as your Royal Anceſtor hath done in the like Occaſion, his Majeſty will accept it as a reſpect “of your Love, which will aſſure and increaſe the Commerce and Friendſhip of your Dominions; in which his Majeſty hath given me more particular and full Inſtructions to treat and mediate in this Buſineſs.

“Thirdly, his Majeſty hath commanded me to move your Imperial Majeſty for the releaſe of divers of the Poliſh Nobility, now your Captives; and for one Scottiſh Gentleman, a Subject of his Majeſty, my Royal Maſter.

“Fourthly, his Majeſty deſires, that you will take ſome order with the Pyrats of Tunis and Algier, who ſhelter themſelves under your Royal Protection, (to the great Diſhonour of your Majeſty) and do many Robberies upon the Subjects of Kings and Princes in Amity and League with your Empire, and take even the Ships ſent unto your Royal Port; admoniſhing your Majeſty to conſider, that if they be ſuffered to continue, they will occaſion the diſſolution of all Commerce and Trade; being common Enemies to all honeſt Merchants, by whom the Friendſhip of theſe Kingdoms are maintained and increaſed. And that if your Imperial Majeſty pleaſe not to exerciſe your Royal Power and Authority to bridle or deſtroy them; that then you will not take it in ill part, that his Majeſty, with other Princes his Allies, ſhall make an Army to puniſh both them and all others that receive and cheriſh them; which hath hitherto been forborn in reſpect only of your Majeſty, and that the Towns where they harbor themſelves are, or ought to be under your Imperial Command.

“Fifthly, his Majeſty hath commanded me to require Juſtice and Reſtitution of a great ſum of Money taken from Arthur Garaway, here impriſoned by force and Injury in the time of Achmet Baſſa; whereof his Majeſties former Ambaſſadors have complained to Sultan Achmat, your Majeſties renowned Father; and to Mehemet Baſſa Viſier, to Huſſen Baſſa, to the Hoja of the King, and to the Mufti; wherein your Majeſties moſt noble Father gave Command for our Satisfaction. All the ſaid great Officers having heard the cauſe, upon Examination giving their Teſtimonies of the great wrong done unto him; Mehemet Baſſa alſo writing a Letter, by the order of your Majeſties Royal Father, promiſing Juſtice and Reſtitution, which his Majeſty doth yet expect, and again demand. And having ſo often written in this cauſe, his Majeſty will not believe, but that in Juſtice and Honour this Royal Court would do right; imputing the Fault to his own Miniſters and Ambaſſadors, that they never complained to your Imperial Majeſty, according to his Highneſs Command. Alſo his Majeſty hath commanded me to require and deſire your Majeſty to give him your Royal Anſwer in all theſe Particulars, by your Letters in Writing, as ſhall be fit for your own Honour, and conformable to the antient League of Amity and Friendſhip between your Royal Majeſties.

His Majeſties Ambaſſador not many days after ſent to the Viſier, who had promiſed him an anſwer unto theſe Articles; who returned him this that followeth.

The Grand Seigniors Anſwer.

To the Firſt, he ſaid, That the Emperour his Maſter had given him order to renew the Capitulations, and to make any ſuch Additions as ſhould be requiſite, agreeable to their Law, and conformable to the antient League; and that therein his Majeſties Ambaſſador ſhould find no Difficulty; for they honoured his Majeſty, and were reſolved to give him aſſurance of their will to maintain a true Friendſhip; and therefore deſired the Ambaſſador to draw and prepare the Capitulations, and ſend them to him and the Chancellor, who would conſider them, and being ſuch as were fit to be granted, the Ambaſſador ſhould have ſpeedy order.

To the Second, the Viſier anſwered with great Subtilty; Firſt, juſtifying the occaſion of the War, and imputing the Fault to the Coſſacks, maintained by the Pole to rob even at the Port of Conſtantinople; therefore, that the Emperour could not in Honour but chaſten and deſtroy them, having firſt by meſſage demanded Juſtice againſt them; and now his Maſter being ingaged with great charge, and in his Honour he could make no Peace with them who had beguiled him; pretending that they had no other intention but the War, becauſe, having raiſed his Camp, and diſſolved his Army, the Polacks now ſcorned him, and kept no Faith, neither ſending Ambaſſador nor Meſſenger, no not any Letter ſince their return. That therefore they could not hearken to any Condition; and that his Majeſty of Great Britain did not value the Honour of the Grand Seignior in this motion.

To the Third he replied, That the motion for the Priſoners was unſeaſonable, becauſe in order it ſhould follow the general Treaty, and making Peace; which, if finiſhed, his Majeſty of Great Britain ſhould find, that for his ſake, all thoſe mentioned in the Memorial ſhould be free, except only the Prince Coreskie, who had been the cauſe of many Troubles, and had made eſcape from Priſon formerly.

To the Fourth, he made Proteſtation in the Grand Seignior's name againſt the Pyrats, offering, that his Majeſties Ambaſſadors ſhould have what Commands, what Meſſage he would deſire in company of any Engliſhman.

To the Fifth he replied, It was an old obſolete Quarrel, and that the Ambaſſador did him Injury to preſs him, when in the time of three former Viſiers, his Predeceſſors could obtain no Relief; therefore he would not look back upon the Actions of other Men, nor rake among the Bones of the dead; but he deſired the Ambaſſador ſhould reſt ſatisfied, that while He had the Honour to govern, there ſhould no wrong be done unto the Engliſh Nation, and that he would hear all Complaints, ſo as no man ſhould need to look back upon his Actions.

This perfunctory Anſwer, did not much ſatisfie his Majeſties Ambaſſador, but that he deſired ſome other of Effect, being loth to accept of Generalities, and therefore required a direct reply for his own diſcharge; which was promiſed after much preſſing, by the Viſier who had firſt undertaken the ſame.

The Poliſh Ambaſſador expected at the Port.

The long ſtay of the Duke of Sbaraskie (choſen extraordinary Ambaſſador by the King of Poland, to conſummate the Peace between him and the Grand Seignior) did much trouble the Emperours Court; and eſpecially the Viſier, who procured the Ceſſation of Arms, but that a Letter was writ by the King of Poland, which did a little prolong their hopes. In the mean time, the Emperour divulged a pretence to viſit Mecha, the Tomb of Mahomet his great Prophet; contrary to the Counſel and inſtance of all his Viſiers that knew not the ſecret, and even to the hazard of a general revolt; for they were jealous, that under colour of that Voyage, he had ſome other deſign; and it was feared, the Duke would not proceed to follow him at random, nor treat with his Deputies left at the Port: For the Polacks ſeemed in performing and aſſuring the Peace, a little too 1622 glorious of their good Succeſs; and the Nobility not ſo obedient to the King, as that he could abſolutely command; which did both trouble their Agents at the Port, and diſcontent the Turks; ſo that a little motion of the Coſſacks or Tartars at that time (ſpoil being both their livelihoods) had kindled new Fires, and had diſturbed or quite broken the Peace.

In the mean ſpace, the Grand Seignior writ his Letter to his Majeſty of Great Britain, in anſwer to his Royal Letter by his Ambaſſador; wherein was contained a Satisfactory reply to all the particulars of thoſe five Articles delivered unto him. And the Grand Seignior made ſuch demonſtration of great care to give his Majeſty all content and ſatisfaction, that his Letter was preſented to the Ambaſſador with Ceremonies of Honour, requiring that it ſhould be ſent by an expreſs Meſſenger; and gave command for a ſafe conduct for that purpoſe. The true tranſlated Copy whereof doth immediately follow.

To the Mighty Prince, renowned among the Majeſties of the Princes of the Law of Jeſus, obeyed of the great Potentates followers of the Meſſiah; the only director of the important Affairs of the Nazarene People; Sovereign of the Limits of Power and Honour; Lord of Advancement and Authority, the moſt Glorious JAMES, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland; to whoſe laſt days We wiſh all Felicity.

THIS our Imperial Letter arriving, you ſhall know, that your Honourable and Famous Ambaſſadour, and worthy Knight, Sir Thomas Roe, is with your Royal and acceptable Letter come unto our happy Port, the refuge of the Princes and Commanders of the World. Whereof the ſincere Contents and Subſtance was, That our antient Capitulations ſhould be renewed, and divers Articles therein reformed and explained, and ſome others inſerted. And whereas certain Cuſtomers and other Officers of our Empire, have often tranſgreſſed our Royal Agreements, and done many Violences and Injuries to the Merchants, your Subjects, that for the time to come they may be ſecured from all Oppreſſion; and concerning the Affairs of the Polacks, that the Enmity and War lately begun between us and them, might be converted into Peace and Friendſhip; and that there ſhould be eſtabliſhed a ſincere League and Amity, as in the Time of our Anceſtors. And that divers Noblemen of Poland, and one of your Maieſties Subjects, now detained in our Captivity, ſhould be ſet at Liberty. Complaining alſo againſt the Inhabitants of Tunis and Algier, That they who have violated our Imperial Capitulations, Amity, and League, ought to be duly puniſhed. And laſtly, That whereas one of your Subjects, named Arthur Garaway, from whom, upon a pretenſion there was a great fine taken, and other wrong done unto his Perſon, you deſire that his cauſe may be with Juſtice renewed; All which being made known unto us; with prudent and mature Deliberation we have duely weighed, and perfectly conceived them. Wherefore, by the favour of the great and proſperous God we do promiſe, that in all theſe matters propounded, we will imploy our Imperial Care and Diligence: And we have already given our high and expreſs Command, that our antient Capitulations ſhould be renewed and confirmed. And ſuch Conditions as are correſpondent to the Peace, Amity, and League between us, ſhall in due form be granted. And there ſhall be ſent with all Expedition, our Royal Edicts to all our (a) Beglerbegs, (b) Begles, (c) Cadees, Governours, Cuſtomers, Farmours, Superintendents, and Commiſſioners of our Revenues, that from henceforth none of them ſhall give any Moleſtation to any of your Merchants or other Subjects. And inſomuch as our happy Gates are ever open to any, who with ſincerity ſeek our Friendſhip, good Will, and Favour; and the Table of our lively Graces is always prepared for all men: Therefore, whenſoever on the behalf of the Polacks, an Ambaſſador ſhall arrive at our high Court, and kiſs the hem of our Veſture, and repent them of their former Errors, and preſent unto us a good Friendſhip and ſincere League, and ſhall deſire our Favour and Amity; by the Mediation of your Reſident now in our Imperial Port, all matters ſhall be pacified and ended, and with a Pen we will blot out all former Differences. And the Peace being ſo eſtabliſhed, your inſtances and deſires for them ſhall have grateful acceptance with us, and we will give fit order for the Priſoners.

(a) Viceroys.
(b) Preſidents.
(c) Judges.

To the Beglerbeghs of Tunis and Algier, and to all other our Slaves in thoſe parts, we will preſently ſend our expreſs and high Commands, and other Orders, that they ſhall never hereafter tranſgreſs the tenor of our Imperial Capitulations, nor commit any Injuſtice, nor do any Violence to the Subjects of your Majeſty. And concerning the buſineſs of the Merchant Arthur Garaway, wherein you have informed us, that there hath been taken from him by Oppreſſion a great eſtate and faculty, in the time of our Father Achmat Han, of happy Memory (the Viſier Achmet Baſſa being then Deputy here) upon pretence that divers Muſſulmens Goods were found in his Hands; which cauſe being now overpaſſed many years, you require a new hearing and inquiſition. By the Grace of the great God it ſhall be renewed and examined with all Juſtice; in the proceſs and Iſſue whereof you ſhall be aſſured to receive a right and fit anſwer from your Ambaſſador now remaining in our Court. And in our time we ſhall never permit, that any the leaſt Injury or Injuſtice ſhall be done to any. Giving you aſſurance on our behalf, that the Foundation and Nerves of Peace, Friendſhip, and League between us, are of us ſtraitly preſerved, continued, and increaſed; and our Amity, Correſpondence, and Love, is ever reſpected, eſteemed, and precious with us. Therefore in the mean time, while our Capitulations are making perfect, and that the full Concluſion may be certified unto you, your Ambaſſador having ſollicited us for an Anſwer to the Propoſitions made by you, by an expreſs Meſſenger, Robert Roe, this our Imperial Letter is written and ſent unto you. Which arriving, we hope, that as in times paſt, the antient, perfect, and acceptable courſe of Friendſhip, Amity, and League, adorned with abundant Sincerity, reſplendent Love, and benigne Correſpondency on your part, hath been alway obſerved and maintained; ſo it is now alſo requiſite, that you preſerve the ſame Affections, with all pure, firm, and conſtant good Will, Grace, and Goodneſs; or rather, that you advance and increaſe therein, as we will ever do by all ſincere ways of Loyal Friendſhip and Holy Peace, nouriſhing it with our perfect Intention and affectionate Diligence, never admitting any occaſion that may be thereunto prejudicial.

Given in our Imperial City of Conſtantinople, the firſt day of the Month Gemaziel Achir (or April) in the year of the departure of our Prophet Mahomet, 1031; that is, Anno Chriſti Dei pari, 1622.

The Grand Seignior, diſcontented ſince his diſgrace in Poland, as ſoon as he came to Conſtantinople, meditating Revenge upon his Souldiers, and alteration; and finding that his Pretence for Mecha did not reliſh, gave out that he would paſs into Aſia to ſuppreſs the Emir of Sidon, who had taken Arms, and was reported to rebell; but indeed having ſecret Intelligence with Oſman and the Viſier Delavir Baſſa. But from which purpoſe being diſſwaded by the great inſtance of the Viſier, and that it would not ſo well ſerve his ſecret Deſigns, he returned to his firſt colour, that he would viſit Mecha, the Tomb of his falſe Prophet.

The Grand Seignior deſirous of Peace with the Polack.

To make this Voyage the more ſecure in apparence, he ſeemed content to accept of any Treaty with the Polacks, even to Conditions both of Diſadvantage and Diſhonour; for his Eſtates in Hungary, he re-inforced the Frontiers with divers Troops; and though he were much troubled at the League between the Emperour of Germany and Bethlem Gabor, yet he diſſembled it ſo, as that he would not diſpleaſe the Tranſilvanian, but rather offered new Succours, and forbearance of his Tribute. From the Incurſions of the Coſſacks he hoped to aſſure himſelf by the Treaty of the Poles; and in occaſion of Breach, he had the Tartars ready to requite them; and for more ſecurity, he added to the number of his Gallies appointed to keep the Black Sea. The common People and Viſiers of the Port that loved reſt, and knew not the deſign, were much troubled and diſcontent at this Journey; and made many Remonſtrances to him of the Inconveniency and Danger, to leave the ſeat of his Empire to the truſt of a Deputy, in a time when Bethlem Gabor was newly reconciled to the German Emperour, and therefore not to be truſted; and the Polacks newly reconciled to him, and therefore to be miſtruſted. Divers other reaſons were made to him, many Petitions delivered from the Church-men, Lawyers, and from all Eſtates. But melancholy Revenge had wholly poſſeſſed him, ſo that by no means he could be perſwaded to deſiſt. The Souldiery paſſed ſo far as to threaten publickly, and to proteſt they would not follow, but rather ſet up another King in his abſence that ſhould ſtay among them. In concluſion, carried by his own fate to Deſtruction, having firſt commanded away his Armado to the Levant, and thereby diſpoſed many of his Souldiers, upon Wedneſday the ſeventh of May, he began to paſs over his Tents and Pavilions to Aſia ſide, with great quantities of Treaſure. The Janizaries and Spahies, who had alſo ſecret Intelligence, upon the King's own Words and Actions betraying ſome further project than a Pilgrimage (for he made Preparations to carry away all his Jewels and Treaſure, even defacing his Palace, and taking from Churches and his Ward-robes whatſoever could be converted to Bullion) ſuddenly met at the Hippodrome in the City, upon a word given; and from thence ran to the Seraglio in Tumult, but without Arms, and there, according to their barbarous Mutinies, cryed out for the King; (having firſt taken order to ſtop the paſſage of any thing upon the Water) who appearing to them, asked, What this Inſolency meant, and what they pretended? They then, by the mouth of a Multitude (for they had no head but that of the Monſter) demanded firſt, That he ſhould not proceed in his purpoſe to go to Mecha, nor into Aſia; but that he would abide in the City. Secondly, they required to have delivered to their Fury, the Great Viſier Delavir Baſſa, the Hoja, or Confeſſor of the King, the Caſlariaga Governour of the Women, the Tefterdar or Treaſurer, the Cadde leſchar or chief Juſtice, and ſome others, as Enemies to the State, and conſenting to this Voyage, which they pretended would be the ruine of the Empire. The firſt, after a little diſpute, the King granted unto them, promiſing to give over his Journey; but they not content, exacted it in Writing. To the ſecond he replyed, That it was diſhonour to him to have his Servants ſo uſed without order of Juſtice; but perſwaded them to have Patience, to ſtay until Saturday, the next Divan or publick Council, where they ſhould appear, and if they were found culpable, they ſhould receive puniſhment; not meaning to perform any of this, but to get time, and allay their preſent Fury. Theſe Fellows, not content with this moderate Anſwer, undertook to know that they were guilty, and therefore that they needed no other Witneſs, Tryal, nor Judge, but themſelves; and with extream clamour called to have them rendred. But the King refuſing to give them any other Satiſfaction, and they unprepared for force, returned into the City, which now was all in fear, every Houſe and Shop ſhut up, expecting a general ſack. But they followed the way of their own hatred, and firſt went into the Houſe of the Hoja, which they brake and pillaged: But not finding him, they proceeded to the great Viſiers, who made ſome defence, and they (being unarmed) beat them off; and ſo they ſeparated, being now Evening, but yet kept a Guard in ſome parts of the Town.

The Janizaries mutiny againſt the Grand Seignior.

That Night the King made an attempt to ſend over to Aſia ſide, but was prevented; and to fortifie and defend the Seraglio, which was ſtrongly walled about, and had alway in it of houſhold Servants about three thouſand; but it ſeemed no man would arm himſelf in his Cauſe; for the next Morning the Mutineers aſſembled again, and taking their Arms, went firſt to the Mufti, or Arch-prieſt among them, and enforced him and divers others to accompany them to the Court, where they a-new demanded theſe Men, but with more Inſtance and Fury. In the mean time, the Hoja, Caddeleſchar, and Tefterdar fled, and were not in long time diſcovered. The Viſier retired to the King, and perſwaded him earneſtly to go over in Perſon in his own Boats (which from his Garden he might eaſily do) to Aſia, and there to take Horſe, and he would ſecure him from all Peril; but the King would not move, bidding him ſtay, confident and aſſured that he would puniſh theſe Rebels.

The great Viſier ſlain by the Janizaries.

The Wiſe old Man, ſeeing this Conſtancy or Obſtinacy, deſired leave to ſhift for himſelf; which he took or obtained, and ſo got away to the Hermitage of a Saint renowned amongſt them; who (like himſelf) betrayed him, yet did him the favour, as not to deliver him to the Multitude, but perſwaded and carried him back to the King's Houſe. At this time it was diſputed in the Seraglio about the delivery of thoſe Officers; the Emperour refuſing, the Rebels clamouring and threatening; inſomuch as he began to fear they would break in, and in their Rage do worſe than was yet pretended. Whereupon (whether by the King's order, or by his own conſent, willing to be the Peace-Offering) the brave Viſier went out to them, and with a good aſſuredneſs, demanded what they ſought of him, and wherein he had offended. At firſt they were amazed: but one Inſolent Villain, breaking the general Modeſty, they anſwered him with their Swords, and ſuddenly cut him in pieces.

The Emperour, ſeeing their Fury ſo outragious, had now more cauſe to doubt, and retired himſelf, then too late, when he had loſt his faithful Counſellor; and would have fled into Aſia, but could not, yet he conveyed himſelf into a private Place, prepared by his Boſtangi Baſſa, or chief Gardiner. The Rebels continued without in their madneſs, asking for the King, and for more Sacrifices. But the Servants proteſting they knew not where he was, they ſaid they muſt have a King, and if he would not appear they would make another; and having a while attended, they reſolved to enter the Palace, (but firſt took a general Oath not to ſack the Imperial Throne, which they called their Houſe and their Honour) and there ſeeking for the King, not able to find him, they extorted by confeſſion the Caſlariaga, and ſlew him; and then they demanded for Muſtapha, Uncle to Oſman, by him formerly depoſed, a Man eſteemed rather Holy (that is, Frantick) than Wiſe, and indeed fitter for a Cell than a Scepter. The King, the firſt day of this Tumult had put Muſtapha into a Vault with two Negro Women, without bread or drink; in which eſtate theſe new Electors found him, almoſt naked, and half pined. At firſt ſight he thought they had been the meſſengers of Death; but that fear paſſed over, and his firſt requeſt was a Cup of Water. Whom they took up, and inſtantly proclaimed him their Emperour; which he was loth to accept, in a manner aſhamed to be raiſed to that Dignity. How unſtable are the Eſtates of the greateſt Princes! for he that was but even now in the Jaws of Death, naked, ſtarved, and dying for Thirſt, is become a great Monarch, and may drink Gold, or innocent Blood.

They as yet not knowing what was become of Oſman, and loth to truſt Muſtapha in the Palace, carried him in Triumph to the old Seraglio, and there left him; departing to the ſack of the Viſiers Houſe, and ſo in the Evening to their Rendezvous, where they kept both good guard and good order in the City, from Fires and other Inſolencies. Sultan Oſman, amazed with theſe News, ſo ſoon as they had left the Court, came out, and called to Counſel in the Night Huzein Baſſa, late Viſier in the Poliſh War, and the Aga of the Janizaries, both faithful to him, and demanded their advice; firſt having ſent to the old Seraglio, to practiſe the Women there to ſtrangle Muſtapha; but ſome of them taking his part, a new uprore began in the Houſe between that Sex; and the Souldiers that kept watch hearing the noiſe, entred in and reſcued him, and from thence removed him to the Chambers of the Janizaries, where they guarded him for that Night in an ill lodging. All this while Oſman conſults what courſe to take. Theſe two his Friends, and ſome others, tell him that the caſe was deſperate, and could not be cured but by a deſperate Remedy; and therefore they agreed, that the Aga ſhould go and perſwade with the Mufti; and that the King in the Morning ſhould ſuddenly preſent himſelf to the Souldiers at their own Door, and make experience what his Preſence, his Submiſſion, and his Benevolence promiſed, could work, to move them to Loyalty or Compaſſion. Which Counſel early in the Morning they put in practiſe. The King, accompanied with the Mufti (who never conſented to his depoſing, though he favoured the Souldiers againſt the Viſier) with Huzein Baſſa, and about twelve Horſemen, went directly to the Janizaries Colledge, where Muſtapha was kept, and there in Tears made them an Oration; offering great Recompence, repenting of his Error, and finally invoked them by the Merits of his Father and all his Anceſtors, to have ſome pity upon their true Maſter. The Multitude (tam prona in miſericordiam, quam immodica ſævitia fuerat; ſometimes as prone to pity as they were before to hatred) now knew not what to do; a ſilent murmur now ran among them, and they were half converted; but the Aga of the Janizaries thinking to merit of the King, and beginning to plead unſeaſonably for him, with ſome harſh words of upbraidure (ut natura maris omni flatu venti turbida; as the Nature of the Sea is to ſwell with every blaſt of Wind) anew moved their Fury, ſo that they cried out Treaſon, and fell upon him and Huzein Baſſa and cut them into pieces, every man taking a part of their Fleſh to ſatiate their Revenge. The Mufti would ſpeak, but was withdrawn by ſome, for reſpect to his Place, and with Difficulty was conveyed away. Now the poor Oſman ſaw his Friends ſlain, and knew not which way to convert himſelf, but binding up his Eyes with a Napkin, expected Death as the laſt of their Fury. But they carried him firſt before Muſtapha, and accuſed him as the Diſturber of the Peace of the Empire, and demanded ſentence againſt him (More vulgi ſuum quiſque flagitium alijs objectans.) The forſaken Prince pleaded for Life, and the new King knew not how to condemn, but nodded and agreed to all that was propounded. At laſt they conſulted with themſelves, and put him upon an Horſe (an inſolent Spahi changing Turbants with him) and ſent him away Priſoner to the ſeven Towers, under good Guard (in his Paſſage begging a draught of Water at a Fountain) and then returned to their new Maſter, and placed him in the Seraglio and Imperial Throne; where he had need to have good Broaths and Nouriſhment to reſtore his decayed Body.

Daout Baſſa ſtrangleth Sultan Oſman in Priſon.

The Souldiers now thought all was done, and (only ſacking the Houſes of Huzein Baſſa and ſome others their conceived Enemies) returned in quiet to their ſeveral Lodgings, and had no further Malice. But the new Viſier Daout Baſſa, made by Muſtapha, knew well, if Oſman lived, that this ſtorm might paſs over, and he would as eaſily, and by the ſame means return to his eſtate, as he fell from it (vulgus ut mos eſt cujuſque novi motus cupidum:) Therefore he conſulted with ſome few intereſſed in Muſtapha's Preferment, and thereby obnoxious to Oſman, to ſearch how many of the Royal Blood were left alive, and reſolved if there remained two, to make an end of Oſman. Two of his Brothers were found, the one about twelve, * the other about ſeven years of Age; and thereupon the Viſier went himſelf to the Priſon with a pack of Hangmen, and gave order to ſtrangle the unfortunate Prince; who now having had no reſt in two Nights, and thinking himſelf ſecure for a ſeaſon, was newly fall'n aſleep; but awaked by the coming of theſe Meſſengers, asked, What News? ſaying he did not like their ſudden Intruſion. They at firſt ſtood amazed, and the King made ſhew to defend himſelf; But a ſtrong Knave ſtruck him on the Head with a Battle-ax, and the reſt leaping upon him, ſtrangled him with much ado. Thus one of the greateſt Monarchs in the World was firſt affronted by mutined Troops, his own Slaves, almoſt unarmed, and few in number, no man taking up a Sword to defend him; and they who began this madneſs, not meaning to hurt him, by the increaſe of their own Fury, which had no bounds, depoſed him againſt their own purpoſe, and at laſt expoſed his Life, againſt their Will, to the Counſels of other men whom they equally hated. And now they mourned for their dead King as freſhly as they raged unreaſonably; knowing they had ſtained their Honour, being the firſt of their Emperours they ever betrayed, and that they had ſet up another that in all likelyhood they muſt change for diſability, Nunquam tulit documenta fors majora quam fragili loco ſtarent ſuperbi.

* Morat.

This was the laſt Act of the Life of Sultan Oſman; but his Intents and great Deſigns, which drew upon him this fatal blow, will not be unworthy the Communication; the Practiſes, Reaſons, Secrets, and Counſels, of all Actions, being the Soul of Hiſtory, and res geſtæ but the bare

Carkaſs;

The Grand Seignior's Deſign to conquer Europe.

Carkaſs; and, as many Ages have not produced ſo ſtrange an Example of the incertainty of humane Greatneſs, ſo in the diſpoſition thereof, and in the ways leading thereunto, there was ſeen evidently the wonderful Providence of God, in confounding the Counſels of the worldly wiſe, who had laid a Foundation of new greatneſs, whereby this Prince aſpired the univerſal Monarchy. And laſtly, the World may ſee upon how weak Foundations this Monarchy was at firſt builded, how eaſily it was now ſhaken and corrupted; how their Kings are ſubject to the Rage of a few Slaves, how Anarchy hath prepared it an eaſie prey to any able hand that would attempt it. From the Invaſion of Poland all theſe changes took their beginning. Sultan Oſman, advanced to the Throne in his Youth, full of heat and Blood, being of a great and haughty Spirit, very courageous, ſtrong of Body, and a mortal hater of Chriſtians, envious of the Glory of his Anceſtors, and ambitious to raiſe his Name above any of theirs, had projected in himſelf the Conqueſt of the remains of the bordering Europe. But to ſo great Deſigns, he had one Vice that reſiſted all hope of Proſperity, which was, extream Avarice; unnatural to Youth, and a ſymptom of the decrepit Age of Monarchy; Vbi vires luxu corrumpebantur, contra veterem diſciplinam & inſtituta majorum apud quos virtute quàm pecunia res militaris melius ſtetit. His firſt Enterpriſe was that of Poland, moved by the Incurſions of the Coſſacks; which then he undertook of his own Head, without the Counſel of any of his Viſiers, (who, in a Tyranny grown to the height by Eaſe and Wealth, are ever corrupt and lazy) and againſt the liking of all the Souldiers, who (contrary to their Inſtitution, being married, and Fathers of Families, entered into Trades, receiving nothing in War more than in Peace, beſides Danger and Travel) are not eaſily drawn from their own Chimnies. This Action he thought ſo eaſie, as he had diſpoſed of his Conqueſt, and divided the live Lyons Skin. But being met upon the Borders with a poor Army in Compariſon, he was firſt arreſted at Chotyn, a little Fortreſs, which he was fain to leave behind him untaken; and then ſeeking to advance into the plain Country, by forcing the Trenches of the Chancellor of Poland oppoſed againſt him, he could never procure his Janizaries to fight, though ingaging his Perſon once or twice beyond the regard of his Quality, and his own Troops ready to mutiny againſt him, and to forſake him, he was at laſt inforced to raiſe ſhamefully his Camp, and to accept of any Treaty to ſave his outward Honour. In this attempt he loſt above an 100000 horſes for want of Fodder, and eighty thouſand men for want of fighting: for they would rather dye running, or pillaging, or eating, than in the face of the Enemy. For this diſgrace he conceived ſo inward and rooted an indignation againſt the Janizaries, and ſo juſtly, that he often lamented himſelf, and complained he was no King that was ſubject to his own Slaves, upon whom he ſpent great Treaſures, and yet they would neither fight in War, nor obey in Peace, without exacting new Bounties and Priviledges. Delauir Baſſa, a man of great Wit and Courage, lately called from the Eaſtern Parts, where he had long governed with honour, who came in, though late, yet in a very brave and warlike Equipage, above all other his Captains, was ſuddenly made great Vizier, the former, Huzein Baſſa, being in the ſame diſgrace common with the Souldier, though not in the ſame fault. This man was never bred at Court, but had lived many years in action, and ſo had neither faction nor dependance at the Port, but ſtood upon himſelf and his own merit: and being now unexpectedly advanced to this high Dignity, he wrought upon the King's diſcontent, and nouriſhed it: and in concluſion brake with him, That it was true he was no Emperour, nor could be ſafely alive, while the Janizaries had the Power which they lately uſurped; informing him, That they were corrupted from their antient Inſtitution, and were lazy Cowards, given over to Eaſe and luſt: Et animi per libidines corrupti nihil honeſtum inerat. But if his Majeſty would pull up his Spirits, and follow his Advice, he would provide him a new Souldiery about Damaſcus, Coords, of Men ever bred in the frontier, with hardneſs and War, of great Courage and Experience; and that of them he ſhould erect a new Militia, that ſhould wholly depend on him, entertaining only 40000 in pay, which ſhould alway be his Guard; and that in the Diſtribution of every Province, he ſhould conſtitute, that the Beglerbeg in his Government ſhould train ſome of the Inhabitants, who in all occaſions of making a great Army, ſhould be in readineſs, and thereby he ſhould ſpare infinite Treaſures ſpent upon theſe drones that eat up his Eſtate; and with Men of new Spirits and Hopes, he ſhould be enabled to do greater matters than any of his Anceſtors; but withal, he deſired the King to communicate this Counſel to no man; nor to truſt his Life upon anothers ſecreſie. Delauir Baſſa never revealing himſelf to any but the King, who, extreamly pleaſed with this advice, that flattered his own humour, conſented, and remitted all to the Viſiers direction, who was a true Souldier, and a very wiſe man, able by his Credit in Aſia to perform all he had undertaken; for he was exceedingly beloved in thoſe parts, very rich, and had kept Damaſcus, whereof he was Governour, for himſelf in a late Rebellion. Upon this Concluſion between them, it was firſt agreed, That the King ſhould pretend to go in Perſon either to viſit Mecha, or againſt the Emir de Sidon, who was moved to take Arms really to aſſiſt in the deſign; but they uſed it to colour the departure of the Emperour; which, when it was well weighed, was found, that then the Army of the Janizaries muſt be kept together, which could not agree with their ends. Hereupon the Journey of the Pilgrimage was divulged, That the King might under the Shadow of an holy Devotion go out with a ſmall Train, and diſperſe thoſe who were ſuſpected to him. And for this, Preparation was made, but ſomewhat too groſly; by melting of all the Plate, Saddles, furniture of Houſe, Lamps of Churches, and whatſoever could more eaſily be conveyed away in Metal, with all the Jewels and Treaſury. This gave the firſt ſuſpition, which was confirmed by divers unadviſed words let fall from the King; of diſdain againſt the Cowardiſe of the Janizaries, and that he would ſhortly find himſelf Souldiers that ſhould whip them: and laſtly, diſmiſſing all his Houſhold, except ſome few elect; the diſcontented ſort obſerved this and betrayed him. Delauir Baſſa kept his own ſecret, and in the mean time prepared by his Friends in Aſia ten thouſand men; about Damaſcus ten thouſand, from the Coords, beſides thoſe in readineſs of the Emir de Sidon; and all upon pretence of defending the Borders of Perſia, who might make ſome advantage of the changes in thoſe parts: and gave order, That all theſe ſhould meet the King at Damaſcus, where he would preſently cut off his Guard, and ſtay there until he had regulated his new Army and Diſcipline, and then to return triumphant to Conſtantinople, and utterly root out the order of Janizaries, Spahies, and Timariots, and to exauctorate all their Captains and Officers, to ſettle a new Government, and to change the Name of the City. And theſe things ſucceeding, he then reſolved with his new Souldiers to attempt the recovery of his Honour in Chriſtendom; in the mean time to hold a diſſembled Friendſhip there in all parts. Certainly this was a brave and well-grounded deſign, and of great conſequence for renewing of that decayed Empire, languiſhing under the Inſolencies of lazy Slaves, if God had not deſtroyed it; it being very true, That the Turkiſh Emperour ſtands at the Devotion of his own Troops for Peace or War, Life or Death, and is in effect nothing but the Steward or Treaſurer of the Janizaries. If this project had taken effect, what events it might have produced by a Civil War, is not eaſie to judge. For doubtleſs the Souldiery would have ſet up another King, and maintained him as well as they could; and the European part had been in danger to have been torn away by the diviſion. Beſides, Delauir Baſſa having the King and the Treaſury in his Poſſeſſion, and his own credit ſo great, and his Inclination velle imperare, ſo willing to bear rule, once diſcovered, it might well be thought that he had ſome ends of his own to ſhare a part of this mighty Eſtate; if on the other ſide the Viſier had proved true and faithful, the reformation and new erection of the Diſcipline of War, and the increaſe of Treaſure conſequent to the diſmiſſion of the old Militia, would have been fearful to all Chriſtendom; but ubi eſt ſapiens? ubi diſquiſitor ſeculi hujus? Perdam ſapientiam ſapientum, & vanam reddam intelligentiam, intelligentium. It is a great queſtion whether then was the wiſer wiſh, That theſe Counſels had ſucceeded, or not; for either diviſion and ſubverſion, or a new proſperity and enlargement of their Dominion had neceſſarily followed.

Obſervations upon Sultan Oſman.

Some Obſervations upon this Occaſion will not be impertinent to thoſe that deſire to know as well the Diſpoſition and uſe, as the things themſelves. Firſt, in the purpoſe of the Souldier, not at all to violate or hurt the King, much leſs to depoſe and murder him; but only to take away thoſe about him whom they thought aſſiſtants in this project; yet the fury once on foot, they proceeded by inſenſible ſteps to the uttermoſt of outrage, againſt many Innocents in that Buſineſs, though otherwiſe obnoxious, and againſt the Throne and Life of their own Emperour, Ubi furor ingruat, innocentes ac noxios juxta cadere; where Rage and Fury hath got the upper hand, there the innocent and nocent fare alike. Secondly, in the degrees; that yet the King had not fallen thus low, if firſt he had not loſt that awe and reverence which alway attendeth upon Majeſty, if it be kept up, by unſeemly Offices done by him in the Streets and Taverns, apprehending many Souldiers for petty faults, like a Conſtable; making his Perſon common, cheap, and deſpiſed among them; which was wont only to be ſeen and feared, as ſomewhat above humane greatneſs. And this he did alſo in hatred and diſdain of thoſe that had in the War forſaken him. And now in this laſt act, if his own obſtinacy had not plunged him into Deſtruction, but that he had ſoftned them by a ſeaſonable yielding to time, he had prevailed only by time. Thirdly, in the order, that theſe Mutineers having no Head or Direction, kept that relegement, that they took Oath in their Fury, in hot Blood, in the Kings yard, not to diſhonour, ſpoil, nor ſack the Imperial Throne; neither committed nor ſuffered any inſolency or violence in the City to the Neutrals, but rather proclaimed Peace and Juſtice. Fourthly, in the Conſequents, that at the third days end all was quiet, and all Men in their Trade, as if no ſuch thing had hapned; only the Janizaries ſuffered no Divan nor Council until they had received a donative as Guerdon of their Iniquity. In which alſo the infinite waſte of Treaſure is worthy the Conſideration, which was exceedingly exhauſted by three changes in four years, and by the late Wars in Perſia and Poland; for every Janizary in the City, abſent or preſent (whoſe roll was about forty thouſand) received twenty five Chequines of Gold; beſides the Spahies, Jamoglans, and other Orders, at every alteration; which amounts in all near to two Millions. And now thoſe Fellows that had taſted the ſweet of proſperous Mutinies (haud ignari ſumma ſcelera incipi cum periculo peragi cum præmio) took ſuch a Head, as could not ſafely be ſuffered on, nor ſecurely be taken off. Fifthly, of certain Preſages that fore-ran; for Oſman dreamed in the Night, That he thought he rid a Camel, and being mounted, he could not force him to go by fair means nor ſtripes; and that then he deſcending in a Rage, the Body of the Beaſt vaniſhed, and left the Bridle and Head in the Kings Hand. Who next day, troubled at this Fancy, ſent to a learned Man, familiar with him, for the Interpretation. He excuſed himſelf, as unfit to give Opinion in a matter of that Conſequence; but perſwaded Oſman to enquire of the Mufti. He alſo craved pardon; but withal ſaid, there was none ſo fit to interpret it as Muſtapha the Kings Uncle, who was eſteemed a holy man, that had Viſions and Angel-like Speculations, (in plain terms, between a Mad-man and a Fool.) The King repaired to Muſtapha, who briefly told him, The Camel ſignified his Empire, his riding, abuſe in Government; his diſſention, his Diſpoſition; the vaniſhing of the Body, the revolt of his Subjects; the Head remaining in his Hand, only a bare Title, and that he ſhould ſhortly die within a few Months, and loſe his Kingdom, but the empty Name of Emperour ſhould accompany him to his Grave.

The Engliſh Ambaſſadors Advice to Delauir Baſſa.

A ſecond of leſs conſequence in the Viſier Delauir Baſſa, from whom his Majeſties Ambaſſador having received particular Friendſhip, about ſix days before this uprore, he went to viſit; and having no other buſineſs but to perſwade him to ſtay the King from his intended Pilgrimage, the Ambaſſador gave him many Reaſons in the preſent Eſtate of their own Affairs; eſpecially, the Treaty of Poland yet depending. To which the Baſſa replied very gravely. Then the Ambaſſador urged the fear of ſome Tumult, collected from the licentious Speeches rumoured in the Town: And he was bold to deal plainly, ſincerely, and friendly, That if any ſuch thing ſhould happen, the fault would be imputed to the Baſſa, as being of authority to perſwade the King; whom his Quality and Youth would excuſe, but all the Fury would be diſcharged upon the greateſt Miniſter; deſiring him to conſider the event, at leaſt to take his Affection in the beſt part.

The Baſſa's Reply.

The old Reinard ſtayed a while from reply; at laſt, ſmiling to himſelf, that he ſhould be perſuaded againſt that which was his own Counſel, he gave a final anſwer, That there was no Remedy, he durſt not hazard himſelf to oppoſe the Kings Reſolution: but aſſured him he would ſo order the matter, as this Journey ſhould not proceed ſo far as was expected. The Ambaſſador concluded for himſelf, deſiring then that he would leave him a particular recommendation to the Chimacham or Deputy as his Friend. To which he ſuddenly replied, Trouble not your ſelf, nor fear; I will never remove ſo far but that I will leave one of my Legs in this City to ſerve you. Which the poor man fulfilled; for being murthered within few days after, one of his Legs whole and entire was hanged in the Hippodrome, the moſt publick place of the City.

The reading of Hiſtory, to know what is done and paſt, having in it no Recompence but Delight, unleſs it look forward to Uſe and Action, either to correct Errors, or by that light to gather advantage in future, it will not be an unprofitable digreſſion to obſerve what was like to ſucceed theſe monſtrous Alterations. It was feared by contemplative men, that the Souldiers in Aſia, who had loſt their hope, would not ſit down with this affront, but rather attempt ſome revenge for the Death of the King, who was their Martyr; or that ſome great Baſſa, far removed from Court, might apprehend this occaſion, not to obey an Uſurper, ſet up by Treaſon; and under that colour to hide their own Ambition; or laſtly, that the whole State would fall into Combuſtion, and inteſtine War. This they themſelves foreſaw, and it came to paſs, as will appear in the Story; for within few Months Abaſſa Baſſa of Arzirum declared himſelf revenger of his Princes Blood, and troubled, and almoſt hazarded the whole Empire. The Perſian apprehended the Opportunity, and recovered the Province and City of Babylon: and the ſame Souldiers that had betrayed their Prince, were never quiet until they had made ſome ſatisfaction, by reſtoring his Brother and right Heir; only it pleaſed not God to open the Eyes of Chriſtian Princes to ſee the Inconveniency of their own uncivil Quarrels, while the diſtractions of this mighty Empire did invite to conquer it, and to divide it as a proſtituted Prey.

A practiſe to murther the Brethren of Sultan Oſman.

On Saturday Evening, the firſt of June following, the Capi-aga or Major Domo of the Seraglio, having received a ſecret order to remove the Brethren of Oſman from their Lodgings, and in the Night to ſtrangle them; as he was performing his Command, aided with a few of his Carnifices to carry away the Princes, they cried out; the Pages running to the noiſe, and incouraged by the Caſtiaraga, who had ſome Suſpition, without further Examination killed the Capiaga, now almoſt every Order having riſen againſt their own Head. That Night they ſent ſecretly to the Janizaries and Spahies, to inform them what they had done; and in the Morning early hanged his Body in the Hippodrome for a publick ſpectacle. The Souldiers returned in Fury to the Court, in favour of the Pages, and demanded Juſtice againſt thoſe that had conſented to this wicked order, which had made an end of all the Ottoman race; only this Muſtapha being left alive, who was ſo holy a Saint, that he would not People the World with Sinners, nor endure any Woman near him. The innocent King proteſted he knew nothing of this purpoſe; and if ſuch command were procured, it was gotten by ſubreption; and he was eaſily believed. But his Mother, another Livia, and the new Viſier, Daout Baſſa, who had her Daughter to Wife, were vehemently ſuſpected. It was a day of Divan or Council; but the Souldiers would ſuffer none, until they had an account of this Treaſon. The Viſier denied all; the Mother was a Woman, and hidden in the Houſe; yet it is very likely, they both were guilty, to uphold and ſecure their own Authority; it being rumoured, that the Viſier determined to place ſubditiouſly in the room of the Elder Prince, his own Son, and very like him, and ſo to govern Muſtapha for a time, and by his remove to eſtabliſh himſelf and his race for ever. But now ſomewhat muſt be done to appeaſe the People; therefore Daout Baſſa, was degraded from his Office, and one Huzein Baſſa, newly arrived from the Government of Cairo, advanced to his place, with promiſe of further Examination. But the fury once over, there was no great ſearch nor diſcovery made, for perhaps the Sultans Chequines quieted the matter. The new Viſier was a man without Friends, yet very rich, of a ſtubborn and obſtinate Nature, reported juſt in his ways, but peremptory and unflexible (Audax ferox, ac prout animum intendit, pravus aut induſtrius eadem vi) one from whom all men might expect much good, or much ill; he begun his Government roughly, and undertook to puniſh Inſolencies early, and profeſſed a Reformation, or to be a Sacrifice: A man fit for thoſe times that were deſperate; for the worſt was, that he muſt at laſt endure their Fury. In the mean time he procured a little awe, and reſtored the face of Juſtice; yet it was thought it could not laſt long, the Ghoſt of Oſman would not be at reſt until there were ſome Parentalia made unto him. The Nature of the Viſier was unſupportable, but if he prevailed, and were once ſetled, he reſolved anew to change the King, and lay an Obligation upon the Brethren of Oſman; for he did never think himſelf ſecure under a man governed by an inſolent Woman, dominandi avida, deſirous to rule. And what aſſurance could he have in that Prince, in whom there was neither Judgment nor Hatred, but as it was infuſed? And though the particulars could not be foreſeen, nor where the ſore would break out, yet the whole body was ſick, their King being mentis inops, an Ideot; and the next in expectation a Child unfit for Action, and all the great Men and Souldiers decay'd, mutined, and corrupted.

The Poliſh Ambaſſador approcheth upon the Confines, and writeth to the dead Viſier.

In the mean time, the Duke of Sbaraſky came near unto the Borders of the Turkiſh Empire, and, ignorant of thoſe great changes which had hapned, ſent a Servant with a Letter to the dead Viſier Delauir Baſſa, with whom only the Poles had treaty. The contents were, That the King of Poland had ſent him to conclude a Peace, upon ſuch Conditions as were agreed upon by the Viſier and the Commiſſioners of Poland, ſigned on both parts; but that it was reported upon the Death of the Grand Seignior, that the new Government was varied from ſome of them; and that he had no other Inſtructions to treat anew; but if he would give his word to the Engliſh Ambaſſador, that there was no alteration in the intents of Peace, he was ready to ſet forward on his Journey. This Letter received by the new Viſier, was Greek to him, who was lately come from Cairo, and underſtood no article nor piece of the buſineſs; which was ſo ſecretly carried by Delauir Baſſa, that Sultan Oſman and he being dead, there was no man had ſo much as a Copy, or knew the ſubſtance of that agreement; ſo that the Viſier giving good Words, aſhamed to confeſs his Ignorance, promiſed all things, but knew not what to write in particular anſwer, and therefore was at a ſtand. The Meſſenger nevertheleſs importuned a diſpatch, the which he had in general terms, and ſo returned again to the Duke his Maſter upon the Confines.

With this Nuntio, the Duke wrote to Sir Thomas Roe; and being very doubtful to intangle himſelf in this unſetled Government, deſired him both to counſel him, and to tell the Viſier, that he would not advance unleſs he might receive ſuch aſſurance of ſafety and publick Faith, as that he might engage his credit to him; hoping thereby to have both aſſiſtance and witneſs in all his proceeding. Which gave the Viſier occaſion to intreat the Engliſh Ambaſſador, both to promiſe for the good uſage of the Duke, and to haſten him, and alſo to inform himſelf by him of the ſubſtance of the Treaty of Chotyn; which being by him undertaken, it turned to the great advantage of both, eſpecially of the Peace it ſelf.

The ſeventeenth of June in the Morning, the Prince Coreſkie, one of the Lords of Poland, taken Priſoner in the late War, recommended by his Majeſty of Great Britain, who had formerly made an eſcape from the Turks Captivity, was ſtrangled in the Priſon, after two years of durance. This put all into murmure, and deep conſideration, for what politick end this ſhould be done, even when they themſelves deſired a Peace with the Pole, and yet did that which might utterly break the ſame; but it ſeemed they were at that time either carried with a brutiſh Fury, or that the Prince was betrayed from home, by intimation that his remuant Nature would never ſuffer the Peace long to continue between the Crown of Poland and the Grand Seignior.

The Prince Coreſkie ſtrangled in Priſon.

The Viſier attempteth to ſet up Morat the Brother of Oſman, and to depoſe Muſtapha.

The Viſier (who cauſed this Polack Prince to be ſtrangled) upon ſome ſpleen towards the Aga or chief Captain of the Janizaries, took this occaſion to caſt the fault on him, and to caſhiere him; and ſent him to the Iſlands to be ſtrangled; and gave order to murder ſome other Baſſaes and Officers, and that way being made to depoſe the Emperour Muſtapha, to ſet up Morat the Child, and Brother of Oſman, many being of his party. Whereupon the Souldiers roſe all in Arms at the Seraglio, taking the alarm at the medling with their Aga, reſcued their Captain, and the reſt, and demanded the Head of the Viſier; whereupon he fled, and order was given to kill him where he could firſt be found. The Souldiers alſo required the Life of Morat, Aga Cuſtomer, and divers others; but for fear of other Complices, they durſt ſearch no further into the Conſpiracy; only the Viſiers Houſe was ſacked, and infinite Treaſure taken, ſo that the Souldier was quiet for a day or two by making a new Viſier, Muſtapha Baſſa; who was of a ſoft Nature, and ſcarce durſt do Juſtice for fear of offending any Man. Now a new Faction was made between Muſtapha and Morat; and it was expected hourly when there ſhould be ſome great ſlaughter or maſſacre in the City; for of Neceſſity one ſide muſt fall.

There was then no ſecurity for any Man; when the King and Viſiers, and all Officers held their Lives and Dignities at the courteſie of the mutined Souldier, who had taſted the ſweet of Rebellion, and caſt off all Awe and Reverence, and could not eaſily be reduced to order, without much blood and hazard of the whole. Therefore the wiſer men retired from Office and Imployment, and the inſufficient did cauſe their own daily change and ruine. The Souldier adhered to the King of their own creation, and he was in effect their Creature, for they did wholly govern him. But the Lawyers and Church-men made ſecret conventions, and ſtill practiſed ſome great alteration, and feared not to ſay openly, that the foundation of their State was diſſolved, the King unlawful, and all that had adhered unto him lapſed into Hereſie, having deſpiſed the Inſtitutions of Mahomet. They wrought by wiſe Counſels, and held a large Correſpondency with thoſe of their own Coat, and ſpread their Confederacy to all parts of the Empire to procure a Faction, and kindle a greater Fire than that of the Souldiers; for at Bagdat the Captain of the Janizaries roſe and ſlew the Baſſa, burnt the Mufti and all his Kin, and gave his Daughter in marriage to one Aſlan Begh, a pretender to the antient Inheritance of a bordering Province, to cautionize that part. All Aſia was in doubt whom to obey; and Cairo was eaten up with Oppreſſion; and that which was moſt dangerous, they had no ſence of the ſickneſs in the Court, to cure it, nor any of them ſo wiſe as to diſſemble it.

The Prince of Tranſilvania's Ambaſſador arrived at the Port.

The two and twentieth of Auguſt, the extraordinary Ambaſſador of Bethlem Gabor Prince of Tranſilvania arrived at Conſtantinople; who, amongſt other Inſtructions, had order to excuſe his Maſter, and to declare the Reaſons why he had made Peace with the Emperour without the knowledge of the Port: which were, That the War had continued three years in the Kingdom of Hungary, and had ſo conſumed and deſolated the Country, that it was impoſſible for him to ſtay longer in the Field, and to maintain an Army, for the great Famine and ſcarcity of all things which the Souldiery ſuffered, and could from no place be ſupplied; ſo that if he had not accepted of Peace offered, he had been enforced to quit the Country of Neceſſity, and by his ſeeming flight have left the Enemy Victor. Therefore he was conſtrained to win time, and to return into Tranſilvania, to refreſh his men of War, and to re-inforce them; as alſo his own preſſing Affairs calling him back, his Brother, whom he had left Governour in his abſence, having adviſed him, That the King of Poland, by the Inſtigation of the Emperour, by intelligence with ſome of the principal Lords, did practiſe a revolt, and promiſed Aid to make a new Prince that ſhould wholly depend upon the Empire and Poland. Laſtly, ſeeing the Grand Seignior had ſuddenly concluded a Peace with the Poles, he feared he ſhould be left alone to the burthen of the War, in which the King of Poland, being at eaſe, might aſſiſt the Emperour, which he was not able to ſuſtain: Therefore he was content to take the Opportunity to accept of that, at the inſtance of the Emperour, which he ſhould have been forced to do by Neceſſity.

Yet afterward, although he made this Apology for his Maſter, for concluding a Peace, he aſſured the Port, that his Maſter meant not long to keep the ſame; informing them, that the Emperour had made a League (being at that time quiet in Germany) to invade the Ottoman Empire; perſwading the Port to grant a Commiſſion with full Power and Authority to him and the Baſſa of Buda (who had been twenty years in that charge, and knew all the Borders) if they ſaw it fit, to prevent the Enemy, and to invade the Empire or the Kingdom of Poland. This demand was made by Gabor, to inſinuate with the State of Turky, and to get a Power dormant in his Hands, to advance into Hungary, if he ſaw advantage, or to oblige the Emperour; and to aſſure his Peace, by having means not to care if it were broken. But the Grand Seignior finding himſelf, by reaſon of civil Diſtractions at home, unfit for a War abroad, and that they ſaw Bethlem Gabor had no other thing in recommendation than his own Deſigns and Fortune, his Ambaſſadors Propoſitions began to be altogether ſlighted and neglected.

The Poland Ambaſſador arriveth at the Port.

The Duke of Sbarasky, who came to conclude the Peace between his Maſter the King of Poland, and the Grand Seignior, after long ſtay upon the Confines, did at length arrive at the Port; but they made him ſtay five Weeks before he could have audience, forcing him to give a Preſent, contrary to his Inſtructions. Notwithſtanding he could not get them to enter into a Treaty, finding nothing but falſhood and uncertainty among them, no Promiſe nor Faith kept, no Priſoners delivered, nor indeed any thing at all performed; for now that they had him within their Liberties, they hoped to work their own ends, and to weary him out, who had twelve hundred of his ordinary train. They threatned to keep him, and to denounce a War againſt his Maſter; yet, by the mediation of the Engliſh Ambaſſador, the Miniſters of the Port and he were peeced again, and the Peace concluded, as ſhall be hereafter ſet down at large.

After many Difficulties to obtain admiſſion to the preſence of the Grand Seignior, cauſed by the frowardneſs of the old Eunuch Georgi Mehemet Baſſa, then Great Viſier; who, diſcovering that the Duke would complain againſt Tomſha Vayvod of Valachia, and his Creature, endeavoured by all fraud, cunning, threatning, and faſtidious delays, to divert him from that purpoſe; being loth that the Actions of him whom he had foſtered and maintained in many Tyrannies, eſpecially in the occaſion of the laſt War, ſhould be examined or layed open to Juſtice. But when he ſaw that nothing could prevail, but that he muſt hazard a direct breach by the diſcontent of the Duke; and that the People began to murmure, and the Engliſh Ambaſſador to protect him, he was admitted, and nobly received, according to the pompous cuſtom of that Court; and with his Letter of Credence he ſpake theſe following Words.

SIGISMUND, by the Grace of God, King of Poland, Sueden, Gothia, Vandalia, Great Duke of Lituania, and of many other Provinces Prince and Lord: To your moſt Renowned Majeſty, moſt Mighty Emperour of Aſia and Europe, and King of many Kingdoms and Provinces, ever moſt happy, wiſheth Health; and by me his Great Ambaſſador ſalutes you with all convenient Reverence and Honour; deſiring to your Majeſty from the moſt high God, the fulneſs of all Proſperity, Happineſs, long Life, Triumph above your Anceſtors, Princes worthy of all Memory.

HIS High Majeſty of Poland, conſidering the depth and height of the decrees of the Great God, marvelling with all the World, and praiſing his High Name; doth comfort and joy himſelf, being more than certain, that, that eternal Power which hath preſerved your Majeſty from all evil deſtinies of Men, and from the Bowels of the Earth, and hath placed you in the ſhining Throne, hath not done it but for the publick good; and like a wiſe Gardiner, who hath weeded out all venemous and noyſome Plants, that he hath placed your Majeſty in their room, as a noble and ſweet ſmelling Flower, full of Virtue, Clemency, and Peace, deſired of all the World. His Majeſty, my Lord and Sovereign, hath always wiſhed, that not only the Actions of later years, but of many Ages paſt, might have been forgotten; and that that Friendſhip and Peace begun with the Renowned Ottoman Kings two hundred and more years ſince, might have been without interruption continued. But ſeeing that the Great God hath been pleaſed to chaſtiſe the People of both parts, by the means of wicked men, that muſt be accepted for good which commeth from his divine Will; and therefore, blotting out of Mind whatſoever is paſt, doth now return to deſire the continuance of the firſt antient Peace, and doth offer himſelf to your high Majeſty to keep it inviolably, as it was maintained in the time of Sultan Amurath of happy Memory. In witneſs of which his Sincerity, he hath not apprehended the Opportunity of the breach begun by the Perſian, the expiration of the Truce with the Emperour of Germany, nor the many Revolts and Troubles in Aſia, nor hearkened to the Inſtigation of many Chriſtian Princes, his Friends and Allies, nor to the Tartar diſcontented; but rather, having refuſed all other ways, hath with the Blood of his own Subjects, and the charge of his Purſe, regained from the Rebel Valachia, Moldavia, and a part of Tranſilvania, and rendred thoſe Provinces into the Hands of your Majeſties Father, and ſuffered no man at any time to diſturb on that ſide the Friends of your Empire; giving Intelligence, like a good Friend and a Neighbour to your Anceſtors, of all your Enemies Deſigns and Machinations, and in as much as was poſſible endeavoured to preſerve a good Peace and Friendſhip; which he offereth to your moſt ſerene Majeſty, contenting himſelf with the Capitulations treated at Chotyn, and thoſe of your moſt happy Father and Brother; praying your Majeſty that they may be confirmed and maintained. And not doubting but your Majeſty will reſtrain the Tartars, as he will do the Coſſacks; and that you will ſuffer no occaſion of kindling new Fires, he beſeecheth your Majeſty to do what Juſtice you think meet upon Cantemir and Tomſha, who, contrary to the agreements and publick Faith, have made ſpoil and new Incurſions into Poland, even ſince my departure from thence; and with many Deceits and falſe Advices have deſired to diſturb the happy beginnings of Accommodation. And ſeeing that by the antient Capitulations made with the moſt warlike Sultan Solyman, and his Succeſſors, the Father and Brother of your Majeſty; the Princes of Moldavia, the Baſſaes of Siliſtria, and the Beghs of Ackirman ought to keep the Paſſages of the Rivers to reſtrain the Tartars; and that thoſe now in Poſſeſſion of thoſe Governments are already known, and grown old in their rapine and ſpoil, the King my Lord deſireth your renowned Majeſty, that they may be diſmiſſed, and their Provinces given to ſome others more inclined to Peace. For Cantemir, it is a true rule obſerved, That one Tartar can hardly govern another, where both live upon ſpoil; and how eaſily upon any occaſion new Troubles are apprehended by thoſe who are antient Enemies, I leave to your Highneſſes Wiſdom; in which his Majeſty is ſo aſſured, that he doubteth not, that for the publick good, and for the Complaints and Tears of both Subjects, you will alſo vouchſafe to accept the requeſt of your Friend, and a King your Neighbour. And if all the World, and the People thereof rejoyce and praiſe God for the Friendſhip and Peace between your Majeſty and the King my Maſter begun and concluded, he hopeth that the poor and miſerable Priſoner ſhall participate of your Clemency, that they may joyn in the general care to pray to the eternal God for increaſe of your Greatneſs. The King my Maſter doth therefore deſire your Majeſty to grant Liberty to thoſe who are in your Captivity, as he bindeth himſelf to ſet free all ſuch of your Majeſties Subjects as are now his Priſoners; and I do promiſe on the behalf of my Maſter, that he ſhall be a Friend to your Friends, and an Enemy to your Enemies. In concluſion, he deſireth all Happineſs and Proſperity to your Majeſty from a clear Heart; in ſign and teſtimony whereof, and of the Friendſhip begun on his part, he honoureth you with a Preſent, which you may be pleaſed to receive with your accuſtomed benignity; and ſhutting your Ears to ſuch Informers, Enemies of Peace, as are found at your Port, that you will eſteem him for a Friend and Neighbour of the moſt Royal and Antient Kings of your moſt Princely Family.

The Souldiers continued ſtill in their mutinous Diſpoſition, even in Conſtantinople, the Head City of the Turkiſh Empire, and grew to that height of Inſolency, that going in Troops to the Court, they demanded all Offices of gain; to be Stewards to the Revenues of the Churches, which are great; to take the Farms of Cuſtoms; and there committed many other Outrages which were unſufferable. The Viſiers durſt deny them nothing; they drunk Wine in the Streets without Prohibition, contrary to their Law; and ſtood in Companies in the open day exacting Money of all Chriſtians to pay for their Wine; and being denied it, ſtabbed and murthered without any Puniſhment; and when complaint was made to the Viſier or Magiſtrate, they anſwered, None durſt meddle with them, who had murthered their own King; and the Baſſaes themſelves deſired the Complainants patience, and that they would bear a part with the general ſufferance.

The Janizaries aſſault the Houſes of the Chriſtian Conſuls at Smirna.

About the ſame time, the Janizaries in the Gallies which rid before Smirna, commanded by the Captain Halil Baſſa, aſſaulted, againſt his Will, the Houſes of all the Chriſtian Conſuls there. The Engliſh, with all thoſe of the Nation, were forced to run naked from their Lodgings, and to ſwim to the Admirals Galley to ſave their Lives; they ranſacked the lower parts of the Houſe, and carried away to the value of two thouſand Dollars; the French ſuſtained more loſs; and the Venetians at leaſt ten thouſand, and one of the Subjects of that State cut in pieces. The General had much ado to appeaſe them by Entreats or Perſwaſions, or to ſave the lives of all; inſomuch as they miſcalled and threatned him, becauſe he would not conſent to their madneſs. In concluſion, he was fain preſently to put to Sea, or elſe they had finiſhed the Trade at that Place.

In Aſia there was then three open Rebellions, one at Babylon, another at Arzerum, upon the borders of Perſia near Tauris, and the third in Meſopotamia. The Viſiers at the Port diſſembled all this, and durſt take no knowledge thereof, nor ſo much as to ſend a command thither, for fear of blowing the Fire, which would have put all into Combuſtion; whereupon they held a ſecret Counſel, and conſented to remove themſelves, to prove if they could recover the deſperate Eſtate of that Empire, and took Reſolution to make Halil Baſſa (the beſt Souldier and moſt beloved) great Viſier; and in his room Daout Baſſa Captain of the Sea; and the preſent Viſier, Chimachan or Lieutenant at the Port; and in the Spring following, they reſolved to ſend the Viſier into Aſia, with all the force they could make; to which end they ſent into Græce, to warn all the Souldiery to be ready at Adrianople, not daring to make a rendezvouſe at the Port, for fear of new Trouble; and ſo to paſs the Helleſpont, wide of the City, to appeaſe (if they could) thoſe Revolts, and by that way to draw the Mutineers from the Court into Action, and to reduce them unto Obedience. And notwithſtanding that there was no other ſymptom or prediction but ſuch as threatned the ruine of that Empire, yet were they never prouder nor more ſeeming not to diſtruſt themſelves, their only ſecurity being, that they had no Enemy but themſelves.

The Grand Seigniors Treaſure exhauſted.

The Treaſury was far exhauſted, the Revenue abated by the Oppreſſion of every Baſſa in his Government; the Souldier increaſed both in pay and number; and ſo impatient of delay, that at every quarter, (beſides borrowing and taking up of the Farmes of the Cuſtoms before-hand) there were ſo many intolerable Exactions to raiſe Monies, that the appearance of domeſtick quiet could not long endure between two extreams; for means could not be found, and the Janizaries would not be retrenched nor deferred; and this was their general Eſtate at that time.

An Ambaſſador from the Great Duke of Muſcovy arrived at the Port.

While the Poliſh Ambaſſador was treating the Peace at the Port, whereof there was no great doubt, becauſe neither ſide was fit for War, there arrived an Ambaſſador from the Great Duke of Muſcovia, which gave ſome Interruption therein, preſſing the Grand Seignior to continue the War for ſeven years againſt Poland, according to the promiſe of Sultan Oſman; offering that his Maſter ſhould enter into Poland with an Army, and that they would divide the Country between them; but his Propoſition was rejected, becauſe they had had ſufficient Tryal of his Maſters cunning proceedings in the laſt War. For the Muſcovite, having made Peace with Poland (before the Invaſion of Oſman) for fourteen years, and being invited by him to break it and to invade that Country, upon promiſe that he would continue the War for ſeven years, and make no agreement without their comprehenſion; firſt anſwered, That he could not break the Peace; thinking that the other was but a flaſh of a young Prince; but ſo ſoon as he ſaw the Turks in the Field and Borders of Poland, then he began to hope he might make advantage; and therefore promiſed Sultan Oſman, on the Conditions mentioned, to enter into the Quarrel. And to that end diſpatched an Ambaſſadour to Poland, with Inſtructions to demand three things. Firſt, that the Prince of Poland ſhould renounce the Title of Elect Duke of Muſcovia. The ſecond, That the Poles ſhould reſtore a Territory in the Border of Lituania, taken in the late Wars. Laſtly, that the Peace ſhould be perpetual; threatning, that if they refuſed thoſe Conditions, he would enter into the Country with an Army, and get what he could. This Ambaſſador being arrived in the Confines, heard News that the Poles had repulſed the Turk at Chotyn, that he was retired, and a Peace treated; whereupon he feigned himſelf ſick, and ſent back a Poſt with this Advice and his old Inſtructions, deſiring in this alteration ſome new order from home. The Governour of the Town where he lay, ſuſpecting ſomewhat, intercepted the Meſſenger and his Packet, and ſent it preſently to the King. The man returned to his Maſter the Ambaſſador, as robbed, and was again diſpeeded the ſecond time, and ſent back with another Stile, to wit, with Letters of Congratulation, Joy, and Offers of all help and continuance of the Peace; with theſe the Ambaſſador went forward to the Court; and having audience, the King anſwered him, That if his Meſſage were ſincere, it had been very acceptable; but he knew it to be a ſugred Treaſon, and no Faith intended from the Muſcovite, and therefore commanded him to depart.

The Ambaſſador proteſted, vowed, and uſed all means to aſſure the Integrity of his Meſſage; until he was confronted by the Chancellor, with his own Letter and his Maſters Inſtructions. Hereupon was this other diſpatched to the Port to hinder the Peace, and to offer all their help to continue an Invaſion. In the mean time the Muſcovite neglected no means to ſecure himſelf, and by renewing two Ambaſſadors, obtained a Peace with Poland, which was then again confirmed. To which the Poles were the willinger to agree, not knowing what effect the Negotiations of the Duke of Sbarasky might produce at the Port. And now the Muſcovite was forced to diſſemble again with the Turk, and make his preparation to depart.

The Great Viſier practiſeth to put Daout Baſſa to Death.

The Great Viſier Georgi, envying the Authority of Daout Baſſa, the beloved Son of the Queen Mother, and Brother-in-Law to the Emperour Muſtapha (which had formerly been depoſed) who had been both the Inſtrument and the Counſellor to murther Sultan Oſman, ſcorning that he ſhould underhand govern in his Reign, eſpecially becauſe he countenanced in oppoſition the Duke of Sbaraskie's buſineſs, he therefore practiſed to put him to Death; but not daring to do it by his own Authority, and in vain to procure it from the Court, he ſtirred up the Spahies to demand Juſtice of him for the Death of the laſt King. This looked further than the firſt aſſent; for the ſubtil Viſier, who was faithful to his true Lord, and knowing the rage of an unguided Multitude, aimed at a by-revenge upon others, whom he hoped would be involved and accuſed of the Murther; and the Souldier ſoon raiſed and mutined in the Seraglio, they demanded him. Daout fled, but now that the buſineſs was on foot, if he were not found the Viſier himſelf was in danger; but the poor man was taken and brought to the Divan, and there being called to the publick Juſtice, he muſt excuſe himſelf upon ſome greater Perſon; wherein the Emperour and his Mother ran a new hazard, which was the ſecret end. Therefore both of them forſook him, and left him to the Law; and without any Trial he was brought before the Souldiers, ſtripped, his Turbant taken off, and on his Knees ready to receive the ſtroke of Death; but ſuddenly the Janizaries came to his reſcue, and carried him away to their Chambers. The Spahies, who began this Action, took it in ill part, and followed with great outcries, That they would have him die; the others demanded that he might be heard in publick Juſtice. Thus thoſe two mutined Factions were ready to come to blows. Daout Baſſa, now in ſome hope of Life, bribed the Janizaries, and that day diſtributed forty thouſand Chequines of Gold, and they promiſed to protect him. Who did not now think but he was taken away for ſafety? But the Spahies followed their firſt Reſolution; and to appeaſe the fear of that Diſſention, it was agreed he ſhould die. They that meant to ſave him, could not, but preſerved him for a greater example of Juſtice. They would not now let him loſe his Head in the Court, for that Death was too honourable for him that had murthered his Prince. Then the Janizaries put him ſecretly into the ſame Coach wherein he had ſent Sultan Oſman to Execution; twice in the way, being dry with Sorrow, he drank at the ſame Fountains where his laſt Maſter begged drink, and ſo was conveyed into the ſame Chamber where he had murthered him. The Executioners beginning to tye him, himſelf ſhewed the very corner where he had committed that foul fact, and deſired that there he might (if poſſible) expiate it; and ſo he was at laſt miſerably ſtrangled. Thus he had his Reward, and God was juſt alſo even for the wicked.

About the twentieth of February, the Peace (after many rubs) between the Grand Seignior and the King of Poland, by the Mediation of the Engliſh Ambaſſador (who was choſen by the Grand Seignior as Arbitrer of all differences) after many meetings with Diac Mahomet Baſſa, Commiſſioner for the Treaty, was concluded; the Duke having firſt been forced to ſend this following Remonſtrance for his Expedition, which much moved the Viſier, and quickned the Concluſion.

The Duke of Sharaskie's Remonſtrance to the Great Viſier.

YOur Excellency may be pleaſed to remember the happy and honourable Treaty made before Chotyn; In which a Peace was concluded between the Ottoman Empire and the Kingdom of Poland, ſigned by Commiſſioners on both parts; wherein (with reference to other antient Treaties) it was agreed, That a great Ambaſſador ſhould come to the Imperial Port, as well to confirm and ſwear the Peace, as to ſet in order ſome other incident Circumſtances, as then not fully taken into Conſideration. Since which, the King and Republick of Poland, having elected me for that Imployment, his Majeſty and my ſelf have received many Letters foom Delauir, Daout, Huzcin, and Muſtapha, Baſſaes, all great Viſiers; not only promiſing a ſpeedy end and diſpatch of the Concluſion of Peace, which on both parts is ſo much deſired, but alſo the releaſe of our Captives, and all other reſpects of Love and Friendſhip, according to the antient Honour of the Imperial Port; deſiring me upon that aſſurance to proceed with Alacrity and Expedition. And further, it having pleaſed his Majeſty of Great Britain (a Friend to both) to mediate in this pious Office, by his Ambaſſador reſident, and ſent to that end; who hath given me by his Letters great encouragement and hopes of a real and true proceeding in this buſineſs, agreeable to divers Promiſes made unto him, which he accordingly hath informed his own Maſter; I was very glad of this honourable function, and hoped to have found as ready performance as is by his Majeſty and all the World expected.

To this end I am come to the Port, with full Power and Inſtructions from his Majeſty and the Republick of Poland, to conclude and finiſh a full and perpetual Peace, with all ſincerity and heartineſs; and in his Majeſties Name to ſwear the ſame; offering to be Friend to the Friends, and Enemy to the Enemies of this Imperial Port reciprocally, and to be ready to treat and accommodate all or any other Circumſtances incident to a buſineſs of ſo great Conſequence.

Since my arrival, notwithſtanding that I have produced both the mentioned Treaty at Chotyn, and Letters how little I have advanced in the main Affairs, and the doubtful Conſequences of a long protraction. I deſire you to conſider, having as yet proceeded no further in ſubſtance, than the delivery of my Letters and Preſents; and to that end, that there may never be imputed to the King and Republick of Poland any ſlackneſs in preſent, or any breach in future, out of a ſincere and good deſire to eſtabliſh this Treaty ſure and firm, and to open a clear and true Heart, I am enforced to make this true Declaration; and deſire your Excellency to weigh maturely the motives following.

I do not repine at mine own ſtay at this Imperial Port, where I receive all Honour; I do not doubt of the ſincere and faithful meaning of the Empire to conclude the Peace; but the deferring hereof may, againſt our Wills, breed three Inconveniencies.

Firſt, your Excellency doth know, that the Coſſacks are a People not eaſily to be reſtrained, if they be once at Liberty, and that they live upon their Arms. They have ready eight hundred Boats to make an Invaſion into the Black Sea. In the Winter they cannot move; they attend only the advice of the Concluſion of Peace; therefore now is the ſeaſon to finiſh and publiſh it; for if by long delays it ſhall be deferred unto the Spring, and that Jealouſie or their own deſire ſet them free, your Excellency doth know in Wiſdom how difficult it is to reduce into order a People of that Condition, which for our parts we are now able and ready to prevent; the State having ordained to ſatisfie them, and to buy their Boats upon the firſt intimation of a Concluſion.

Secondly, it is the order of our Nation every Spring to call a Parliament for the relegement of all publick Affairs; of which aſſembly I am a Member; if I ſhall be ſtaied here, and not able to render a reaſon thereof, it will breed great ſuſpition and diſturbance in the general Reſolution; you may conſider, that in all parts there are ſome unadviſed Men, Friends of Sedition and War, and many that make advantage of others Troubles, who may do ill Offices, ſuch as the innocent may be ſorry for but cannot help.

Thirdly, the Eyes of all Princes are ſet upon the Honour and Faith kept on both parts in this Treaty, and accordingly will govern their own Occaſions.

For theſe Reaſons I do in his Majeſties Name deſire your Excellency to give me a diſtatch, ſuch as may bring Joy and Content to all, by avoiding the Miſeries of War; and in ſuch time, that the Snows and Diſcommodities of Winter ſhut me not up; but that I may return as well to ſatisfie his Majeſty and the Republick in our general Aſſembly, as to retain thoſe, who may be cauſe of much trouble, without our Conſents.

There is no Difficulty that I underſtand; I am content to accept the antient and honourable Treaties made with the famous Emperour Solyman and his Succeſſors, and now laſtly at Chotyn; if there be any other difference, I have Power, and am ready to accommodate it.

My deſire then only is, That a preſent End and Concluſion be made of a Peace, firm, and perpetual; and that the Emperour will be pleaſed, according to many promiſes, to deliver and ſet free the Captives taken in the laſt Wars; as I do in his Majeſties Name give my Word that all others taken on our parts ſhall have Liberty and Paſport to return. And if there have been any Difficulty made by occaſion of my preſſure for the rejection of Tomſha, and Cante-Emir-Emirze, I do make this true Proteſtation, That as it is the Requeſt of his Majeſty, my King, in Friendſhip, ſo there is no other end nor cauſe of that deſire, but only to remove all occaſion of offence and breach with this Imperial Port, which thoſe ill Neighbours are ever ready to miniſter; But if that be any great Inconvenience to this Imperial Port, I only then ſeek, that better order may be taken with them for the future, that they may live quietly without offence of the publick Peace.

> I deſire your Excellency to weigh and conſider theſe my Reaſons and Proteſtations, which proceed only from a good and ſincere Heart, to promote and maintain an inviolable and good Friendſhip with this Imperial Port.

Within two days after, the Duke of Sbaraskie took his leave of the Emperour, to the great Joy of himſelf and his Train, who thereby ſaw themſelves delivered out of Captivity. The three great and noble Priſoners were ſet free, and did make a publick acknowledgement of his Majeſty of Great Britains Favour, to whom both the Ambaſſador and they attributed the beſt part of their good Succeſs, and gave particular Thanks by Letter.

Articles Contracted between the Grand Seignior and the King of Poland.

HIS Majeſty of Poland, having ſent into our happy Port his well deſerving and famous great Ambaſſador, the moſt Illuſtrious Duke of Sbaraskie, to offer us ſincere Peace, loyal Friendſhip, and good Correſpondence, and to ſeek that the antient Peace and Friendſhip ſhould be of us anew confirmed, and the old Capitulations renewed, and that for the time to come there might be eſtabliſhed an eternal Peace and Friendſhip: His Kingly inſtance hath been moſt pleaſing to us, and the Peace and Friendſhip of us accepted; and we have ordained, That all the antient Treaties ſhall be renewed, and at the preſent have given this our Capitulation with the following Articles.

FIrſt, That never upon our part, nor of any of our Viſiers, Beglerbeghs, Beghs, Cadees, Officers, nor Souldiers, any harm ſhall be done to the Provinces, Cities, Caſtles, Towns, Villages, and other Places pertaining to the King and State of Poland. And likewiſe upon the part of his Majeſty of Poland, that by his Princes, Miniſters, or Coſſack, nor any other his Subjects, there ſhall be no wrong done in any part of our Empire, City, Caſtle, Town, or Village, but that both parties ſhall always remain Friends to Friends, and Enemies to Enemies.

II. And ſeeing that the Tartars of Dobrirza, Biaolograd, Kcil, Ozu, and Siliſtra, and the People of Moldavia, do enter, invade, and damniſie the State of Poland; We command, that for the time to come, our Beglerbeghs of Siliſtra, and all other Beglerbeghs of Bender, ſhall take care to keep all thoſe Paſſages and Rivers, to the end that hereafter the ſaid Nations ſhall have no paſſage by thoſe ways to damniſie the State of Poland; and whenſoever it ſhall be known that the ſaid Miniſters have uſed Negligence in keeping thoſe Paſſages, according to the Treaty with Sultan Solyman, of happy Memory, that ſuch Miniſters be degraded and ſeverely puniſhed.

III. The Vayvod of Moldavia likewiſe ſhall never grant any Paſſage to the ſaid Nations; and whenſoever it ſhall be known that the ſaid Vayvod hath tranſgreſſed in this our Will, he ſhall be degraded and ſeverely puniſhed.

IV. And whenſoever the ſaid Tartars and others, contrary to this our Will, ſhall make any Invaſion or Spoil in the State of Poland, all our Miniſters and Governours ſhall apprehend and ſeverely puniſh them; and, as it is ſet down in the Agreements with Sultan Solyman, all the Slaves and Priſoners which ſhall by ſuch Malefactors be brought into our Dominions, ſhall be ſet at Liberty, and their Goods reſtored to them again, and the Malefactors puniſhed for having tranſgreſſed our Imperial Capitulations.

V. And if any of our Subjects ſhall buy any Perſon or Poliſh Goods, unjuſtly taken by ſuch Malefactors, and it ſhall be made known unto us by the King of Poland; the buyers, for having bought unlawful Goods, their Eſtate ſhall be confiſcate, and they themſelves ſeverely puniſhed.

VI. The Prince Chrim Tartar ſhall be obedient to us, and all the Tartarian Nation under his Command. Kalgha Sultan, and other Emirs and Princes of his Blood, from henceforth ſhall never enter into, nor invade any part of the State of Poland, nor ever do any Dammage, either by the way of Moldavia, the open Field or Deſart, nor ſhall ever enter into or invade any part or juriſdiction of the ſame. And at all times that his Majeſty of Poland ſhall give notice, That the ſaid Prince, or others above mentioned, have broken this our Will and Capitulations, and entered and damnified his State; for their Diſobedience, the ſaid Prince, as well as the others, ſhall be by us puniſhed and chaſtiſed; and we command, that never any one, in any part of our Dominion, ſhall ſell either People or Goods robbed from the State of Poland; and finding that there be any one that hath dared to buy Men or Goods, robbed from them, ſuch ſhall be immediately puniſhed with confiſcation. And, as before mentioned, the Beglerbeghs of Siliſtria, with all Diligence ſhall keep the Straights of Oſue, and never ſuffer the ſaid People to paſs; and if it ſhall be known they have tranſgreſſed, they ſhall be puniſhed with loſs of their Charge and Office.

VII. And whenſoever the ſaid Prince Chrim Tartar, or his Kalka, Emirze, or others, ſhall by our order be called and commanded in their proper Perſons to go to any part of the War in our Service, if by chance they ſhould paſs by the Confines of Poland, as it is ſet down in the Capitulations of my Father of happy Memory, They ſhall not enter into any Village, Borough, Caſtle, or City of Polonia, or do any kind of dammage to the People thereof; and finding that they have given any moleſtation or hurt, they ſhall be corrected, as is aforeſaid.

VIII. And in Conformity of my Fathers ſaid Capitulation, every time that his Majeſty of Poland ſhall invite invite and call the ſaid Prince Chrim Tartar in his Occaſion of War, whilſt he giveth him his annual ſtipend, the ſaid Prince with all his Forces and Army, ſhall go help and aſſiſt his Majeſty in every ſuch Occaſion, and ſhew all Friendſhip and Sincerity; to which effect we have given order, that our Imperial Letters be written to the ſaid Prince, in this particular, who ſhall obſerve all according to our Will and Pleaſure.

IX. And for the better eſtabliſhing of this our Peace and Amity according to the antient Capitulations and Obſervance, his Majeſty of Poland promiſeth to ſend his Great Ambaſſador to the ſaid Prince of Tartars; and (beginning from this preſent, the 24th of the Month of June) to pay yearly to the ſaid Prince his accuſtomed ſtipend in this form following. Every year his Majeſty ſhall ſend the ſaid ſtipend into the Caſtle of Chotyn in Moldavia, and the Vayvod thereof ſhall certiſie the ſaid Prince Chrim, who ſhall preſently ſend his Ambaſſador to receive the ſame, by the hands of the Vayvod. The which Prince ſhall always obſerve this form, and ſhall be always obedient to this our Imperial Will.

X. And in caſe that his Majeſty of Poland ſhould fail any year to ſend the ſaid ſtipend, the Prince Tartar ſhall not ſuddenly riſe with his Army and invade Poland; but, according to the agreements of Sultan Solyman, continuing ſtill in his Obedience, he ſhall certiſie us, and we will procure and recover his right.

XI. His Majeſty of Poland doth promiſe, that from henceforward the Coſſacks ſhall not enter nor come into any part of our Empire by the Rivers of Oſue or any other, nor make any ſpoil therein; and if the ſaid Coſſacks do enter into any part of our Dominions and do any hurt, we certifying his Majeſty by our Imperial Letters, he promiſeth to correct them ſeverely, and to put to death the Maleſactors for breaking the Capitulations, and violating the Peace and Amity.

XII. And all our Subjects which ſhall be made Slaves, and impriſoned by the ſaid Coſſacks, ſhall be immediately ſet at liberty; and the Miniſters of his Majeſty ſhall always be diligent to puniſh the Tranſgreſſors, and wholly reſtore thoſe Perſons and Goods which they ſhall have taken from our ſaid Subjects, and that never any Subject of the King of Poland ſhall buy any ſtollen Goods; and if any have preſumed and bought, that he be ſeverely puniſhed; and in general all that which we have promiſed concerning the Tartars and Moldavians, ſo his Majeſty alſo doth promiſe to us for the Coſſacks and other his Subjects.

XIII. After the Concluſion of this Peace, if upon the Confines or open Fields, Fiſhers or Hunters on either part meeting together, ſhall happen to fall out, or be at difference by their own Occaſion, it ſhall be no diſturbance to this our Peace and Amity.

XIV. Always, according to the antient Agreements, the Princes or Vayvods of Moldavia, ſhall ſhew to his Majeſty of Poland all due Reverence and reſpect, good Amity and Neighbourhood; and ſeeing that the ſaid Vayvods have ever been as it were Inſtruments of Preſervation, or of the breach of the Peace; therefore we command, that for the time to come, neither the ſaid Vayvods, nor other of our Beglerbeghs or Miniſters, ſhall build in thoſe Confines any new Caſtle, Fort, or Bridge; and that in thoſe Caſtles or Forts of thoſe Frontiers which are already built, there ſhall never any other Garriſons be kept but Moldavians; and according to the antient Capitulations, the Tartars ſhall not inhabit, dwell, or till within thoſe Confines, of both Nations.

XV. And to the end this Peace and Amity may be always kept between us, we ſwear by the Name of God, and aſſure by this our Imperial Article, that all the Ambaſſadors, great or inferiour, which ſhall be ſent from us to his Majeſty, or thoſe great or leſs which ſhall be ſent from his Majeſty to us, ſhall always be ſafe and ſecure, as well in their coming as their return; and that there ſhall never be need of any other paſport, but that they ſhall be of us by all ways honoured and well received.

XVI. Concerning Merchants, Paſſengers, and other Polack Negotiators, they ſhall always come ſafely and ſecurely by Sea and Land into all the parts of our Empire; and for Cuſtoms, Tolls, and other Duties of their Merchandiſe, and in caſe of Debt, Credit, Saretiſhip, and ſuch other like Accidents concerning the courſe of Juſtice and Law, we command that it ſhall be always obſerved according to the Agreements with our Father of happy Memory, Sultan Achmat. Which Articles we at this preſent accept and confirm, ratiſie, and command that they be of all our Subjects for ever punctually obeyed and obſerved.

XVII. Furthermore we promiſe, and in the Name of God ſwear, to obſerve and maintain for ever all thoſe Covenants and Articles agreed upon and written in our Capitulations, by our Great Grandfather, Grandfather, and Father, and never to diſannul any of them.

XVIII. And whereas to ſhew greater deſire of Sincerity concerning this Peace, his Majeſty of Poland hath ſought of us by his ſaid great Ambaſſador, that the Subjects of Poland may ſafely and ſecurely come by the River of Turla with divers Merchandiſe, and ſell, buy, and traffick in Ackirman, which traffick being uſed, will be of great benefit to both Eſtates. We ordain and command from henceforward, that the ſaid Nation may come and negotiate ſafely and ſecurely in the ſaid Ackirman. And to the end that this buſineſs be eſtabliſhed and concluded in a good manner, we will give order to our Ambaſſador, whom we intend to ſend ſhortly to his Majeſty for the ratification thereof.

XIX. Which preſent Articles, Capitulations, Peace, Amity, League, and Correſpondence, by the Grace of God we promiſe undoubtedly to maintain ſo long as we live in this World; and do hereby conclude between us and our Poſterity, and the King and State of Polonia, an everlaſting Peace; Sealing it and confirming it with theſe Words, Friends to Friends, and Enemies to Enemies.

Some of the Capitulations of Peace altered by the Turks.

Notwithſtanding all this, after the Duke was departed one days Journey, where he ſtayed to receive the Treaty ſigned, they altered ſome of the Articles to their own advantage, without his Knowledge. Which when he heard, he complained anew by his Letters to the Port of the abuſe offered unto him, and made haſte rather to eſcape than return. But the Coſſacks at the ſame time being ſtirred about the Black Sea, the Viſier and State (having nothing more in care than to ſhut up that back port, whereby they ſuffered much loſs and Diſhonour, and could not revenge it upon a fugitive People: which divided their Naval Army, being forced to ſend a portion of Gallies to defend the Trade, the beſt part of relief of the City of Conſtantinople coming from thoſe Coaſts) reſolved to give content to the Poles, and to aſſure the Peace; that they might with more Security attend their Affairs in Aſia and Hungary; which Action was favoured vehemently by the preſent Viſier. To which end, he ſent anſwer into Poland, with Promiſes of Faith, and Reparation for the Injuries committed by the Tartars; laying the fault of miſwriting the Treaty upon the Chancellor, which though they amended not, yet they did explain and interpret; and for better eſtabliſhment and ſecurity on their behalfs of the Peace, they reſolved to depoſe Jehan-Beg, Prince of Tartaria, and ſent Mechmet Gheray his Couſin German, and firſt of the Blood, late Priſoner in the Rhodes, to take Poſſeſſion of his Dominion; who undertook to quiet and reſtrain that People; which he cauſed to be ſignified to Poland, that the King might ſee theſe alterations were only for the full ſecurity of the Peace on their ſide, that the Pole might take the like courſe with the Coſſacks, who were not as yet reclaimed.

Treaty The

The Souldiers ſtill continue in their Fury.

The Souldiers continued ſtill in their height of Fury and Madneſs, and thoſe that were to go upon the Gallies for the defence of the Black Sea and other Deſigns, being ready to depart, robbed, ſlew, brake Houſes in the Face of the Magiſtrate in the open day: What was it not lawful for them to do that had ſlain their King, and made and deſtroied the great Miniſters at their Will and Pleaſure, as their Stewards and Servants? and God did ſo blind them, that they ſhould not ſee, that they digged up their own roots, and were made by God the blind inſtruments of their own Ruine. The Mint alſo was removed into the Seraglio, where was brought forth all the Saddles, Bridles, Stirrops, that had any Gold or Silver upon them, with all old Plate, to make Money to patch up a quiet, and to ſatisfie and content the Souldiers, and all little enough for the preſent to ſave the City from a total ſack.

The Ambaſſadors of the Prince of Tranſilvania departed from the Port.

The Ambaſſadors of the Prince of Tranſilvania, having changed their Stile of excuſing a firm Peace with the Emperour by the change of the Viſier, and finding the Opportunity of a Friend now in place to aid their Prince, they negotiated new matter, aſſuring the Port, that by the troubles of Germany a fair occaſion was given to recover Hungary, and to ſet the Crown upon their Maſters Head; and that therefore if the Grand Seignior would be pleaſed to grant unto their Prince the aid of the Græcian Army, that he would make another attempt to weaken the greateſt Enemy of that Empire, which they eaſily obtaining (the ignorance and avarice of the Turk opening a way to credulity which was the conſtant advantage of Gabor, who could conquer both their Underſtandings and Forces to his own ends) being in all fully ſatisfied, they departed the twentieth of April. Which Reſolution of the Port was much wondered at by all wiſe men, who knew how unfit the Turk was at that preſent for a War. The Prince was then at Caſſovia, expecting the iſſue of his Ambaſſage, and in hope of Turkiſh Aid; which being granted and gathered upon his frontier, and joyned at laſt with his own Forces, his whole Army was not very great, nor had he any Cannon to march withal to beſiege any place; his chiefeſt truſt conſiſting in his Intelligence in Hungary, where he expected a general revolt, and that all the Garriſons would open to him, or at leaſt ſome diverſion in Sileſia (which he was promiſed) facilitate his ways; and he was not in deſpair, that upon the firſt appearance of an Army, Moravia, by the favour of the Count of Tourn and his Friends, would follow the ſame Example; and this was the deſign which his Ambaſſadors had ſo long ſollicited at the Port, and diſſembled at their firſt coming. Now there was nothing expected but a War; but not long after there arrived a new Ambaſſador from the Prince, without any mention of the Affairs of thoſe parts; which made all men inquiſitive, thinking he was either come to haſten the Succours, or to change ſomething in the manner and other Circumſtances depending thereon; but it was found that the States of Tranſilvania had aſſembled at Alba-Julia, and were very loth to entertain a War, or to break with the Emperour; and therefore diſpeeded two Commiſſioners towards him, who were well received and treated at Vienna; and from the Emperour was ſent to Tranſilvania the Biſhop of Nitria. Whereupon a new Peace was treated, and this Ambaſſador ſent to procure the recall of the former Commands given to the Baſſaes to move with their Armies. Whereby it was ſuſpected he never had any purpoſe to make a War, but only to ballance by the continuance thereof his Fears and laſt Agreements with the Emperour.

The Baſſa of Arzirum in Rebellion.

All Men prophecied (by reaſon of daily Diſorders) the fall of the Ottoman Empire. But now the Baſſa of Arzirum, who was joyned with divers others, and had made a great Army, was in his march toward Angria, the direct way to Conſtantinople (Babylon yet reſting in Rebellion) with a pretence of Reformation; who took nothing by force but the Treaſure of the Empire. He held a general Council in his Camp, and ſent to the Port to require the Preſence of the Mufti, Cadees, Baſſaes, and antient Beghs, to take knowledge and to puniſh the Traitors that murthered the late King, and to ſettle a new one lawfully that ſhould be able to govern; to reduce the mutined City-Souldier to Obedience and Diſcipline, and to place about the Emperour ſome Great Viſier, choſen by the State, able to direct and apply Remedies to the Diſeaſes then grown to a Chryſis; complaining, that every three or four Months, by the change of the Viſier, the Provinces were deſtroyed, (for they placed and diſplaced the Governours according to their own Factions) and ſo contrary orders were ſent abroad daily, inſomuch as no man knew who was King or Viſier, nor whom they ſhould obey. Theſe were his Pretences, and if the preſent State would not conſent to this Aſſembly, he then reſolved to come to the Port, and ſettle all things at his Pleaſure by the Sword. The great Officers in poſſeſſion of the Empire and Government, loth to be called to an account by the Souldier, took a worſe Reſolution, To make a War; and made choice of Cigala Baſſa for General; which he refuſed upon the ſame pretence, that in his abſence alterations would be ſo frequent; and that he ſhould not pleaſe, or at leaſt uncertainly, and according to Interpretation. Therefore he would have an abſolute Dictatorſhip for the time, equal to that of a great Viſier, or elſe he would not ſtir. This was granted him, and money given out, and order to paſs the Water ſpeedily; inrolling for his Army fifteen thouſand Janizaries, and thirty thouſand Spahies. But thoſe did demur, and alledged it was a War againſt their own Brethren, and ſought any Excuſes rather than to come to blows. But the ſecret was, it was then Ramazan, or their Holy Lent, at the end of which they were to receive their Pay; and therefore they would not move, but pretended Religion. Next day after their Feaſt, when they ſhould march, they ſhewed themſelves in their Colours, (having firſt held many Conſultations) and would not march at all, unleſs the Emperour or Great Viſier would go in Perſon. So every day brought forth new ſubject of Trouble, and the Empire to a great deal of hazard and danger.

A
GREATNESS
TURKISH EMPIRE:

As alſo wherein the greateſt Strength thereof conſiſteth; and of what Power the bordering Princes, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, are in Compariſon of it.

By RICHARD KNOLLES.

THE Hiſtory of the Turks (being indeed nothing elſe but the true Record of the woful Ruines of the greater part of the Chriſtian Common-weal) thus, as before paſſed through, and at length brought to an end; and their Empire (of all others now upon Earth far the greateſt) as a proud Champion ſtill ſtanding up as it were in defiance of the whole World: I thought it good for the Concluſion of this my Labour, to propoſe unto the view of the zealous Chriſtian, the Greatneſs thereof; and ſo near as I could to ſet down the Bounds and Limits within the which it is (by the goodneſs of God) as yet contained, together with the Strength and Power thereof, as alſo in what regard it hath the Neighbour Princes bordering or confining upon it, with ſome other Particularities tending unto the ſame purpoſe. All or moſt part thereof, although it be by the conſiderate well to be gathered out of the whole courſe of the Hiſtory before going, yet ſhall it more plainly here together in the full thereof appear, than by the long and particular conſideration of the riſing and increaſe thereof be perceived; not much unlike the overgrown Tree, at the greatneſs whereof every man wondereth, no man in the mean time either perceiving or marking how by little and little in tract of time it grew up to that bigneſs, as now to overtop all the reſt of the Wood. The Imperial Seat of this ſo great and dreadful an Empire, is the moſt famous City of Conſtantinople, ſometime the Glory of the Greek Empire, but now the Place where Achmat, the firſt of that Name, and fourteenth of the Othoman Emperours, acknowledging no man like unto himſelf, triumpheth over many Nations; a City fatally founded to command, and by the great Conqueror Tamerlane, of all others thought to be the beſt ſeated for the Empire of the World. In which City (taken from the Chriſtians by Mahomet the ſecond, by the Turks ſirnamed the Great, and the Greek Empire by him ſubverted) as the Othoman Emperours have ever ſince ſeated themſelves, ſo have they wonderfully, even to the aſtoniſhment of the World, out of the Ruines of that ſo glorious a State, increaſed both their Strength and Empire, almoſt altogether fixed even in the ſelf ſame Kingdoms, Countries, and Regions, as was ſometimes that; though not as yet (God be thanked) able to attain to the uttermoſt bounds that that Empire ſometimes had, eſpecially in Europe, albeit that it hath oftentimes in pride thereof moſt mightily ſwoln, and in ſome few places thereof ſomewhat alſo exceeded the ſame. Amongſt the reſt of the Othoman Emperours, this great Monarch of whom we ſpeak (namely Achmat the firſt, which now reigneth in that moſt ſtately and Imperial City) hath at this preſent under his Command and Empire, the chief and moſt fruitful parts of the three firſt known parts of the World; only America remaining free from him, not more happy with the rich Mines thereof, than in that it is ſo far from out of his reach. For in Europe he hath all the Sea-Coaſt from the Confines of Epidaurus (the uttermoſt bound of his Empire in Europe Weſtward) unto the mouth of the River Tanais, now called Don, with whatſoever lieth betwixt Buda in Hungary, and the Imperial City of Conſtantinople; in which ſpace is comprehended the better part of Hungary, all Boſna, Servia, Bulgaria, with a great part of Dalmatia, Epirus, Macedonia, Græcia, Peloponneſus, Thracia, the Archipelago, with the rich Iſlands contained therein. In Affrica he poſſeſſeth all the Sea Coaſt from Veléz (or as ſome call it Belis) De Gomera, or more truly to ſay, from the River Mulvia (the bounder of the Kingdom of Fez) even unto the Arabian Gulf, or Red Sea, Eaſtward; except ſome few Places upon the Rivage of the Sea, holden by the King of Spain; viz. Merſalcabir, Melilla, Oran, and Pennon; and from Alexandria Northward unto the City of Aſna, called of old Siene, Southward; in which ſpace are contained the famous Kingdoms of Tremizen, Algiers, Tunes, and Ægypt, with divers other great Cities and Provinces. In Aſia all is his from the Streights

The bounds of the Turks Empire in Europe, Affrica, and Aſia;

of Helleſpontus Weſtward, unto the great City of Tauris Eaſtward; and from Derbent, near unto the Caſpian Sea Northward, unto Adena upon the Gulf of Arabia Southward. The greatneſs of this his Empire may the better be conceived by the greatneſs of ſome parts thereof; the Meere of Meotis, which is all at the Turkiſh Emperours command, being in compaſs a thouſand miles; and the Euxine or Black-Sea in circuit two thouſand and ſeven hundred; and the Mediterranean Coaſt, which is ſubject unto him, containing in compaſs about eight thouſand miles. But to ſpeak of his whole Territory together; he goeth in his own Dominion from Tauris to Buda, about three thouſand two hundred miles. The like diſtance is from Derbent unto Adena. From Balſera upon the Perſian Gulf unto Tremiſena in Barbary, are accounted little leſs than four thouſand miles. He hath alſo in the Sea the moſt noble Iſlands of Cyprus, Eubœa, Rhodus, Samos, Chios, Lesbos, and others of the Archipelago. In this ſo large and ſpacious an Empire are contained many great and large Countries, ſometime moſt famous Kingdoms, abounding with all manner of worldly Bleſſings and Natures ſtore: For what Kingdom or Country is more fruitful than Ægypt, Siria, and a great part of Aſia? What Country more wealthy or more plentiful of all good things, than was ſometime Hungary, Gracia and Thracia? In which Countries he hath alſo many rich and famous Cities, but eſpecially four, which be greateſt for Wealth and Trade; namely, Conſtantinople, Caire, Aleppo, and Tauris. Conſtantinople, for multitude of People, exceedeth all the Cities of Europe; wherein are deemed to be above ſeven hundred thouſand Men; which if it be ſo, is almoſt equal to two ſuch Cities as Paris in France. Aleppo is the greateſt City of Syria, and, as it were the centre whereunto all the Merchandiſe of Aſia repair. Tauris, of late the Royal Seat of the Perſian Kings, and one of the greateſt Cities of that Kingdom, from whom it was in this our Age taken by Amurath the Third, hath in it above two hundred thouſand Men. Caire, amongſt all the Cities of Affrica is the chief, leaving all others far behind it, (although that ſome make the City of Cano equal unto it in greatneſs) being as it were the Store-houſe, not of Ægypt onely, and of a great part of Affrica, but of India alſo; the Riches whereof being brought by the Red-Sea to Sues, and from thence upon Camels to Caire, and ſo down the River Nilus to Alexandria, are thence diſperſed into theſe Weſtern Parts; albeit, that this rich Trade hath of late time been much impaired, and ſo like more to be; the Chriſtians (eſpecially the Portugals) trafficking into the Eaſt-Indies, and by the vaſt Ocean tranſporting the rich Commodities of thoſe Eaſtern Countries into the Weſt, to the great hinderance of the Grand Seignior's Cuſtoms in Caire.

The four chief Cities for Trade in the Turks Empire.

The Othoman Government meer tyrannical.

The Othoman Government in this his ſo great an Empire, is altogether like the Government of the Maſter over his Slave, and indeed meer tyrannical; for the Great Sultan is ſo abſolute a Lord of all things within the compaſs of his Empire, that all his Subjects and People, be they never ſo great, do call themſelves his Slaves and not his Subjects; neither hath any man power over himſelf, much leſs is he Lord of the Houſe wherein he dwelleth, or of the Land which he tilleth, except ſome few Families in Conſtantinople, to whom ſome few ſuch things were by way of reward, and upon eſpecial favour given by Mahomet the Second, at ſuch time as he won the ſame. Neither is any man in that Empire ſo great, or yet ſo far in favour with the Great Sultan, as that he can aſſure himſelf of his Life, much leſs of his preſent Fortune or State, longer than it pleaſeth the Sultan. In which ſo abſolute a Sovereignty (by any free born People not to be endured) the Tyrant preſerveth himſelf by two moſt eſpecial means; firſt, by taking off all Arms from his natural Subjects; and then by putting the ſame and all things elſe concerning the State and Government thereof into the Hands of the Apoſtata, or Renegade Chriſtians, whom for the moſt part every third, fourth, or fifth Year, (or oftner, if his need ſo require) he taketh in their Child-hood, from their miſerable Parents, as his Tenths or Tribute Children; whereby he gaineth two great Commodities: Firſt, For that in ſo doing he ſpoileth the Provinces he moſt feareth, of the flower, ſinews, and ſtrength of the People, choice being ſtill made of the ſtrongeſt Youths, and fitteſt for War; then, for that with theſe, as with his own Creatures, he armeth himſelf, and by them aſſureth his State; for they, in their Childhood, taken from their Parents Laps, and delivered in Charge to one or other appointed for that purpoſe, quickly, and before they are aware, become Mahometans; and ſo no more acknowledging Father or Mother, depend wholly on the Great Sultan; who, to make uſe of them, both feeds them and foſters them, at whoſe hands onely they look for all things, and whom alone they thank for all. Of which Fry, ſo taken from their Chriſtian Parents, (the only Seminary of his Wars) ſome become Horſe-men, ſome Foot-men, and ſo in time the greateſt Commanders of his State and Empire, next unto himſelf; the natural Turks, in the mean time, giving themſelves wholly unto the Trade of Merchandiſe, and other their Mechanical Occupations; or elſe to the feeding of Cattel, their moſt ancient and natural Vocation, not intermedling at all with matters of Government or State. So that if unto theſe his Souldiers, all of the Chriſtian Race, you joyn alſo his Fleet and Money, you have as it were the whole ſtrength of his Empire; for in theſe four, his Horſe-men, his Foot-men, his Fleet and Money, eſpecially conſiſteth his great Force and Power: whereof to ſpeak more particularly, and firſt concerning his Money. It is commonly thought, that his ordinary Revenue exceedeth not eight millions of Gold; and albeit, that it might ſeem, that he might of ſo large an Empire receive a far greater Revenue, yet doth he not, for that both he and his Men of War (in whoſe power all things are) have their greateſt and almoſt onely care upon Arms, fitter by nature to waſte and deſtroy Countries, than to preſerve and inrich them; inſomuch that for the preſervation of their Armies, and furtherance of their Expeditions, (every year to do) they moſt grievouſly ſpoil even their own People and Provinces whereby they paſs, ſcarce leaving them Neceſſaries wherewith to live; ſo that the Subjects, deſpairing to enjoy the Fruits of the Earth, much leſs the Riches which by their Induſtry and Labour they might get unto themſelves, do now no farther endeavour themſelves either to Husbandry or Traffick than they needs muſt, yea, than very neceſſity it ſelf inforceth them. For to what end availeth it to ſow that another man muſt reap? or to reap that which another man is ready to devour? Whereupon it cometh, that in the Territories of the Othoman Country, yea, even in the moſt fruitful Countries of Macedonia and Greece, are ſeen great Foreſts, all every where waſte, few Cities well peopled, and the greateſt part of thoſe Countries lying deſolate and deſart; ſo that Huſbandry (in all well-ordered Common-wealths the Prince's greateſt ſtore) decaying, the Earth neither yieldeth her Increaſe unto the painful Huſbandman, neither he matter unto the Artificer,

The means whereby the Turkiſh Emperours preſerve themſelves in ſo abſolute a Sovereignty.

Four things wherein the greateſt ſtrength of the Othoman Empire conſiſteth.

The Turks ordinary Revenues, and why they are no greater.

neither the Artificer Wares to furniſh the Merchant with, all together with the Plough running into ruine and decay. As for the Trade of Merchandiſe, it is almoſt all in the hands of the Jews, or the Chriſtians of Europe, viz. the Raguſians, Venetians, Genowaies, French, or Engliſh; the natural Turks having therein the leaſt to do, holding in that their ſo large an Empire no other famous Cities for Trade, more than the four above named, viz. Conſtantinople, Tauris, Aleppo, and Caire; whereunto may be added, Caffa, and Theſſalonica in Europe; Damaſcus, Tripolis, and Aden in Aſia; Alexandria and Algiers in Affrick. In our Countries here in this Weſt part of Europe, of the abundance of People oftentimes ariſeth Dearth; but in many parts of the Turks Dominions, for want of Men to manure the Ground; moſt part of the poor Country People, drawn from their own dwellings, being inforced with Victuals and other Neceſſaries to follow their great Armies in their long Expeditions, of whom ſcarce one of ten ever return home to their dwellings again, there by the way periſhing, if not by the Enemies Sword, yet by the wants, the intemperateneſs of the Air, or immoderate pains taking. But to come nearer unto our purpoſe; Although the great Turks ordinary Revenues be no greater than is aforeſaid, yet are his extraordinary eſcheats to be greatly accounted of, eſpecially his Confiſcations, Forfeitures, Fines, Amerciaments (which are right many) his Tributes, Cuſtoms, Tyths and Tenths of all Preys taken by Sea or Land, with divers other ſuch like, far exceeding his ſtanding and certain Revenue; his Baſſaes and other his great Officers like ravening Harpies as it were ſucking out the Blood of his poor Subjects, and heaping up ineſtimable Treaſures, which for the moſt part fall again into the Grand Seignior's Coffers. Ibrahim Viſier Baſſa (who lived not long ſince) is ſuppoſed to have brought with him from Caire to the value of ſix millions; and Mahomet, another of the Viſiers, was thought to have had a far greater ſum. His Preſents alſo amount unto a great matter, for no Ambaſſador can come before him without great Gifts, no man is to hope for any commodious Office or Preferment without Money, no man may with Empty Hands come to the Preſence of him ſo great a Prince, either from the Province he had the charge of, or from any great Expedition he was ſent upon; neither unto ſo great and mighty a Prince are Trifles preſented. The Vayvods of Moldavia, Valachia, and Tranſilvania, before their late revolt, by Gifts preſerved themſelves in their Principalities, being almoſt daily changed, eſpecially in Valachia and Moldavia; for thoſe Honours were by the Grand Seignior ſtill given to them that would give moſt; who, to perform what they had offered, miſerably oppreſſed the People, and brought their Provinces into great Poverty. In brief, an eaſie thing it is for the great Tyrant to find Occaſion for him at his Pleaſure to take away any Mans Life, together with his Wealth, be it never ſo great; ſo that he cannot well be ſaid to lack Money ſo long as any of his Subjects have it. Nevertheleſs, the late Perſian War ſo emptied the moſt covetous Sultan Amurath's Coffers, and exhauſted his Treaſures, that all over his Empire the value of his Gold was beyond all credit enhanced, inſomuch that a Chequine was twice ſo much worth as before, beſide that, the Metal whereof his Gold and Silver was made was ſo embaſed, that it gave occaſion unto the Janizaries to ſet fire upon the City of Conſtantinople, to the great Terror, not of the vulgar ſort only, but of the Grand Seignior himſelf alſo. And in the City of Aleppo only were in the Name of the Great Sultan ſixty thouſand Chequines taken up in preſt of the Merchants there, which, how well they were repayed, we leave for them to report.

The Turks Caſualties more than his ordinary Revenue.

Now albeit that the Turks Revenues be not ſo great as the largeneſs of his Empire and the fruitfulneſs of his Countries might ſeem to afford, all the Soil being his own; yet hath he in his own Dominion a Commodity of far greater value and uſe than are the Revenues themſelves; which is, the Multitude of the Timariots or Penſioners, which are all Horſemen, ſo called of Timaro, that is, a ſtipend which they have of the Great Sultan, viz. the poſſeſſion of certain Villages and Towns, which they hold during their Life, and for which they ſtand bound for every threeſcore Duckets they have of yearly Revenue to maintain one Horſeman, either with Bow and Arrows, or elſe with Targuet and Launce; and that as well in time of Peace as War; for the Othoman Emperours take unto themſelves all ſuch Lands as they by the Sword win from their Enemies, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, all which they divide into Timars, or as we call them Commendams, which they give unto their Souldiers of good deſert for term of Life, upon Condition that they ſhall (as is aforeſaid) according to the proportion thereof keep certain Men and Horſes fit for ſervice always ready whenſoever they ſhall be caled upon; wherein conſiſteth the greateſt Policy of the Turks, and the ſureſt means for the Preſervation of their Empire. For if by this means the care of manuring the Ground were not committed unto the Souldiers, for the profit they hope thereof, but left in the hand of the plain painful Husbandman, all would in that ſo warlike an Empire lie waſte and deſolate; the Turks themſelves commonly ſaying, That whereſoever the Grand Seignior's Horſe ſetteth his Foot, the Graſs will grow no more there; meaning the Deſtruction that their Great Armies bring in all Places where they come. The Inſtitution of theſe Timariots, and the taking up of the Azamoglans, (for ſo they call thoſe Children which are taken up from their Chriſtian Parents to be brought up for Janizaries) are the two chief Pillars of the Turks Empire, and the ſtrength of their Wars; both which ſeem to be deviſed unto the imitation of the Romans, as are divers things more in the Turkiſh Government; for the Roman Emperours uſed their own Subjects in their Wars, and of them conſiſted the Prætorian Army, which never departed from the Emperours ſide, but were ſtill to guard his Perſon, as do the Janizaries the Great Turk. And in the Roman Empire Lands were given unto Souldiers of good deſert, for them to take the profit of during their Lives, in reward of their good Service and Valour, which were called Beneficia, and they which had them, Benificiarii, or as we term them Benefices, and beneficed Men. Alexander Severus granted unto ſuch Souldiers Heirs that might enjoy thoſe Lands and Commendams, upon condition alſo, That they themſelves ſhould ſerve as had their Fathers, otherwiſe not. Conſtantine the Great alſo gave unto his Captains that had well deſerved of him, certain Lands for them to live upon during the term of their Life. The like Fees in France, which they called Feuda, were of Temporaries made Perpetuities by theſe their late Kings. Theſe Timariot Horſemen in the Turkiſh Empire, ſerve to two great and moſt notable purpoſes; whereof the firſt is, That by them the Grand Seignior, as with a Bridle, keepeth the reſt of his Subjects in every part of his great Empire in awe, ſo that they cannot ſo ſoon move, but that they ſhall have theſe his Timariots as Faulcons in their Necks; for to that purpoſe they are diſperſed all over his Dominion and Empire.

The Turks Timariots of greater value than his Revenues.

The two chief Pillars of the Othoman Empire.

The great uſe of the Timariot Horſemen in the Turks Empire.

pire. The other uſe of them (and no leſs profitable than the former) is, for that out of them he is always able to draw into the Field an hundred and fifty thouſand Horſemen well armed, ready to go whitherſoever he ſhall command them; with all whom he is not at one farthing charge. Which ſo great a power of Horſemen cannot continually be maintained for leſs than fourteen Millions of Duckets yearly. Wherefore it is to be marvelled, that ſome, comparing the Turks Revenues with the Chriſtians, make no mention of this ſo great a part of the Othoman Emperour's Wealth and Strength, ſerving him firſt for the ſuppreſſing of all ſuch Tumults as might ariſe in his Empire, and then, as a moſt principal ſtrength of his continual Wars, always ready to ſerve him in his greateſt Expeditions. The number of theſe Timariot Horſe-men is now grown very great, taking increaſe together with the Turks Empire. It is reported, That Amurath the Third, Grandfather to Achmat that now reigneth, in his late Wars againſt the Perſian, ſubdued ſo much Territory as ſerved him to erect therein fourty thouſand Timariots; and appointed at Tauris a new Receit which was yearly worth unto him a million of Gold.

The number of the Timariots.

Theſe Timariots are in all accounted to be ſeven hundred and nineteen thouſand fighting Men; of whom two hundred and fifty ſeven thouſand have their Aboad and dwelling in Europe, and four hundred ſixty two thouſand in Aſia and Affrick.

The Spahi, Ulufagi, and Carapici, Seminaries of the great Offices in the Turks Empire.

Beſide theſe Timariots, the Grand Seignior had a great number of other Horſe-men alſo, unto whom he giveth Pay; which are his Spahi, Ulufagi, and Carapici of his Court, being indeed the Nurſeries and Seminaries of the great Officers and Governours of his Empire; for from among them are ordinarily choſen the Sanzacks, which afterwards, through their good deſerts, or the Sultan's great favour, become Viſiers, Beglerbegs, and Baſſaes, the chief Rulers of that ſo mighty a Monarchy.

The Acanzii.

He hath alſo ſtill in his Army a great multitude of other Horſe-men called Acanzii, being indeed but rural Clowns, yet for certain Priviledges which they have are bound to go unto the Wars, being even of the Turks themſelves accounted of ſmall worth or value in compariſon of the Timariots. He receiveth great Aid alſo from the Tartar in his Wars, as alſo from the Valachians and Moldavians, (until that now of late, by the Example of the Tranſilvanians, they have to the great benefit of the reſt of the Chriſtian Common wealth revolted from him) all which are to be accounted as the Romans Auxiliarii, that is to ſay, ſuch as come to aid and aſſiſt him. And thus much for his Horſe-men.

The Janizaries the ſecond ſtrength of the Turkiſh Empire.

Another great part of his ſtrength conſiſteth in his Foot-men, and eſpecially in his Janizaries; in whom two things are to be conſidered, their Nation and Dexterity in Arms. Concerning their Nation, ſuch of the Azamoglans as are born in Aſia are not ordinarily inrolled in the number of the Janizaries, but ſuch as are born in Europe; for they of Aſia are accounted more effeminate, as they have been always, more ready to fly than to fight; whereas the People of Europe have even in the Eaſt been accounted for better and more valiant Souldiers, having there, to their immortal Glory, ſet up the notable Trophies of their moſt glorious Victories. The Souldiers of Aſia be called Turks, after the name of their Nation, and not of their Country, (no Country being indeed ſo properly called) and they of Europe, Rumi, that is to ſay, Romani, or Romans; as the Country, eſpecially about Conſtantinople, is called by the name of Rum-Ili. that is, the Roman Country, as it was in ancient Time, of the notable Roman Colonies therein, known by the name of Romania.

What manner of Children are taken up to make Janizaries o.

Now, as concerning their Dexterity, ſuch male Children are culled out from the Chriſtians, as in whom appeareth the greateſt ſigns of Strength, Activity, and Courage; for theſe three Qualities are in a Souldier eſpecially required.

The Azamoglans are ſuch untrained Youths as are taken up to become Janizaries, but yet are not of their Order.

This choice is made every third Year, except neceſſity inforce it to be made ſooner, as it happened in the late Perſian War; wherein, not only oftener choice was made, but they were glad to uſe the Azamoglans alſo, a thing never before by them done; for thoſe Youths, the Children of Chriſtian Parents, being by them that have taken them up brought to Conſtantinople, are taken view of by the Aga of the Janizaries, who cauſeth to be regiſtred the name of the Youth, with the name of his Father and Country wherein he was born; which done, part of them are ſent into the leſſer Aſia, (now called Natolia) and other Provinces, where, learning the Turkiſh Language and Law, they are alſo infected with the Vices and Manners of them with whom they live, and ſo in ſhort time become true Mahometans.

The manner of their bringing up.

Another part of them, and thoſe of the moſt towardlieſt, is divided into Cloyſters, which the Grand Seignior hath at Conſtantinople and Pera, of whom the faireſt and moſt handſome are appointed for the Seraglio of the Great Sultan himſelf. All the time that theſe Youths, thus ſent abroad, live in the leſſer Aſia or other the Turks Provinces, they are not appointed to any certain Exerciſe, but ſtill kept buſied, ſome at Husbandry, ſome in Gardening, ſome in Building, ſome in other domeſtical Services, never ſuffered to be idle, but always occupied in painful Labour; where, after certain years they have been thus inured to labour and pains-taking, they are called thence into the Cloyſters of the Azamoglans, (for ſo they are called all the time untill they be inrolled into the number of the Janizaries) and are there delivered unto certain ſpecial Governours appointed to take charge of them; who keep them ſtill exerciſed in painful Work and Labour, intreating them evil enough, as well in their Dyet, as in their Apparel and Lodging; they ſleep together in large Rooms, like unto the Religious Dormitories, wherein are Lamps ſtill burning, and Tutors attending, without whoſe leave they may not ſtir out of their Places.

The daily Pay of the Janizaries and Spahi.

There they learn to ſhoot both in the Bow and Piece, the Uſe of the Scimitar, with many Feats of Activity; and being well trained in thoſe Exerciſes, are inrolled amongſt the Janizaries or Spahi, of whom, the Janizaries receive no leſs than five Aſpers, nor more than eight for their daily Pay, and the Spahi ten. Being recorded among the Janizaries, they are either ſent away into the Wars, or into ſome Garriſon, or elſe attend at the Court. Theſe laſt have for their Dwelling three great Places like unto three Monaſteries, in the City of Conſtantinople, there they live under their Governours to whom they are deputed, the younger with great obedience and ſilence ſerving the elder, in buying of things for them, in dreſſing their Meat, and ſuch like Services. They that be of one Seat or Calling, live together at one Table, and ſleep in long Walks. If any of them upon occaſion chance to lie all Night abroad without leave, the next Evening he is notably beaten, with ſuch Nurture and Diſcipline, that after his beating, he, like an Ape, kiſſeth the Governour's Hands that ſo corrected him.

The Janizaries Inſolent.

Theſe Janizaries have many large Privileges, are honoured, although they be moſt Inſolent, and are feared of all men, yea, even of the Great Sultan himſelf, who is ſtill glad to make fair weather with them. In their Expeditions or Travel, they rob the poor Chriſtians Cottages and Houſes, who muſt not ſay one word to the contrary. When they buy any thing they give for it but what they liſt themſelves; they can be judged by none but their Aga, neither can they be executed without danger of an Inſurrection; and therefore ſuch Execution is ſeldom done, and that very ſecretly. They have a thouſand Royalties; ſome of them are appointed to the keeping of Ambaſſadors ſent from foreign Princes; other ſome of them are aſſigned to accompany Strangers, Travellers, eſpecially them that be men of the better ſort, to the intent they may ſafely paſs in the Turks Dominions; for which Service they are commonly well rewarded. They have made choice of their Prince, namely of Selymus the Firſt, his Father Bajazet yet living; neither can any of the Turks Sultans account themſelves fully inveſted in the Imperial Dignity, or aſſured of their Eſtate, until they be by them approved and proclaimed. Every one of their Sultans at his firſt coming to the Empire doth give them ſome great Largeſs, and ſometime the better to pleaſe them, increaſeth alſo their Pay. In every great Expedition ſome of them go forth with their Aga, or his Lieutenant, and are the laſt of all that fight. There is no Office among the Turks that is more envied than the Office of the Aga of the Janizaries, for the greatneſs of his Authority and Command; onely he and the Beglerbeg of Græcia chuſe not their own Lieutenant, but have them nominated unto them by the Grand Seignior. Unto this great Man, the Aga of the Janizaries, nothing can portend a more certain Deſtruction than to be of them beloved; for then is he of the Great Sultan ſtraightway feared or miſtruſted, and ſo occaſion ſought for to take him out of the way. The number of the Janizaries of the Court is betwixt ten and fourteen thouſand. This Warlike Order of Souldiers is in theſe our days much imbaſed; for now natural Turks are taken in for Janizaries, as are alſo the People of Aſia; whereas in former times none were admitted into that Order but the Chriſtians of Europe onely; beſide that, they marry Wives alſo, contrary to their ancient Cuſtom, which is not now forbidden them. And becauſe of their long lying ſtill at Conſtantinople, (a City abounding with all manner of Pleaſure) they are become much more effeminate and ſlothful, but withal moſt Inſolent, or more truely to ſay, Intolerable. It is commonly reported, the Strength of the Turkiſh Empire to conſiſt in this Order of the Janizaries, which is not altogether ſo; for albeit that they be indeed the Turks beſt Foot-men, and ſureſt Guard of the Great Sultan's Perſon, yet undoubtedly the greateſt Strength of his State and Empire reſteth nothing ſo much in them, as in the great multitude of his Horſe-men, eſpecially his Timariots. Beſides theſe Janizaries, the Turkiſh Emperour hath a great number of baſe Foot-men, whom the Turks call Aſapi, better acquainted with the Spade than with the Sword, ſerving rather to the wearying of their Enemies with their multitude, than the vanquiſhing of them with their Valour; with whoſe dead Bodies the Janizaries uſe to fill up the Ditches of Towns beſieged, or to ſerve them for Ladders to climb over the Enemies Walls upon. But, as the Romans had both their old Legionary, and other untrained Souldiers, which they called Tirones; of whom, the firſt were the chief Strength of their Wars, and the other but as an Aid and Supply; even ſo the Turk accounteth his Timariot Horſe-men the ſtrength of his Army, and the Acanzii, (which is another ſort of baſe and common Horſe-men) but as an Acceſſory; and ſo amongſt his Foot-men he eſteemeth of his Janizaries, as did the Romans of their Prætorian Legions, but of his Aſapi, as of Shadows. The Janizaries are by none to be commanded more than by the Great Sultan himſelf, and their Aga; as for the Baſſaes, they regard them not much, but in their rage oftentimes foul intreat even the greateſt of them. The Aſapi, as they are but baſe and common Souldiers, ſo have they alſo their ordinary Captains and Commanders, Men of no great place or mark.

Their great Priviledges and Royalties.

The Order of the Janizaries in our time much imbaſed.

The Turks Aſapi in what ſmall regard they are had.

The whole State of the great Empire of the Turks is commanded by the Great Sultan, by the grave Advice and Counſel of his Viſier Baſſaes, which were not wont to be in number above four, ſo providing for the ſecrecy of his high Deſigns or important Reſolutions, hardly by a greater multitude to be concealed; howbeit that the Sultans of later times have had ſometimes more, ſometimes fewer, as their pleaſure was. Theſe Men are of all others in that Empire the greateſt, and for their high Places moſt honoured; unto them even the greateſt Princes that have any thing to do in the Turks Court, ſue and ſend their honourable Preſents. By their Advice the Great Sultan taketh his Wars in hand, neither without them concludeth he any Peace. They give Audience unto the Ambaſſadours of foreign Princes, and from them receive their diſpatch. The greateſt Honours and Preferments (which are many in that ſo great and large an Empire) are all by their means to be obtained; which maketh them of all others to be ſought unto. Some one or other of them are ſtill Generals over the great Armies of the Turks, eſpecially in theſe their late Wars, their three laſt Emperours never themſelves going forth into the Field (excepting once that Mahomet the Third, for the maintenance of his Credit with his Men of War, came down into Hungary, and there won the City of Agria:) which leading of ſuch mighty Armies is ſtill with great Emulation and Ambition of the Viſier Baſſaes amongſt themſelves ſought after, as well for the great profit thereby unto them ariſing, as for the Honour thereof, which is of all other the greateſt. But leaving theſe great ones, the chief Counſellers for his State; the whole body of his ſo large and mighty an Empire (all in the hands of Martial Men) is governed by other great Baſſaes, whom they by a moſt proud and barbarous Name call Beglerbegs, that is to ſay, Lords of Lords, every one of them having under him certain Begs or Sanzacks, who are Lords and Rulers alſo over ſome particular Cities and Countries, with the Timariots therein; yet all ſtill at the command and beck of their Beglerbeg. In ancient time there was wont to be but two of theſe proud Beglerbegs in all the Turks Empire; the one commanding over all the Provinces the Turk had in Europe; and the other, over all that he had in the leſſer Aſia, now of the Turks called Natolia. But the Turkiſh Empire, greatly augmented in Aſia by Selymus the Firſt, and alſo afterwards much enlarged both in Europe and Aſia by Solyman his Son, the number of the Beglerbegs were by him increaſed, and in ſome ſort alſo changed; who, although that they be all Beglerbegs, and that one of them (eſpecially in the time of Peace) in the managing of his Souldiers and Affairs of his Country, is not ſubject to any other, but is onely at the command of the Great Turk; yet notwithſtanding in the time of War, where the Beglerbeg of Romania is, all are obedient unto him, as the chiefeſt of the reſt; inſomuch that none of them but onely he and the Baſſa of Natolia are called by the ſtately name of Beglerbegs, the others being then onely called the Baſſaes of ſuch and ſuch Places, as of Buda, Aleppo, and ſuch like; although indeed they are in nature Beglerbegs, and ſo written in their Records. For the more manifeſting of which their Government, as alſo that they which come hereafter may be comparing of that which is here written with the ſtate that then ſhall be, ſee how much this great Empire in the mean time increaſeth or diminiſheth, I have thought good here briefly to ſet down all the ſaid Beglerbegs, with their Sanzacks and Timariots, and, as near as I could (either by reading, or the credible relation of others well travelled in thoſe Countries) together, and as it were at one ſhew, ſet forth the whole Strength and Power of this ſo mighty an Empire, as alſo in what Countries and Provinces the ſame is eſpecially placed.

cords,

The Beglerbegs or Great Commanders of the Turks Empire in Europe.

1. The Beglerbeg of Romania, chief of the Beglerbegs of the Turks Empire in Europe.

The firſt and chiefeſt of all the Beglerbegs in the Turks Empire, is the Beglerbeg of Romania, or Græcia, called of the Turks Rum-Ili (as we ſay the Roman Country) the principal reſidence of whoſe Beglerbegſhip is at Sophia, a City of Bulgaria, ſo appointed for the commodious ſcituation thereof, for the better command of the reſt of the Provinces of Europe; howbeit that he for the moſt part, or rather altogether abideth at the Court, which the other Beglerbegs cannot do; for they are bound not to depart from the Government of their Provinces; in which charge they ordinarily continue but three years only, the great Sultan ſtill changing and altering them at his Pleaſure. This Beglerbeg hath under his own Enſign and Command forty thouſand Timariots always ready at his call, under the conduct of theſe one and twenty Sanzacks following; namely the

1 Sophia in Bulgaria.
2 Nicopolis.
3 Cliſſe, or Quadraginta Eccleſiæ.
4 Vyza in Thracia.
5 Kirmen,
6 Siliſtria,
7 Giuſtandil, all in Macedonia.
8 Bender, near unto the Euxine.
9 Acherman, in the Confines of Moldavia.
10 Vſcopia.
11 Priſrem,
12 Salonichi,
13 Trichala, all in Theſſalia.
14 Miſitra, of old called Sparta, in Morea.
15 Palæopatra, in the ſame Province.
16 Joannina, in Ætolia.
17 Delvina.
18 Elbaſſan. both in Achaia.
19 Avelona or Aulona in Albania.
20 Ducagin in Epirus.
21 Iſcodra, or Scodra in Albania.

2. The Beglerbeg of Buda.

The Beglerbeg of Buda, who there reſideth in the Frontiers of the Turkiſh Empire, having under his charge eight thouſand Timariots, beſide 12000 other Souldiers, which in continual pay lie ſtill ready in Garriſon in the Confines of Hungary, Croatia, Stiria, and other Places bordering upon the Chriſtians, but eſpecially the Territories belonging to the Houſe of Auſtria. He had of late under his Enſign and Command theſe fifteen Sanzacks, viz. the

Sanzack of
1 Novigrade.
2 Filek.
3 Zetſchen.
4 Zolnock.
5 Gran or Strigonium.
6 Segedin.
7 Alba Regalis.
8 Sexard.
9 Simontorna.
10 Copan.
11 Muhatz.
12 Zigeth, or Saſwar.
13 Petſcheu or Quinque Eccleſiæ.
14 Sirmium.
15 Semendria.

Of which, Filek, Zetſchen, and Strigonium, are in theſe late Wars won from the Turks by the Imperials, and ſo yet by them holden; as was alſo Alba Regalis, which but of late was by the Turks again recovered.

3. The Beglerbeg of Temeſwar.

The Beglerbegh of Temeſwar in Hungary, who there hath his abode, having under his command ſeven thouſand Timariots, with theſe eight Sanzacks; the 1 Temeſwar.

2 Mudava.
3 Vilaoſwar.
4 Tſchinnad.
5 Wiſchitirni.
6 Iſwornick.
7 Vidin.
8 Lippa.

4. The Beglerbeg of Boſna.

The Beglerbegh of Boſna, who lyeth at Bagnialuca, hath under him theſe Sanzacks, the 1 Bagnialuca.

2 Poſchega.
3 Cliſſa.
4 Hertzegovina.
5 Lika.
6 Sazeſchna.
7 Giula.
8 Briſrem.
9 Alatſchia Chiſſar.

5. The Beglerbeg of Coffe or Capha.

The Beglerbegh of Coffe or Capha, who there reſideth in Taurica Cherſoneſus, and beſide the Country thereabout, commandeth over all the Sanzacks near unto the great River Tanais, and the Fens of Meotis. It was at firſt but a Sanzackſhip, ſubject to the Beglerbeg of Græcia; and is in truth rather a Beglerbeghs place in Name, than in Strength and Power.

The Beglerbegs or Great Commanders of the Turks Empire in Aſia.

The Beglerbegs of the Turks Empire in Aſia.

The Beglerbeg of
1 Anatolia, who hath his reſiance in Cutay, the Metropolitical City of the greater Phrygia (called in antient time Catyai) and hath under his Enſign and command thirty thouſand of the Timariot Horſemen, with twelve Sanzacks.
2 Caramania, who hath his abode at Caiſaria (in antient time called Cæſaria) a City of Cilicia, and hath under him ſeven Sanzacks, with twenty thouſand Timariots.
3 Sivas, who hath his abiding at Sebaſtia, a City of the leſſer Armenia, and hath under his Government ten thouſand Timariots.
4 Tocatun, who reſideth at Amaſia, the Metropolis of Capadocia, and hath under him five Sanzacks.
5 Dulgadir, ſometime part of the Kingdom of Aladules, and commandeth over four Sanzacks.
6 Halep, commonly called Aleppo, a City of Syria, and one of the moſt famous Marts of the Eaſt, who hath under his Regiment five and twenty thouſand Timariots.
7 Sham, otherwiſe called Damaſco, a moſt famous City of Syria, who commandeth over forty thouſand Timariots.
8 Tarapolos, or Trapolos, commonly called Tripolis, another famous City of Syria.
9 Maras, a City upon the great River Euphrates, betwixt Aleppo and Meſopotamia, who hath under his command 10000 Timariots.
10 Diarbekir, otherwiſe called Meſopotamia, who maketh his abode at the City of Amida, or, as the Turks call it, Cara-hemid, who commandeth over twelve Sanzacks, and thirty thouſand Timariots.

The Beglerbeg of 11 Bagdat, or new Babylon, where he reſideth, not far from the Ruines of old Babylon, who hath under him forty thouſand Timariots.

12 Balſara, not far from Bagdat, upon the Perſian Gulf, who hath under his Rule or Government fifteen thouſand Timariots.

13 Laxa, towards Ormus, and near unto the Perſian, hath under his Regiment ten thouſand Timariots.

14 Gemen and Aden, two famous Cities in Arabia Fœlix, upon the Coaſt of the Red-Sea, who hath under him thirty thouſand Timariots.

15 Chebetz, or Zebet, upon the Coaſt of the Arabian Gulf, near unto the Kingdom of the great Æthiopian King Prejanes, commonly (but corruptly) called Preſbiter John.

16 Cyprus, who lieth at Nicoſia or Famaguſta, commanding over all that great Iſland, ſometime of it ſelf a Kingdom.

17 Scheherezul in Aſſyria, bordering upon the Perſian, who hath under his Government ten thouſand Timariots.

18 Wan, a City in the Confines of the greater Armenia toward Media, who hath under him twelve thouſand Timariots.

19 Artzerum, or Erzerum, in the Borders of Armenia towards Capadocia, about four days Journey from Trapezond, who commandeth over twenty thouſand Timariots.

20 Teſlis, near unto the Georgians, erected by Muſtapha Baſſa, General of Amurath the third's Army againſt the Perſian, in the year 1578.

21 Siruan, or Media, erected by the ſame Muſtapha, and at the ſame time, commandeth over all that great Country, ſometime a famous Kingdom.

22 Temir-Capi, or Derbent, near unto the Caſpian Sea, taken by Oſman Baſſa the ſame year 1578; who, having ſlain Schehemet Chan, his Father-in-Law, reduced that Country into the form of a Beglerbegſhip.

23 Cars, a City of Armenia the greater, diſtant from Artzerum four days Journey, by Muſtapha Baſſa made a Beglerbegſhip in the year 1578.

24 Tſchilder or Tzilder, in the Confines of the Georgians, erected by the ſame General Muſtapha, in the ſame year 1579.

25 Faſſa, or Phaſis, in Mengrelia, near unto the Georgians, erected by Uluzales the Turks Admiral, the ſame year 1579.

26 Sochum, in the Borders of the Georgians, erected by the great Baſſa Sinan, in the year 1580.

27 Batin, there erected alſo by the ſame Sinan Baſſa.

28 Reivan, erected by Ferat Baſſa, General of the Turks Army, taken from Tochomac Chan the Perſian, in the year 1582, whereof Cicala Baſſa was the firſt Beglerbeg.

29 Sumachia, in the Country of Media, erected by Oſman Baſſa in the year 1583.

30 Tauris, a moſt famous City of Armenia the greater, ſometime the Regal Seat of the Perſian Kings, but of late taken from them by Oſman Baſſa, and converted into a Beglerbegſhip in the ſame year 1583.

But theſe late erected Honours, namely the Beglerbegſhips of Teſlis, Siruan, Temir-Capi, Cars, Tſchilder, Faſſa, and the reſt, gained by Amurath from the Perſians and the Georgians, although they contain a great Territory, are not of themſelves any of them worthy of thoſe proud Titles, or yet able to maintain the ſame (Siruan, Reivan, and Tauris only excepted) but were by the great Baſſaes, Muſtapha, Sinan, Ferat, and Oſman, Amurath's Lieutenants, for their own great Honour, and the encouraging of them which were to defend thoſe their new Conqueſts, erected; being indeed nothing either in Power or Strength comparable with the other more antient Beglerbegs either in Europe or Aſia. But, having thus paſſed through the great Kingdoms and Provinces by the Turks holden in Europe and Aſia, with their proud Honours therein, let us go forward toward the South, to ſee what great Kingdoms and Territories they at this preſent hold in Africk alſo.

The Beglerbegs or Great Commanders of the Turks Empire in Africk.

The Beglerbeg of

1 Miſſir, who ſtill making his abode at the great City of Caire, hath under his command all the Kingdom of Ægypt, with ſixteen Sanzacks, and an hundred thouſand Timariots.

2 Ceſair, in antient time called Julia Cæſaria, but now commonly Algiers, where the Beglerbeg ſtill reſiding, commandeth over all that Kingdom, wherein are forty thouſand Timariots.

3 Tunis, where he ſtill remaining as a Viceroy, commandeth all that great and large Kingdom.

4 Tripolis, the Seat of his Beglerbegſhip, by Sinan Baſſa taken from the Knights of Malta in the year 1551.

There are beſide theſe, two other Kingdoms in Africk inrolled in the Turks Records as their own, although they be not as yet by them brought into the form of Beglerbegſhips, namely the Kingdoms of Fez and Morocco, but are as yet holden by them as their Tributaries and Vaſſals.

But, having thus as it were taken view of the Greatneſs and Forces of this ſo mighty a Monarchs Empire by Land, and ſo in ſome ſort bounded it out, let us conſider alſo his Power by Sea. With the great Ocean he much medleth not, more than a little in the Gulfs of Perſia and Arabia, moſt of his Territories lying upon the Mediterranean and Euxine Seas, or elſe more inwardly into the heart of Aſia near to no Sea. Now for theſe Seas, no Prince in the World hath greater or better means to ſet forth his Fleets than he; for the overgrown Woods of Epirus and Cilicia, and more than they, thoſe of Nicomedia and Trapezond, are ſo great and thick, and ſo full of tall Trees fit for the building of Ships and Gallies of all ſorts, as is almoſt incredible. Neither wanteth he ſtore of Shipwrights and Carpenters for the framing of that ſo great ſtore of Timber, large pay drawing even the Chriſtian skilful Carpenters and Workmen into his Arſenals at Conſtantinople, Synope, Callipolis, and others. For proof whereof it is worth the noting, that Selymus the ſecond, in our freſh remembrance, the next year after that notable overthrow by him received at the Echinades (commonly called the battel of Lepanto) rigged up a Fleet, wherewith Vluzales his Admiral was not afraid to face the whole Power of the confederate Chriſtian Princes at Cerigo. Neither hath the Turk ever wanted good ſtore of expert Seamen, after the manner of thoſe Seas; for beſide thoſe he hath in ſtore at Callipolis and Sinope, out of his Gallies, which he hath always in readineſs at Lesbos, Chios, Rhodus, Cyprus, and Alexandria, and from the Pyrats which he continually receiveth into the Ports of Tunis, Bugia, Tripolis, and Algiers, he can and doth from them when need is, chuſe Captains, Mariners, and Rowers ſufficient for the manning and ſtoring of his Fleet. What he is able to do in thoſe Seas was well ſeen in our time, by thoſe Fleets which he had at Malta, Cyprus, the Echinades, and Guletta. He hath beſide of all neceſſary and warlike Proviſion abundant ſtore, and of great Ordnance to furniſh himſelf withal both by Sea and Land an infinite quantity. Out of Hungary he hath carried away above 5000 great pieces, out of Cyprus 500, and few leſs from Guletta, not to ſpeak what he hath more got from the Chriſtians in divers other places alſo. What ſtore he hath of Shot and Powder he ſhewed at Malta, where he diſcharged above 60000 great ſhot; at Famaguſta, where he beſtowed 118000; and at Guletta, where, in the ſpace of nine and thirty days, he by the fury of his great Ordnance overthrew the Fortifications which the Chriſtians had been forty years in building. So that, to return again to our purpoſe, the Great Turk ſo well provided of Men, Money, Shipping, and great Ordnance, and having done ſo great Matters at Sea, as is before reherſed, is not in reaſon otherwiſe to be accounted of, than as of a moſt mighty and puiſſant Prince as well by Sea as Land; which to be ſo, the Greatneſs of his Denizi Beglerbeg, or great Admiral (commonly called Capitan Baſſa, of whom we have not yet ſpoken) well declareth. This great Man having charge of all the Grand Seigniors Strength at Sea, is alway one of the Viſier Baſſaes, not bound ſtill to follow the Court, as the other Viſiers be, but always, or for the moſt part reſiant at Conſtantinople or Callipolis, ſo to be the nearer unto his charge. He that now hath this honourable Place, is called of the Turks Cigala Baſſa, deſcended of an honourable Family of that Name in Genoa; who commonly reſiding at Conſtantinople or Callipolis, hath under him fourteen Sanzacks, all of them great Commanders, and Men of great Place; namely the

1 Gallipolis, or Callipolis.
2 Galata, or Pera.
3 Nicomedia.
4 Limnos, or Lemnus.
5 Mitylene, or Lesbos.
6 Chios, or Scio.
7 Nexia, or Naxus.
8 Negropont, or Eubœa.
9 Rhodus.
10 Cavala in the Frontiers of Macedonia.
11 Napoli di Romania.
12 Lepanto, or Naupactus.
13 S. Maura.
14 Alexandria.

6. The Denizi Beglerbeg, the Turks great Admiral, to be accounted ſixth of the Beglerbegs.

The Princes, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, upon whom the great Empire of the Turk confineth, and of what Power they be in compariſon of the Turk.

The Greatneſs, Wealth, and Strength of this ſo mighty an Empire, as well by Sea as Land, thus in ſome ſort declared, let us now ſee upon what Princes it alſo confineth, and of what Power every one of them is in compariſon of that ſo great and overgrown a State. The Turks toward the Eaſt border upon the Perſians, according to a right line drawn by Imagination from Tauris to Balſara; upon the Portugals at the Perſian Gulf, and ſo there likewiſe toward the South; at the Red-Sea, upon the great Æthyopian King Prejanes, commonly called Preſter John; towards the South, in Affrick upon the Kingdom of Morocco; and in Europe, upon the Kingdom of Naples, with ſome part of the Venetian Seigniory; toward the North upon the Polonians, and the Territories of the Houſe of Auſtria. Now to begin with the Perſian; the great Turk no doubt is in Field too ſtrong for him, as by proof hath been oftentimes ſeen; for Mahomet the Great in plain Battel overcame the valiant Vſun Caſſanes; Selymus the firſt, and after Solyman his Son put to flight the noble Hyſmael and Tamas, the two great and famous Perſian Kings; and now of late in our time, Amurath the Third by his Lieutenants hath taken from the Perſians all Media, with the greater Armenia, both ſometimes famous Kingdoms, together with the Regal City of Tauris. That the Turk ſo prevaileth, is by reaſon of his Foot-men, which the Perſian wanteth; and of his great Ordnance, whereof the Perſian hath neither ſtore nor uſe; and although the Perſians by Valour of their Horſemen have ſometime in open Field foiled the Turk, yet have they ſtill loſt ſome part of their Country; Solyman taking from them Meſopotamia, and Amurath, Media and Armenia. Neither did the Perſians alone feel that harm, and loſe their own, but undid their Confederates alſo; Selymus the Firſt ſpoiling the Mamalukes of Egypt and Syria, and utterly rooting them from off the face of the Earth; and Amurath, by his Lieutenants having brought to a low ebb the Warlike Georgians, both of them the Perſian Kings Friends and Confederates. Now is not the Turk ſo much too ſtrong at Land for the Perſian, but that he is as much too weak at Sea for the Portugals; in thoſe Seas I mean where their Forces have more than once to the Turks coſt met together in the Eaſt-Indies; the Portugals having in thoſe rich but remote Countries many ſure Harbours and Ports, yea, fair Countries and Territories abounding with Victuals and all Proviſion neceſſary for Shipping, with ſome alſo of thoſe great Eaſtern Princes their Allies and Confederates; whereas the Turk on the other ſide hath nothing in the Perſian Gulf ſtrong, beſide Balſara; the Sea Coaſt of Arabia, which might ſtand him in beſt ſtead, having no more but four Towns, and thoſe but weak and of ſmall worth. So that there, as alſo in the Red Sea, it is a matter of exceeding charge and difficulty for him to ſet out any great Fleet into thoſe Seas, for that thoſe Countries are utterly deſtitute of Wood fit to make Ships. For which cauſe, thoſe few times that he prepared his Fleets into the Red Sea (to have cut off the Portugals trade into the Eaſt-Indies) being not able to perform the ſame in the Perſian Gulf, he was inforced to bring the Timber for the building of his Gallies out of the Ports of Bithinia and Cilicia (out of another World as it were) up the Nile into Caire, and from thence upon Camels by Land to Sues, where he hath his Arſenal, a thing almoſt incredible. And yet having done what he could, as oft as he hath made Expedition againſt them, he never gained any thing but loſs and Diſhonour; as in the year 1538 at the City of Dium; and in the year 1552, at the Iſland of Armuz; and after that at Mombaza, where four of the Turks Gallies, with one Galliot, which by the favour of the King of Mombaza had thought to have ſtaid in thoſe Seas, were by by the Portugals taken; who ſtill have a ſpecial regard and care that the Turks ſettle not themſelves in thoſe Seas; but as ſoon as they perceive them to prepare any Fleet, they forthwith ſet upon them, and to that end oftentimes without reſiſtance enter into the Red-Seas.

Preſter John too weak for the Turks.

Preſter John, of whom although men ſpeak much, yet is he nothing in ſtrength to be compared unto the Turk, but far inferiour unto him both for Commanders and Souldiers, as alſo for Weapons and Munition; for that great Prince hath a great Kingdom without Fortification, and a multitude of Souldiers without Arms; as appeared by the overthrow of Barnagaſſo his Lieutenant towards the Red-Sea; who, having loſt all that Sea coaſt unto the Turks, was brought to that extremity, that to have Peace with them, he yieldeth to pay unto them a yearly Tribute of a thouſand ounces of Gold.

The King of Morocco and the Turk both in doubt of the King of Spain.

In Affrick the Turk hath more Territories than hath the King of Morocco, otherwiſe called the Xeriſe; for he poſſeſſeth all that there lyeth betwixt the Red-Sea and the Kingdom of Fez; but the Xeriſe hath the better part, the richer, ſtronger, and more united; yet dare neither of them well make War upon the other, for the nearneſs of the King of Spain, Enemy unto them both.

The King of Polonia unwilling to meddle with the Turk, or the Turk with him.

Now then there remaineth the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes bordering upon the Turk; and firſt the King of Polonia. What theſe two Princes can do the one againſt the other, hath been ſeen in ſome former Expeditions, wherein the Polonian had ſtill the worſe; yet it ſhould ſeem, that of later time the Turk hath not been greatly deſirous to move the Polonian too far, for that being provoked by divers occaſions, (namely in the Reign of Henry the Third, in the Wars that John the Vayvod of Valachia had with the Turks, many Polonian Horſe-men ſerved the ſaid Vayvod, though not indeed ſent from the King; and in the time of Sigiſmund, the Polonian Coſſacks have with divers Incurſions not a little troubled them; beſide the late motions of John Samoſchie, the great Chancellor and General of the Polonian Forces, for the ſtaying of the Tartars by the Turks ſent for, he hath been content to comport the ſame, and not with his wonted pride ſought to be revenged thereof, as he hath for far leſs upon ſome other Princes. And on the other ſide, the Polonians, ſince the unfortunate Expedition of King Ladiſlaus, never took upon them any Wars againſt the Turks, neither gave ſuch Aid as they ſhould unto the Valachians their Confederates, but ſuffered to be taken from themſelves whatſoever they had toward the Euxine or Black-Sea; a thing imputed rather unto the want of Courage in their Kings, than in the Nobility of that Kingdom. Sigiſmund the Firſt, being by Pope Leo the Tenth, invited to the Wars againſt the Turks, anſwered them in theſe few words: Set you the Chriſtian Princes at unity amongſt themſelves, and I for my part will not be wanting. Sigiſmund the Second ſo abhorred, the Wars, that he not onely declined the Turks, but, provoked by the Muſcovites, never ſought to revenge the ſame. King Stephen, (by the commendation of Amurath choſen King of Polonia) an indifferent eſteemer both of his Enemies Forces and his own, thought it a moſt dangerous thing to joyn Battel with the Turk, and yet in private talk with his Friend, would oftentimes ſay, That with thirty thouſand Foot joyned unto his Polonian Horſemen, he durſt well to undertake an Expedition againſt the Turk; which he was ſuppoſed oftentimes to have thought upon.

The Emperour, with the reſt of the Princes of the Houſe of Auſtria, together with the Aid of the Germans, have much ado to defend themſelves againſt the Turk.

The Emperour, with the reſt of the Princes of the Houſe of Auſtria, are by a longer tract of ground joyned unto this great Empire of the Turks, than any one other Prince of the World, and beſtow in Fortifications and the maintenance of their Garriſons, (wherein they have continually above twenty thouſand Horſe and Foot) the greateſt part of their Revenues, even in the time of Peace, much more in theſe their long Wars; and with the German Forces joyned unto their own, are more careful how to defend that they have yet left, than how to recover that they have already loſt, or to inlarge their Empire. The Emperour Ferdinand, with greater force than ſucceſs, undertook the unfortunate Expeditions of Bada and Poſſega; which ſo evil fell out, not for that his Forces were not ſufficient or ſtrong enough, but for that they wanted Agility and Dexterity. The truth is, thoſe his Armies were ſtrong enough, and ſufficiently furniſhed with all things neceſſary, but conſiſted for the moſt part of Germans and Bohemians, ſlow and heavy People, unfit to encounter with the Turks, a more ready and nimble kind of Souldiers.

The Venetians by Policy rather than by force, maintain their State againſt the Turk.

The Venetians alſo confrontier the Turks by many hundred miles, both by Sea and Land, and defend themſelves rather by peaceable Policy than force of Arms; notably fortifying their Strong-holds upon their Frontiers, declining by all means the Dangers and Charges of War, by Ambaſſages and rich Preſents, leaving nothing unattempted, (their Liberty and State preſerved) rather than to fall to Wars. To ſay the truth of them, although they had both Coin and Warlike proviſion ſufficient, yet want they Men and Victuals anſwerable to ſo great a War againſt ſo puiſſant an Enemy.

The King of Spain, of all other Princes that border upon the Turk, beſt able to wage War with him.

There remaineth onely the King of Spain, of all other the great Princes either Chriſtians or Mahometans bordering upon him, the beſt able to deal with him; his yearly Revenues ſo far exceeding thoſe of the Turks, as that they are alſo probably thought to countervail the greateſt part of his Timariots; and his great Dominions in Spain, Portugal, Naples, Sicilia, Millain, Sardinia, and the Low Countries, (if they were with him at unity) able to afford unto him ſo great and powerful a Strength both by Sea and Land, as might make him dreadful even unto the Great Turk when he ſwelleth in his greateſt Pride; but conſidering how his Forces are diſtracted for the maintenance of his Wars at once in divers places; as alſo for the neceſſary defence and keeping of his ſo large and diſperſed Territories, not all the beſt of themſelves affected to the Spaniſh Government, he is not to be thought of himſelf ſtrong enough againſt the united Forces of the Great Turk, whenſoever they ſhall chance to be imployed upon him. So that by this we have already ſaid, is eaſie to be gathered, how much the Turk is too ſtrong for any one of the neighbour Princes, either Mahometans or Chriſtians, bordering upon him, and therefore to be of them the more feared. Yet, leſt ſome miſtaking me, might think, What, is then the Turk invincible? Far be that thought from me, to think any Enemy of Chriſt Jeſu (be his Arm never ſo ſtrong) to be able to withſtand his Power, either quite to devour his little Flock, rage he never ſo much about it.

Why the Turk is not to be thought invincible, neither his Power ſo ſtrong, as in ſhew it ſeemeth to be.

As for the Turk, the moſt dangerous and profeſſed Enemy of the Chriſtian Common-weal, be his ſtrength ſo great, yea, and haply greater too than is before declared, (the greatneſs of his Dominion and Empire conſidered) yet is he not to be thought therefore either Invincible, or his Power ſo great, as it in ſhew ſeemeth for to be; his Timariot Horſe-men (his greateſt ſtrength) diſperſed over his whole Empire, being never poſſibly the one half of them by him to be gathered into the body of one Army; neither if they were ſo, poſſible in ſuch a multitude long to be kept together, living upon no pay of his, but upon ſuch Store and Proviſion onely as they bring with them from their Timari, never ſufficient to maintain them long. Beſides that, the policy of his State hardly or never ſuffereth him to draw above a third part of his Timariots out of his Countries where they dwell, for fear leſt the reſt of the People, by them ſtill kept under, ſhould in their abſence take up Arms againſt him in defence of themſelves and their ancient Liberty; whereafter, the greateſt part of thoſe poor oppreſſed Souls, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians in every Province of his Empire, awaiting but the opportunity, moſt deſirouſly longeth. So that more than two parts of them being always to be left at home for neceſſary defence of the ſpacious borders of his ſo large an Empire, as alſo for the keeping in Obedience of ſo many diſcontented Nations; it is a great matter, if he, even in his greateſt Wars, draw together of theſe kind of Souldiers the full number of an hundred and fifty thouſand ſtrong, making up the reſt of his huge Multitude with his Acanzii, living of no pay of his, but upon the ſpoil of the Enemy onely, the fifth part whereof they pay unto him alſo. All which put together, what manner of men they be, and of what Valour, not onely the ſmall Armies of the Chriſtians, under the leading of their worthy Chieftains, Huniades, Scanderbeg, King Matthias, and others, have to their immortal Glory in former times made good proof; but even in this our Age, and that as it were but the other day, the Tranſilvanian Prince, with divers other Captains and Commanders yet living, have done the like alſo, as well witneſſeth the late Battel of Agria, wherein the Chriſtians, in number not half ſo many as the Turks, by plain Valour drave the Great Sultan Mahomet himſelf (with Ibrahim Baſſa his Lieutenant General) out of the Field, and had of him had the moſt notable Victory that ever was got againſt that Enemy, had they not by too much careleſneſs, and untimely deſire of ſpoil, themſelves ſhamefully interrupted the ſame. But thus to let his Horſe-men paſs; the chief ſtrength of his Foot-men are his Janizaries, never in number exceeding twelve or fourteen thouſand, yet ſeldom times half ſo many even in his greateſt Armies, except he himſelf be there in Perſon preſent in the midſt of them; who, beſide the ſmall number of them, in the time of theſe their late voluptuous and effeminate Emperour, corrupted with the Pleaſures of Conſtantinople, and for want of their wonted Diſcipline, have, together with their ancient Obedience and Patience, loſt alſo a great part of their former Reputation and Valour; all the reſt of his Foot-men filling up the Body of his populous Army, being his Aſapi, rather Pioneers than Souldiers, men of ſmall Worth, and ſo accounted of both by the Turks and their Enemies alſo. So that all things well conſidered, his beſt Souldiers being the leaſt part of his greateſt Armies, and they alſo far unlike their Predeceſſors, the ſtern followers of the former Ottoman Kings and Emperours, but Men now given to Pleaſure and Delight, it is not otherwiſe to be thought, but that he bringeth into the Field far more Men than good Souldiers, more bravery than true Valour, more ſhew than Worth, his Multitude being his chiefeſt ſtrength, his ſuppoſed greatneſs the Terrour of his Neighbour Princes, and both together the very Majeſty of his Empire. Which, although it be indeed very ſtrong, for the reaſons before alledged, yet is it by many probably thought to be now upon the declining hand, their late Emperours in their own Perſons far degenerating from their Warlike Progenitors, their Souldiers generally giving themſelves to unwonted Pleaſures, their antient Diſcipline of War neglected, their Superſtition not with ſo much zeal as of old regarded, and Rebellions in divers parts of his Empire of late ſtrangely raiſed, and mightily ſupported; all the ſigns of a declining State. Which, were they not at all to be ſeen, as indeed they be very pregnant; yet the Greatneſs of this Empire being ſuch, as that it laboureth with nothing more than the weightineſs of it ſelf, it muſt needs (after the manner of worldly things) of it ſelf fall, and again come to nought, no man knowing when or how ſo great a Work ſhould be brought to paſs, but he in whoſe deep Counſels all theſe great Revolutions of Empires and Kingdoms are from Eternity ſhut up; who at his Pleaſure ſhall in due time, by ſuch means as he ſeeth beſt, accompliſh the ſame, to the unſpeakable comfort of his poor afflicted flock, in one place or other, ſtill in danger to be by this roaring Lyon devoured. Which work of ſo great wonder, He for his Son our Saviour Chriſt's ſake, the glory of his Name, and comfort of many thouſand oppreſſed Chriſtians, fed with the Bread of carefulneſs amidſt the Furnace of Tribulation, in mercy haſten, that we with them, and they with us, all as Members of one Body, may continually ſing, Unto him be all Honour and Praiſe, World without end.

The Epiſtle Dedicatory to the KING.

May it pleaſe Your moſt Excellent Majeſty:

I Cannot, without ſome deſpondency of Mind, and awful fear of the Greatneſs of Your Majeſty, make an Offering at Your Sacred Feet of ſo ſmall an Eſteem and inconſiderable Value, as theſe following Hiſtories. For having travelled long in remote Countries, and reſided no leſs than eighteen Years in Turky, the World may reaſonably expect ſome rich Returns unto Your Majeſty in Perſian Silks, and Tyrian Purples, or in the fineſt Carpets, and other Gayeties, in which the ſoftneſs and luxury of the Leſſer Aſia did anciently abound: and may now judg me a Bankrupt, or ill Husband of my Talent, when they ſee me at Home trembling in Your Royal Preſence, with a Gift no more worthy than a few Sheets of Paper; which being a Sacrifice inferior and beneath the acceptance of ſo Great a Monarch, I might reaſonably fear, that they would take fire at the heat of Your juſt diſpleaſure, were they not with all humility and reverence conſecrated to the Royal Clemency. For in this glorious Title and Attribute, Your Majeſty (as is notorious to the World) exceeding all the moſt Serene and moſt Clement Emperors that ever were, expects not from me, either Gold or Jewels, but rather a true Account of my Time, how I have ſpent it in the Service of God, and of your Majeſty: and how I have adminiſtred that Publick Truſt and Intereſt which was committed to my Management. Accept therefore, GREAT SIR, theſe following Diſcourſes, to diſcharge part of the Account of my Time, with other Treatiſes which have been the Employment to fill up my vacant Intervals: the remaining account of my Hours are not to be juſtified by my own Report, but by the Teſtimony of others, whoſe Wiſdom and Goodneſs will be as ready to own my Induſtry and Faithfulneſs in their Concernments, as they will be to excuſe and pardon my Infirmities.

Ever ſince the time of Your Majeſty's happy Reſtauration, my Lot hath fallen to live and act within the Dominions of the Turk, and there to move in a Publick Capacity; which though it was in an Adminiſtration of one of the loweſt Note and Degree, yet the great Influence which the flouriſhing Eſtate of that Trade hath on the common Good of England, nouriſhed in me a ſecret Pride and Satiſfaction in that Employment, which called and raiſed up all my Endeavours to acquit my ſelf therein with Prudence, Faithfulneſs, and Induſtry; there being the ſame Regularity required in the Stars of the lower, as in thoſe of higher Magnitude.

This hath been the firſt, and indeed the only Affair I ever managed for the Publick: for before Your Majeſty's bleſſed Return, the Character noted on my Family of being Loyal, as it made them at firſt active and zealous in the Service of Your Glorious Father, ſo afterwards it famed them for their Sufferings, and rendred them and me uncapable of Office. But Your Majeſty returning like the Sun, to animate and cheriſh all living Creatures, with an equality proportioned to their ſeveral Capacities, hath been pleaſed alſo to beſtow a Ray of Your benign Influence on my ſelf; whereby having received Comfort and Refreſhment, I do with all ſenſe of my Duty, and with entire Devotion, pray unto the King of Kings for the Happineſs, long Life, and immortal Glory of Your Majeſty, and with all reverence and humble ſubmiſſion, devote and conſecrate my ſelf, for ever to remain,

Your Majeſty's moſt Humble, moſt Dutiful,

PAUL RYCAUT.

MORAT AVT AMVRATHES IV TVRCARVM IMPERATOR VNDECIMVS 1623

My Brothers folly, and my want of years
Let loose the reignes of Rule to Mutiniers;
But as wth time my strength, and wit improve,
I all reforme wth feare, and not by love.
By mighty force I Babylon subdue,
From whence a peace with Persia doth ensue,
And when 'gainst Christiã foes, I do designe
To turn my armes, dye with excesse of wine.

THE REIGN OF Sultan MORAT, OR AMURAT IV. The Eleventh EMPEROR, AND Twenty firſt MONARCH OF THE TURKS.

THE weak Underſtanding of Sultan Muſtapha, and his inability for Rule, cauſed the Affairs of State, both at Home and Abroad, to move diſorderly and irregular. Where Violence and Injuſtice prevail, there is ſo little diſtance between the moſt eminent Height of Grandure, and the loweſt Abyſs of Miſery, that a Prince may in a moment ſtep from one unto the other. The Janiſaries and Military Officers commanded more now than the Civil, all things being guided by the Air and Fancy of the Souldiery, who placed and diſplaced with that wind of Favour and Diſpleaſure, which is agreeable to the Humour of a Multitude, and the Licentiouſneſs of Arms. For at the ſame time there were three Emperors, ſeven Great Viziers, two Captain-Paſha's, five Aga's of the Janiſaries, three Treaſurers, ſix Paſha's of Cairo; and in proportion, the Changes and Alterations were as many in all the Provinces of the Empire. All this Confuſion evidently proceeding from the weak and almoſt ſenſleſs Underſtanding of Muſtapha; the Miniſters and People concurred, as it were, in an univerſal Conſent to dethrone him a ſecond time, and exalt into his Place Sultan Morat Brother to Oſman, who was murdered the Year before. The Principal Actors in this Contrivance, were Kioſem the Mother of Morat, and the Muſti. But in the execution hereof, three Difficulties occurred: The firſt was Chuſaein Paſha the Great Vizier; who by reaſon of the Inabilities of Muſtapha, being become abſolute Lord and Soveraign of all, would be unwilling to aſſent unto that Propoſition, which might degrade him of his Dignity, and diveſt him of his Power. A ſecond Obſtacle was the Fancy and Humour of the Souldiery, who having with much Zeal and Paſſion exalted Muſtapha to the Throne, it might be doubted, that in maintenance of the ſame Humour, they would with equal obſtinacy perſevere in their Election. A third was the Poverty or low Ebb of the Exchequer, which at that time was in no capacity to ſupply that Donative to the Souldiery, which was uſual and cuſtomary at the Inauguration of every Sultan. To forward and haſten this Change, and ripen this Plot, the News of the Rebellion of Abaſſa did much contribute; who with a Body of fifteen thouſand Horſe, roved over all the Plains of Kara-hiſar, calling himſelf Avenger of Sultan Oſman's Murder, and Enemy of the Janiſaries; by whoſe Mutiny and Conſpiracy he was put to Death: in ſatisfaction for which, he not only killed all Janiſaries which fell into his hands; but their Wives, Children, and thoſe allied to them, he deſtroyed with implacable Malice and bloody Rage. Upon this Advice, the Janiſaries at Conſtantinople being moved with equal Fury and deſire of Revenge, applied themſelves to their Aga, propoſing a ſpeedy Union with the Spahees, for ſuppreſſing this Rebellion before Time gave it greater growth, and made the Humour more ſtubborn and difficult to be purged. At the ſame time alſo came Letters from Cicala Paſha, (who was diſpatched into Aſia with a ſtrong Party, to give a ſtop to the farther Progreſs and Advance of Abaſſa) adviſing that upon his near approach to the Enemy, ſo general a Fear poſſeſſed his Souldiery, that moſt of them diſbanded and forſook their Colours; and that at preſent he had no more than five hundred Janiſaries, and two hundred Spahees under his Command, which he found to be an unequal Match to contend with the increaſing Power of Abaſſa. This Intelligence ſerved happily the occaſion of the Mufti, Vizier, and Aga, to give a turn to the deſired Change, and ſupplied them with an Anſwer to the Janiſaries, that they were ready to yield compliance unto their Addreſs, but that the Incapacity of their Soveraign obſtructed their Proceedings, and that the Defect in the principal Wheel diſordered all the Motions of good Government. At which Reply the Janiſaries becoming more unquiet, aſſembled themſelves in a tumultuous manner at the Moſch of Sultan Solyman; where making an * Ayack Divan, (ſo called, becauſe they ſit not down, but ſtand on their Legs, to denote the preſent haſte and urgency of their Affair) it was enacted, by an unanimous conſent of the Civil and Military Power, That young Morat, or Amurat, ſhould be promoted to the Throne, and that Muſtapha ſhould be depoſed: And becauſe the Exchequer was at its loweſt Ebb, and wholly exhauſted by miſcarriage of the Officers, the Souldiers were contented to diſpenſe with their Donative; which they relinquiſhed in conſideration of the Publick Good, reſerving ſtill their Title and Claim thereunto at times of a more happy Inauguration. With this News the Vizier immediately mounted on Horſe-back to ſignify this Univerſal Decree to Muſtapha; but he found him ſo ſtupid, as if he had been inſenſible of the Meſſage; and his Mother wanting Power to reſiſt this ſtrong Convulſion, gave way to Neceſſity, and ſeemed to embrace what ſhe could not oppoſe.

* Ayack in Turkiſh ſignifies a Foot.

Thus Muſtapha falling from the Heaven of his Throne to the Abyſs of his Priſon, ſeemed to return unto his Centre; for being only by the Wild-fire of Fortune carried as far aloft, as the force of popular Powder could reach, he afterwards by the meer weight of his earthly Temper returned with the like quickneſs of Motion to the place from whence he aſcended.

Hereupon Sultan Amurat, a Youth of about fourteen years of Age, was brought forth to the People, and placed in the Throne with all the Acclamations and Rejoycings of the People. And being taught by his Mother in a feigned manner to refuſe acceptance of the Empire, he pretended that the Exchequer was exhauſted, and that therefore he was not able to demonſtrate the Affection and Eſteem he had for them; and that ſince they had killed their former Sultans, he was fearful leſt the tenderneſs of his Age ſhould betray him to the like Violence: but the Souldiery having not the patience to hearken to his Excuſes, immediately carried him to the Divan, where having cloathed him in White, they ſeated him on a Safraw, erected with four Pillars, ſtudded with precious Stones; the Covering of which was of Crimſon-Velvet, richly embroidered with Gold and Oriental-Pearl. And being ſo ſeated, the Mufti with all reverence approached, and kiſſed his Hand; and then turning to the People, he demanded of them, If they were contented with that Prince whom they now beheld in the Seat of the Ottoman Kings? To which they having given aſſent by their loud Acclamations; Morat, with a becoming gravity, encharged the Mufti to take care that Juſtice and the Law be executed, and ſo retired to his Lodgings with general ſatiſfaction. The next morning he was carried by Water to the Moſch of Jub in the Suburbs of Conſtantinople, where according to the Solemnity of the Ottoman Empire, having performed his * Corban, or Sacrifice, and having his Cemiter girt to his Side by the Emirſheriff, he mounted on Horſe-back, and with a magnificent Train entred by the Gate of Adrianople. In the mean time Muſtapha, who was more worthy to bear a Fool's Cap than an Imperial Diadem, was conducted to Priſon, and more narrowly guarded than formerly; howſoever no Man offered to take away his Life, the Perſons of Fools and Idiots being ſacred in eſteem of the Turks, and the leaſt Injury offered to them accounted Irreligious and Unlucky.

* Which is a diſpenſing of Mutton to the Poor.

Morat was of a lively Countenance, full-fac'd, dark Hair, of a black and lively Eye, ruddy and ſanguine Complexion, and in every degree of a promiſing and hopeful Aſpect: but his exteriour appearance did not correſpond with the internal Cruelty of his violent Spirit, having ſome ſimilitude with the Swan, which hath white Feathers and black Fleſh.

The Great Vizier who aſſiſted at this Solemnity, was (as we have ſaid) Chuſaein Paſha, a Perſon of Self-intereſt, who had waſted and conſumed the Treaſury, and converted a great part thereof to his own Benefit; he was a Tyrant, hated of all Men, and ſupported himſelf by no other Art than bribing of the Souldiery: And to his other Crimes he added, that of having unjuſtly perſecuted Halil Paſha, and deprived him of his Office, his Power not reaching to the taking away his Life; which being reſerved for better Times, he was again recalled from his Retirement, and by ſpecial Command of the Sultan, was unwillingly reſtored to the Office of Vizier, being beſt pleaſed with a quiet and pacifick Life, to which his melancholy Temper had naturally diſpoſed him. In the mean time Chuſaein Paſha being terrified by the ſenſible touches of his own Conſcience, took his flight by way of the Black Sea; and being out of the reach of Juſtice, a Fine was ſet of Five thouſand Zechins, and of Lands to the Revenue of an hundred thouſand Aſpers a Year, to be given unto him who ſhould bring his Head. Many of thoſe who had ſold him their Friendſhip and Favour, being affrighted with this Sentence, voluntarily diſgorged the Rewards they had received; and amongſt the reſt, the laſt Aga of the Janiſaries, who had been his Kahya or Steward for the ſpace of three months, reſtored 8 hundred thouſand Dollars as an Atonement for his Sin, and a Ranſom for purchaſing his own Life and Office. At length, by force of the foregoing Reward, Chuſaein Paſha was betrayed and taken alive; and being brought to Conſtantinople, was immediately ſtrangled before the Gate of the Divan.

Many were the Difficulties which this young Sultan was to encounter; the greateſt of which was the Inſolence of the Janiſaries, who feeling themſelves empty of Mony, began to repent of the prodigal and eaſy remiſſion of their Donative, and in a tumultuous manner to redemand it again. There was no Argument or Debate to be uſed againſt Men of the Sword, who hearkned to no other Reaſon than their own Wants, and to ſatisfy them, there was no other Remedy than Compliance; wherefore all Officers and Perſons not employed in Military Affairs were forced to contribute towards a large Tax, and a ſhameful Demand was made for the Loan of Thirty thouſand Zechins from the four Chriſtian Ambaſſadors reſident at the Port, that they alſo as Friends might yield an aſſiſting hand towards the preſent Urgency of Affairs: ſo little conſideration 1624. deration and ſhame have Turks to lay open the Nakedneſs and diſtreſs of their Country even to Strangers and Enemies of it. And indeed ſuch was the Inſolence and uncontroulable Power of the Souldiery, that their Deſires and Commands were Laws, and their Determinations Rules for their Sultan and his Subjects.

This Humour of Uſurpation and unlimited Power, wearied all the Officers of the Empire, and inclined them ſecretly to approve the Cauſe of Abaſſa Paſha of Erzirum, who declared and ſtiled himſelf Enemy to the Janiſaries; and of Bechir Paſha of Babylon, who was joined with him. The Vizier alſo finding his Power abridged by the Arbitrary Will of the Souldiery, moved ſlowly and coldly into Aſia, where all the Force he could make, conſiſted of no more than fifty thouſand new and unexperienced Men, ſuch as were uncapable to contend with a more numerous Army of veterane Souldiers; to which alſo the Beglerbei of Anatolia joined himſelf, as did all other the chief Timar-Spahees, who conſpired together to confound and deſtroy the Pride and Government of the Janiſaries. The Vizier alſo was of the ſame Party, and coldly at firſt anſwered the Requeſt of the Janiſaries, when they earneſtly preſſed him to lead them againſt Abaſſa their common and mortal Enemy: At length, being fortified with the Force of the Timar-Spahees, he told them plainly, That if they would go and fight, he would be a Spectator of the Succeſs, but would not engage himſelf in a Quarrel wherein the Blood of Muſſelmen might be ſpilt on one ſide and the other: by which means the Rebels in Aſia took Head, increaſed in Force, and every day rendred them in a more formidable and dangerous poſture.

But this was not all the Trouble which enſued; for the Tartars having refuſed that King whom the Grand Signior had appointed them to receive, declared for Mehmet his Brother: who was ſeconded by the Votes of the Generality, and maintained by the ſtrongeſt Nerve of that Nation. The Vizier was unwilling to ingage in this Quarrel, alledging, That a Civil War was the worſt of Evils, and that it was better to connive at a preſent Inconvenience, than in this diſtracted Time of Affairs, to pollute the Empire with the Blood of Tartars, who were their Brethren, and of the ſame Religion and Alliance with them. Howſoever the Divan was of another Opinion, and reſolved to diſpeed the Captain-Paſha with a Force ſufficient to re-inſtate Gherey (for ſo the Elder Brother was called) in the Government of that Kingdom. But yet the Inſtructions given, rather directed him to act with Dexterity than with Force, ſuppoſing that the Authority of the Turks abetted with the preſence of a conſiderable Force, would create an inclination in the Tartars to Obedience, ſo ſoon as they diſcovered them to appear on their Coaſt. The Captain-Paſha being arrived at * Caffá, declared, That he was ſent by the Grand Signior, not to exclude either one or other of the Pretenders, but only to be Witneſs of a free and fair Election; that ſo all Civil Diſcord ceaſing, that Party might be choſen who was moſt pleaſing to the generality of the People. To which end two Standards were erected, one for † Gherey the Elder Brother deſired by the Turks, and the other for Mehmet beloved of the Tartars. The People in multitudes ran to the Standard of Mehmet, and but few to that of Gherey; which demonſtrated at how mean a rate the Tartars eſteemed the Protection and Favour of the Port. The Captain-Paſha vexed 1625. hereat, denied to give his Aſſent to the Confirmation, on pretence, that he was firſt to demand the Grand Signior's Pleaſure; but at length was perſwaded by Gherey to land a Force of about eight thouſand Men to own and maintain his Cauſe, on hopes, that rather than ingage againſt the Turks, the People would condeſcend to Terms in his Admiſſion and Favour. The Tartars not being in the leaſt diſmayed hereat, arrayed themſelves in a warlike Poſture, and feigning Fear and Flight, allured the Turks to a purſuit of them, until they had brought them to a place where thirty thouſand Horſe lay in ambuſh; which on a ſudden ariſing and encompaſſing them round, had entirely deſtroyed them, had not Salil the Brother of Mehmet given a ſtop to the ſlaughter, on hopes, that ſuch a teſtimony of Friendſhip would reconcile the Spirits of the Turks, at leaſt might render his Brother's preferment more tolerable and grateful to the Turks. In this conflict, Ibrahim and Chuſaein who were Viziers of the Bench, the Kahya and a Capigibaſhe of the Seraglio were ſlain, whoſe Bodies were afterwards tranſported to Conſtantinople, ſix hundred Janiſaries and as many Sea-men were killed, and fifteen hundred Priſoners were taken, whoſe Liberty was procured at a mean Ranſom, for the ſake of that Faith and Religion which they jointly profeſſed; they alſo took thirty Pieces of Cannon, and might alſo have become Maſters of the whole Fleet conſiſting of thirty ſix Gallies, had they been deſirous to have proſecuted their Victory to the utmoſt advantage: and moreover in that conjuncture of Affairs, when a general conſternation had overſpread the principal parts of the Ottoman Dominions, when the Councils were feeble and faint, and that a languiſhing Pulſe beat in all the Government, had the Tartar with an Army of fifty thouſand Horſe then ready to march, made up to the Walls of Adrianople, it might have proved ſuch an opportunity for dividing and deſtroying this Empire, as hath not offered at any time ſince that Occaſion. But the two Brothers, Mehmet and Salil, ſtiling their War forced and defenſive, uſed that moderation in their Victory, which might not provoke a deſire of Revenge in the Turks. The Captain-Paſha being thus permitted to depart from Caffa with his Fleet, ſailed to Varna, a Port in the Black Sea, about two hundred miles diſtant from Conſtantinople; where the News of this Defeat being arrived, put all the City into confuſion, and raiſed the Viziers at midnight to conſult of thoſe Remedies and Expedients which were agreeable to the preſent emergency of Affairs. The Great Vizier Ali was of opinion, that the Grand Signor ought to condeſcend to Terms of Accommodation, tho to the diſadvantage and diſreputation of his Power; and that accordingly a Letter ſhould be wrote to Mehmet the Tartar, beginning with the uſual Complements of Friendſhip and Salutation; and afterwards declaring, That it was never the intention of the Port to ingage in a War againſt him, the late conflict having only proceeded from a miſtake and miſinterpretation of Orders; and that there was no other deſign, than to compoſe the Civil Differences amongſt themſelves, by advancing that Prince to the Kingly Dignity who was moſt pleaſing and grateful to the People. This Advice was approved by the reſt of the Council, and a Meſſenger diſpatched with the Letter, accompanied with a Cemiter and Veſt of Sables, which are the Signals of the Sultan's Favour. In the mean time the People murmured at the puſillanimity of the 1625. Government, ſaying, That they had ſent an Ambaſſador to thank the Tartar for not ſeizing their whole Fleet, and acknowledg their Obligation to him for the Blows and Wounds he had given their Army. The Tartars alſo gloried in this ſubmiſſion, and took the boldneſs to vaunt of their Linage and Deſcent to be more Ancient and Noble than that of the Ottoman Family; and that in this time of decay and degenerate procedure of that Monarchy, it appertained to the Greatneſs of the Tartars to ſtir up the Fire and ſnuff the Lamp, that the Splendor of that Empire might become more bright and ſhining than in former Ages. And ſo little reſpect did they now maintain for the Port, that they ſurpriſed two Ambaſſadors ſent from the Moſcovite in their way to Conſtantinople, robbed and killed them, as alſo the Turkiſh Chiaus that was with them, leſt his Teſtimony ſhould be brought in for an evidence againſt them.

The form of the Coſſacks Boats.

1626. During theſe Troubles, the Coſſacks taking advantage of the Captain-Paſha's abſence in Tartary, entered the Boſphorus with about an hundred and fifty Sail of Saicks and Boats; theſe Boats and Veſſels which the Coſſacks uſe, are built long and light, with ten Oars of a ſide, and two Men to an Oar; the Head and Stern are not unlike, ſo that they hang the Rudder ſometimes at one end, and ſometimes at the other, being not obliged to turn their Veſſel, but without loſs of time to proceed with that end which happens to be foremoſt. Each Boat carries fifty ſelect Men armed with Fire-arms and Cemiter, in the management of which they are very expert; and are a People ſober, enduring Labour and hard Diet; and ſo ſpeedy in their Incurſions, that they foreſtal the Advices, and commonly ſtrike before they threaten. With theſe Boats and People (as we have ſaid) they entred the Boſphorus, where they burnt ſeveral Villages and Houſes of Pleaſure; on the Grecian ſide they burnt Boyucderi and Tenichioi, on the Aſian ſide Stenia. The appearance of this Enemy ſo near the Imperial City, cauſed a general Conſternation, not unlike that at London, when the Dutch entred the River of Chatham. To oppoſe this Force, there was not one Gally in readineſs, ſo that Saicks, Chimbers, and ſmall Boats were armed, to the number of four or five hundred, and man'd with ſuch people as the preſent haſte and expedition offered; the great Chain was then brought forth to croſs the Boſphorus, which the Grecian Emperors uſed at the Seige of Conſtantinople: and Ten thouſand Men were iſſued from the City to defend the Shoar from depredation and farther miſchief. The Turkiſh Fleet faced the Coſſacks to give them a ſtop, whilſt they hovered about the middle of the Chanel in form of a Half-Moon, and ſo continued the whole day until Sun-ſet; when with the night they returned into the Sea, carrying with them, beſides their Booty, Glory ſufficient to have entred the Chanel, and without blows or oppoſition, to have braved the Capital Seat of the Ottoman Monarchy, and the moſt formidable City of the whole Word. Not many days after they returned again with a greater Force than before, which put the City into the like conſternation; and having hovered about three or four days at the Mouth of the Black Sea, they burnt the Pharos or Lantern with certain Villages thereabouts, and being laden with Spoils and Glory, they again returned into their own Country. Thus we may obſerve, how bold Enemies are made with the weakneſs of a State: a Horſe is ſoon ſenſible of his Rider, when backed by a faint Hand, and an unaccuſtomed Lightneſs, but a ſtiff Rein and a cloſe Knee makes him obedient to his Ruler. All people having diſcovered the imbecillity of the Government, made head againſt it: and the young Sultan had thoſe for his Enemies in the time of his Nonage, which in his ſtrong and fiercer years became the moſt ſubmiſſive and Fawning Slaves in the World.

Bethlem Gabor deſires aſſiſtance againſt the Emperor.

And though at this time the Turkiſh Miniſters were corrupt and rebellious, and the Souldiery mutinous; yet Bethlem Gabor Prince of Tranſylvania, a Chriſtian, was obſervant to the Port, demanding Licence to wage War againſt the Emperor, which was eaſily granted, and upon paiment of the uſual Tribute of Ten thouſand Hungars, the Ambaſſador, with thirteen of his Followers, received Coſtans or Veſts of Honour, and a promiſe of Succour and Protection, as the Condition of his Affairs ſhould require. Thus we ſee, that whilſt the Turks themſelves endeavoured to rent in pieces their own Monarchy, to which one would have thought, that the Chriſtians had moſt reaſon to contribute; yet ſuch was the unhappy Fate of Chriſtendom, that Gabor was the only Perſon at that time to court the Turks; and that for no other Reaſon, than that he might be ſupported and abetted in a War againſt the Emperor and other Chriſtian Princes of Germany.

The Army of Bethlem Gabor conſiſted of above Thirty thouſand Men, with which he marched over all Hungary, having taken moſt Towns of conſideration, unleſs Presburg, alias Poſſonium, Rab, and Komorra. But if we penetrate into the depth and foundation of this War, we ſhall find that it had a deeper Intereſt than that of Gabor, and had its Original from the Diſcord and Civil War of Germany. For the Houſe of Auſtria being at that time in a condition to render it ſelf formidable, and in a poſture to create a jealouſy in all the Princes ſubjected to it, did under colour of ſubduing the Palatine of the Rhyne, oppreſs alſo the Liberty of the Empire, and of the ſeveral States which compoſed it. For after the Emperor, againſt the Conſtitutions of the Golden Seal, and the Senſe of the Electoral Colledg, had diveſted the Palatine and his Children of their Eſtates and Dignity, not ſo much by Force of Arms, as by Deceit and Breach of Promiſe; inſtead of diſbanding the Army, which was to have been performed according to Agreement, new Troops were added; and though the Proteſtant League was diſſolved, yet the Catholick Combination, with all its Adherents, remained armed and immoveable to compel the Proteſtants to a reſtitution of the Eccleſiaſtical Revenue, notwithſtanding the Articles of Peace to the contrary: ſo that the Princes and Towns of the Lower Saxony entring into a new League, raiſed an Army under the Command of Chriſtian of Brunſwick, Biſhop of Alberſtadt. Bethlem Gabor having his Intereſt adjoyned to this Party, entertained the ſame Deſires and Intentions, to ſuppreſs the Greatneſs of the Emperor; and having the juſt complaint to alledge of wanting his annual Penſion of Fifty thouſand Crowns, as was agreed by the Treaty of Niclasbourg, he reſolved to force it by Arms, and take part with the Princes of the Proteſtant Religion which he profeſſed: but becauſe his Srength and Power was not ſufficient, without the aſſiſtance of the Turks, he not only obtained their permiſſion and approbation of this War, as we have ſaid before, but by paiment of Fifty thouſand Dollars preſented to the firſt Vizier, and of Forty thouſand by way of annual Tribute, he procured an 1626. Auxiliary Force of Fifty thouſand Turks and Tartars; with part of which, commanded by Budiani, he made an Irruption into the Lower Auſtria; and with the other, Bethlem himſelf, about the beginning of October, entred into Moravia, defeated the Regiment of Tiſſenbach, retook the Town of Turnova, and routed the Count of Montenegro General for his Imperial Majeſty before the Town of Ghoding on the Frontier of Moravia, which he afterwards beleagured and held beſieged until the 20*th* of November, when Staniſlaus Turzow a Hungarian Palatine became Mediator of the Peace, and at length obtained a Truce: the principal Articles of which were as followeth.

1. That on both parts Arms be laid down for ten months, and all Acts of Hoſtility ceaſe; that on neither ſide any attempt ſhould be made either by force or fraud to take any Caſtles, Forts, Cities, or places of Defence during this time; and that both Germans, Hungarians, and Turks ſhould be alike comprehended.

2. That if the Emperor were deſirous to treat and conclude a final Peace with the Grand Signior, he ſhould uſe Bethlem Gabor as Mediator, and do nothing therein without his privity.

3. That all Places and Forts taken by the Prince of Tranſylvania in his late Expedition, and that all Cities and Caſtles now in poſſeſſion of either, ſhould ſo remain without any alteration.

4. That all Paſſages ſhould be open for free Trade of Merchants, and all other the Subjects and Friends of either ſide.

A Truce being thus concluded, the Turks in their return made great havock, carrying with them great numbers of poor Chriſtians into Slavery, which Gabor out of compaſſion ſeemed willing to redeem with a low price at his own charge; which the Turks refuſing, carried thoſe miſerable Wretches into Captivity. The Count Eſterhaſi Governour of Newhauſel for the Emperor, being highly incenſed at this treacherous Action, contrary to the Truce ſo lately concluded, having drawn out a ſufficient Force from the neighbouring Gariſons, fell on the Rear of the Turks in their March towards Buda, and charged them ſo home on the Banks of the River Niter, that he killed five hundred of them on the place, took all their Baggage, with divers Priſoners, and gave liberty to many Chriſtian Slaves. The next day but one after he charged another Party of them, as they attempted to paſs a Bridg, which the night before he had cauſed to be broken down; of which having killed a great number, the reſt ſaved themſelves by ſwimming: howſoever many Chriſtians procured their liberty thereby, and a conſiderable Booty was made of Horſes, Camels, Waggons, and all Proviſions. The other Troops conſiſting of greater numbers, were worſe treated than the former; for Eſterhaſi having received a Recruit of Horſe from Reiſſemberg Governor of Komorra, and Breuner of Jarvarin or Rab, he proceeded boldly to meet the Turks, and joyning Battel with them, he ſlew twelve hundred on the place, gave liberty to fourteen hundred Chriſtians, took divers of their principal Commanders, with all their Bag and Baggage, beſides a conſiderable quantity of Gold and Silver, in Plate and Mony. Nor were Reiſſemberg and Breuner leſs ſucceſsful over thoſe who paſſed through their Quarters to joyn with the Gariſons of Alba Regalis and Caniſia, having killed ſeven hundred of them, and taken all their Baggage. Moreover Count Serini in his Journey towards Vienna, defeated ſix hundred of them, and preſented their Colours to the Emperour: and Eſterhaſi in like manner after his ſeveral Exploits, offered thirty Cornets at his Feet, with ſix Priſoners of Quality, one of which was Kinſman of Bethlem Gabor. 1626.

Theſe Rebuffs cooled the courage of the Turks a little, and altered the reſolution of the Council for carrying forward the War on the ſide of Germany, as was intended, had the Succeſs anſwered expectation: For theſe Misfortunes abroad, and inteſtine Troubles at home, with Peſtilence and Famine, which at the ſame time greatly afflicted the parts of Conſtatinople (whereby an hundred thouſand People died) abated the Mettle of the Turks, and cauſed them to take new Meaſures in all their Determinations: and for that reaſon Ambaſſadors were ſent both to Vienna and into Poland to renew the Articles of Peace, and ſo to confirm the League, that whilſt the Sultan was imployed in his Wars with Perſia and the Eaſtern Countries, nothing ſhould intervene from the Weſtern Parts to trouble or obſtruct his Progreſs, or recal him from his Enterpriſe. For now the Rebellion of Abaſſa, joined with Bechir Paſha of Bagdat, growing daily more conſiderable, and his ſtrength increaſing to that condition, that he was able to keep the Field in deſpight of the Grand Signiors Forces, he adventured to quarter within five days March of Conſtantinople: and at the ſame time Letters coming from Haſiſh Paſha General of the Army in the Province of Bagdat, that the King of Perſia was entred into the Dominions of the Turk with a powerful Army, a general Conſternation ſeized the whole Turkiſh Court, the wiſeſt and ſtouteſt having occaſion to call up for all their Wiſdom and Courage to aſſiſt at a Time when the Government was aſſailed on all ſides, both at home and abroad. Various were the Counſels and Propoſals in what manner to proceed in Times of ſuch emergency. Firſt it was reſolved to proclaim a War both againſt the King of Perſia, and the Rebels in Aſia, and that whoſoever took of the Grand Signior Pay, from one Aſper a day to higher value, ſhould be in readineſs to ſerve in the War, upon penalty of loſing his Eſtate, of being accounted a Rebel, and his Wife and Children ſold for Slaves. But the more ſober and moderate ſort judged it policy to take off Abaſſa, by ſending him a general Pardon, with a conceſſion of all his Demands, upon condition, that he ſhould turn his Arms upon the King of Perſia, who was the common Enemy of their Country and Religion: but the Janiſaries would by no means aſſent to this Agreement, with a Perſon to whom they bore a more inveterate hatred, than to the Perſian himſelf, as he did alſo to the Janiſaries. For that he might better juſtifie his pretence of Revenge, he declared, That being one day in a Moſch at his Prayers, the murdered Oſman appeared to him, and taking him by the hand, ſaid, My faithful Muſſulman, ſince thou art the moſt generous of all my Slaves, I command thee to revenge my Death, with the Blood of ſixty thouſand Janiſaries and Spahees; good Fortune ſhall accompany thy Arms, and Victory ſhall crown thy Labours. During theſe Intrigues and Difficulties of Reconciliation, Abaſſa, ſpoiled the Leſſer Aſia, and the Perſian King conquered the City and Province of Bagdat, or Babylon, took Kur Aſan Paſha, an old Souldier, Priſoner, poſſeſſed himſelf of Moſul and Leska on the Perſian Sea; and meeting no conſiderable oppoſition, he divided his Army into four parts. The firſt was diſpatched into Meſopotamia, commanded by the King himſelf. The ſecond made Incurſions into Paleſtine. The third infeſted the Coaſt of the Black Sea: and the fourth marched towards Mecha, with hope and deſign of ſharing all the parts of the Eaſtern Empire.

Ali Paſha, who oppoſed the King in Meſopotamia, was ſlain, and his Army wholly defeated, ſo that the Province became a Prey to the Enemy: the ſucceſs in Paleſtine was equally fortunate by the revolt of Damaſcus, a place of great Riches and Importance; the Coaſt of the Black Sea was greviouſly infeſted, and a Port taken near to Trapezond; and little oppoſition being made at Balſora, the Town was taken by that Army in their March towards Mecha and the parts of the Red Sea, where they rendered themſelves Maſters of Medina, the City of their Prophet Mahomet.

To repair theſe loſſes, and to encounter numbers ſo ſtrong and valiant in all parts, the Vizier was diſpeeded with a powerful Force to the Town of Bagdat; but by reaſon of Mutinies and Tumults amongſt the Souldiery, Matters found not the ſucceſs expected: and the Gariſon making valiant and vigorous Sallies againſt the imbecility of the Turkiſh Souldiery, which were always moſt obſtinate and ſtout to oppoſe their own Commanders, obtained an advantage in every Attempt; by which diſcouragement many forſaking their Colours, the Siege was raiſed with diſhonour, and the Intereſt of the Turk impaired, and almoſt irreparably loſt in thoſe Provinces. This News arrived at Conſtantinople, that the Camp was riſen and fled by Night, that they were forced to burn their Tents and Proviſions, and to break their great Artillery and caſt them into the Euphrates: that the Miſeries in the Army had been ſuch by Famine and Peſtilence, and want of all Proviſions and Ammunition, that the like was never known: that the Vizier had beheaded three of his Paſha's, that ſo he might caſt the whole blame upon them; and that now retreating with his Army into the Turkiſh Dominions, the Perſians purſued them in the Rear, and for ten days did execution on them, making the beſt uſe they could of their Victory; which Relation filled the Hearts of all People with ſadneſs, and diſordered the Counſels with confuſion. The Cauſe of which ill Succeſs, according to cuſtom, being imputed to the General, he was deprived of his Office, and ſacrificed to the Fury of the Janiſaries.

The Siege raiſed at Bagdat, & the Turks overthrown.

Theſe Troubles were increaſed at Conſtantinople, by the Addreſſes which the Prince of Tranſylvania made unto the Port by his Kapi-Kahya or Agent, repreſenting to the Grand Signior, That he wanting Heirs Male to ſucceed him in his Principality; the States at a Diet had, with common conſent, elected his Lady for his Succeſſor; and therefore deſired confirmation from the Port. In excuſe of her Sex, he alledged the urgent Neceſſity of the preſent Times, which perſwaded rather to admit of the Government of a Woman, than that his Principality ſhould, for want of an Heir, fall into the Hands of the powerful Family of Auſtria. To make good this Demand, Duke John of Weymar, and Count Manſfelt, arrived in Siliſtria, to whom the Prince of Tranſylvania joined his Troops: and Morteza Paſha of Buda wrote to the Port, that he was marching towards Vatz to meet the Prince, and confer with him concerning theſe Deſigns. The Emperor's Reſident at Conſtantinople greatly exclaimed againſt theſe Proceedings; which ſomething troubled the Counſels of the Turks, who in that Conjuncture were unwilling to give beginnings to a new War; ſo that beſides fair Words, they promiſed to write ſuch Letters to the Paſha of Buda, as ſhould give a ſtop to the Inveſtiture of the Princes. But, to ſay truly, the Inſtructions given were in ſuch ambiguous terms, that they in effect left the whole Matter to the Diſcretion of Morteza to act, as he judged moſt agreeable to the State of Affairs on the Frontiers, and ſecurity of the preſent Peace.

Duke of Weymar and Count Mansfelt join with the Prince of Tranſylvania.

Thus did the Turkiſh Court ſeek to ward off the blow of a War with Germany, and yet ſecretly nouriſhed and encouraged it, by giving Orders to the Paſha of Buda to take up his Winter-quarters with the Prince of Tranſylvania, and to follow his Directions; but yet ſo to govern Matters with Caution, as not to engage too far on uncertain Grounds or doubtful Hazard, but to embrace Propoſitions of Peace, if offered with Honour and Security. In proſecution of theſe Rules, Morteza obſerving, that Weymar and Manſfelt having united their Forces with Gabor, had formed a conſiderable Army, and were able to fight with Walleſtein General of the Imperialiſts; joined alſo his Forces to theirs, judging it a prudent and politick Deſign to wage a War at the Blood and Expence of others. With theſe Encouragements, and with the favour of a good Opportunity, the Confederates fell upon the Army of Walleſtein near the River Gran; who not being able to withſtand their Force and Fury, was put to flight, and purſued in the Rear with great ſlaughter; and endeavouring to paſs the River on two Bridges of Boats, were cloſely followed by the Prince's Forces, who gaining the Paſs, put the whole Army into great amazement, and reſolved to purſue them to the Gates of Presburg, or Vienna.

The Emperor's Army defeated.

Notwithſtanding this Succeſs, the Prince of Tranſylvania obſerving the backwardneſs of his Allies to contribute the Succours of Men and Mony which they had promiſed; and fearing that the unfortunate Eſtate of the Turkiſh Affairs ſhould cauſe the Sultan to diſown the War, diſpeeded a Meſſenger to the Emperor in the Winter-ſeaſon, to excuſe the Conſtraint upon him of taking up Arms, and to offer Terms of Accommodation and Peace. But the Emperor refuſed all Treaties, until ſuch time as Gabor had ſeparated himſelf from his Allies, and from aſſociation with the Turk: Upon which Anſwer, Gabor retired to Caſſovia, and Morteza to Peſth. This Compliance gave beginning to a Treaty at Komara, where the Commiſſioners on part of the Emperor, of the Grand Signior, and Prince of Tranſylvania, aſſembled. All Parties ſeemed inclinable to War, and yet with occult Intentions to make Peace, being neceſſitated thereunto by the urgency of their diſtinct Intereſts. The Emperor was urged by his Wars with the Proteſtants of Germany, and apprehenſion of Forces from England in favour of the Elector Palatine, then King of Bohemia. The Grand Signior was encumbred by the unfortunate condition of his Wars in Aſia: And Bethlem Gabor, jealous of being diſowned by the Port, deſerted by his Allies, and expoſed to fight and contend ſingly with the Emperor. In ſhort, Gabor concluded a Peace with the Emperor apart, which gave ſome Jealouſies and diſpleaſure to the Grand Signior: Howſoever he diſſembled his Diſcontent, and willingly intereſſed Gabor with Morteza as Commiſſioner for him; who being variouſly diſpoſed, yet moved with the conſiderations of their common Advantage, work'd all Differences into a Compoſition of Peace; the Articles of which being brought to Conſtantinople by an Internuncio from the Emperor, and delivered in preſence of the two Ambaſſadors of Gabor, they were accepted

Peace concluded between the Emperor and Gabor.

Articles of Peace concluded between the Emperor of Germany Ferdinand the Second, and Bethlem Gabor, in the Month of December 1626.

I. T*HE Prince of* Tranſylvania doth promiſe, by the Faith of a Chriſtian, never to move Arms, or uſe any Hoſtility againſt the Majeſty of the Emperor, or the Houſe of Auſtria, or their Succeſſors, much leſs to enter into their Dominions with an Army; nor to aid his Enemies, or keep a Correſpondence with them: Not to plot any Innovation in the Kingdom of Hungary, or other Chriſtian Countries: Nor to ſtir up or provoke the Turks, Tartars, or others, to invade them: Not to entertain or aſſiſt in any evil Counſel againſt his Majeſty, nor to give ear to the Requeſts and Deſires of his Enemies; but rather to reveal all their Conſpiracies and Wickedneſſes, which ſhall be made known unto him; and by all means to demonſtrate and ſhew a ſincere mind truly deſirous of Peace, and ſollicitous of the Common Good.

II. That the Prince ſhall inſtantly depart with his whole Army, out of the Territories and Cities of the Emperor; and that he ſhall reſtore as well all Goods belonging to the Imperial Treaſure, as thoſe of his faithful Subjects.

III. That he ſhall remove from him the Rebel Mansfelt, and all other his Followers and Adherents, deſirous to invade the Dominions of the Emperor: And that he ſhall not aid any Stranger whatſoever, who at his Inſtance hath entered into the Territories of his Majeſty with Count Mansfelt; to whom Letters of Publick Safety ſhall be given, that they may return by twenty or thirty in a Troop, conditionally, that in no place of their Retreat they ſhall joyn with the Enemies of the Emperor.

IV. That ſeeing it is fit, for Eſtabliſhment of the Peace, that the Inhabitants of Countries and Cities belonging to the Prince, by conſent of the Emperor, ſhould remain, during his Life, in Obedience and Fidelity to him; and that thoſe Inhabitants ſhould do Homage to the Emperor, (ſaving their corporal Oath to the Prince) to keep inviolate theſe Articles, That they ſhould have leave, by Letters of full Authority and Power, granted them by the Prince in their firſt Aſſemblies and Conventions, to make ſuch Oath of Homage.

V. That at the ſame time of performing the Homage and Oath, beſides the Oath before the laſt War, they ſhall take a new Oath according to the Agreement between the Prince and the Commiſſioners of the Emperor.

VI. The Prince ſhall procure, that all Places upon the Confines, which were taken by the Turks in the laſt War, be reſtored; and that all Captives, taken Priſoners, ſhall be ſet at liberty: And that the Prince ſhall procure the freedom of all ſuch the Emperor's Subjects as ſhall be in the Turkiſh Captivity.

VII. That all the Subjects of the Emperor, lately incited and drawn to the Service of the Prince, ſhall be free from their Oath: and if the Prince hath any of their Writings Obligatory in his Hands, that he ſhall reſtore them: And that theſe Conditions being confirmed, all other things formerly treated, ſhall remain in their former State and Vigour.

VIII. That if any other Difficulties ariſe, they ſhall be accommodated with Fidelity and Quietneſs by Commiſſioners on both Parts: And that all thoſe who in the laſt Commotions have ſerved the Prince, ſhall be abſolved according to the Treaty and Agreement at Vienna.

IX. That all the Inhabitants of Cities and Countries, which have ſerved the Prince, ſhall be abſolved; only thoſe excepted, who have voluntarily taken up Arms againſt the Emperor; for whom the Prince only ſhall intercede, excuſing always private Men, who have done private Wrongs; for they ſhall, according to Law and Cuſtom, ſeek their Reſtitution by Civil Action.

X. That all other Articles of Peace concluded at Nichilsburg and Vienna, ſhall remain in their former Vigour and Force: And that all Goods of the Emperor's Clergy, poſſeſſed by the Prince from the Year 1619, to this preſent Day, ſhall be reſtored; except the Abbies of Replana belonging to the Seminaries of Strigonium, for which the Prince ſhall pay yearly to the Emperor five hundred Florens.

Theſe Articles being thus agreed, and ſigned, and approved by the Sultan, in the Month of September following 1627, the Articles between the Emperor and the Grand Signior were alſo agreed at Komara; the which are as follow, tranſlated out of the Turkiſh, word for word.

T*HAT ſeeing the Peace eſtabliſhed formerly at* Zitwar, Vienna, Komara, and Chiarman, hath remained in the ſame State, and in the ſame Articles, without any alteration, it ſhall not be violated by any new occaſion of Contention.

That the Differences of Vatz, whereof is made mention at the preſent, ſhall reſt in the ſame State that the Commiſſioners on both ſides ſhall agree.

That the new Forts built upon the Confines of Croatia, contrary to the Peace, ſhall be demoliſhed. To which purpoſe our ſaid Deputy Mehmet, and our Viſier Morteſa Paſha, ſhall meet upon the Frontiers of Buda with your

1626. your Deputies, at the Time appointed by the Treaty; and thereupon the places on both ſides ſhall cauſe to be demoliſhed the Forts built contrary to the Peace: Wherein if they find any Impediment, they ſhall chuſe able and valiant Men to perform and execute the ſaid Service.

That after the Approbation of this happy Peace, your great Ambaſſador ſhall come to Komara, and ours ſhall repair with our Imperial Letters to Strigonium: and there one of them adviſing the other, yours ſhall ſet forward to our happy Port, and ours ſhall advance to you. For ſo it is agreed by our Imperial Order, both carrying with them the new Imperial Capitulations.

That all Complaints of Villages ſubject to both parts, ſhall be laid aſide, and no Violences, Taxes, or Contribution, contrary to our former Convention, ſhall be exacted. And all Forts built in the common Confines, ſhall be raiſed. And reciprocally it ſhall be made known, according to the ancient Treaty, what great Men do dwell amongſt our Tributaries. And for the execution of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Articles of the Peace of Zitwa, the Tenth of Vienna, and the Fourth of Komara and Chiarman (for ſuch was then the Agreement) two Capigi-Paſha's of our high Port ſhall be deputed and diſpatched, the one to this ſide, and the other to that ſide of the Danube. And upon your part you ſhall ſend two ſuch qualified Perſons to the ſame places: who being met together with the Deputies of Morteſa Paſha, and the Palatine of Hungary, ſhall rectify all Diſorders, and ſee that good Juſtice be done on both Parties; for ſo it is our moſt High Pleaſure.

That the Slaves which have been taken during this our Treaty, ſhall be freed and ſet at liberty without any Ranſom: And thoſe who were taken before the ſaid Treaty, ſhall be exchanged and Redeemed, according to their Qualities and Eſtates, by the interpoſition of Morteſa Paſha, and the Palatine of Hungary deputed for that purpoſe.

For the Good of poor People on both ſides, the Commiſſioners have thought fit to conclude this renewed Peace for Twenty five Years, from 1627. Whereunto we have given our Imperial Aſſent.

That all Merchants, and other our Subjects on both parts, ſhall have ſafe paſſage and conduct through both our Dominions: And we have given command to our Paſha's, Beglerbeghs, Generals, Beghs, and Captains, upon our Confines, to apprehend, bring into Juſtice, and puniſh all ſuch as ſhall any way diſturb or moleſt them contrary to the Peace. As likewiſe the Palatine of Hungary, and other your Miniſters ſhall do on your part, if they find any ſuch Offenders.

That our Beglerbeghs, Sanzacks, Captains, and Governors; and your Generals, Commanders, and Captains, ſhall upon occaſion imploy all ſuch Perſons as are lovers of the Peace and Common Good.

That there ſhall be no Damage or Hurt done to any of our Subjects in any of your Kingdoms or Dominions, neither by Sea nor Land; as there ſhall none be done to yours in our Dominions. 1626.

That all by-paſt Wrongs, Enmities, and Unkindneſſes, on both parts, ſhall be forgotten and laid aſleep: and that this happy Peace ſhall be ſincerely and firmly continued and kept inviolate.

Upon Condition that the Emperor perform and obſerve all the aforeſaid Articles, and that there follow no Action from any Miniſters, contrary to the ſaid Peace: We promiſe and ſwear, by God our Creator, who made the whole World of Nothing; and by the Honour which we bear to our moſt high Prophet Mahomet Muſtapha, That there ſhall not be done, during the whole Term of the ſaid Peace, the leaſt Hurt or Damage to the Subjects, Countries, Kingdoms, Caſtles, or Forts of the ſaid Emperor, by any of our Miniſters or Armies, nor to any Chriſtian Slaves ſubject to our happy Port.

By theſe Articles we may obſerve, that both Parties were deſirous of a preſent Peace, rather than one which was durable; for things are ſo ſlubber'd over to ſerve the preſent Occaſion, that they leave all Diſputes undecided, till Time ſhould happen more proper to interpret them with the Sword, than with the Pen: like Sores obducted by an unskilful Chirurgion, which feſtering within, muſt be again opened before they are cured: howſoever they ſerved the turn of Gabor, whoſe Intereſt it was to maintain an ill Correſpondence between the two Emperors.

Peace being thus concluded between Ferdinand the Second and Sultan Morat, gave ſome reputation to the Affairs of the Turks: ſo that notwithſtanding the late ſucceſs of the Perſian in their War, by raiſing the Siege of Bagdat, and overthrow of the Turkiſh Army; yet that King finding himſelf now engaged alone, and ſingly to contend with the Ottoman Power, feared the Puiſſance of that Empire, leſt being rouſed and heated with the ſenſible Pinches of the late Diſgrace, they ſhould call up and invigorate all their Forces to a Revenge, which might at length tend to a ruin and deſtruction of Perſia, unleſs Fortune, which attended the firſt auſpicious beginnings with Succeſs, did alſo continue conſtant, and ſtill accompany their Arms, which could hardly be expected. 1627.

Wherefore on theſe Conſiderations becoming more faint in proſecution of the War, the Perſian diſpatched an Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople, furniſhed with various Propoſals and Projects for a Peace; but ſtill Mattters driving ſo as to reſerve the City and Province of Bagdat, or Babylon, in the hands of the Perſian, the Treaty became ineffectual, in regard the Vizier (who was then called Halil Paſha) judged it a high and an irrecoverable diſreputation to the Empire, to be diſmembred of ſo principal a part of it. Wherefore the Ambaſſador being diſpatched away with ſome neglect, the Turks armed with that diligence and heat, that they entred Perſia with an Army of an hundred and fifty thouſand Men; with which appearance the people being diſmayed, ſuffered Tauris to be taken without much oppoſition. From hence marching to Bagdat, they found found the City well provided and defended with a numerous Gariſon, from whence many Sallies were made with variety of Fortune, till at length the Turkiſh Souldiers being wearied and tired with inceſſant labour and watchings, many of them fled from their Colours: and with ſuch diminutions, the Army being much abated in its Numbers, the Vizier withdrew them from the Perſian Dominions.

Another Expedition into Perſia.

Some Months after the Turkiſh Army being reinforced, the Vizier entring again into Perſia, overthrew the Trucmen who oppoſed him in his March, and deſtroyed the Gregorians, who were Friends to the Perſian, with a very great ſlaughter; took Moroc their General, and cut off his Head: And adding to theſe Victories, the report of having taken ſome few inconſiderable Towns, his Expedition ended without other Advantages, or Progreſs of their Arms. This ill Succeſs much troubled the Councils at Conſtantinople; for they conſidered that they had now waged an expenſive, laborious War, for the ſpace of three Years, without any Effect agreeable to the Blood and Charge which maintained it, but rather to the Loſs and Damage of the Empire. The Souldiers abhorred the length and tediouſneſs of the Way, and the miſery of the March, being to paſs over vaſt Countries and Deſarts, where there was nothing beſides Rocks, Sands, and Barrenneſs. Many Horſes, Camels, and other Beaſts of Burden, periſhed for want of Nouriſhment; and where Proviſions were to be had, the Price was ſo exceſſive, that the Timariots and other Souldiers had not a Purſe to defray their Charges. The Enemy likewiſe was very ſtrong, for the Sofi was at the Head of forty thouſand brave Horſe, which daily inſeſted the Ottoman Camp, beat their Convoys, and cut off their Proviſions, and ſo obſtructed them that they could not advance.

Propoſition made by the Perſian for a Peace.

Rejected by the Turk.

The Vizier Halil, then General, being diſcouraged by theſe Diſaſters, was inclinable to accept of the Propoſition made by the Perſian, viz. That Babylon ſhould remain to his eldeſt Son in Fee, and to his Heirs and Succeſſors, acknowledging to the Grand Signior a Tribute as great as the yearly Revenue which proceeded from it, at the time when it was in the Hands of the Sultan. But this middle Way ſeemed an Expedient diſhonourable to the Greatneſs of this Empire, and that which argued puſillanimity and want of courage in the Government, and therefore was rejected by the Council of State, as well as by the Military Men. Howſoever the Perſians taking their Meaſures by the diſpoſition they diſcovered in the Vizier thereunto, adventured to diſpatch an Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople with tender of the ſame Project; but as he was coldly and faintly received, ſo he was in a few days diſpatched with few words, and little reſpect, as if he had been ſent as a Spy to diſcover the State and Condition of the City, and the Inclination of the Prince, rather than to obtain any Benefit by the Treaty. For now Amurat growing into Years, increaſed in Spirit, and diſcovered a Martial Courage; he began to leave his Delights, and Walks in Gardens, and the ſociety with his Mother and Women, and to aſſume thoughts of War and Government: ſuch as entertained him in ſoftneſs and luxurious Paſtimes, were reproved by the Miniſters about him, and by them perſwaded to buckle on his Armour, and to delight in Martial Exerciſes: So that now new Meaſures were taken in all Affairs: And in the firſt place, Halil the Great Vizier was recalled from being General in Perſia, and the Paſha of Darbiquier put into his Place; and though he was Brother-in-Law to the Grand Signior, yet being eſteemed at Court as a Perſon who had amaſſed great Riches in his Employment, he was forced to diſgorge five hundred thouſand Crowns as an eaſe of his Burden, and an Atonement to pacify the Sultan for the Fault of his Misfortunes and ill Succeſs.

The Pirats of Tunis and Algier trouble the State.

In theſe Times of Licentiouſneſs and Revolt, the Pirats of Algier and Tunis, began alſo to caſt off their Reſpect and Reverence to the Ottoman Empire; for being become Rich by the Prizes they had taken on Chriſtian Veſſels, they reſolved to ſet up for themſelves, and to eſteem the Peace which Chriſtian Princes had made with the Grand Signior, not to concern them; but as if their Governments had been independent, demanded a particular Treaty, and diſtinct Articles with themſelves: So that now daring to do any thing, ſix Veſſels of Tunis chaſed ſome Chriſtian Ships into Rhodes, and there attaqued them, notwithſtanding that the Caſtle ſhot at them. They afterwards took a Dutch Ship, which had laden at Alexandria: and entring the Port of Salines in Cyprus, they engaged with two Venetians; the leſſer Ship made a good reſiſtance, but having no help, ſhe was thrice fired, and at laſt burnt: the other being a Ship of eight hundred Tuns, was cowardly ſet on fire by the Mariners, and abandoned, eſcaping aſhore with their Boats. Then they ſailed for Scanderone, where finding a Dutch Ship and a Polaca, they took both, and then landed. The Aga of the Scale, with all the Inhabitants, fled; ſo that finding no oppoſition, they ranſacked and robbed all the Ware-houſes, and afterwards ſet them on fire: The greateſt Loſs fell upon the Engliſh and Dutch, the firſt loſt about ten thouſand Dollars, and the latter about thirty thouſand.

Of theſe Loſſes, and breach of Peace, the Chriſtian Ambaſſadors much lamented; and complained, that if ſome Remedy were not applied thereto, all Trade muſt be given over, no Security being to be expected in the Articles and Faith of the Grand Signior: To which, though the Vizier and Great Men did ſeem to yield a favourable Ear, and promiſe Redreſs: Yet being corrupted with ſome ſhare of the Spoils, and ſweetned with part of the Robbery, they began to reject the Memorials of the Ambaſſadors, and to allow the Pleas of the Pirats, as grounded on ſome ſolid Foundation of Reaſon and Religion: ſuffering them to publiſh Diſcourſes, that the Turks were obliged to maintain a perpetual War with the Chriſtians, as Enemies to their Law and Alchoran; and though Policy may ſuggeſt ſome Conveniencies by Peace with them, yet thoſe Conſiderations are Matters of Sin rather than of Reaſon.

To make all this good, the Divan of Tunis ſent two Deputies to remonſtrate the great Benefit and Advantage the Port received by the Depredations and hoſtile Acts which they committed on the Chriſtians: And to inculcate this Argument the better, they declared, That they had lately taken two Gallies of Malta, out of the Spoils of which, they preſented unto the Sultan two Stirrups of Gold, with divers Slaves; two of which were Cavaliers, one of the Roman, and the other of the French Nation: thoſe which were Youths, and comely in ſhape and feature, were entred into the Service of the Seraglio; and the more ſtrong and robuſtous, were committed to the Service of the Gallies; ſo that the Turks were inwardly pleaſed with theſe Piracies, howſoever gave good words to the Chriſtian 1627. Ambaſſadors, promiſed much, and effected nothing.

At that time Trade flouriſhed greatly in thoſe Parts, and had done much more, had it not been interrupted by the Piracies of Barbary; and the Trade was eſpecially ſo great with Venice, that a Turkiſh Merchant called Rodul Aga, whoſe whole Negotiation and Dealing was for that place, died worth a Million of Soltanees; of which, for want of Children, the Grand Signior became the ſole Heir.

But one Accident happened about this Time on the Seas, worthy to be recounted: The Seas (as we have ſaid) ſwarming then with Pirats, the General of Candia, with three Gallies, coaſting on the Seas for defence and protection of Merchant-Ships, arrived in the Port of Andro; from whence eſpying a Gally plying cloſe under the Shore, and believing her to be a Corſaire, or Pirat, made up to her; and becauſe it was a about the glimpſe of the Evening, ſo that ſhe could not be well known or diſtinguiſhed, the General raſhly charged her; and meeting a ſtout reſiſtance, many were killed before it was known that the Gally belonged to the Archipelago, commanded by Dervis Bei, one of the Grand Signior's Captains: but ſo ſoon as the Miſtake was diſcovered, the Candiot General demanded of the Turk a thouſand Excuſes, returned him his Gally and Slaves again, and whatſoever was taken from him, beſtowing with them an infinity of Complements, ſuppoſing that thereby the Spirit of the Turk being ſomewhat appeaſed and mollified, he would repreſent this Encounter with the more favourable Terms and Advantage at the Port. Notwithſtanding which Offices of Kindneſs, Dervis Bei, without farther loſs of time paſſed up to Conſtantinople, bringing his Gally in without Lantern, ſhot thorough, ill treated, and ſhattered, feigning himſelf alſo to be wounded; related, that he had loſt forty four Levents, and ſeventy ſeven Slaves which were killed; and that all the Haratch or Tribute-Mony, which was collected for the Grand Signior's Service from the ſeveral Iſlands, was robbed and embezled by theſe Candiots. His Complaints were aggravated by many Circumſtances, and being aſſiſted with the Clamours of other Beys or Captains of Gallies; the Noiſe and Diſpute was exceeding high in the Divan, urging, that the Venetians were obliged to make good a Loſs, which they had cauſed rather out of Malice than Miſtake.

A Fight at Sea by miſtake.

At that time Georgio Giuſtiniano reſided at Conſtantinople for the moſt Serene Republick; who to oppoſe the high Clamours of theſe Complainants, ſhewed Courage, and accompanied his Anſwers with Prudence and Reſolution, which are often very convincing in the Turkiſh Court. They alledged, that the Peace was broken. He anſwered, That it would not be the firſt time; and that they ought not to yield entire Credit to the Relation of Perſons paſſionate and partial in their own Cauſe: that ſuch Accidents as theſe, were as ordinary and common in the World as Cold and Heat, as fair and foul Weather; and that ſo ſoon as the Error was diſcovered, and the Gally known not to belong to Barbary, but to the Grand Signior, it was punctually and entirely reſtored, with all the Excuſes imaginable.

In ſhort, this Buſineſs which had ſo bad an Aſpect at the firſt, by the dexterity of this Miniſter, and giving ſomething to Dervis Bei, whereby to ſtop his Mouth, the Complaint ceaſed, and all farther Proceedings were ſuperſeded.

Propoſals of Accommodation with Abaſſa.

The Wars in Perſia being unſucceſsful, it was propoſed in Council, that a Peace ſhould be made, if poſſible, with Abaſſa Paſha; that his Demands, whatſoever they were, ſhould be granted, and promiſes given him of Honours and Preferment: But the inveterate Enmity and Hate which the Janiſaries bore him, and the difficulty there was to perſwade Abaſſa, that the Overtures made him were free and candid, and not mixed with Treachery and Deſign, were Obſtructions not to be obviated or overcome. Wherefore Abaſſa keeping mutual Intelligence with the Perſians, and receiving aſſiſtance and ſuccours from them, was become very formidable and ſtrong, and the Town of Erzirum well fortified with Works and a numerous Garriſon. Howſoever the Janiſaries, his mortal Enemies, preſſing the Vizier to proceed againſt him, at length obliged him to beſiege the Place; which having done, and cloſely begirt it, the moſt forward and brave amongſt the Janiſaries, were the firſt to ſcale the Walls, but were repulſed by the valour of ſtout and reſolute Souldiers; for they knowing that there was no other ſafety but in their Arms, and no other Mercy than an ignominious Death, being the juſt Reward of their Rebellion, refuſed to give or receive Quarter: Wherefore they made frequent Sallies on the Enemy, and as many Janiſaries of them as they took Priſoners, they immediately hanged about the Walls, as a ſpectacle of Horror to their Aſſociates. This Reſolution and Cruelty, deterred the Turks from their frequent Aſſaults and Storms made upon the Town; and the many Batteries and Fortifications, rendred the Place almoſt impregnable; ſo that there ſeemed no other hopes to remain, but to overcome them by a long Siege and Famine: But Abaſſa had ſo well provided againſt this Danger, with ſuch plenty of Proviſions, that the Turkiſh Army began to be more ſtraitned for want of Suſtenance than the Beſieged: ſo that becoming weary and diſcouraged amidſt ſo many Difficulties, they raiſed the Siege with ſuch diſorder and haſte, that they left ſeveral Pieces of Cannon behind them; and retiring with ſome confuſion, were charged in the Rear, ſo that many Janiſaries fell a Sacrifice to the hate and revenge of the Enemy.

Erzirum beſieged.

The Siege raiſed.

The News of this Succeſs coming to Conſtantinople, was ill received; but the Diſaſter thereof, according to the uſual Cuſtom, was attributed to the Vizier who was General; for which Cauſe he was deprived of his Office, and the Selictar Aga (who carries the Sword before the Grand Signior) was put into his place, a Perſon of a fierce, bloody, and cruel Diſpoſition.

New Troubles from Tattary.

To theſe, new troubles were added out of Tartary. For Mahomet the King of that Country, exalted to the Princely Dignity (as we have already declared) by the Favour and Election of that People, though contrary to the ſenſe and pleaſure of the Port, was now fallen from the good eſteem which they conceived for him, becauſe he gave ſome hindrance to their uſual Incurſions on the Polonians and Coſſacks, out of memory and gratitude to the aſſiſtance they had contributed towards his Election; for which reaſon being, as it were, famiſhed for want of their uſual Depredations, they refuſed to obey his Commands; and then openly threw off their Obedience to him as their Prince. The Turks, who always envied this Dignity to Mahomet, rejoiced to ſee this Diſcord between him and his People, and therefore thought it time to make uſe of this occaſion to re-inſtate Gherey the elder 1627. Brother into the poſſeſſion of his Kingdom; whom the Turks, for his better ſecurity, having placed at Rhodes, the uſual Retirement of the Tartarian Princes, diſpatched a Squadron of Gallies to fetch him from thence to Conſtantinople; where being arrived, he was received with a magnificent and Princely Entertainment by the Sultan: that ſo the Fame thereof forerunning his arrival in Tartary, the people might be better prepared to concur with the Port in their acceptance of him for their King. He was afterwards conducted to Caffa, the Grand Signior's Town in Tartary, with a ſtrong Fleet of fifty Gallies, where at his firſt landing he was received by Cant-Emir, a rich and powerful Tartar, and Chief of the Turkiſh Faction, and by many others with great honour and ſolemnity, with whom alſo a conſiderable Party moſt willingly engaged. But the Coſſacks of Poland and Circaſſians, Friends to Mahomet the Brother, joyning their Troops to his Forces, became too Strong for the Turks; for giving them Battel near the Incloſures of the Danube, at a place called Bandet, they defeated them, and killed three or four thouſand of their Men, putting all to Fire and Sword round about; and entring on the Seas with their Fleet of Boats, took five of the Turkiſh Gallies: with which ill Succeſs, the Tartars, which took part with Cant-Emir, being diſcouraged, abandoned their Colours and fled; ſo that Cant-Emir was forced to take Sanctuary in Caffa, which being a Town belonging to the Grand Signior, it was hoped, that the reverence they owed to that Name, would cauſe them to refrain all Violence thereunto. But the Tartars, provoked by this late effuſion of Blood, loſt all reſpect to that Government; ſo that beſieging the Town, they aſſaulted and took it, and therein the Son of Cant-Emir whom they cut in pieces, the Father eſcaping in a diſguiſe from the City.

Brother

The News hereof arriving at Conſtantinople was greatly diſpleaſing, and cauſed many ſerious Debates and Conſultations thereupon; the wiſeſt and moſt ſober of the Council was for diſſembling the Matter, and with their uſual dexterity to ſuffer what they could not remedy: for that it was by no means adviſable in the preſent conjuncture of Affairs, to proceed unto an open Rupture with the Tartars, fearing leſt the Chriſtians, Perſians, and other Enemies ſhould make a benefit of this Occaſion, and joyning with a Nation ſo ſtrong in Horſe, ſhould dangerouſly preſs upon the Empire, and force them to the ultimate extremity of Affairs. Wherefore an Envoy Extraordinary was ſent to the Tartars, who covering the inward ſentiments of Regret and Anger, which the Sultan conceived for the late Diſgrace, ſeemed to wonder at the Cauſe and Reaſon of the laſt Engagement, as if it had been acted without the knowledg or order of the Grand Signior; and thus with gentle Terms inſinuating, that the Surrender of Caffa would be very acceptable to the Port, and that which would atone for all miſcarriages, and be ſuch an offering of Pacification, as would reconcile all paſt Differences, and reſtore a perfect Correſpondence between the Sultan and them: the Tartars readily aſſented to the Demand, upon condition, that the Turks ſhould impoſe no other King upon them than him, whom by general conſent they had elected for their Prince.

1628. Though Differences were thus concluded with the Tartars, yet the Coſſacks continued ſtill their Enmities, entring the Black Sea with eighty Saicks, which they ſo infeſted, that the Turks could for that Year avail themſelves little of their Navigation in thoſe Seas: ſo that the Turks, to curb theſe Inſolencies, gave Orders to build two Forts at the Mouth of the Black Sea: the Poliſh Ambaſſador made Complaint hereof, and proteſted againſt it, as an Act contrary to the Capitulations of Peace; but the Turks eſteem little of the Air of Bravadoes, whilſt they are not accompanied with ſomething elſe more ſolid than their own Levity.

But the grand Concernments which buſied the Thoughts of the Turks, was the Rebellion of Abaſſa, and the War in Perſia, the management of which was the charge and care of the Selictar Aga lately made Vizier, called Serches Paſha. His Head-quarters were at the beginning of this Year taken up at Iconium, called by the Turks Conie; and Abaſſa was encamped at Kaiſaria, againſt whom the Vizier marched; and being nearly approached, the Janiſaries earneſtly urged, that Battel might be given the Enemy; but the Vizier having received Inſtructions not to engage, if poſſible, but rather to enter into a Treaty, and to propoſe Terms of Accommodation, delayed the Time, and with various Excuſes, eluded the preſent premures of the Janiſaries; at which they became ſo angry, that they flew into an open Mutiny, cutting the Cords of his Tents, ſtoning him, and wounding him in the Head: by which open Violence, the Vizier being compelled to make known his Orders, he aſſembled the chief Commanders of the Spahees and Janiſaries, giving them to underſtand, that the Grand Signior's Pleaſure was, to make up the Difference with Abaſſa, as the only means to conclude an inteſtine and unnatural War, and to be able to withſtand the Perſians, and regain the Country and Reputation which the Turks had loſt. This Propoſition ſeemed plauſible to the Commanders at the General Aſſembly, and more eſpecially, becauſe it was the Pleaſure and Injunction of the Grand Signior; but more difficult it was to incline the rough and obſtinate minds of the Janiſaries to a reſolutian ſo different to their Natures, and ſo contrary to that Revenge which they had deeply rooted in their Hearts, and ſworn to execute: howſoever the perſwaſions which the Officers uſed to their inferiour Souldiers, putting them in memory of the Blood of their Companions, and how deſtructive the continuance of ſuch a War muſt neceſſarily prove for the future by thoſe large effuſions of Blood which they muſt expect farther to make, were ſo prevalent upon them, that at length they condeſcended to a Treaty, and to receive Abaſſa for a Friend and a Fellow-Souldier. Abaſſa at firſt ſuſpecting ſome Treachery, refuſed to give a private meeting to the Vizier; but the Vizier giving his Brother the Beglerbegh of Caramania, and the Paſha of Anatolia for Hoſtages, the Day and Place for a Conference was appointed; where both Parties meeting, Articles were agreed, That Abaſſa ſhould ſtill continue to be Paſha of Erzirum, his Son Paſha of Boſra, his Cahya, or Lieutenant, to be Paſha of Maraſch, (all which were Places on the Confines of Perſia) a general Act of Pardon and Amneſtie was to be given to Abaſſa and his whole Army, and the Articles ſworn unto in the moſt ſolemn manner by the Vizier, and confirmed in the publick Camp of the Janiſaries, who alſo promiſed to maintain this Word and Promiſe of the Vizier; to all which the Grand Signior gave his Hand, and affixed his Royal Signature.

The Janiſaries mutiny.

They conſent to treat with Abaſſa.

Abaſſa reconciled to the Grand Signior.

A Reconciliation being in this manner compleated, the City of Erzirum reſigned it ſelf to the the Obedience of the Grand Signior, and the Army of Abaſſa was employed on the Confines of Perſia, and converted againſt the Enemy. The Vizier alſo was appointed to proceed on the ſame Enterpriſe; but his Army was ſo ill provided of all Neceſſaries, that he made his Excuſe, and refuſed to march forward: But on the contrary, he returned to Conſtantinople in company with Abaſſa; where, with many demonſtrations of Friendſhip and Reſpect, he was conducted to the preſence of the Grand Signior to receive Honour, and the Reward of his Penitence, and return to Obedience. The approach of theſe two great Perſonages near to Conſtantinople, made much noiſe and rumor in the City; ſome blamed the weakneſs of the Government for accepting an Enemy unto Favour, and that the crowning of his Rebellion with Rewards, was to encourage others in the like Practices.

The Vizier and Abaſſa make their Entry into Conſtantinople.

The Vizier was alſo murmured againſt for leaving the Army and the War, contrary to the Royal Command, by ſuch as were emulous of his Greatneſs: But as Envy is converted into Veneration, and ceaſes as Smoke doth, when it is blown up by the Flame of Succeſs and Glory; ſo thoſe who were emulous of theſe Perſons, ſubmitted to all obſequious Offices towards them; and diſſembling their Malice, went to meet them as far as Scutari, that they might add to their Train and Equipage, and help at the Solemnity of their Entrance. All People now caſt their Eyes on the Vizier and Abaſſa, as the two great Men of this Age; the firſt was eſteemed for his dexterous and ſucceſsful management in bringing over Abaſſa to his Submiſſion and Obedience; for though he was not famed much for his great Feats of Arms, yet this Reconciliation of Abaſſa was accounted a Maſter-piece of Policy, and better Service than a Victory. Abaſſa alſo drew the Eyes of the People, who crowded to ſee ſo great a Captain, that could contend with the Port, and put all Aſia into Diſturbance, and in concluſion could make the ſame Arms ſerve his Maſter, which had lately before given a check and ſtop to all the Ottoman Force. The Vizier was the firſt introduced to the Royal Preſence, where being graciouſly received, he was preſented with a Veſt of Sables and a Cemiter ſet with Jewels. Abaſſa was afterwards admitted, and having performed his Obeiſance by touching the Ground with his Forehead after their faſhion; he declared, That he never was other than a faithful Vaſſal to the Sultan, and that he had taken up Arms for his ſake, that he might ſubjugate the inſolence of the Janiſaries, and with their Blood revenge the Death, and ſacrifice to the Ghoſt of his murdered Brother Oſman, that they might learn to reverence their Princes for the future, & learn to know how ſacred the Blood is of their Soveraign. The Grand Signior ſeemed kindly to accept this Apology, and as a Token thereof, beſtowed three Veſts upon him; which was a treble Honour of that kind, and made him Paſha of Boſna; on which employment he immediately entred: And though when ſuch offices are beſtowed, it is commonly the cuſtom for that Perſon, who is inveſted in the Employment given, to kiſs the Sleeve of the Grand Signior publickly by way of Thanks: Yet, leſt ſuch Demonſtration of Honour ſhould ill affect the Eyes of the Janiſaries, and cauſe murmuring and repinings amongſt the moſt envious of the Souldiery, his laſt Audience was deſigned privately, and his Diſpatch procured in more ſecret and familiar manner, and therefore more obliging than was uſual.

The Jews at Conſtantinople how treated.

To yield ſome aſſiſtance to the preſent growing Charges of the Empire, the Vizier impoſed a heavy Tax on the Chriſtians and Jews; on the firſt it was levied with all ſeverity; but the Jews found more favour by their Arts, and ſecret management of Affairs, for they are a People of ſome Authority and Power in Turkie: they are curſed by particular Perſons, but careſſed by the generality: they are Slaves in all Countries, and yet acquire ſomewhat of Maſterſhip and Propriety: they are Vagabonds, and yet every Country is their own: they cannot buy Lands, and yet daily increaſe their Fortunes: they multiply in abundance, becauſe they all marry, and are not deſtroyed by Wars: they are great Confidents of the Turks, and Enemies to the Chriſtians. In ſhort, Covetouſneſs in Conſtantinople is like a publick Courtiſan, to whom the Jews are the Panders and Ruffians.

The Grand Signior paſſing one day through the Streets, unhappily met with the Ambaſſador of the Prince of Tranſylvania; who becauſe he did not immediately deſcend from his Horſe in token of Reverence, he cauſed him and his whole Family to be impriſoned; but being afterwards excuſed by the Chimacam, to have only been a matter of inadvertency, his Omiſſion was pardoned, and ſo releaſed from his Reſtraint.

The Souldiery having for a long time been governed by a looſe and gentle hand, continued their licentious way of living, committing many outrages on the Merchants and Inhabitants of Conſtantinople; againſt which many Decrees having been publiſhed, and Proclamations made, without any effect or notice of the Souldiery, the Vizier was unwilling to dally longer; and therefore taking a Spahee and a Janiſary, hanged them up, and cut off their Heads: and with ſuch courſe and method of Severity, he ſo abated the haughty Stomachs of the Souldiers already mortified by the aſſumption of Abaſſa into favour, that they began to yield unto Command, and to behold their Rulers with an eye of Reſpect, as thoſe which were ſeated in ſome degree above themſelves; for till now there was ſcarce a common Janiſary, but who thought himſelf to be the Creator or Elector of his General, and therefore to be little inferior to him in Power and Dignity.

And as this Vizier was ſevere towards the Souldiery, ſo he demeaned himſelf with equal rigour towards the Paſha's and Grandees of the Court; which though it was an Humor in the Vizier at that conjuncture, laudable and neceſſary, yet it procured him ſuch enmity, as removed him at a diſtance, and cauſed him to be ſent into Perſia to command the Army, and by that means to expoſe him to the hazard and difficulties of doubtful Succeſs in a dangerous War.

The Vizier being departed, the Grand Signior appeared in publick on Horſe-back, together with his Brother by his ſide, an unuſual ſight amongſt the Turks: But the Queen-Mother, who in abſence of the Vizier ruled much, commanded that it ſhould be ſo. The Grand Signior had this Year a Son born, which cauſed great rejoycing at Conſtantinople, becauſe there were few Males at that time ſurviving of the Ottoman Line; but ſcarce was the Feſtival ended before the Child died.

But let us now for a while withdraw our Diſcourſe from the Wars of Perſia, and look to the Actions in Poland and Tranſylvania. Mehmet the late King of Tartary, who was ſo diſpleaſing to the Port (as we have already related) was now dead; to whom ſucceeded a Kinſman of his called Jembeg Gheray, univerſally pleaſing and acceptable to that People.

This new King, to demonſtrate his Proweſs, and to act ſomething acceptable to the Port, diſpatched forty thouſand Horſe into Podolia and Ruſſia to ſack and ravage the Country; which dividing themſelves into ſeveral Parties, made their Incurſions as far as Socal. But in the mean time the Polonians and Coſſacks having formed a ſtrong Body of Horſe under the Command of Stephen Chmieleſkie, met them at their return near to Burſtinow, where they gave them a total overthrow. And in like manner Staniſlaus Lubomiskie, encountred another Party, and overthrew them, leaving thirty thouſand ſlain on the place, and taking two thouſand Priſoners, amongſt which was the younger Brother of the Tartar King.

The Tartars overthrown by the Polanders.

This Defeat, as it was the greateſt that ever was given to the Tartars, ſo it is probable, that had it been well proſecuted at that time by the Polonians, they might have entred the Cherſoneſus Tauricus, and without much oppoſition have put an end to that Kingdom: But Sigiſmond King of Poland had other Deſigns in hand; ſuch mixed Monarchies as that, being better able to defend their own Dominions, than to acquire or conquer others.

The Death of Bethlem Gabor.

To this News ill received at Conſtantinople, ſupervened the unexpected Death of Bethlem Gabor; unexpected, I ſay, becauſe that though he had been long labouring under the Diſeaſes of Dropſy and Aſthma, yet the greatneſs of his Soul, and activeneſs of his Spirit, maſtered for a long time his Indiſpoſition, ſo that he ſeldom or never omitted his Counſels and Buſineſs; and to the very time of his Death, was meditating and contriving Deſigns, whereby to preſerve his Dominions, and enlarge them. And indeed the Government of Tranſylvania required no leſs than ſuch a ſtirring Spirit: for being ſeated between two ſuch powerful Monarchs, as the Emperor and the Turk, there was need of dexterity and courage to ſteer between the Rocks of ſuch oppoſite Intereſts: Sometimes it was neceſſary to join with one, and anon with the other. So Sigiſmond Battori Prince of Tranſylvania, uniting his Forces with the Emperor's, in ſeveral Conflicts overthrew the Turk, and kept the Scale in an equal Ballance. Gabor on the contrary inclined to the Turks, and ſupported his Intereſt with the Ottoman Power, following ſuch Maxims as had been more ruinous to Chriſtendom, had he transferred them to a Son to imitate and purſue; but dying without Iſſue, the Government devolved to his Princeſs, by Vote of the States of the Country, and by Confirmation of the Turk, as we have already intimated.

Gabor knew ſo well how to deal and treat with the Turks, that he gained an abatement of ten thouſand Dollars of the annual Tribute; he managed his Affairs ſo ſubtilly with the Emperor, that he was always invited to a Peace, and accordingly made his Advantage by the Treaty.

The other Princes of Chriſtendom in like manner courted him, and particularly the Cardinal Richelieu employed one Bornemis, a Gentleman of Tranſylvania, a Lover of the French Intereſt, to be always about him; by whoſe means, and with the aſſiſtance of twenty thouſand Crowns of yearly Penſion, he obliged him to make War on the Emperor, at ſuch Seaſons as it ſhould be intimated unto him to be moſt conducing to the advantage of France.

The Widow of Bethlem Gabor perſwaded to quit her Government.

At length, as we have ſaid, giving way to mortality, he died on the 15th of November, after he had reigned eighteen Years: he was a Prince of great Abilities, but exerciſed them ill to the dammage of Chriſtendom; howſoever he was a Souldier of extraordinary Courage and Conduct, having begun to manage his Sword at ſeventeen Years of Age; and as it is ſaid, had been engaged in forty two ſeveral Fights. His Widow Katherine, Siſter of the Elector of Brandenburgh, rendred an account to the Port of this Accident, and the Grand Signior immediately returned Anſwer by Sulficar Aga, condoling the Miſfortune, and encouraging her to a dependence on the Port: which ſhe accepting with due Reſentment, promiſed Obedience to the Grand Signior, and begged his Protection. But the weather was too boiſterous and rude for a Veſſel to be navigated well under the Pilotage of a Woman; for the ſituation of the Country, between two mighty and potent Monarchs, required more than a Feminine Mind and Courage to free and defend it from the Plots, Snares, and Violence with which it was, as with a toile, encompaſſed by thoſe two great Nimrods of the Eaſt and Weſt. And though the Sultan undertook to defend his Female Ally, yet the diverſion of the Ottoman Arms in Perſia, the inteſtine Diſtractions, and the Minority of the Emperor were ſuch burdens on the Foundation of Empire, and obſtructions to great and Heroick Atchievements in behalf of the diſtreſſed Princeſs, that all the Promiſes made to her were unavailable and ineffectual. For Stephen Bethlem, a Kinſman of the deceaſed Prince, a Man conſpicuous in his own Perſon and Eſtate, as well as for the ſeveral Governments divided amongſt his Sons, and the intereſt he had gained in his Country, procured means to convoke the States at Claudiopolis; and inſinuating the foregoing Inconveniences of a Female Government, ſo prevailed with the Aſſembly, that they perſwaded the Princeſs to yield up her Soveraignty to Stephen Gabor, as one better capacitated for Rule and Soveraignty than her ſelf. Stephen having thus obtained his intent, entred into a ſerious Conſultation with his Friends and Relations, whether he ſhould labour to confirm the Government to himſelf, and entail it to the Family, or renounce it to ſome other. The firſt ſeemed a Matter very dubious and difficult; for that Bethlem Gabor his Predeceſſor, had diſobliged the principal Boyards or Barons of the Country, and thereby derived an envy and hatred to all his Family: His long and violent Government annexed to the Intereſt of the Turk, had not only rendred his Memory odious to his own People, but likewiſe to the Houſe of Auſtria, which would be ready to continue the like prejudice and averſion to any of the ſame Family, as it did to the laſt thereof.

For which Reaſons, after due and mature conſideration, it was reſolved to offer the Government to George Ragotskie, a Perſon rich in Mony, and of great Intereſt, by reaſon of the Juriſdiction and Caſtles which he poſſeſſed in Hungary, belonging to his own paternal Inheritance; and in purſuance thereof, they ſent Stephen the ſecond Son, and Solomon a Kinſman of that Family, for Ambaſſadors to Ragotski, repreſenting to him, that they had preferred his Merit before the Intereſt of their own Family; and therefore deſired him, that he would be pleaſed to take upon himſelf the Regency of the Principality.

The Principality offered to Ragotski.

The offer of Government was a ſavoury Bait to the Palate of Rogotski; which he embraced with with ſingular affectation and contentment, and was eaſily perſwaded on this occaſion, to take a Journey to Waradin, one of the principal Fortreſſes and Places of conſideration in that whole Province, and was there received by Stephen the Ambaſſador, Governor of the Citadel, with firing all the Cannon, and with the common Joy and Feſtivity of the whole City. But in the midſt of this Mirth, an unexpected Meſſenger arrived with News, that the States had with common conſent elected another Prince, which was Stephen Bethlem, Father of the Ambaſſador, and Author of this Counſel.

Ragotski was ſtrangely ſurpriſed with this Intelligence, and the Ambaſſadors were put to the bluſh to ſee their Negotiations under ſuch a ſhameful defeat: Howſoever reſolving to continue conſtant to their firſt Election, and to renounce the Intereſt of their own Family, they ſtill maintained the ſame obſequious Offices of Honour and Reverence towards Ragotski as formerly.

And notwithſtanding the Orders received from the States to abſtain from any other demonſtrations of Honour to Ragotski, than what were ordinary towards a private Perſon of his Quality and Riches; and that he ſhould retire from the Confines of Tranſylvania to the Precincts of his own Caſtles: yet they ſtill perſiſted to execute their firſt Commiſſion, and ſo to attract People to his Party; that the number thereof daily increaſing, it was at length agreed, that the firſt Election not being fair, the Point in Controverſy ſhould be determined at Saxburg, a City of Saxony.

The States General being aſſembled, Ragotski accompanied his Pretenſions with a large effuſion of Gold, the moſt powerful and moſt convincing Argument imaginable: to which he added, That he had no deſign to affect the Principality, had not the ſame been firſt offered to him from Stephen Gabor the Father by the Hand of his Son: That it was very improper for that Perſon to offer a Dignity to another, which he affected for himſelf: that it was in the power of the Tranſylvanians, not to have offered him the Principality; but having once choſen him to it, they could not, without his diſparagement and prejudice, retract from their Election.

Ragotski choſen Prince.

In ſhort, theſe Conſiderations, aſſiſted by the Intereſt of the Princeſs Dowager, ſo far prevailed, that Stephen Bethlem was put aſide, and Ragotski, who attended the ſucceſs of this Matter at Waradin, was with common conſent elected Prince; from whence being with great Acclamations, and a general concourſe of the People, conducted to Alba Julia; he there took the uſual Oath with much Solemnity and Magnificence: and with Princely Magnificence, entertained and treated the two Ambaſſadors, Stephen and Solomon, and diſpenſed freely his Mony unto divers, who before being Enemies, were now reconciled, and become his Friends and Admirers. Liberality in a Prince, is the moſt reſplendent Gemm in all his Crown, and is a Light ſo forcible, that it dazles Envy it ſelf, and puts out all the Eyes of Suſpicion and Jealouſy.

1630.

By this time the Great Vizier was far advanced with his Army into Perſia, having been encouraged to proceed by the feigned Flight, or rather Retreat of the Enemy, who burned, deſtroyed, and laid waſte all round them, as they retired; which put the Turks to ſuch inextricable Difficulties, that in two months March, they had all the Inconveniencies and Miſeries to contend with, which commonly attend Armies in ſtrange Countries; the Plains through which they travelled were abandoned by the Inhabitants, and void of Proviſions; the Mountains were covered with Snow and comfortleſs: and what was worſt, the Perſians kept all the narrow Paſſages ſo ſtrongly guarded, that the Vizier was now more in danger of Famine than of the Sword: but being a Perſon of great Senſe and Experience in Military Affairs, he prudently diſingaged himſelf from the intricacy of theſe Dangers; and encamping his Army in the Plain of Amedan, he ſo provoked the hot Spirits of the Perſians, that they reſolve to aſſault him on that ſide of his Camp, which they judged to be the moſt weakly defended: of which having ſome advertiſement, he ſecretly laid an Ambuſcado in the way; which ſo happily ſucceeded, that he killed eight thouſand Perſians on the place: but howſoever the Victory coſt ſo dear, and was ſo bloody, by the loſs of the ſtouteſt Janiſaries, and the braveſt of the Souldiery, that the News thereof made little noiſe or rejoycing at Conſtantinople.

A Victory gained by the Turks over the Perſians

With this Intelligence the Vizier demanded new Recruits; for that beſides the abatement of his Numbers by the laſt Engagement, the Multitudes of the Enemy increaſed, and his own Souldiers fled from their Colours; of which many being obſerved to enter Conſtantinople, notwithſtanding the ſevere Decrees of Martial Law publiſhed againſt them, put the Grand Signior into a high Cholor and Indignation. And being deſirous to reinforce the Vizier's Army with all the Recruits that he was able, Proclamations were made, that all the Militia at Conſtantinople ſhould immediately paſs over unto Scutari under their reſpective Commanders; and that whoſover received one Aſper of Pay from the Grand Signior in quality of a Souldier, ſhould immediately paſs the Chanel into Aſia, and follow their Leaders to the War. But ſo great was the abhorrency which the Souldiers had to this March into Perſia, calling it the Sepulchre and Cemetery of the Turks, that few or none would obey, every one flying, hiding, and ſhifting for himſelf as well as he could: During which Fears and Troubles, the Ways from Perſia were ſo obſtructed by the Curdes, that in the ſpace of three or four Months, no News arrived at Conſtantinople from the Army; which cauſed as great apprehenſions and affrightments there, as if the Empire had been reduced to the utmoſt extremity. Nor did the Sultan want Jealouſies and Fears of receiving Affronts from the Emperor, and King of Poland; the firſt of which had a fair opportunity preſented of regaining all Tranſylvania, eſpecially at a time when that Country was divided by two ſeveral Factions: but more preſſing and troubleſom were the Coſſacks, who daily infeſted the Black Sea; and to the great reproach of the Imperial City, perpetually diſturbed it with Alarms, paſſing up almoſt in ſight of Conſtantinople. Of which Complaints being made to the Polonian Ambaſſador, he anſwered with ſome indignation, That the Coſſacks had reaſon for what they acted; for that ſince the Tartars had, by Orders from the Grand Signior, made their late irruption into that Country, as they could well prove from the Commiſſion taken amongſt the Baggage of the Prince of Tartary in the laſt Defeat, the Coſſacks might with all juſtice aſſume to themſelves a method of Revenge.

The difficulty of ſending Men into Perſia.

The Coſſacks trouble the Turks.

But the Grand Signior not being able to ſupport this Affront, or to ſee himſelf braved on the very Banks of his Imperial Seat, and his

Villages

Villages and Towns round about burnt and pillaged by a crew of Free-booters and Pirats, caſt all the blame on the Chimacham; to whom, in his rage, he gave ſuch a blow with his Fiſt on the Face, that Blood iſſued from his Noſe; and had not the Queen-Mother interceded for him, he had been delivered into the Hand of the Executioner to take away his Life. Nor was the Captain-Paſha in leſs danger at his return; becauſe, that upon his aſſurance, that the Coſſaks would not for that Year make any attempt in the Chanel of Conſtantinople, the Grand Signior had aſſented, that the Fleet of Gallies ſhould that Summer make a Voyage into the Archipelago: Which Miſtake having been the cauſe of all this Affront, the Captain-Paſha was to ſhare in the blame, and had likewiſe in the puniſhment, had not good Friends interpoſed between him and Danger.

Nor were the Coſſacks ſatisfied with their late Plunder, but ſpeedily made another return with two hundred Boats; and though the whole Fleet of Gallies were then in Port, yet they had the boldneſs to proceed as far as Pompey's Pillar, and thereby to hinder all Proviſions from paſſing to Conſtantinople by way of the Black-Sea. And what gave greater fear than all this, was the News which came at the ſame time, that the Poles were on the Frontiers with thirty thouſand Horſe; to whom immediatly a Chaous, or Envoy was diſpatched with Propoſitions very advantagious to the Crown of Poland, conditionally, that the continual Irruptions made by the Coſſacks ſhould be ſtopped, and they reſtrained within the due Terms of Peace and Moderation.

The Chaous found a civil Reception from the Poles, and promiſes of Compliance, in regard that the King had ſome Intentions of making War upon the Muſcovite.

But whilſt theſe things were in agitation, and that the Chaous was ready to return, behold, on a ſudden News came, that ten thouſand Tartars were broken into Podolia; which put all things back again, and ſo changed the ſtile of Affairs, that inſtead of Articles of Peace, the Chaous was again returned with the Menaces of War, and with Reproaches for the laſt perfidious Action.

Notwithſtanding all theſe Troubles abroad, the puiſſance of the Ottoman Empire might have been able to have ſtruggled with greater Difficulties, had not its own Inteſtine Diſtractions rendred all things dangerous, and of a malevolent Aſpect.

The Diſorders in the Ottoman State.

The Government was at that time chiefly in the hands of the four Brothers-in-Law, who had married four Siſters of the Grand Signior's; and for that reaſon were powerful, and employed in the principal Offices of State, and commonly drew contrary to the Opinions of the Mufti and Chimacham; which two laſt were not well accorded between themſelves, for that the latter encroached on the Office of the Mufti, to the great ſcandal and diſcontent of all the Religious and Literate Men in the whole City; howſoever they both joined in conſultation by what means they might beſt ſecure themſelves and the Government from the Luſts and evil Deſigns of this quadruple Fraternity; but their Wiſdom and Intereſts were too weak to contrive Remedies againſt ſuch high Oppreſſions; for beſides the Violences daily practiſed by the Brothers, the extravagant Humors in the Sultan himſelf, added to the Diſorders of State, and increaſed the Diſcontent and Diſſatisfactions of the People: For though Morat was naturally endowed with a good Wit and Parts, was ſtout, and of a good Courage: yet as his perpetual Debauchery in Wine rendred him in appearance but of a weak Underſtanding, mixed with much Levity, ſo it cauſed his Acceſſions of the Falling-ſickneſs (to which he was ſubject) to return often, whereby the ſtrength of his Brain was daily weakened and impaired. He was negligent alſo in the performance of thoſe Ceremonies which his Anceſtors were accuſtomed to obſerve; nor did he live with that gravity and regular Courſe which is agreeable to the Grandeur of ſo great a Prince: for ſometimes he would go out of his Seraglio with no other Attendance than of three or four Men, which were for the moſt part Buffoons, players upon the Gittern, and Eunuchs; and with no better an Equipage would he ſometimes be ſeen on Horſe-back, or in his Boat rowed on the Boſphorus with ſix Oars only: by which Actions, and other ſallies of Youth, he created ſuch a contempt towards his Perſon, that evil Men grew factious and weary, and entred into Conſpiracies againſt his Life, whilſt the good Men feared and preſaged the ruin and downfal of the Empire: for neither Juſtice, nor Order, nor Obedience, prevailed; no Offices were conferred for Merit, but by Mony, or ſome other unlawful Means; there remained no Counſellors of true Faith and Integrity, nor Souldiers almoſt, either of experience for Sea or Land-adventures. The People, being burdened by double Taxes and Impoſts, were mutinous, and ready to take the leaſt Fire of Rebellion; the Souldiery were diſorderly for want of Diſcipline and their conſtant Pay: the Paſha's of remote Provinces grew inſolent, taking upon themſelves rather an abſolute than a depending Soveraignty.

In ſhort, all things looked with that black appearance, that nothing ſeemed to keep the Frame of Empire together, but only the expectation of good Succeſs to the Army in Perſia; the which, as it depended on uncertain Events, ſo the Ottoman Monarchy was then ſhaking, and ſtood tottering on its deepeſt Foundation.

The Vizier prepares to beſiege Bagdat.

Wherefore all People being intent to hear of good News from Perſia, were much pleaſed to underſtand, that the Vizier having, by advantage in the laſt Engagement, laden his Army with Plunder and Spoils, was now preparing to beſiege Bagdat; for whoſe good Succeſs, Prayers were daily made in the Moſchs; and the Schoolmaſters ſurrounded the Streets with their young Scholars, ſinging out Prayers with the Amen at every Period, according to the Cuſtom of that Country.

The Vizier marched towards Bagdat, and began to beſiege it about the 10th of September: In order whereunto, he amaſſed great abundance of all ſorts of Proviſions, and made his Magazine of them at Moſul, two thouſand Camels, each laden with two Sacks of Cotton, every Sack being of about ten foot long, were carried to the Siege, for ſhelter of the Souldiery, and to fill the Ditches.

The Vizier having paſſed part of his Army over the River Tigris, the reſt with the Cannon remaining on the hither ſide, he diſpatched Naſuf Paſha of Aleppo, with ſix thouſand Spahees, to take a view of the Place, and to diſcover the Avenues unto it. In his way thither, he met with eight thouſand Perſian Horſe ſent to reinforce the Gariſon, which he valiantly engaged; but being dangerouſly wounded, was forced to retreat, with the loſs of almoſt half of his Men, part killed, and part taken: thoſe which were carried Priſoners to Bagdat, were treated with all civility by the Governor, who gave them a view of the Gariſon, which conſiſted of twenty thouſand effective Men; ſhewed them their Stores and Proviſions, and that there was ſcarce an unuſeful Mouth in all the City to devour them.

The Siege.

Notwithſtanding this Diſaſter at the beginning, the Vizier nothing diſmayed, proceeded on his Deſign, ſpending the whole Month of September in making his Approaches. In the Month of October, he mounted eighteen Pieces of great Cannon, which for the ſpace of twenty five days battered continually the Curtain between the two Baſtions, on which were four Pieces of Cannon not perceived by the Turks; there was alſo a deep and large Ditch not diſcovered by them, for that it was planked over with Boards, and covered with a green Turf, ſo that it appeared like plain and firm Ground: the Breach being made, and ſeemingly undefended, the Turks reſolved to make an Aſſault; wherefore the Vizier, on the 20*th* of November, commanded the Spahees, under the Conduct of the Beglerbei of Anatolia, accompanied with Paſha's, Sangiacks, and other Perſons of Note; as alſo with Janiſaries, to the number of thirty thouſand, to enter the Breach: which being performed, and great numbers crowding on the Turf, the weight of them preſſed down the Planks; and therewith the whole Engine giving way, five or ſix thouſand were in a moment taken, as it were, in a Pit-fall, and ſwallowed up without any poſſibility of Succour to be yielded from their Companions. After which on an inſtant there appeared fifteen thouſand Men on the Breach and on the Baſtions; which with their Cannon, and continual Vollies of Musket ſhot, ſo galled the Spahees, that they broke their main Body, and killed the Beglerbei of Anatolia, with other Perſons of Note and Quality, and made the whole Army to retreat.

The Siege raiſed.

Two days after this Diſgrace, the Vizier raiſed the Siege, and marched towards Moſul; and the Perſians encouraged with this Succeſs, purſued the Turks with eight thouſand Horſe, aſſailed the Rear-guard of the Enemy; and though the Conduct and Care thereof was committed to the charge of the Paſha's of Aleppo and Damaſcus, yet the Perſians killed three thouſand Turks, and had defeated the whole Rear of the Army, had not the Spahees turned their Horſes, and withſtood the ſhock with great Valour.

Notwithſtanding this diſhonourable Retreat, the Vizier loſt not his Courage, or hopes of taking the Town; in order unto which, he appointed all things neceſſary to renew the Siege again in the Months of September and October following, for that the foregoing Months are either too rainy, or too hot in thoſe Countries, to undertake a Deſign or Enterprize of that Nature: He fortified all the ſmall Places in thoſe parts round,and quartered his Souldiers in them; ſo that having all conveniencies of living, they might be induced to continue, and not abandon their Colours: eſpecially he took care to fortify Illay, a place of about two days journey from Bagdat, reinforcing the Gariſon with ſix thouſand Men, under the command of three Beglerbegs, in regard that it was a very conſiderable Paſs, and the principal Magazine and Granary of Corn and other Proviſion.

At the ſame time he ſent Letters to Conſtantinople, repreſenting the ſtate of his Affairs to be in a hopeful condition; and deſiring Recruits both of Men and Mony, gave great aſſurances of conquering the City at the next Attempt.

The Poles and Turks make Peace

In this perilous Condition of the Ottoman State, one would have imagined that Chriſtian Princes would have ſeen their own Intereſt, and made uſe of their advantage; but God not having as yet fixed a Period to the Bounds of this Empire, was pleaſed, by his ſecret Providence, to divert both the Emperor and King of Poland from making War with the Turk, inclining them to employ their Arms on their Chriſtian Neighbours. For though the Chaous (as we have ſaid before) was returned from Poland with diſdain, and an angry Meſſage, yet the Chimacam, when he made Moſes Vayvod of Moldavia, encharged him to perform all Offices of Mediation between the Grand Signior and the Poles, perſwading them to reſtrain the Incurſions of the Coſſacks, and to ſend an Ambaſſador to the Port. In which Affair Moſes ſo well performed his Negotiation, that applying Lenitives to the Anger of the Poles, he reduced them to Articles of Peace, and to promiſes of reſtraining the Coſſacks, on condition, that the Turks reciprocally forbid and withhold the Tartars from joining or affording aſſiſtance to his Enemies the Muſcovites.

The Coſſacks and Tartars compared.

Theſe Conditions being agreed, the Ambaſſador was ſent from Poland to Conſtantinople, where he was received with as much Joy, as he was expected wirh Impatience. The Coſſacks and Tartars were two ſorts of people which lived equally on Spoils and Booty; the firſt as offenſive to the Turk, as the latter to the Pole; and therefore as it was an equal Benefit, ſo it was an Agreement of even Terms, to counterchange the Caution given reciprocally for one and the other.

But the Engagement for ſuch wild People, was more eaſily given than performed; which becauſe it was a Point agreeable to both Parties, it was expreſſed with the moſt clear Words and ſtrict Terms poſſible.

The Poles were weary and grieved to ſee their Provinces depopulated by the Tartars, who yearly carried away ſome thouſands of Souls. The Turks on the other ſide were not leſs infeſted with the Coſſacks, who captivated their People, burnt their Towns and Villages, and kept them in continual Alarms.

But becauſe theſe People are hardly reſtrained from their Robberies and Pillaging, the Poles, as a Remedy, reſolved to carry the Coſſacks to the War againſt the Muſcovite; and better to ſecure the Tartar,the Poliſh Ambaſſador was obliged to pay them twenty thouſand Florins yearly, and ſix thouſand pair of Boots, according to the ancient Articles of Peace. On which Conſiderations the Tartars were engaged never to enter Poland in a hoſtile manner, but to ſerve that King in his Wars againſt all Nations whatſoever, the Turks only excepted.

Troubles in Hungary.

In this manner were the Turks this Year freed from all apprehenſions of Alarm from the Coſſacks, and of War with Poland. And the Emperor was ſo buſied concerning the ſurprize of Mantoua, and engaged in the Quarrel about that Dutchy, and with ſome ambitious thoughts relating to Italy, that the Turks hoped to have proſecuted their Wars in Perſia without fear of Diverſion from the Weſtern Parts. But yet the Affairs towards the parts of Germany were not ſo well ſecured, but that the turbulent Spirit of Ragotski adminiſtred ſubject for Diſſention; for being lately ſeated (as we have ſaid) in his Principality, he was doubtful whether it were moſt for his Intereſt to incline unto the Emperor, or to the Turk; and whilſt both Parties courted his Friendſhip, and cheapned his acknowledgments, (for of neceſſity he muſt be a Vaſſal to one or the other) the Heyducks who were Tenants to the Lands of Gabor, refuſed to return to the Obedience of the Emperor, demanding protection from the Grand Signior. The jealouſy of thoſe ill Conſequences which this Commotion might produce, alarmed all the Country: and the Emperor and Ragotski being hereby raiſed to a mutual Defiance, advanced their Troops one againſt the other upon the Frontiers: But all Hungary trembling with fear of thoſe Calamities which enſue from War, ſeveral of thoſe concerned, interpoſed ſo far towards an Accommodation, that Deputies were appointed to meet at Caſſovia to treat of Peace. But in the mean time the Palatine of Hungary paſſing eight thouſand Men over the River Tibiſcus, to make ſeiſure of a certain Fort built by George Baſta, ſo alarmed and awakened Ragotski, that he diſpatched a Gentleman to him to demand the Cauſe of this Motion; and not receiving an anſwer agreeable to his expectation, he advanced upon him with an Army of ten thouſand Men, and engaging him with great reſolution, killed four thouſand on the place, and ſo cauſed him to retire: from theſe beginnings all the miſchiefs of a bloody War had certainly enſued, had not Ragotski refuſed to receive Succours from the Turk; but he depending on his own ſtrength (having fifteen thouſand Men in Arms for defence of his Hereditary Lands in Hungary) contemned all external Aſſiſtances, as ſavouring too much of vaſſalage and dependance: howſoever the Paſha's of the Frontiers aſſembled their Forces, and yet acted with ſuch caution, as not to proceed to an open Rupture; for the Wars in Perſia being unſucceſsful and preſſing, required moderation and Lenitives on this ſide, that ſo the differences now on the Frontiers might be transferred to an opportunity more ſeaſonable for diſpute.

The G. Signior afrighted with Lightning.

In the month of September Sultan Morat being at his ſmall Seraglio called Daout Paſha, and ſleeping there one night in his Bed, he was on a ſudden awakned by a terrible Lightning; which entring his Chamber, ſurrounded his Bed, leaving ſeveral Marks on his Sheets and Quilts; and whilſt he ſought ſome place to hide himſelf in, it paſſed under his Arm, and burnt part of his Shirt; the afrightment of which ſo aſtoniſhed him, that he remained for ſome time in a ſwound, which for ever after did much impair the ſtrength of his Brain: He now began to be ſenſible that there were other Thunder-bolts than thoſe that proceeded from his own Throne; and, like Tiberius, learned to tremble at the Voice of God, whilſt he heard him ſpeak in the Clouds: Nec Deum unquam niſi iratum pertinuit, & turbatiori Cœlo fulminantem. And ſo affected was the Sultan with this Accident, that afterwards he diſmiſſed divers of his Buffoons from the Court; and particularly a Mute, whoſe ridiculous Geſtures were his common Divertiſement, and for ſome time cauſed him to abſtain from Wine; and as a farther token of his Converſion and Thankfulneſs to God for this eſcape, he ordered five thouſand Dollars to be given in Alms to the Poor, and Korban to be made of three hundred Sheep; and the Friday following, he ſolemnly went to the Moſch, to render Thanks unto God for having ſo prodigiouſly preſerved him from the Executioner of his Vengeance.

During all this time the Great Vizier wanting Succours and Supplies of Men and Mony, had great difficulty to contain his People in their due Obedience, or within the Bounds of their Quarters; for they were apt to leave their Colours, and would really have diſbanded, had not their Spirits been daily held up with the hopes and amuſements of Pay and Recruits.

The four Brethren-in-Law, which greatly apprehended leſt their Power and Authority ſhould be abated by the return of the Vizier, exerciſed all the diligence they were able to make new Levies, the reinforcement of which might inſtil new Courage into the Souldiery, and be a means to continue the Vizier in thoſe parts; but the Mufti obſtructed all Levies on the ſide of Greece, and the Frontiers of Chriſtendom, alledging, That the beſt Souldiers being ſent from thoſe parts, would hazard the Empire, by expoſing and laying it open to the Incurſions of the Chriſtians: by which contrary Opinions and Delays, the Vizier wanting the Aſſiſtance expected, the Perſians recovered all the little Fortreſſes which they had loſt the Year before, with the conſiderable place of Illay; which being taken by Aſſault, and by an abſolute force of Sword and Arms, the greateſt part of the Garriſon conſiſting of eight thouſand Men, commanded by the three Paſha's before-mentioned, were cut off; which was an important loſs to the Turks; not only for the ſlaughter of ſo many brave Souldiers, but alſo for the quantities of Proviſions, being the Granary and Magazine for the whole Army. Therein were likewiſe taken forty Field-pieces carrying eight pounds Bullet; with a great Chain of Iron, which uſually encompaſſes the Treaſury which is carried into the Field. With this ill ſucceſs the Vizier retreated from Moſul as far as Mirdin, from whence he redoubled his Inſtances for Supplies for Men and Mony.

At length it was agreed, that an Army of thirty thouſand Tartars ſhould be ſent thither; but Ragotskie adviſing, that he was upon the point of breaking with the Emperor, it was ordered, that their number ſhould be reduced to ten thouſand: the which taking their Journey into Perſia, by the way of Circaſſia, were there encountred by Han Gherey, the Prince of Tartary, (whom we formerly mentioned to have been depoſed by that People) and by him obſtructed in their paſſage, the Van-guard of their Army being cut off by him; ſo that they were forced again to retreat and to embark their Men and Horſe at Caffa, to be tranſported by Sea to Trapezond; which as it was a matter of great trouble, ſo it was a courſe unpractiſed by the Tartars. The Grand Signior being unable to render a more conſiderable Succour than this unto his Army, which was now reduced to the weak number of two thouſand Janiſaries, and three thouſand Spahees, he reſolved to condeſcend to Terms and Articles, as the only means to ſave his Honour, and the remainder of his Forces.

In order unto which, he releaſed a Perſian Lord from his Impriſonment in the Seven Towers, and qualified him with the Title of Ambaſſador, beſtowing upon him an Equipage of Men and Horſe agreeable to his Character, with four thoſand Dollars to defray his Expence. And that the King of Perſia might be aſſured of the Sultan's real Intentions and deſires of Peace, he recalled his Army in the Spring, whereby all Acts of Hoſtility ceaſed: And thus the Vizier being returned to Conſtantinople, that Pride and Rigour which he exerciſed towards all in the time of his proſperity, laid him low by Miſfortunes tunes in the eſteem of his Enemies; who gladly embracing the opportunity to diſgrace him, with all the terms of Obloquy and Detraction, deprived him at length of his Office. One of the four Brothers-in-law married to one of the Grand Signior's Siſters, and Prime of the Cabal, being conſtituted Vizier in his ſtead. Nor did the late Vizier eaſily eſcape with his Life, until he had repreived it with an Atonement of an hundred thouſand Zechins of Gold, and ſome choice Horſes which he preſented to the Sultan; the like Example other Paſha's his Companions followed in proportion to their Eſtates and Employments; by which Preſents the empty Treaſury was in a manner recruited, and the preſent Neceſſities of the Sultan relieved.

But this new Vizier enjoyed not long either his Honours, or his Life; for the firſt Act he performed, was to mitigate the Valedé Sultana, or Queen-Mother, to obtain a Hatteſheriff, or Writing, under the Grand Signior's Hand for cutting off the Head of Caſref Paſha, the Spahecler Agaſi; or General of the Spahees, which being executed by Morteſa the Commander in Chief in Perſia, his Head was brought and thrown at the Gates of the Divan.

Mutiny of the Spahees joined with the Janiſaries.

The Spahees aſtoniſhed at this Spectacle, and enraged to ſee that Head on the Ground which they ſo much eſteemed and loved, forgot all the Terms of Duty and Obedience to their Superiors; and without regard to the Place wherein they were, even within the Walls of the Grand Signior's Court, they threw Stones at the Vizier, and beat him from his Horſe; which though the Grand Signior, and all the Viziers highly reſented, as the moſt ſcandalous Indignity that could be offered to the Majeſty of a Supreme Ruler, and to all Government, yet their Counſels rather ſought Remedies to ſuppreſs the Mutiny, than to make Propoſals of executing Juſtice on the Offenders; for the Spahees ſeconded by the Janiſaries, (who were glad of any cauſe to make a Commotion) aſſembled in the Hippodromo, from whence they ſent an Arz to the Sultan, requiring the Heads of the Great Vizer, and of divers others, as well within as without the Seraglio. The Grand Signior denying poſitively to aſſent hereunto, the Souldiery as plainly threatned to depoſe him, and place his Brother in the Throne; at which barbarous Reſolution the Grand Signior being affrighted, his youthful conſtancy was ſo ſhaken, that he wrote to his Mother to deſire her excuſe, in caſe he aſſented to the death of her Son-in-law the Great Vizier; for that the Storm of the Military Fury was ſo great, that he could not endeavour to protect him without the loſs of his Life and Crown: wherefore the Vizier being turned out of the Gates of the Seraglio, he was immediately butchered in the preſence of the Sultan.

Nor did the impetuous Rage of the Souldiery end here, but they proceeded farther to demand the Head of the Janiſar-Aga, or General of the Janiſaries, who was reputed the chief Inſtrument of the Death of Caſref, becauſe he was a principal Favourite to the Grand Signior; but he wiſely taking divers off with Mony and Preſents, ſowed diviſion between the Janiſaries and Spahees; ſo that ſome Difficulty ariſing hereupon, the determination of his Death was deferred for a while; howſoever they proceeded to demand, that the Mufti ſhould be diſcharged of his Office, and that the Teſterdar, or Treaſurer, ſhould be delivered into their hands.

To the firſt the Grand Signior aſſented; but being willing to ſave the other, he pretended, that he was eſcaped and fled; but when he was found, he ſhould run the ſame Fate with the Vizier. But the military Sedition not being appeaſed with this Anſwer, they roved through the whole City, and Galata, and other parts of the Suburbs: the Spahees perſiſting to require the Head of the Janiſar-Aga, and not finding him in his Houſe, they plundered it, and departed; and meeting with a Youth, a Favourite of the Grand Signior's, they killed him; and ſo returning with the like Fury to the Seraglio, they required admiſſion to the New Vizier and Mufti. Regep Paſha, another of the Brothers-in-law, was then made Vizier, who with the new Mufti trembling at theſe Tumults, were careful to treat the Souldiery with all lenity and condeſcenſion imaginable, deſiring them to declare their Grievances, and whatſoever might give them Satisfaction ſhould be granted. The ſeditious Souldiers replied, That they were reſolved to ſee the Grand Signior's Brother, for that when the preſent Sultan did not govern well, they might know from whence to produce another of better Abilities, and more agreeable to the Deſigns of the Empire.

That neceſſity which cauſed the late eaſineſs of condeſcenſion to former demands, made way alſo for compliance with this; ſo that the young Prince being brought forth, they obliged the Sultan not to attempt any thing againſt his Life, and cauſed the Vizier and Mufti to become Caution and Security for it.

Nor did theſe Conceſſions contribute towards a Pacification; but rather their Inſolence increaſed thereby, renewing their Exclamations at the Gates of the Seraglio for the Heads of the Janiſar-Aga and the Teſterdar; not would they be ſatisfied with anſwer, that theſe Men were not found in the Seraglio, but ſtill perſiſted in their rude Out-cryes and Menaces, loſing all reſpect and reverence to the Sultan and the Superiors; ſo that the Grand Signior reſolved once to ſally out upon them with his own Guard; but trying their Temper and Reſolution, he diſcovered moſt of them to be poiſoned with the like Spirit of Sedition, and combining with the others as Aſſociates in the Treaſon.

The Viziers, and other principal Officers, perceiving the Mutiny to increaſe daily, and not knowing to what degree it might ariſe, made it their buſineſs to ſearch out for thoſe proſcribed by the Souldiery: at length the Aga was happily diſcovered by a certain Perſon, to whom a Reward was given of a thouſand Zechins, with the Office of Zorbaſi or Captain; and the Aga confeſſing that he had counſelled the Death of Caſref, he was immediately ſtrangled, and his Body hanged upon a Tree to publick view. The like Fate befel the Teſtardar, who being alſo taken, was killed and hanged up together with the Body of the Aga.

All which Perſons thus inhumanely murdered by the Souldiery, were the Enemies of the preſent Great Vizier Regep; for which cauſe the Grand Signior ſuſpecting that he ſecretly contrived and nouriſhed theſe Rebellions, never after looked on him with a gracious eye. Of which the Vizier being ſenſible, combined with the Souldiery; and judging it almoſt impoſſible to ſet himſelf right in the Affection of his Maſter, he courted the Favour of the Militia, as the only means to protect his Life, and maintain his Power. But as the revenge of Princes is not like a Thunder-bolt, which wounds on a ſudden, but rather like a Mine which requires time to form, and is then ſprang, when it may do the beſt execution: ſo in the ſame manner, the Grand Signior diſſembled his hate towards the Vizier, until one Night being preſent with him in the Seraglio to ſee certain Fire-works, he called him aſide, and whiſpered to him, that he ſhould go into his private Lodgings; where being entred, the Door was ſhut upon him, and he ſtrangled by certain Eunuchs, who were appointed to attend him for that purpoſe. But little benefit or riches did the Grand Signior reap by his death; for the Vizier having for ſome time expected this Blow, had concealed his Treaſure, and conveyed it away for the uſe of his Poſterity.

The like hatred did the Sultan conceive againſt the Souldiery, reſolving in his mind to execute his Revenge, eſpecially on the Janiſaries, as the moſt turbulent Fomenters of Rebellion and Treaſon, and to vent his Anger, either by the Cord or Sword, or ſome other more expedite way, as opportunity preſented: and to prevent or oppoſe the like Seditions for the future, he fortified the Seraglio, and brought Arms in thither by night, chuſing into his Guard ſelect Men of Courage and Faithfulneſs: and being ſenſible, that the being of his Brother attempered his Soveraignty, and drew away the Hearts and Eyes of his Souldiers and People from fixing entirely on his own Perſon; he therefore intended to cut him off; but the Caution and Security given by himſelf, and chief Miniſters, to preſerve his Life, diverted him from this Reſolution.

In place of the deceaſed Vizier, Mehmet late Paſha of Cairo was conſtituted, and the Seal conſigned to him; with whom the Grand Signior conſulting of the preſent Emergency of Affairs, often uttered his diſpleaſure againſt the late Seditions, and ſignified his Intention to redreſs them for the future; in order unto which, he cauſed the Heads of the moſt mutinous Spahees to be cut off, and on various Pretences ſeparated the Souldiery each from other into divers Parts; ſome numbers of Janiſaries he commanded to march to the Confines of Perſia, and cauſed many others of them to be killed by Night; and by various other Means greatly weakned the Chambers, both by diminiſhing the Numbers, and taking off ſuch who were the Men of beſt Courage and Conduct: many Bodies were found ſwimming in the Boſphorus, and known to be Spahees; great part of the Lands belonging to the Timariots was taken away, and the Pay of the Spahees was abated; and divers Offices of Profit and Honour were taken from the Militia, that ſo Men might be made ſenſible of the Indignation of their Prince, and that there is no Sport or Jeſting with the Anger of a provoked King, who knows no other mean of his Paſſion, than the total evaporation of his Choler and Vengeance.

To maintain and make good theſe ſeveral Acts of Juſt Puniſhment, young Morat growing in Courage with his Years, mounted on Horſe-back, well Armed, and like a Souldier, attended with a ſelect Party of Cavalry, paſſed through the moſt publick Streets of the City in a huffing manner, and caſting a ſtern Eye upon the Souldiery and People as he went, and making a hundred Paſſes through the midſt of them, ſtruck them with an awe of his Majeſty, and admiration of his Warlike and Martial appearance; with which Severity and Gallantry the Souldiery being affrighted, began to conſider, that they were not longer to be governed by a Woman, or a Child, but by the moſt brave Prince that ever ſwayed the Ottoman Scepter; and thereupon for the future reſolved upon an impartial Submiſſion and Obedience unto him. To encourage them in which, and to reconcile their Spirits and Affections to him, Morat oftentimes aſſembled his Souldiery at Ackmeidan, where he exerciſed with them, ſhooting with the Bow at Marks and at Rovers, rewarding thoſe who ſhot beſt, with adding an Aſper a day to their Pay; beſides which, he diſtributed ſix thouſand Hungars amongſt them, to demonſtrate that wiſe Princes are uſed to mix Lenitives with their Rigour.

Rebellion in Anatolia.

Theſe Mutinies and Seditions in the Capital City, encouraged Rebellious Spirits in divers other places: ſo that a certain Bold and Audacious Fellow, drawing a number of Miſcreants after him, poſſeſſed himſelf of the City of Pruſa: another of the ſame Temper, called Elia Paſha, made himſelf Maſter of Magneſia, where he committed all the Outrages which Enemies inflict on a Conquered People; and being about twenty four miles diſtant from Smyrna, ſo affrighted the People of that Place, who were Merchants, and ſuch as lived by Trade, that they fled with their Wealth, and ſuch Things as were portable, leſt they ſhould be expoſed to the Robbery and Spoil of Thieves and Rebels. But the Beglerbey of Anatolia ſuffered not Elia to reign long in his luſt, but giving him Battel in thoſe Plains, wholly defeated him, and ſent twenty of the Heads of the chief Commanders to the Sultan for a Preſent; and purſuing Elia and the reſt of his Army to Magneſia, beſieged him in that City. The Grand Signior being adviſed hereof, and fearing leſt the Siege ſhould take up too much time, and move other ill Humors in that Country, diſpatched Orders to offer Terms and Conditions of Accommodation with Elia, which were ſecretly treated, and great Promiſes made him of Favour and Rewards from the Grand Signior. The eaſie Fool accepted the Conditions, and embraced the Promiſes; and leaving his City of Magneſia, proceeded confidently to Conſtantinople to receive the gracious Rewards of the Sultan for his paſt Services. At his Entry into the Seraglio in place of the Kapiſlar-Kahyaſee, or Maſter of the Ceremonies, he was received by Officers with a Cord in their Hands, who beſtowed on him the gracious Reward of his Maſters ultimate Favour.

Mutinies at Buda.

Theſe Rebellions were no ſooner ſuppreſſed in Aſia, but that other Mutinies of the Janiſaries, for want of Pay, began at Buda in Hungary, where they threw Stones at their Aga, and purſued him to the very Palace of the Paſha, electing another into his place. They alſo cut in pieces the Governour of Peſt, and beſtowed his Office upon his Lieutenant.

To remedy theſe Diſorders, and extinguiſh the Mutiny, the Grand Signior ſent Commiſſioners to examine the Matter, and to render him an account of the Grievances and Demands of the Souldiers: but they fearing to be ſurpriſed with ſome ſevere Acts of Juſtice, prevented or foreſtalled the Inquiries of the Commiſſioners, by acknowledging their Fault, and demanding Pardon, with ſurrender of four of the Ring-leaders to Puniſhment; declaring, That by their ſeducement and evil perſwaſions, they were debauched into that diſorderly courſe of Proceedings: the Sultan accepted the Sumiſſion, and all things were quieted in Hungary.

Troubles in Moldavia.

Howſoever new Troubles aroſe in Moldavia: for that People being oppreſſed over-much by their Prince Alexander, made an Inſurrection againſt him, and drove him out of the Country, who for refuge fled to Conſtantinople. And the 1632.

People deſirous that one Bernoſchi, a Polonian by Nation, might be put into his Place: To obtain his Confirmation, he came to the Port, and offered himſelf before the Grand Signior; but Morat ſuſpecting, that to obtain the Principality for himſelf, he had ſecretly inſtigated and nouriſhed the late popular Commotions, cauſed his Head to be cut off in the Publick Divan.

Amurat had now born to him a ſeventh Daughter, by his Slave called the Shining Star; and though he was much troubled that ſhe had not brought him forth a Son and Heir, yet ſo much was ſhe beloved by him, that he reſolved to create her Queen, had not his Mother declared againſt it, as a thing not uſual for any Woman to be honoured with that Title before ſhe had ſupplied the Inheritance by the Birth of a Male Child.

And that he might now totally extinguiſh the Fire of Sedition amongſt the Souldiery, he cauſed Ferdum Efendi and Saluc Aga, two prime Chiefs of the Spahees, with eight principal Janiſaries, to be put to Death; after which ſeverity, fearing another Inſurrection, he paſſed the Water, and retired to his Seraglio at Scutari, where he fortified himſelf.

It happened about that time, that a Turkiſh Woman, a Slave, was found aboard a French Ship, ready to ſail from Conſtantinople; which the Turks highly reſented, and aggravated the Crime ſo much againſt the French Ambaſſadour, that they impriſoned his Son then embarqued, and would have confiſcated the Veſſel and her Lading. In thoſe days the Chriſtian Ambaſſadors reſident at that Court, kept better Union and Correſpondence among themſelves than they do at preſent; ſo that all of them, as concerned, joined together to repreſent before the chief Miniſters, that ſuch a Fault merited not ſo grand a Forfeiture, for that it was moſt probable to have been committed without the privacy either of the Ambaſſador, or Commander of the Ship. The Ambaſſadors then reſident were Sir Peter Wych for England, the Sieur Marcheville for France, and Pietro Foſcarini for Venice; at whoſe warm and urgent Inſtances the Turks condeſcended to releaſe the Veſſel, and the Goods laden upon her, with free liberty to depart. Howſoever it being repreſented to the Grand Signior by the Captain-Paſha (who is Admiral of the Seas) that one Baldaſar, an Armenian by Nation, but Dragoman or Interpreter to the French Ambaſſador, was a principal Inſtrument to move the Ambaſſadors to unite in this Pretence; and being obſerved to manage the Intereſt of his Maſter with warm and earneſt Sollicitations, the ſurly Sultan grew ſo angry, that one of his own Slaves ſhould preſume to manage a Diſpute with him, in Fury and Rage, commanded that he ſhould be immediately empaled; and that he might be aſſured that his Sentence took effect, he would ſee him with his own Eyes on the Stake before he would paſs the Water to his Seraglio at Scutari. The reſolution was ſo ſudden, and the Execution ſo ſpeedy, that there was neither Ear lent to hear, nor Time given to mediate in his behalf; and the Act being performed, complaints would not ſerve to redreſs a tyrannous Action now paſt Remedy, and not to be recalled: Wherefore as the Ambaſſadors were forced to acquieſce, and patiently endure the Affront; ſo if they would have reſented it, they could ſcarce have found one amongſt their Interpreters of ſo bold a Spirit, who durſt have opened his Mouth after ſo terrifying an Example. The truth is, the Dragomen, or Interpreters to Ambaſſadors at Conſtantinople, are required to be Men of Learning, Courage, and Courtſhip; their ſtudies ought to endue them perfectly with the Turkiſh, Greek, and Arabick Languages, with ſome knowledg alſo of the Perſian, and with good Elocution, and readineſs of Tongue: their conſtancy and preſence of Mind is always neceſſary at their appearance before thoſe Grandees or Great Men, who are ever proud, haughty, and arrogant in all their Expreſſions and ways of Treaty, the which they commonly manage towards Chriſtian Miniſters with the ſame reſpect which we uſe towards our Servants, or our Slaves. And therefore by reaſon of this and other Preſidents of like nature, Dragomen have been always timorous in repreſenting the true ſence of the Ambaſſadors and Conſuls; at leaſt have ſo minced and tempered their words, that they have loſt much of that Vigour and Accent which is neceſſary to inculcate perfectly a Buſineſs into the Underſtanding of a Turk, eſpecially if you intend to incline him to Reaſon and Juſtice. Wherefore it would be an excellent Qualification for an Ambaſſadour himſelf to underſtand and ſpeak the Turkiſh Language, or at leaſt to have a young Man by his ſide of the Engliſh Nation, educated in the Turkiſh Court, who ſhould be ready to explicate thoſe Matters which are too thorny and prickly for Subjects of that Country to handle.

The French Interpreter impaled.

Had all the foregoing Troubles, Mutinies, and Misfortunes encountred the Spirit of an eaſie and a gentle Sultan, certainly the Fate of this Amurat had been the ſame with that of Oſman, who retiring within his Seraglio, could never have appeaſed the Seditious Humor with all the Conceſſions he could give an unreaſonable multitude: but being a reſolved and buſling Prince, he at firſt gave ſome few ſteps backwards, as if he would yield ſomewhat to the impetuoſity of that Torrent which he could not reſiſt; yet it was only like a Ram, who retires, that he may butt with the greater force. Howſoever the Politicians and ſober Men attributed the true cauſe of all theſe Commotions in the Souldiery, to have no other Foundation than the ill ſucceſs and miſeries which attended the War in Perſia; for the way being long, and the Countries hot, barren, and for the moſt part void of all comfort, the Souldiers abhorred the Fatigues and March thither; and hated to conſider, that they ſhould be made a Sacrifice to the luſt of voluptuous Miniſters, who, to gain Eſtates and Riches out of thoſe Monies which were deſigned to carry on the War, did not care, whilſt they lived at Eaſe and in Delights, what Labours, Wants, and Dangers attended the Militia.

The Peace made with Perſia, and ſpeedily broken.

Theſe Conſiderations made likewiſe ſome impreſſion in the Sultan, who therefore inclined to hearken unto thoſe Propoſitions of Peace which were brought him by an Ambaſſador from Perſia; and being accompanied with very great Preſents, the Peace was clapt up and concluded on a ſudden. But as Things quick in their Birth and Production, are not long-liv'd, nor long durable; ſo this Peace was broken the ſame Year with an inconſtancy equal to that inconſideration with which it was agreed and ſigned. For no ſooner was the News hereof flown into the Eaſtern World, than the Great Mogol diſpatched his Ambaſſador with Letters to the Grand Signior, perſwading him to make War again with the Perſian, promiſing to aſſiſt him therein, by ſtopping up the Paſſage of Nachivan, which is a City in the Leſſer Armenia, built upon the River Aranes, and is the common Road into the Indies.

Indies. The which Motion, as it was pleaſing to Morat, ſo being accompanied with Indian Curioſities and Preſents of an ineſtimable Value, the Ambaſſador was graciouſly received, and treated with ſuch Feaſts and Entertainments as are not uſually known amongſt the Turks; and returned again with Letters, giving hopes, that he would ſpeedily take an occaſion to break with the Perſian. But thoſe who had experienced the Difficulties of a War with Perſia, and obſerved, that in the preſent Conjuncture of Affairs it might be more eaſily and with advantage waged on the ſide of Hungary, endeavoured, with many pregnant Arguments, to perſwade the Grand Signior thereunto, giving him to underſtand, that Guſtavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, being victorious over the Emperor in Germany, had taken many Towns and Cities of great ſtrength; and having overthrown him in divers Battels, had ſlain or taken his beſt Captains and moſt Martial Men of Valour; and that other Chriſtians, who were deſirous to abate the pride of the Auſtrian Family, were ready to embrace the ſame Conjuncture, whereby they might entirely ſhake off the Yoke and Servitude to the Imperial Tyranny.

Perſwaſions for a War againſt the Emperor.

Theſe Advantages being well repreſented, took place eaſily in the mind of Morat, ſo that he diſpatched expreſs Orders to the Paſha of Buda to aſſemble his Forces, and put all things in a readineſs on the Frontiers: in compliance with which, though the Paſha ſet forth his Tents, and made great appearance of a March, yet ſome ſecret Deſigns cauſed him to move ſlowly, and to affect a Peace rather than a War; ſo that receiving an Ambaſſador from the Emperor at Peſt, he readily Admitted him, and gave him ſafe Conduct and Convoy unto Conſtantinople: at which time Advices coming, that the Great Guſtavus Adolphus was ſlain, and that the Affairs of the Swedes went backwards and unſucceſsfully in Germany, altered all the Meaſures of the Ottoman Counſels; and though Ragotski endeavoured all he was able to foment the Differences, and encourage the Turks to a War, having beſides other ſpecious Pretences, an Army of thirty thouſand Men in a readineſs to joyn with the Turks againſt the Emperor; howſoever the Turks looking on the Condition of the Swedes as deſperate, and the Proffers of Ragotski to be uncertain, and of no true Foundation, and the State of Affairs amongſt themſelves to be turbulent and unſetled, gave a kind Reception to the Emperor's Ambaſſador, and ſigned the Agreement for continuance of the Truce.

A Peace made between the Emperor and Grand Signior.

By this, and other Actions of like Nature, Ragotski loſt much of his Eſteem with the Emperor and the Grand Signior; the firſt always looked on him as an Ambitious Prince, exciting the Turk againſt him, and ready on the leaſt Occaſion to enter his Country with Fire and Sword: The other looked on him as a Falſe Friend, who never made Proffers, but thoſe which ſquared with his own Deſigns and Intereſt; and particularly he had diſguſted the Port, by preſuming to inſtate one Matthias in the Principality of Walachia, and to eject another conſtituted there by Authority of the Grand Signior, called Stridia Bei, or Lord Oyſters, becauſe his Father was a Fiſher-man, and gained a good Eſtate by the Trade of Oyſters; howſoever it being the Grand Signior's Pleaſure to ordain ſuch a Perſon to that Office, it was a Preſumption, and a bold Piece of Uſurpation in Ragotski, to diſpoſe of that Government, by virtue of his own ſingle Power: Howſoever the Grand Signior, to avoid Contention with the reſolved Spirit of Ragotski, confirmed Matthias, upon Condition of a double Tribute paid for the Inveſtment to the Principality.

But beſides theſe Reaſons for a Peace with the Emperor, the Deſigns the Grand Signior entertained of making War upon Poland, with the Aſſiſtance of the Muſcovites and Tartars, and of diſpoſſeſſing Emir Facardin of his Government, were ſtrong Inducements to make fair Weather on all other ſides of the Neighbouring Princes. The Envy which the Riches and Greatneſs of Emir Facardin (who was a Prince inhabiting in the Parts of Arabia, to whom a large Tract of Land, with ſeveral Fortreſſes did belong) had contracted to him from the Paſha's of Damaſcus, Tripoli, and Gaza, cauſed them to accuſe him before the Grand Signior of Rebellion, and other enormous Crimes: The Plea againſt him was managed eſpecially by the Paſha of Tripoli, who alledged, That he was an Enemy to the Mahometan Law, deſtroyed the Moſchs, kept correſpondence with the Malteses and the Corſairs of Ligorn, permitting them freely to take Water in his Country; that he openly favoured the Chriſtians, ſuffering them freely to build Churches in his Country. That he continually fortified his Caſtles, and encroached on the Lands and Territories of the Emirs his Neighbours. In ſhort, his Riches were ſo great, that every one feared and envied him, and therefore repreſented his Caſe in that Manner, that the Grand Signior reſolving to deſtroy him, ſent great Forces into thoſe Countries, under the Command of the Paſha of Tripoli, to whom he commanded the Paſha's of Damaſcus, Gaza, Aleppo, and Cairo to join their Forces: and for better expedition, the Captain-Paſha was appointed to equip his Fleet, to tranſport Men and Ammunition into thoſe parts.

Preparations of War made againſt Emir Facardin.

The Captain-Paſha in his Paſſage by Sea, encountred two Engliſh Ships lading Corn in the Gulph of Vola, called the William and Ralph, and Hector: this being a prohibited Commodity, not to be tranſported under penalty of forfeiting Ships, Goods, and Liberty of the Men, moved the Paſha, with the ſight of ſuch a Booty, to command his Gallies to ſeize the Veſſels; which being only two, it was imagined that they would immediately yield and ſurrender without conteſt. But theſe bold Brittons knowing the Conſequences of ſuch a Surrender, reſolved not tamely to yield themſelves, at leaſt to ſell their Liberties, Lives, Ships and Goods to the Turks at the deareſt Rate they were able: wherefore cutting their Cables, put themſelves under Sail, and got into the main Sea, fighting with the whole Fleet above three hours; ſometimes they were boarded by one Gally, ſometimes by two at once; but plying their Quarter-deck Guns with ſmall Shot, and defending themſelves manſully with their half-Pikes, they often cleared their Decks, and put off the Enemy with great ſlaughter: the Captain-Paſha being aſhamed to ſee ſuch Reſiſtance made by two ſuch Veſſels againſt his whole Force, reſolved to enter his Men at the Gun-room Port of one of the Ships, and running the Prow of the Gally into the Stern-port, the valiant Crew of the Gun-room clapt an Iron Spike into the Trunnel-hole of the Prow, whereby the Gally being wedged faſt to the Timbers of the Ship, they brought their Stern-chaſe laden with croſs Bars, pieces of Iron, and Parteridge-ſhot to bear upon them; which raking them fore and aſt, killed the Captain-Paſha himſelf, with near three hundred out of the the Baſtard Gally. At length having ſpent all their ſhot, they charged their Guns with pieces of Eight, and being over-powered by numbers of their Enemies, and not able farther to reſiſt, they ſet fire to their Ships, which blowing up, deſtroyed two or three of the Gallies which laid by their ſides, together with thoſe Men which were then fighting aboard at handy-blows on the Deck with the Defendants; ſo that none of the Engliſh were taken, unleſs three or four fiſhed out of the Water.

An end being in this manner put to the Fight, the Turks gained the Victory, with the loſs of twelve hundred Slaves killed and wounded, beſides Turks, and were forced into Port, where they remained a full Month to repair their Gallies; the which Fight affected all Turks with an aſtoniſhment of the Engliſh Bravery, or Obſtinacy, (as they call it) and is a Matter remembred and talked of to this Day, eſpecially by the Son of the Captain-Paſha who was ſlain, called Omem, Paſha Ogli, who is Paſha of Rhodes at preſent, (as I remember) and commands three or four Gallies; for which reaſon he is ſo inveterate an Enemy to the Engliſh, that to ſatisfie his Revenge, he buys what Engliſh Slaves he can get into his Gallies, and ſells none out under a double Price or Ranſom.

The News of this Fight coming to Conſtantinople, provoked the Grand Signior to the height of Indignation; howſoever the Officers either being aſhamed of their Loſs, or entertaining ſome ſecret admiration of the Engliſh Bravery, ſuffered the Matter to be compounded for the Sum of forty thouſand Dollars, of which the Engliſh paid only their ſhare with the French and Venetians, whom (for I know not what Reaſon) the Turks equally concerned in the Occaſion.

Whilſt the Turks were appointing a new Captain-Paſha, and again refitting their Fleet, the Paſha of Damaſcus diſpatched a Summons to Facardin to ſurrender Seida up to him, with other Caſtles and Places of Strength. The Old Man reſided then a Barut, where pretending to be retired from all Buſineſs, anſwered, that he had reſigned the whole Government into the Hands of his Son Ali, as he had already teſtified by Publick Acts: that he was but a Subject, and a Souldier under his Son, and therefore to him they ought to make their Applications. Facardin had at that time an Army of twenty five thouſand Men, the which he divided into two Bodies, commanded by his two Sons. Ali his eldeſt he ordered with twelve thouſand Men (a thouſand of which were Maronites, and two thouſand Druzes) to march to Saphet for hindering the conjunction of the Emirs of Feruc and Therabith, and the Paſha's of Gaza and Damaſcus, whoſe Forces being joined together, did not compoſe a greater Number than that of Facardin.

Ali entercountring with them, and being a briſk and hot-metled Prince, engaged and charged them ſo whom, that he defeated them, and killed eight thouſand of their Men; but ſuch a Victory as this not coſting him leſs than ſeven thouſand of his Men, was in effect his own Overthrow; for being the next day charged again by the Enemy, both ſides fought with that obſtinacy, that (as is reported) there remained not above an hundred forty ſix of all the Souldiers which followed Ali; and he himſelf having his Horſe mortally wounded under him, and being out of Breath, Weary, and Faint, yielded himſelf to a common Souldier, who promiſed him Quarter; but afterwards having him in his power, he ſtrangled him with his Match, and cut off his Head and his little Finger on which he wore his Seal-Ring, and ſo preſented both to the Paſha. But this proud Conquerour refuſed to accept this Preſent without Ceremony, until firſt the Head had been perfumed with Sweet Waters, the Beard combed out, and covered with a rich Turbant, and having kept this Trophy for ſome days by him, he ſent it afterwards to Conſtantinople.

The Son of Facardin overthrown

And is ſtrangled.

But before the News of this Defeat reached the Ears of old Facardin, the Captain-Paſha with his Fleet of Gallies arrived at the Port of Tripoli; to whom Facardin being deſirous to ſhew all Friendſhip, and profeſs Loyalty to the Grand Signior, he cauſed his Army to retire into the Parts of Mount Libanus, whilſt he himſelf, with about three thouſand Men, between Domeſtick Servants and his Guards, went to Seida, from whence he ſent two * Caramoſauls laden with Proviſions and Refreſhment to the Captain-Paſha for a Preſent, aſſuring him, that he was an humble Vaſſal to the Grand Signior, and was ready to obey all his Commands; and becauſe the Sultan may probably have received ſiniſter Reports relating to the Arms he had taken up, he aſſured him, that they were no otherwiſe deſigned, than to ſuppreſs the Robberies of the Arabs, and the Incurſions of their Kings; and that he was ready to conduct his Army to any Place, where his Maſter the Grand Signior ſhould think fit to employ them. But theſe fair words could not divert the Captain-Paſha from his Reſolutions to enter the Port of Seida, nor from his Inſtructions of demanding, and upon refuſal of forcing poſſeſſion of the Caſtle; which as it was the moſt conſiderable Fortreſs, and the moſt pleaſant Seat of all his Dominions, ſo he could not, without much regret and ſorrow, hearken to ſuch a Propoſition: wherefore that the Paſha might not perſiſt in this Demand, he ſecretly proffered him an hundred thouſand Zechins as a Bribe to himſelf, and his Son Manſour to be carried for a Hoſtage and Earneſt of his Faithfulneſs to the Grand Signior. The Captain-Paſha liked well the hundred thouſand Zechins and the Hoſtages, but ſtill required the Surrender of the Caſtle with them; on which whilſt Facardin deliberated, News came of the Death of his Son Ali, and the Deſtruction of his Army, with which, loſing all Courage, he yielded his Caſtle of Seida to the Captain-Paſha, retiring himſelf to his City of Barut: nor could he reſt quietly at that Place; for being purſued, he was forced to quit it, and retire with his Maronites and Druzes into the Mountains, leſt being incloſed within the Walls of a City, he ſhould fall alive into the Hands of his Enemies.

 A ſort of Veſſel or Ship ſo called by the Turks.*

And now all good Fortune forſaking unhappy Facardin, the Maronites and Druzes his Subjects revolt to the Paſha of Damaſcus, his Palaces and Gardens of Pleaſure were all ruined, his Friends forſook him, his two remaining Sons were loſt, one carried to Conſtantinople for a Hoſtage, and the other ſlain in Fight; his Towns of Gazir, Saphet, St. John d'Acria, and others were ſurrendred to the Paſha of Damaſcus: only ſome few ſtrong Places in the Mountains remained to him, where living in League with Reba a King of the Arabs, he committed all the Spoils he was able on the Lands belonging to the Paſha of Damaſcus. But being hunted from one Mountain to another, and from one Cave to another, he was at length forced to ſurrender upon Conditions, that he ſhould have liberty to proceed unto 1633. the Grand Signior with his own Equipage of three hundred Men, and Trumpets ſounding, and that he might carry with him all his Treaſure conſiſting of a Million of Zechins all in Gold, together with other Riches, which were carried by fourteen Camels; and that he ſhould not be conducted as a Priſoner in Triumph, but that he ſhould with freedom approach the Preſence of the Sultan, like other Paſha's, who are in Grace and Favour.

Theſe Propoſals being granted, Facardin with his two young Sons began his Journey to Conſtantinople, and being about two days journey from thence, he diſpatched eight Cheſts of Gold before him, to prepare and make his way to the Grand Signior; who being pleaſed with the Gold, and greatly rejoyced to receive the Submiſſion and Homage of one who had ſo long ſtood out in Rebellion, he went out in a Diſguiſe and Habit of a Paſha to ſee and diſcourſe with that Perſon, of whom there had been ſo general a Rumor: and having accordingly encountred with the Emir, he ſate down in his Tent with him, deſiring him to relate the Story of his Life, with the ſeveral Particulars of his late Misfortunes. Emir Facardin well knew the Perſon of the Grand Signior; but feigning as if he was unacquainted with whom he diſcourſed, and that he took him for ſome Paſha, began to recount the Courſe of his Life, the Reaſons why his Enemies falſely ſuggeſted evil Reports of him to the Grand Signior; how he was forced, for defence of his Life, to take up Arms, and what ill Succeſs accompanied his Affairs; all which he repreſented with ſuch Quickneſs and Eloquence, that the Grand Signior pitying his Misfortunes, promiſed to be his Advocate, and mediate with the Grand Signior in his behalf.

The day following Facardin made his Entry in a Triumphant manner, and received a moſt favourable Audience from the Grand Signior; and all the Paſha's and great Men in conformity to their Maſter, and in hopes of ſharing ſome part of his Gold, ſhewed him a like kind favourable Countenance and Aſpect.

But finding afterwards that Facardin increaſed daily in the eſteem of the Grand Signior, and that the old Rebel was become a new Favourite, and that he was likely to over-top and out them, they generally conſpired together, taking the Mufti on their ſide, to accuſe him of many Crimes, and more particularly that he was a Chriſtian, and an Apoſtate from the Mahometan Faith. This Point of Religion ſo ſenſibly touched the Grand Signior, that he reſolved to condemn him in a manner Solemn and Extraordinary; for mounting one Day on his Throne, he commanded Facardin to be brought in, and placed on a low Chair; where ordering his Crimes whereof he was accuſed to be recited, he paſſed a formal Sentence of Death upon him: but Facardin ariſing to juſtifie himſelf, was not permitted to ſpeak, only he obtained a quarter of an hours reprieve to make his Prayers, and afterwards was ſtrangled by the hands of two Mutes.

1634. Morat growing now into Years, took into his own Hands the Reins of Government, reſolving to rule Singly and Abſolutely, and to make himſelf rather Feared than Beloved: He degraded four Viziers at once, and baniſhed them into Cyprus, confiſcating their Eſtates, for no other Reaſon, than becauſe they had denied him the uſe of their Mules and Camels on occaſion of his Service.

Morat exerciſes ſeveral Acts of Tyranny.

He became extremely ſevere againſt the Souldiery, cruſhing them with all imaginable Rigour on the leaſt appearance of Reluctancy to his Commands; declaring, That he expected Blind and Silent Obedience from all, but eſpecially from his Souldiery.

He impoſed a great Tax upon Copper; and becauſe he had ſeveral Warehouſes filled with that Mettal, which had for many Years lain by, he forced the People to buy it at his own Rates. At which Aggrievance the Commonalty growing deſperate, began to Mutiny and Rebel; but Morat put a ſpeedy ſtop thereunto, by cutting off the Heads of fifty of the moſt Seditious, and ſo paſſed to Pruſa, with the Attendance of ſix Gallies.

He cauſed a Kadi to be hanged, to the great Diſpleaſure and univerſal Reſentment of the Ulemah, who are Students in the Law; who to make known their Aggrievance, and Conſult a Remedy, aſſembled in great Numbers at the Houſe of the Mufti.

The Queen-Mother being acquainted with this Meeting, and fearing the ill Conſequences thereof, gave immediate Advice to the Sultan; who with like Expedition diſpatched a Boat to bring over the Mufti and his Son to Pruſa; who were no ſooner arrived, than they were ſtrangled, not being permitted to ſpeak for themſelves, or to alledge any Plea or Excuſe for their Lives. This Act of Cruelty, beyond the Example of former Ages, and never practiſed by the moſt tyrannical of his Predeceſſors, ſtruck a Terror on the whole Empire; for Men obſerving the unjuſt Rigour which was executed on the Head and Chief of their Law, the Oracle and Mouth which reſolved their difficult Problems, and whom the World ſo reverenced and honoured, that few Examples have been of Capital Puniſhment executed on his reverend Head, feared, that Innocence was not ſufficient to ſecure their own leſs conſiderable Eſtates from his Fury and Violence.

There is a particular Death allotted for Mufties, which is, by braying them in a Mortar, which is kept in the ſeven Towers at Conſtantinople, and there ſhewed to Strangers; which Inſtrument hath been ſeldom made uſe of.

Morat deſtroys the Taverns.

Morat being greatly addicted to Wine, was ſenſible of the ill Effects of it in himſelf, and that the heat of debauchery inclined him to Violence and Cruelty, and from hence collecting how dangerous this Humour of Drunkenneſs was in his People, eſpecially in his Souldiery, for that much of the late Seditions might be attributed thereunto, he publiſhed a moſt ſevere Edict againſt Wine, commanding all Taverns to be demoliſhed, the Butts to be broken, and the Wine ſpilt. It was the common Cuſtom of the Grand Signior to walk the Streets in diſguiſe; when meeting with any drunken Perſon, he would impriſon him, and almoſt drub him to Death. It was his fortune to meet a Deaf Man one day in the Streets; who not hearing the Noiſe of the People, nor the Rumor of his Approach, did not ſo readily ſhift out of the way, as was conſiſtent with the fear and dread of ſo awful an Emperor, for which default he was ſtrangled immediately, and his Body thrown into the Streets.

All People feared and trembled at theſe Practices, and were as careful to look out abroad for the Grand Signior, leſt they ſhould be ſurpriſed with the bluſter of his preſence, as Mariners are of being taken unprovided by ſome ſudden Guſt or Hurricane; for there was ſcarce a Day, that one Innocent or other was not ſacrificed to his Fury and tyrannical Fancy.

Hangs a Venetian Merchant.

One Thomas Zanetti, a Venetian Merchant, who had built a lofty Jardac, or a high Room of Proſpective on the top of his Houſe, was accuſed to the Grand Signior to have deſigned that Place for no other end, than that he might with a long Glaſs overſee the Chambers of the Ladies, and the Gardens, and Walks of the Seraglio: For which Reaſon, without farther inquiry, he was hanged in his Shirt on the top of his Jardac, with a red Streamer in his Hand, that ſo the Grand Signior might be ſure that the Sentence was executed. The Eſtate of Zanetti, whether belonging to himſelf or Principals, was confiſcated; but in regard the Goods, for ſecurity, were privately conveyed to the Ware-houſes of ſeveral Frank Merchants, ſtrict ſearch was made for them; but in regard the Marks and Numbers were altered, they could not be diſtinguiſhed: wherefore the Grand Signior concluding, that all the Frank Merchants had combined together to deceive him, he impriſoned every Man of them; nor would he releaſe them, until they had paid ſorty thouſand Dollars for their Ranſom and Liberty.

After which, upon pretence of a Plot, or Agreement of the Franks to defend themſelves from the leviation of this Tax, the Turks ſearched their Houſes for Arms; in taking of which they were ſo rigorous, that they ſpared not ſo much as a Birding-piece; nor yet the Sword of Sir Peter Wych, then Ambaſſador for England, though he alledged, that it was the very Sword with which his Majeſty had conferred the Honour of Knighthood upon him.

But from theſe Tranſactions at Home, let us paſs to the Wars in Poland and Perſia. That Invincible Prince, Vladiſlaus King of Poland, had gained ſuch good Succeſs againſt the Czar of Muſcovy, that the Czar was forced to demand Aſſiſtance from the Turks. The Grand Signior, though he had lately made a Peace with Poland, and ſworn to maintain the Articles of Chocin, concluded by his Predeceſſor Sultan Oſman; yet the continual Depredations which the Coſſacks made, did always adminiſter reaſonable Pretences for a War: To which Abaſſa, one of his chief Counſellors, a valiant and preſumptuous Captain, did much incite him; for promiſing to himſelf the Conduct of that Army deſigned againſt Poland, did much flatter the Sultan and himſelf with the Fancy of mighty Succeſs.

The Turks make War on the Poles.

The War being thus reſolved upon, the Turk, who commonly ſtrikes before he Quarrels, gave Orders to Abaſſa to make Levies of Men in Moldavia and Valachia; and to put the Tartars in Arms, and the Militia of Buda, and of the Parts along the Danube into a warlike Poſture, and with all Expedition to enter Poland.

Abaſſa who had with wonderful diligence put his Troops in readineſs, ordered the Tartars, with a Body of fifteen thouſand Men to enter Poland; which they performed with ſuch celerity, that paſſing the River of Tyre above Chocin and Rinczug, they in a few hours laid waſte for the ſpace of ten Leagues round Kemenitz, and ſo retired with their Booty into Moldavia: howſoever their haſte was not attended with ſuch good ſpeed, but that they were overtaken on the 4*th* of July by Staniſlaus Koniſpolzki, General of the Poliſh Army, with no greater Force than two thouſand five hundred Horſe; howſoever ſurpriſing them whilſt they were feeding their Horſes, he put them into ſuch Confuſion and Diſorder, that he eaſily recovered all their Booty, and took five of their chief Men Priſoners; of which the Son-in-Law of the Cantemir was one. But this was a faint Refreſhment in reſpect to that terrible Storm of ſixty thouſand Men, compoſed of Turks, Tartars, Moldavians and Valachians; which under the Command of Abaſſa had already paſſed the Danube.

Koniſpolzki the Poliſh General, having not ſufficient Force to oppoſe them in open Field, nor time to aſſemble a greater Army, gathered what Supplies he could from the Coſſacks and Lords of that Country, and therewith encamped himſelf upon a Hill between the River Tyr and the Town of Chocin, that he might be the better able to ſuccour Kemenitz, which the Enemy deſigned to aſſault.

A Fight between the Turks and the Poles.

Abaſſa who contemned this weak Force of the Poles, reſolved, without farther conſideration, to attack them in their own Camp, and force them to fight; of which the Poles being well adviſed, placed ſeveral Pieces of Artillery, and lined all the Hedges and Ditches with Muſquetiers, where the Turks were neceſſarily to paſs, drawing out their whole Army into Batalia; the Turks who haſtened the neareſt way to charge the Enemy, fell into the Ambuſh, where having loſt about five hundred Men, they began to make a ſtand, and to conſider of ſome more advantageous way to their Deſign. Wherefore Abaſſa taking another Courſe, which he judged to be free from all concealed Dangers, ordered the Tartars to charge the Right Wing, and the Moldavians and Valachians the left of the Enemy, and he with his Turks would fight the main Body. The Tartars with great Reſolution performed their part, and had wholly defeated that Wing, had not Wiſnovitzki, with ſome Troops and a Train of ſmall Artillery, come in ſeaſonably to their Succour: The Moldavians and Valachians fought ſo faintly againſt the Enemy, whom they conſidered to be Chriſtians, Brothers, and Neighbours, that they ſoon turned their Backs and fled, but were not far purſued by the Poles.

Abaſſa receiving this Repulſe, ſounded a Retreat, and immediately repaſſed the River Tyr, and marched with all the haſte he was able, ſtopping no where, until he arrived at Rinzur, about thirty Engliſh miles from the place of the Fight; and arriving at length on the Banks of the Danube, he gave Licenſe to his Souldiers to diſperſe into their Winter-Quarters; in the mean time Abaſſa diſpatched Advice to the Grand Signior of the Particulars of the Fight, and of his great Victory, by an entire defeat of the Poliſh Army. The Grand Signior believed the Report, which none durſt to contradict, and which was confirmed by the Rumour of an Ambaſſador coming from Poland. For the Poles being at that time engaged in a War with Muſcovy, and apprehenſive of another with Sweden, judged it not ſeaſonable to provoke the Turk, but rather, by way of Accommodation, diſpatched an Ambaſſador with a Train of three hundred Men, to make Complaints againſt the late Acts of Hoſtility committed by Abaſſa, as if he had moved his Arms without the Orders or Knowledg of the Sultan.

An Ambaſſador ſent to the G. Signior from Poland.

About that time that the Ambaſſador approached near to Conſtantinople, the Grand Signior had another Son born, but of a weakly and ſickly Temperament, howſoever great Joy was expreſſed, and all the City was enlightned with Torches, Bonefires, and Fire-works; and that the Grand-Signior might evidence his Greatneſs and Magnificence to the Ambaſſador, he took this Occaſion of the Birth of a Son, to make a ſolemn Entrance into the City, and to make the

the greater Show, he armed all the Citizens and Inhabitans.

Before the Grand Signior would grant Audience to the Ambaſſador, he ordered that Abaſſa ſhould treat with him, and underſtand his Buſineſs and Deſires. Abaſſa carried himſelf high in the Negotiation, he pretended the Damages and Charges of the War, the Demoliſhment of certain Palancas, which were the Places of Refuge for the Coſſacks; and the Tribute of ten Years paſt, with Security of paiment for the Time to come. The Ambaſſador poſitively refuſed to hearken unto any Terms about Tribute; and that for other Matters, the Preſents which he had brought to the Grand Signior, would reaſonably anſwer.

His Preſents were,
A Coach lined with Velvet, with ſix very fine Horſes.
A Baſon, and Candleſticks of Silver richly gilt.
Four Clocks, ten Veſts of Sables, ſix Quivers of Arrows, with ſome Hunting-Dogs.

Being at length admitted to Audience, and thereunto conducted by the Aga of the Spahees, and the Chaous Baſhee: The Grand Signior asked the Ambaſſador, which was not uſual, For what Reaſon he was come thither?

To which he anſwered; That he was come to bring his Majeſty Advice of the Coronation of his King; and to eſtabliſh a Peace, if his Majeſty ſhould judg fit to accept thereof.

To which the Sultan replied; That all Chriſtian Kings ought either to receive the Ottoman Laws, or pay him Tribute, or try the ſharpneſs of his Sword. And taking a Cemiter in his hand which hung by him, he drew it half out, and ſaid; With this I will ſubdue my Enemies; and though my War in Perſia continues, I do not fear to undertake another in Poland.

To which the Ambaſſador returning a modeſt Anſwer, was diſmiſſed of the Royal Preſence.

And now the Grand Signior, to put a good face on the Buſineſs, and to make the World believe, that he deſigned what he ſpake, he proclaimed a War with Poland, and ordered his Tents to be carried abroad, ſuppoſing hereby to draw the Poles to his own Terms of Agreement. And in purſuance hereof he mounted on Horſeback, and rode in ſtate through the City, his upper Veſt was made after the Hungarian Faſhion lined with Sables; in his right hand he carried a Quiver of Arrows, in his left two drawn Swords, on his Turbant he wore a large Plume of Feathers, encompaſſed with a Circle of Diamonds; and in this manner entring his Tents, he proceeded to Adrianople. But before his departure, the Count Puchen, Ambaſſador from the Emperor, arrived with other ſumptuous Preſents, offering Incenſe and Gifts of Peace at the Throne of this Greatneſs.

But before we relate the Tranſactions at Adrianople, and the Succeſs of Affairs at that Place, let us recount ſeveral diſmal Accidents at Conſtantinople.

The ſeveral Miſchiefs by Water and Fire.

The Grand Signior returning by Sea from a place called Stravoſta in the Bay of Iſmit, anciently the Bay of Nicomedia, where he had for ſome time held his Court and great Divan, he was followed by ſeveral Veſſels appointed to tranſport the People; in one whereof were ninety five Perſons embarked, all of them Paſha's, Aga's, and chief Officers of the Court; the Veſſel was over-ſet by a ſudden guſt of Wind, and all the People drowned, excepting three Sea-men which ſaved themſelves by ſwimming. More conſiderable were the Miſchiefs by Fire; For on occaſion of ſome Fire-works made in one of the Grand Signior's Chiosks, or Houſes of Pleaſure, the Fire took ſo fiercely on the Tavan, or wooden Works of the Sieling, that it endangered the whole Palace, and had conſumed all, but that many Hands and active Men gave a ſtop to the farther Progreſs.

A terrible Fire at Conſtantinople.

This Fire was but a fore-runner of a greater, which began the 16*th* of September in that part of the City of Conſtantinople, which is called Aiacab, being between the Wall and the Port, where live Taverners, Butchers, Fiſhmongers, and others who ſell Proviſions. The Fire took firſt in one of thoſe Houſes which had been a Tavern, and are Buildings only made of Deal-boards and Timber; which combuſtible Matter flamed out ſo violently, that it took hold on all the Houſes round, and was ſo quick in its Motion, as if it had taken by a Train, or that ſome wicked People with Fire-balls had employed themſelves in the Miſchief; the Fire took its Courſe againſt the Wind, burning on one ſide and the other to the Hiſtorical Pillar, and to the Moſchs of Sultan Mahomet, and Sultan Selim; ſo that in a ſhort time one third of the City was reduced to Aſhes.

It is difficult to expreſs the lamentable Deſtruction was made hereby, what Riches, what Palaces, and Moveables were conſumed in it, there being twenty thouſand Houſes reported to be burnt; which Miſery is beſt repreſented by the remembrance of our calamitous Incendiation at London; the greateſt difference between one and the other was, that that at Conſtantinople was more quick in its Motion; for it burnt a larger compaſs of Ground in one third of the Time, than ours did at London; for that City for the moſt part conſiſting of ſlight Buildings of Wood, met not the reſiſtance which ours ſometimes did againſt the Walls of Brick and Stones.

The Fire being extinguiſhed, and Men having time to lament and think, began to impute the Cauſe and Fault to thoſe whom they moſt ſuſpected; ſometimes they accuſed the Perſians for having fired the City, for which Crime one of them the next Year ſuffered Death. Some attributed the Cauſe of all to the Janiſaries; and that they, out of hatred to the Inhabitants, or for the ſake of Plunder, if they did not begin, yet at leaſt increaſed the Fire; which they the more ſuſpected, becauſe the Janiſaries refuſed not only to work themſelves, alledging, that they expected Orders from their Aga, but likewiſe hindered and diſcouraged others. Howſoever the Grand Signior not wanting on his own part to contribute all Aſſiſtance poſſible, ſent four thouſand Men out of his Seraglio to work about the Fire, not excuſing the very Officers of his Royal Chamber from contributing their Authority and perſonal Aid; ſome of which ventured far into the Fire, to demonſtrate their Courage, Activeneſs, and Obedience to the Commands of their Emperor: but all this was too little againſt an obſtinate and an invincible Enemy, for the Fire flamed, and proceeded, until it wanted Nouriſhment and Food to conſume.

In fine, twenty thouſand Houſes were burnt, two hundred Moſchs, and the Library of the Mufti, which for the Number of the Arabick and Perſian Books, was curious, and of high eſteem. The Albengs, or Habitation of the Janiſaries,

Janiſaries containing three hundred Chambers, of which each Chamber was capable to receive four hundred Men, were all burnt and reduced to Aſhes.

The which fatal and miſerable Spectacle, did a little touch the Heart of Sultan Morat; ſo that he gave out conſiderable Sums to comfort the Diſtreſſed, who had moſt ſuffered by this Calamity, and to raiſe from its Aſhes his conſumed and languiſhing Conſtantinople; which being revived and flouriſhing, was again miſerably conſumed by Flames, in the Month of April 1660. But ſuch is the beneficial and commodious ſituation of that Place, and the Riches thereof by Trade, and the Preſence of the Ottoman Court, that the Inhabitants again rebuilt it in fewer Years than could be imagined.

Reaſons for a War with Poland.

But now to return to the Grand Signior at Adrianople, we find him reſolutely deſigned to make a War upon Poland, to which he was induced by the Perſwaſions of Abaſſa, and the preſent conjuncture of Advantage to join with the Moſcovite, it ſeeming great Policy not to ſuffer the Countries of Moſcovy to be over-run; or the Poles, who is a warlike and dangerous Nation, to grow Puiſſant and Powerful by his Succeſs and Conqueſt over his Neighbours: Wherefore Preparations were made on all ſides for the War; great Quantities of Proviſions and Ammunition were ſent into Moldavia by way of the Black Sea and the Danube.

The Tartar Han ſent word that all his Forces were in readineſs, and expected nothing but their Orders to march. The Beglerbey of Greece made his Rendezvous at Philippolis with an Army of thirty thouſand Men, where he attended to join with the Forces of Boſna, Siliſtria, and other parts of Europe. Moldavia and Walachia made an appearance of Levying Men, and joining with the Turk; but their Hearts were towards the Poles, with whom they kept a ſecret correſpondence, and would be ready to adhere on the leaſt Opportunity.

The Victory which the Poles obtained over the Moſcovites.

In ſhort, the Army of the Turks was ſo great, and all his Affairs in that readineſs, that he ſcorned to incline an Ear to Propoſitions of Peace; in which Opinion Abaſſa humoured and perſwaded him, that the Poles were ſo fearful of his Forces, that they had already yielded to Terms of compounding for a yearly Tribute. All which proved falſe; for in the mean time Vladiſlaus King of Poland, remitting nothing of the Heat and Vigour of his War againſt the Moſcovites, he was ſo ſucceſful therein, that he forced an Army of eighty thouſand Men, which he had beſieged in their Camp, to lay down their Arms, and ſurrender themſelves; which was an Action ſcarce to be credited, at leaſt to be parallel'd in any Hiſtory: and with this Conqueſt he might have proceeded to the Capital City of Moſco, and concluded the War and that Empire: But God's Providence, which governs all things, altered this Counſel, and diverted thoſe victorious Arms to the Siege of Bial; which Town being well fortified and gariſoned, withſtood many Aſſaults of the Enemy, and blunted the Spirits and Swords of the Conqueror; for loſing much time in this Siege, other Towns made uſe of the Opportunity to provide and fortify themſelves; whilſt the Poles growing weary, and wanting Pay, raiſed divers Mutinies and Seditions in the Camp. Theſe Difficulties and Inconveniences inclined the King Vladiſlaus to bend a favourable Ear to the many Supplications and Inſtances which the Moſcovites made for Peace: So that the Plenipotentiaries being aſſembled, it was agreed, that the Dutchy of Smoleſco and Czernieſchou, which two hundred Years paſt had been taken from Poland and Lituania, with many other Towns and Countries, to the extent of two hundred Leagues, ſhould be reſtored to the Kingdom of Poland.

They make a Peace.

The Turk ſends an Ambaſſador into Poland to deſire a Peace.

The News of this ſudden Peace coming unexpectedly to Sultan Morat, cauſed his Bravadoes againſt Poland to ceaſe, and to turn the ſtile of his Fury and Indignation againſt the Moſcovites, whom he vilified with all imaginable Terms of Perfidiouſneſs and Cowardiſe, and abuſed and impriſoned their Ambaſſadors. He conſidered that he had provoked an Enemy who was Victorious, Valiant, and Powerful, and one who at any time was able to contend with his united Force, much more whilſt it was ſeparated and disjoined by his War in Perſia: wherefore in all haſte he diſpatched an Ambaſſador into Poland, called Shahin Aga, deſiring to renew the ancient League and Articles of Peace. This Ambaſſador found the King at the Diet in Warſaw, where he publickly endeavoured to excuſe his Maſter for the late Acts of Hoſtility; aſſuring them, that they were not performed according to his Maſter's Deſires, and Original Intentions, but as they were moved and guided by the evil Suggeſtions and Artifices of Abaſſa, who being ſolely culpable of this Fault, by giving ill Counſels to his Maſter, he aſſured them, in the Name of the Sultan, that he ſhould receive ſuch Puniſhment as they ſhould think fit to inflict upon him. Hereupon the King Vladiſlaus gave this Anſwer, That ſince the Grand Signior could ſo eaſily infringe the Articles of that Peace which had been ſolemnly and ſacredly eſtabliſhed, it was now his Part, and the Wiſdom of that grave Aſſembly, to contrive ſuch Conditions and Bonds wherewith to oblige his Maſter, as could not eaſily and at his Pleaſure be broken or avoided. And at the ſame time the Poliſh Ambaſſador being returned from Conſtantinople, and diſcourſing in the Diet of the Pride and Perfidiouſneſs of the Turks, and the Scorn wherewith they received Chriſtian Ambaſſadors, ſo incenſed the Spirit of the whole Aſſembly, that with a general Conſent they approved the words of the King, adding, That they would no longer be ſubject to the Inſults and Falſities of that Tyrant, whom they would make to know, that they wore as well Offenſive as Defenſive Arms; and were not of that abject Spirit, or mean Condition, to permit the Sultan to violate the moſt Sacred Articles of Peace, and then at his pleaſure to ſalve them with a fawning Acknowledgment, or a flattering Speech. In this manner the Turkiſh Ambaſſador was returned, whilſt the King Vladiſlaus went into Podolia to take a view of his Armies; which he found to conſiſt of eighty thouſand fighting Men, all well accoutred, of good Courage, and ready to follow their King to the Walls of Conſtantinople.

Abaſſa ſtrangled.

The fear of the Motion of this great Army, in a Conjuncture when the Wars broken out again in Perſia were not proſperous, affected the Mind of Morat with much terror; ſo that he became very ſollicitous to find out, and make ſome ſubſtantial Propoſition in order to an Accommodation. One of the Viziers called Morteza, was very active in this Buſineſs, plying continually the General Koniſpolzki with Letters, Offers, and Expedients for a Peace: To facilitate which, and ſhew that the Grand Signior did heartily relent, Abaſſa was ſtrangled by two Kapugees, and given for a Sacrifice to appeaſe the Anger of his Enemies; a Perſon who was a ſtout Souldier, and one who had performed great and ſignal Services in the War of Perſia.

But the Poles not being pacified with this ſingle Act of Penitence, but thirſting farther after the Blood of the Turks, deſired to Spoil and Pillage their Richer Provinces. Howſoever at length the Council of Poland entring into more ſerious Debates, conſidered, that the Troops lately come from Muſcovy, were but in a bad condition; that the part of their Army, which conſiſted of Voluntiers, would not endure a long and tedious War; and that the Expence and Charge of this great Army was immenſe and almoſt inſupportable: for which Reaſons it was reſolved, that a Peace ſhould be made, which was ſoon afterwards concluded, and agreed on theſe following Articles.

Articles of Peace agreed between the Poles and the Turks.

That the Vaywods of Moldavia and Walachia, ſhould be confirmed by the Grand Signior, with the Conſent and Recommendation of the King of Poland.

That Cantemir and his Tartars ſhould abandon the Country of Buckzac; and in caſe of refuſal, that then the Turk and Tartar Cham ſhould join their Forces to expel them from thence.

That the Poles ſhall ſuppreſs all Acts of Hoſtility of the Coſſacks in the Black Sea.

That the Turks renounce for ever all Demands, or future pretence of Tribute from Poland: and that they ſhall build no new Forts on the Frontiers.

That the Navigation on the River Nieper ſhall remain free and undiſturbed to the Poles. That all other Articles ſhall remain as formerly in their true Force and Virtue.

A Difference between the French Ambaſſador & the Captain Paſha.

In this Year happened out great Differences between the French Ambaſſador and the Turkiſh Officers. The firſt Diſguſt had its Original from the Year 1631, when the Marqueſs of Marcheville going Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople, was in his Voyage met off of Scio by the Captain-Paſha and his Fleet of Gallies, who immediately ſent off a Boat to adviſe him, that he ſhould ſtrike his Flag, and make ready the Preſents which were due to the Grand Signior's Admiral. Marcheville duly conſidering, that this Submiſſion would blemiſh the Honour of his Maſter, and the Dignity of his Character, refuſed Compliance either in one or the other; howſoever that he might teſtify the Friendſhip and good Correſpondence which he came to confirm between the two Kings, he ſtood off at ſome diſtance, and fired five Guns to ſalute the Grand Signior's Standard: But the Captain-Paſha not contenting himſelf herewith, required the Ambaſſador to come aboard and ſpeak with him; which after divers Meſſages from one Veſſel to another, the Ambaſſador was counſelled to perform, not knowing how far otherwiſe he might engage the Honour of his Maſter. Marcheville being arrived at Conſtantinople, did greatly complain of the Affront and Violence he received from the Captain-Paſha; which though the Grand Signior and other Miniſters ſeemed not to approve, yet the Ambaſſadour received little other ſatisfaction than fair Words and Promiſes, that his Honour ſhould be again repaired.

At the Arrival of the Sieur Marcheville, the Count Ceſi, who was the former Ambaſſador, was to return into France; but the Debts which he had contracted by a certain way of living, were ſo great, that the Creditors would not ſuffer him to depart without paiment; for Default of which, he endured many Affronts offered to his own Perſon, and was detained at Conſtantinople until this Year 1634; during which time the Marqueſs Marcheville managed all the Affairs of the Embaſſy; who keeping ſtill in mind the Affront offered him before Scio, watched all Opportunities to diſparage the Actions and Perſon of the Captain-Paſha; who at length returning from the Black Sea, where he had ſome Succeſs againſt the Coſſacks, was graciouſly received by the Grand Signior; and being advertiſed, how, during his abſence, the French Ambaſſador had endeavoured to blaſt his Reputation by many Inſtances of Diminution, which he often inculcated by his Druggerman, took Advantage of the Grand Signior's good Humor, to vent before him the reſentment which he conceived thereof: The Grand Signior, to gratify the Paſha, promiſed to hang the Druggerman; which the Paſha acknowledged as a ſingular Favour, and returned from the Preſence of the Sultan full of Joy and Contentment. But better to cover his Malice, and to enſnare the poor Wretch, he ſent a Meſſenger to the Ambaſſador, aſſuring him that he deſired his Friendſhip; and that there might be a right underſtanding between them, he perſwaded him to ſend his Druggerman to him, that by his Mouth he might ſignify the eſteem he had for the Ambaſſador, from whoſe Spirits he was willing to take off all Jealouſies and Umbrages of Diſcontent.

The French Druggerman hanged.

The Ambaſſador not ſuſpecting the perfidiouſneſs of the Paſha, ſent his Druggerman to him; who being come within his Power, was immediately hanged by the Grand Signior's expreſs Command, and ordered that he ſhould remain on the Gallows with his Velvet Cap on his Head, which in this Sultan's Reign all Druggermen wore to diſtinguiſh them from others.

The Ambaſſador complained greatly of this Affront, and Violation of Articles, to the Chimacam and other Officers, but could receive no other Anſwer or Satisfaction, than that the Grand Signior might execute Juſtice as he pleaſed on his Subjects, without asking leave, or concerning the King of France or his Ambaſſador in the Matter.

But Marcheville not reſting ſatisfied with this Reply, ſtill proſecuted his Pique and Animoſity to ſuch a height, that the Captain-Paſha farther incenſed thereat, obtained Authority from the Grand Signior to diſpatch him away: ſo that ſending one day for Marcheville, and firſt reproaching his Contrivances and Deſigns againſt him, told him plainly, that it was the Grand Signior's Pleaſure that he ſhould depart at that inſtant; to which he conſtrained the Ambaſſador ſo precipitately, that he would not give him time to advertiſe his Servants, or make up his Baggage, but forced him aboard a French Ship then in Port, which he immediatly compelled to ſail; and the Wind being contrary, cauſed the Veſſel to be toaed abroad by two Gallies into the open Sea of the Propontis.

The Sieur Marcheville forcibly ſent away.

After the injurious departure of this Ambaſſador, the Count Ceſi, who had been detained at Conſtantinople, for the Reaſons before denoted, took again upon him the Function of Ambaſſador. To execute which, in better advantage of Trade and Commerce, he was adviſed to a compliance with the Captain-Paſha, and to uſe ſuch Means as might mitigate that Acrimony of Spirit which this Paſha nouriſhed againſt the French Nation.

Theſe Diſputes between the French and the Turkiſh Officers, revived certain Diſguſts and Averſion againſt all the Frank Nations, which favoured the Latine Rites; ſo that in deſpight to them, the Grand Signior reſtored again Cyrillus the Patriarch to the Patriarchal Juriſdiction, who had long been perſecuted by the Jeſuits, and by their Means been depoſed, promiſing that for the future he ſhould continue undiſturbed, in oppoſition to all thoſe of the Roman Religion.

The Peace (as we have ſaid) being concluded with Poland, the Grand Signior was more at leiſure to attend the Wars in Perſia; with the Labours and Toils of which the Janiſaries being wearied, began new Troubles and Seditions in the Camp; the which Diſorder Morat attributing to the negligence or cowardiſe of the Officers, as wanting Courage to ſuppreſs them, ſummoned the Janiſar-Aga to appear before him, and without long Proceſs or Excuſe cut off his Head, and confiſcated his Eſtate to the Exchequer, which amounted to a Million and ſeventy thouſand Dollars: another Janiſary alſo, more rich than ſeditious, was in like manner ſacrificed, and an hundred and ſixty thouſand Dollars of his Eſtate added to the Treaſury of the Sultan. The Paſha alſo of Damaſcus, with ſeveral other Officers of the Army enriched with Spoils of the People, fell a Sacrifice to Morat's Avarice and Cruelty; to whom Riches and Blood were ſo pleaſing, that none acquired a higher degree of Grace in his Favour, than thoſe who could give him notice of opulent Men, who having found Riches he undertook to find them Guilty, and to prove their Wealth ſo corrupted by extortion and violence, that nothing could hallow or purifie it but his Coffers.

Acts of Cruelty.

The next News from Perſia brought advice, that that King at the Head of a powerful Army was encamped in the Country about Van, with which the Turks not having ſufficient Force to fight, the Vizier wrote to the Grand Signior, that his Preſence was neceſſary to increaſe the Army, and encourage the Souldiery; whereupon he reſolved to leave Adrianople, and transfer his Court to his Seraglio at Scutari, that ſo remaining on the Banks of Aſia, he might be nearer to his Buſineſs, both to receive Intelligence, and adminiſter Supplies; and becauſe Seditions and Diſcontents in the People do always obſtruct the Motion of Publick Affairs, he not only ruined the Taverns and Tabacco-ſhops, but forbid Coffee-houſes, and other idle Places of Concourſe; nay to Barbers Shops no more than one was ſuffered to enter at a time; for thoſe being places of reſort, Treaſon was frequently vented there, Men of that Profeſſion being notorious through the World for their Talk and Intemperance of Language: And farther, to reſtrain Meetings and ſecret Conventions, ſtrict Orders were given, that after an hour and half in the Night, all Fires and Candles in the City ſhould be extinguiſhed; which was the general Diſcontent of all People.

The G. Signior returns to Scutari.

But what ſhewed much of the fierce Spirit of the Sultan, was a certain Fury which he conceived on this occaſion. On a certain day, riding on his Horſe, thirty Indian Pilgrims met him in the way to demand his Charity, and being in a different habit to what the Turks wear, and not accuſtomary in that Country, the Grand Signior's Horſe ſtarted at the ſight of them; and being ſpurred for bogling in that manner, the Horſe capred and reared an end, ſo that he threw his Rider; at which the Grand Signior being highly enraged, drew out his Cemiter, and with his own hand killed his Horſe, and inſtead of Alms, prepared a place of Entertainment in the Gallies for thoſe unhappy Indians.

The Grand Signior being returned to his Palace at Scutari, which is ſeated on the Aſian ſide oppoſite to Conſtantinople, applied his whole Mind entirely to the Affairs in Perſia; and being reſolved to march thither in Perſon, he put abroad the Horſe-tail, which is a ſignal of departure, he viſited the Sepulchres of his Anceſtors, made his Corban, which is a diſtribution of Fleſh to the Poor, for a Bleſſing on his Enterpriſe. The Officers of the Army contended to out-vy each the other in their Preſents to the Grand Signior, ſome furniſhed him with Royal Tents, others with curious and light Arms; and others with Horſes and Furnitures of value. Great Sums of Mony were extracted out of the Exchequer for Military Preparations and Paiments of the Souldiery. The Charge of Affairs, in abſence of the Grand Signior, was committed to the Boſtangi-baſhee, who was made Chimacam of Conſtantinople; and ſo with a fierce Spirit, and aſpect full of Indignation and Anger, he mounted his Horſe at the Head of an Army of an hundred thouſand; he departed from Conſtantinople about the end of April.

But before we recount the particulars of what ſucceeded in Perſia, it is requiſite to caſt our Thoughts back to the Troubles of Tranſylvania, occaſioned by the competition of Stephen Bethlem and George Ragotski, for that Principality.

Bethlem (as we have ſaid before) being grieved and diſcontented at his hard Fortune in being put by the Government, and reſenting the Puniſhment which Ragotski inflicted on his Son for the Crime of Manſlaughter, he went to Buda, and there renewing his old Complaints to the Paſha, he was, with Recommendations from him, accompanied to the Port; where being introduced to the Preſence of the chief Miniſters, he at large declared the Merits and good Services of his Family towards the Sultan: ‘That for this ‘Reaſon only, in diſhonour and deſpight to the ‘Ottoman Empire, he was excluded from the ‘Government, and therefore challenged its Aſſi‘ſtance to re-eſtabliſh him therein; in conſidera‘tion of which, he promiſed the ſame Faithful‘neſs and Devotion to the Sultan, which was ‘profeſſed and maintained by his Anceſtors, and ‘was natural to the Family of Gabor. That as ‘to Ragotski it was apparent, that he entertained ‘different Principles; that he was a Perſon of ‘elated Thoughts, and a Turbulent Spirit, and ‘was ever united in Combination with the Em‘peror, Germans, and other Enemies to the Ot‘toman State.

His Reaſons to be re-inſtated.

The Turks moved with theſe Reaſons, reſolved to favour Stephen, and to diſcountenance Ragotski; and though the Conjuncture of Affairs was ſuch, as that any other Engagement in War, beſides that of Perſia, did not ſquare with the preſent Deſigns; yet at all times it was judged convenient to ſow the Tares of Diſcord, and promote Differences amongſt Chriſtians, which have ever produced Advantages to the Mahometan Cauſe. And likewiſe the Paſha of Buda was commanded to enter Tranſylvania with a Force ſufficient to contend with Ragotski; and leſt the Emperor ſhould be allarm'd with this Commotion, a Chiaus was diſpatched to give him a perfect underſtanding of the Reaſons, why an Army marched into Tranſylvania; the Deſign of which was not intended in the leaſt manner to impeach the Articles of Peace between him and the Grand Signior, but only to diſplace a Man of a furious and turbulent Spirit, and to ordain another in his ſtead of a more ſober and quiet Temper, by whoſe Moderation and Prudence, the Peace between

The Turks ſend an Army into Tranſylvania.

Ragotski implores Aid from the Emperor.

Ragotski ſtartled at this Deſign intended againſt him, aſſembled the States of his Country, to determine and conſult concerning a Remedy, and immediately diſpatched a Meſſenger to the Emperor, to deſire and implore his Imperial Succour and Protection: and though Ragotski was ſenſible of the diſparity of his Strength, in compariſon of that of the Turks; yet neither did his Counſels nor Behaviour betray Fear or want of Conſtancy.

The Hungarians ſeconded thoſe Inſtances which Ragotski had made at the Imperial Court, and the Party which he had made at Vienna brought the matter to a debate in Council, which was argued on both ſides with ſolid and convincing Reaſons. Thoſe who ſpake in diſfavour of Ragotski, alledged, That all Aſſiſtance contributed to him would be a juſt Cauſe and Pretence to the Grand Signior to make War with the Emperor.

It is debated in Council.

That Ragotski himſelf was of an unquiet Temper, not unlike to Gabor his Predeceſſor, who had often bid Defiance to the Emperor, and over-running all Hungary and Auſtria, had often erected his Standard in the ſight of Vienna. To protect and cheriſh a Perſon of this Diſpoſition, was no other than to nouriſh a Serpent or Viper in their Boſom; who being elevated at the expence of the Empire in ſucceſſes againſt the Turk, would convert that Power which he had gained to the damage of the Houſe of Auſtria, combining with the Faction of other Princes to procure its deſtruction. Let us therefore, ſaid they, ſtand at a gaze, and as Men on the Shore, or in a good Port, behold the agitation of Ships in the Ocean; perhaps the change of a Prince in Tranſylvania may turn to our Benefit, and one may ſucceed into the place, of ſuch a mild Temper and ſerene Diſpoſition, as may better agree with the Maxims of this Court, and may cultivate that Peace which can only render theſe Countries happy.

Howſoever there were other Opinions to the contrary, amongſt which it is ſaid, that D. Annibal Gonzaga, a Perſon acquainted with the State of Tranſylvania, and of the Turks, and Director of the Imperial Army, delivered himſelf in this manner.

May it pleaſe Your Sacred Imperial Majeſty.

IF Ragotski had been the Lawful Son and Hereditary Succeſſor of Gabor, who was an Enemy to your Majeſty, we might then apprehend the evil Conſequences of a Son, that traces the ſame Path and Footſteps of his Father. But here is another Perſon, another Prince, in Emulation different, and by Enmity hating the Houſe of Gabor; wherefore I cannot imagine how this Prince can poſſibly entertain Maxims of like Nature with the other. For my part I believe, that it behoves your Majeſty to maintain a good Correſpondence with the Princes of Tranſylvania, by a cloſe Union againſt the Turk; your adjoining Countries being like contiguous Buildings, which are ſtrengthned by a mutual Support: Let us therefore ſupport it; for if it depends not on us, it will be overrun, and remain oppreſſed without us. To aggravate the Faults of Gabor to the diſparagement of Ragotski, is no Logical Conſequence, unleſs you will argue, That the Faults of the Guilty are to be puniſhed on the Innocent. Let us therefore conſider, which agrees beſt with the Security of the Empire; that Tranſylvania ſhould remain in the Hands of Ragotski, or of the Turk; or that we had better ſtrike againſt the Rock of Jealouſie, which we conceive againſt this Tranſylvanian, or on that ruinous Rock of the Turkiſh Power. The Ottoman Councils commonly look aſquint, they caſt their Eye on the Prince, when their ſight aims at the Principality; and threaten the Perſon, when they deſign to vent their Fury to the ſubjection of his Country. The true Intent of the Turk is to reduce Tranſylvania to the ſame Condition with Moldavia and Walachia, and to incorporate this, with infinite other Provinces, into the groſs Body of his Empire. It is notorious to all the World, that the Emperors, your Predeceſſors, have loſt a large Tract of Land by the Turks; and your Loſſes will every day be greater, as their Conqueſts increaſe: And when their Dominions in Europe are ſo enlarged, that they are able to quarter their Aſiatick Cavalry in theſe Countries, your Dangers muſt neceſſarily be inevitable and full of Terror. For I compute, that when the Turk deſigns to make War upon us, he marches with an hundred thouſand Men, and perhaps ten thouſand Camels, beſides other Beaſts of Burden: ſo numerous a Body as this cannot be maintained until the Graſs be fully grown, which is not until the middle or end of June; and from that time they have more than a month or ſix weeks March before they arrive upon our Confines; the which conſumption of Time, prolongs their Enterpriſes, and protracts the time of our Damages. But if once they become Maſters of Tranſylvania, and that that Country be laid to Moldavia, Walachia, and other parts of Hungary, they may then commodiouſly winter amongſt us, and begin their Wars and Attempts upon us early in the Year, and purſue them until the laſt ſeaſon of the Autumn: and in this manner, whilſt we are debating and taking our Meaſures in our Diet, they will fatten themſelves, and ſatiate their Appetites with our Spoils. It is good therefore for us to defend Auſtria in Tranſylvania, keeping the Fever as far from the Heart as we are able. Let us ſuppoſe, that Ragotski is the moſt ungrateful Man in the World; and that after we have ſupported and ſuccoured him, that he will reverſe his Arms upon us: Howſoever he is not ſo ſtrong and conſiderable as to do us much hurt, and therefore it were better to have him our Neighbour and our Enemy, than the Turk, though our Friend; the firſt can only adminiſter ſome little cauſe of Jealouſie, but the other may deſtroy and ſupplant us; the firſt is but like a putrid Fever, which is cured with every ſmall Evacuation; but the latter is a Peſtilence, which dilates and diffuſes it ſelf, and is deadly and irrecoverable. Let not the Scruple neither of breaking with the Turk trouble us; for we may adminiſter Aſſiſtance under-hand, and without noiſe effect our Buſineſs, without arriving at the extremity of a Rupture. It is folly and weakneſs in us to be charmed by the Flatteries of the Turks, and the fair words of this Chaous; or to imagine, that when they have over-run all Tranſylvania, they will ſtop in the midſt of their Career, before they arrive at the Gates of Vienna; no, their Intentions are to lull us aſleep, and to deſtroy our Neighbour firſt, and then us; they cannot devour us both at once, but huſband their Diet, and reſerve us for another Meal. The Turk is like a Serpent, who lies quiet and coiled up all the Winter; not becauſe he wants either a Sting or Poiſon, but being benummed with cold, wants warmth and heat to give it Motion and Operation. This is my Senſe and Opinion, which I moſt humbly tender before the greater Wiſdom of Your Sacred Majeſty.

The Emperor refuſes Succour to Ragotski.

Notwithſtanding theſe convining Arguments, the Reſult of the Council determined otherwiſe, and Ragotski was left to ſhift for himſelf, and to ſtand upon his own Legs; which was a pernicious Reſolution, and that which was afterwards the cauſe of the ſubjection of Tranſylvania to the Turk, and the Original of many Miſchiefs to the Empire; but thus was the Fortune of the Turks, more favourable to them than to the Chriſtian State.

Ragotski being thus abandoned by the Imperialiſts, and expoſed to the Mercy of an inſatiable Enemy, though his Courage was good and reſolute, yet he began to deſpond of his Force, unable to deal with ſuch an unequal Match as that of the Turks; And his Subjects being fearful of the Event, perſwaded him to give way, and reſign his Rule to the hands of Gabor his Competitor; Ragotski, that he might not ſeem to neglect the Counſel of his Subjects and Friends, and to gain Time, pretended to hearken to their Advice; and accordingly entred into a Treaty with Gabor. During which Debate he ſecretly obtained ſome Forces from Poland, by connivance of that Government: and the Hungarians being his Friends, privately favoured him, knowing that the Conqueſt of Tranſylvania would be a ſtep to their Deſtruction; and being at length well fortified and recruited, he began to declare openly, that he found no ſecurity to himſelf in this Surrender, for that a Place was denied him, wherein he put his chief hopes of Defence; and therefore that he was reſolved to ſupport and maintain his State and Cauſe in the beſt manner that he was able.

Ragotski obtains Succours under-hand.

The Turks enter Tranſylvania.

Hereupon the Turks entred Tranſylvania with an Army of twenty five thouſand Men under the Command of the Paſha of Buda: Ragotski, to obſtruct their March, diſpatched his General Cornis with ſeven thouſand Men, to prepoſſeſs an advantageous Ground, with Order to entertain, but not fight the Enemy, until he could come up to him with the groſs of his Army.

The Turks perceiving their advantage in number, reſolved to engage the Enemy before they were reinforced with new Succours; to perform which they made a Detachment of twelve thouſand Horſe and two thouſand Janiſaries, and ſome Field Pieces, commanded by the Paſha himſelf and Stephen Gabor. Cornis not being able to diſingage himſelf, or avoid fighting, made a Vertue of Neceſſity, and put his Forces into form of Battel; and exhorting his Men to follow his Example, aſſured them, that Victory was ſooner acquired by Valour than Numbers, and that Fortune was always more favourable to the Valiant and Brave, than to the Cowardly and puſillanimous.

They fight with Cornis.

Cornis unſheathing his Sword, fought in the Head of his Men, and led them through the thickeſt of his Enemies, the firſt rank of which not being able to ſuſtain the furious Charge of the Chriſtians, gave way; and being diſordered, the firſt Squadrons ran foul of the ſecood, and at length all of them betook themſelves to a ſhameful flight. The Tranſylvanians took all their Canon and Baggage, with ten Enſigns, and killed three thouſand Turks. The Paſha of Agria was wounded, and Olac Bei of Temiſwar was taken Priſoner; and the whole Army had that day been defeated, had not the Janiſaries, who fortified themſelves in a thick Wood, given a ſtop to a farther purſuit. Ragotski likewiſe in divers ſucceeding Skirmiſhes overthrew the Turks, killing many Paſha's and Souldiers of Quality, and at length remained ſole Maſter of the Field.

Are overthrown.

The Turks retired to Lippa, and Stephen to Temiſwar, whilſt Ragotski made his Incurſions into the Country of the Turks, burning and ſpoiling two thouſand Villages; with which being terrified and beaten into terms of Reaſon, they agreed to ſuffer Ragotski to injoy his Government, conditionally, that the Goods and Eſtate of Gabor in Tranſylvania ſhould be reſtored unto him: and thus Ragotski eſtabliſhed himſelf in the Government, and obtained a Confirmation thereof from Conſtantinople to his Son, accompanied with Preſents and Ornaments of a Prince. And this Example ſhews us in what manner we are to deal with Turks; Reſolution and Rigour are better Arms againſt them than Complements; and with an Enemy it is more advantageous to make Peace with Weapons in our Hands, than to condeſcend to the hard Terms which a Tyrant pleaſes to impoſe on an eaſie and unprovided People.

Peace is made.

So ſoon as this News arrived the Ears of the proud Sultan, he was ſo incenſed, that in a fury he would have deſiſted from his preſent War in Perſia, to vent his Revenge upon Tranſylvania; but the cooler and more moderate Counſels of wiſer Friends, adviſed him to defer the execution of his Anger, until he could diſcharge it more to the purpoſe, and in a Conjuncture when it would fall more eaſy on himſelf, and more heavy on his Enemy: Howſoever in the mean time Ragotski made ſuch uſe of this remote Diverſion of the Ottoman Arms, by advantaging himſelf of an Alliance with the Coſſacks, and by the ill Correſpondence and Diffidence which at that time intervened between the Tartars and the Port, that he not only avoided the Revenge threatned by Morat, but obtained an eſtabliſhment of the Inheritance to his Son.

Morat at Erzrum.

By this time Sultan Morat was arrived at Erzrum, which is a City belonging to the Turks on the Confines of Perſia; where the firſt Act which he performed of Juſtice, was to cut off the Head of the Paſha for his Oppreſſion and Extortions inflicted on his People.

Entring into Armenia, he was grieved to ſee the upper and lower Provinces ſo miſerably deſtroyed and waſted by the War; to recover which, he commanded the People, under pain of Death, to return again to their Ancient Habitations within the ſpace of twenty days; but they

they being ſetled in other Cities, where perhaps they had purchaſed Houſes and Lands, could not poſſibly comply with the Severity of this Decree; and therefore were conſtrained to buy a Diſpenſation and releaſe from the Penalty for a Sum of Mony.

About the beginning of July, in the parts of Erzrum, Morat made a general Review and Muſter of his whole Army; with which thoſe he brought from Conſtantinople joined to Recruits by the way, and thoſe Forces which had waged War in Perſia, amounted to near the number of three hundred thouſand fighting Men, but ſuch as were admirably well diſciplined, not only by the Severity of their Soveraign, but by the example he ſhewed them of Frugality and Patience: for he often marched afoot in the midſt of the Heats; he was very temperate in his Diet, though he was naturally of a gluttonous and luxurious Palate: for ſeveral Months he made uſe of no other Pillow for his Head than his Saddle, no other Blanket or Quilt than the Covering or Foot-cloth of his Horſe.

The Grand Signior's Patience & Labours.

Being arrived near to the City of Revan, he beſtowed that Largeſs on the Souldiery of a Dollar a Man, which is accuſtomary to be given at all times, when the Grand Signior marches in Perſon, and then made known to them his Intentions of beſieging that Place; and in caſe he took it not in the ſpace of ten days, that then he would leave it begirt with forty thouſand Men; and dividing his Army into three Bodies, he would enter the Bowels of Perſia by divers ways. The Tents of the Grand Signior, and of all the Camp, were pitched, Batteries raiſed, the Trenches opened, and all Matters laid in the formal manner of a Siege. The Gariſon within, commanded by Emir Gumir, conſiſted of fifteen thouſand Men, fitted and provided with all ſorts of Ammunition, and wanted neither Courage nor Proviſions; howſoever at the end of nine days, the City was ſurrendred to the Sultan, upon Terms of Quarter to the whole Gariſon, both for Life and Freedom of Eſtate: And becauſe this Governour Emir Gumir, a principal Noble-man of Perſia, had by corruption thus voluntarily delivered up the City, he acquired a place of high Grace and eſteem in the Favour of the Grand Signior; to which his courtly manner of indulging his Humour, and complying with him in his Wine and Feaſts, (to which the joy of this preſent Succeſs priviledged him to return) gave him daily a new Title to receive extraordinary Honours from him.

Revan betrayed and ſurrendred by Emir Gumir.

The News of this proſperous Succeſs was poſted to Conſtantinople, as the firſt Eſſay of the good Effects of the Sultan's Preſence, and was there celebrated with Feaſts, Joy, and Lights, according to the Turkiſh Faſhion, called Danalma; to perform which, the Turks obliged likewiſe the Chriſtian Ambaſſadors, ſaying, That if they were Friends, they ought to evidence their Satiſfaction, by demonſtrations of Joy in the proſperity of their Ally.

Rejoycing and a Feſtival kept for it at Conſtantinople.

The Feſtival was kept for the ſpace of four days; during which two Brothers of the Sultan, viz. Bajazet and Orchan were ſtrangled; the latter of which, as is ſaid, was ſo brave, and of that Courage, that he killed four of his Executioners before he ſubmitted his Neck to the fatal Cord.

The Turks entring farther into Perſia, inconſiderately fell into an Ambuſh, where twelve thouſand of their Men were defeated; howſoever the remainder of the Army not being diſcouraged with this Encounter, proceeded on their March, making moſt miſerable Havock and Deſtruction of all before them, carrying that Dread and Terrour to the Countries round, that all People fled, leaving their Houſes and Things not portable, to the poſſeſſion of the Enemy. Howſoever the Turks found greater Difficulties than they expected; for meeting frequently Parties of the Perſian Cavalry, which were practiſed to manage their Horſe and Sword, were often defeated, at leaſt endured and ſuſtained the ſhock of Bloody Skirmiſhes; and then the Perſians retiring into the Mountains known to them, but unknown to the Turks, which ſerved them better than fortified Places, returned again when any Advantage or Booty appeared, which perpetually vexed and wearied the Enemy; and burning all Things which might afford them relief, rendred that fruitful Country more Deſolate and barren than the Deſarts of Lybia, or the Sands of Arabia.

The Turks enter farther into Perſia.

In this manner the Turkiſh Army being deſtitute of all ſorts of Proviſions and Refreſhments, were forced to retire to the Country of Tauris; which being haraſſed and impoveriſhed like other Provinces, cauſed a miſerable Famine in the Camp, whereby Multitudes of Horſes and Camels periſhed for want of Nutriment; at which the Grand Signior being highly incenſed againſt the Inhabitants of Tauris, committed their City to the Will and Mercy of the Souldiery, who having pillaged and ſacked it, left it a miſerable ſpectacle of Fire and Sword.

Tauris deſtroyed.

The King of Perſia ſeeing in what manner the Troops of his Enemy were wearied and conſumed, took hold of this Opportunity as ſeaſonable to propoſe certain Articles of Peace by an Ambaſſador, to which Morat ſeemed to incline a flexible Ear; but lodging his Souldiers in their Winter-quarters in the parts of Damaſcus and Aleppo, he took his way towards Conſtantinople, with intention to eaſe the Hardſhips and Labours of the Summers War, by a voluptuous Eaſe and Winters paſtime in the delights and ſoftneſs of the Seraglio.

The 16th day of December he arrived at Conſtantinople, having paſſed from Iſmit through the Gulph of Nicomedia with the attendance of fourteen Gallies: he made his Entry by the Jews Gate, and not by that of Adrianople, as was accuſtomary; he was mounted on one of the beſt of his Horſes, and cloathed with a Coat of Mail, a Caſket on his Head, with three Feathers adorned with Pearls and precious Stones; his Sword was girt to his ſide with his Bow and Quiver, his Beard was in a rough and neglected manner, which made him appear more Fierce and Martial; the Chimacam came after him, accompanied with the Traitor who ſurrendred Revan. This Feſtival for his return was celebrated for the ſpace of a whole week, during which time the Shops were ſhut, the Doors and Outſides adorned with green Boughs and Paintings, and by Night the Streets with Torches were made as clear as the day: howſoever the People ſecretly murmured, that the War was not proſecuted, and the Advantages taken, when Fortune began to ſmile and favour their Enterpriſes; and that now deſiſting in the middle way, the Work was again to be begun, and all the foregoing Blood and Treaſure was ſpent and conſumed to no purpoſe. Theſe Murmurings of the People were not without ſome Ground and Cauſe; for after the departure of the Grand Signior, the Perſians put themſelves again into the Field, and recovered the Country which they had loſt; and having offered offered a Sum of Mony to Morteſa Paſha to ſurrender Revan; which he refuſing to accept on Principles of Fidelity and Honour, they prepared to lay cloſe Siege to the Place: the Janiſaries were alſo diſpleaſed to ſee themſelves neglected, and caſt out of the Guard, and their Places ſupplied by the Boſtangees; nor leſs diſguſted were the Lawyers to ſee ſeveral of their Judges and Kadies hanged, and their Heads cut off, upon pretence of Sedition and Faction. His ill Humor more increaſed to the height of Tyranny, by reaſon of certain twinges which he ſuffered of the Gout, which is not uſual in Perſons of his Age, not ſurpaſſing twenty ſix years; and becauſe his Phyſician, a Jew, forbid him wholly to drink Wine, as poiſon to his Diſeaſe and Complexion, he was ſo enraged, that he drove him from his Preſence with Indignation; and immediately conceived ſuch Anger and Prejudice againſt the whole Nation, that he cauſed their Houſes to be ſearched, and their Jewels taken from them. But what was moſt ſtrange, was his horrid averſion to Tobacco, the taking of which, by any Perſon whatſoever, he forbid upon pain of Death; which Sentence he ſo rigorouſly executed, that he cauſed the Legs and Arms of two Men, one that ſold Tobacco, and the other that took it, to be ſawed off, and in that manner expoſed to the view of the People: he alſo cauſed two others, a Man and a Woman, to be impaled alive, for the ſame Offence, with a Roll of Tabaco about their Necks.

Feſtival for return of the G. Signior.

His averſion to Tobacco.

As the Gout cauſed him to be froward and ill-natur'd, ſo more eſpecially when ill news came from Perſia, he was obſerved to be more raving and tyrannical than ever. His Army in Perſia wanting Proviſions, disbanded; Morteſa Paſha Governour of Revan being killed, the Souldiers rebel, open the Gates, and yeild themſelves to the Perſian; for which Offence the Janiſaries fearing the Juſtice of their Maſter the Grand Signior, two thouſand of them took up Arms in Service of the Enemy: the ſenſe hereof vexing Morat to the Soul, he cauſed the Regiſter of the Janiſaries to be hanged, and another of their principal Officers to be beheaded, and ſtrowed the Streets of Conſtantinople with dead Bodies, ſome for one cauſe, and ſome for another, which ſtruck the whole City with a general Dread and Conſternation.

Revan regained by the Perſian.

The Grand Signior's Severity & Cruelty.

He often walked in the night, puniſhing Quarrels and Diſorders of the Streets, and meeting two Women wandring in the dark, he cauſed them to be cut in pieces.

He put his Cook to Death for not dreſſing his Meat well, or not ſeaſoning his Sauces according to his Palate.

In his Seraglio ſporting with his Arms, he wounded himſelf with a Dart in the thigh; and by accident wounded the Son of Mehmet the late Vizier with a Carbine-ſhot, of which in a ſhort time after he died.

The Perſians having taken Revan (as we have ſaid) inſtituted Chambers of Janiſaries in that place after the Turkiſh faſhion, paying them in the ſame form as at Conſtantinople; and to allure the Spahees to enter into his Service, he offered to all that came in twelve Aſpers a day of conſtant Pay; and declared, That their Faith and Law had no difference from the Mahometan.

The Grand Signior receiving theſe Advices with extreme indignation, proclaimed his Intentions to return again into Perſia; and though the Deſign pleaſed not the Militia, who were weary of the War, yet his Power was too great to be reſiſted, and his Humors too violent to be diverted by ſober Counſels; for having ſubjected and abſolutely ſubdued the Inſolence of the Souldiers, and ſuppreſſed the Arrogance of the Lawyers and Church-men, he ordered every thing according to his Arbitrary and Uncontroulable Pleaſure; which being rendred Extravagant and Unſupportable, by reaſon that in his Cups, and at the time of his Debauchery, he would often take his Counſels and determine his Reſolutions, were notwithſtanding with more patience endured, upon hopes that they would not be laſting, and that Exceſſes would accelerate his Death, and the end of their Oppreſſions.

The Paſha's of greateſt Note and Riches he put to Death, and confiſcated their Eſtates to his Exchequer; and whereas Avarice and Cruelty were equally predominant in his Nature, there was ſcarce a day wherein he made not ſome demonſtration of thoſe Diſpoſitions.

The Engliſh Ambaſſador making ſome inſtances for the releaſement of Engliſh Slaves from Captivity, was forced to purchaſe their Liberty by giving two Ruſſians, or other Slaves in the place of one Engliſh-man.

He took a ſingular delight to ſit in a Chiosk by the Sea-ſide, and from thence to ſhoot at the People with his Bow and Arrows, as they rowed near the Banks of the Seraglio; which cauſed the Boat-men afterwards to keep themſelves at a diſtance from the Walls of the Seraglio. And as he likewiſe took pleaſure to go from one Garden to another on the Boſphorus, ſo if he obſerved any ſo bold, as to put forth his Head to ſee him paſs, he commonly made him pay the price of his Curioſity by a ſhot from his Carbine.

In all his Gardens and places of Pleaſure, his chief Recreation was Drinking, in which his principal or almoſt ſole Companions were Emir Gumir the Perſian who betrayed Revan, and a Venetian of the Family of Bianchi, who having been taken by the Turks, when he was young, was placed in the Seraglio, and educated in all the Learning and Cuſtoms of it, and becoming as well a Proficient in Drinking, as in other Vices, he was made a Favourite and Companion to Morat. And thus did they follow this trade of Drunkenneſs ſo conſtantly, that the Health of the Grand Signior began to impair; and at length he became ſo ſenſible of his Extravagancies, that he incharged the Chimacam not to obey him after Dinner: and when in the heat of his Wine he took a humor to ride through the Streets, the Janiſaires and Officers would ſometimes run before to adviſe the People to withdraw, and ſometimes drive them away with Stones, that ſo they might eſcape the hazard of this capricious Tyrant.

As it cannot be expreſſed in what Dread and Fear the People ſtood of him, ſo neither in what Veneration he was with his Servants, who obſerved the looks and every caſt of his Eyes; had learned his Nods, and the meaning of every Motion and Geſture of his Body. It happened once, that a Paper falling caſually from his Hand out of a Window, the Pages ran in all haſte down the Stairs, ſtriving who ſhould be the firſt to take it up; but one more deſirous than the others to evidence the Zeal of his Service, took the neareſt way and leaped out of the Window; and though with the fall he broke the Bone of his Thigh, yet being the firſt that took up the Paper, he came halting to preſent it with his own Hand: this bold readineſs in his Service ſo pleaſed the Grand Signior, that being cured, he was afterwards preferred to one of the moſt conſiderable Offices of the Empire. Thus was Morat revered in his Seraglio, as he was feared aboard, his Servants having the ſame awe of him, as Bagotes the Eunuch had of Alexander the Great, who holding the Pot of Incenſe and Perfumes whilſt his Maſter ſlept, ſuffered his Hands to burn to the Bone, rather than to awaken him by moving out of his place. Q. Curtius.

But it is time now to leave off farther Diſcourſe of the Extravagancies of Morat, and to return to the Wars in Perſia; howſoever before the departure of the Grand Signior, it will be requiſite to recount ſomewhat of the State of Affairs in Europe.

Diſturbances in Poland and Hungary.

On the Frontiers of Hungary and Poland, there wanted not Exerciſes and Skirmiſhes to employ and practiſe the Souldiery, and keep them in Breath.

The Poles heightned with their good Succeſſes, would not longer endure the Incurſions of the Tartars, complaining againſt the Turk, that he had given Orders, and ſecretly abetted them in their Robberies and Invaſions, againſt the Articles of the laſt Peace; and therefore to avenge themſelves, the Poles appeared on the Frontiers with forty or fifty thouſand Horſe: but the Grand Signior not willing in this Conjuncture to break with the Poles, abſolutely diſowned any ſuch Order or Permiſſion given to the Tartars; and being willing to continue the League, that he might oblige the King of Poland, gave liberty to all the People of that Nation, and to the Ruſſians, who had been taken ſince the laſt Treaty, poſitively prohibiting all People from buying, or keeping any of the Subjects of that Country for Slaves, during the continuance of this Peace.

The Turks confirm the Peace with Poland.

In Hungary, though the Ambaſſador had but lately brought a Confirmation of the Peace from Conſtantinople; yet the Turks pretending that the Articles were not complied with, continued to trouble and diſturb thoſe Frontiers; for four thouſand of them being gotten into a Body, burnt certain Villages, made divers Slaves, and battered the Caſtle of Raab; but being repulſed by that Gariſon, and by that of Komorra, they again made Head, and encamped within three Leagues of Presbourg: The which gave great trouble to the Emperor, both becauſe he had lately declared a War againſt France, and becauſe he apprehended, that thoſe Commotions of the Turks were deſigned to no other end, than to engage him to renounce all aſſiſtance and ſuccour to be given unto Ragotski.

Send Forces againſt Ragotski.

We have already recounted in what manner the Turks had eſpouſed the Quarrel of Stephen Gabor, and reſolved to eſtabliſh him in the Principality of Tranſylvania, with the Ruin of Ragotski; which now being deſigned to be done by open Force, ſeveral Troops were ſent to the Frontiers of Tranſylvania; which ſo alarmed the Hungarians, that they put themſelves on their Guard, and obliged the Eſtates of Auſtria and Hungary to contribute toward the Succour of the Tranſylvanian Prince.

The Emperor remained long in ſuſpenſe what courſe to ſteer, until at length the Perſwaſions of the Confederate Princes, the ſhame of abandoning a Friend and an Ally for a Prey to the Turks, and the fear of diſpleaſing his Hereditary Dominions in Hungary, who conſidered Tranſylvania as the Bulwark of their Country, induced him to promiſe ſecretly, and underhand, Aſſiſtance to Ragotski.

As to the Turks themſelves, the Effects did not correſpond with their Menaces: for though they had gathered an Army of twenty thouſand Men at Buda, they not only were diſappointed of their Deſign upon Newhauſel, but were openly repulſed, and ſhamefully expelled the Frontiers by the Palatine of Hungary: And Ragotski being recruited by Succours from the Emperor, and by an Alliance with Poland, defied the Forces of the Turk, and contemned the Reports of ſixty thouſand Men preparing to march againſt him.

For indeed the Grand Signior had too great an Incumbrance on his Shoulders by the War in Perſia, to attend unto a perfect and ſtudied Revenge againſt Ragotski; for Revan being recovered by the Perſian, (as we have already declared) was a Matter of high Moment; and what diſtracted all his Counſels, and weakened his Hopes.

Mutiny in the Turkiſh Army.

When News came firſt of the Siege of Revan, Orders were given to the Vizier to Beſiege Bagdat, as a means to cauſe a diverſion of Arms; but the Souldiery entertaining an averſion to this Enterpriſe, unanimouſly refuſed to March, or to proceed farther than Erzrum. Jambolat Ogli, who commanded the Army before the Arrival of the Vizier, had ſtrangled a Paſha, and taken his Eſtate to ſupply the Wants of the Army; and had likewiſe put to Death ſeveral Spahees and Janiſaries for Mutiny, and becauſe they had declared an unwillingneſs to this War. The Souldiery prepared to addreſs themſelves to the Vizier for Juſtice againſt theſe violent Proceedings: but he not willing to hear them, endeavoured to divert their Complaints, which cauſed a greater Commotion and Storm than before. And though Jambolat pleaded his Orders and poſitive Commiſſion from the Grand Signior for what he had acted; yet that Allegation not being accepted by the Multitude as a juſtifiable Plea, the Vizier was forced to condeſcend to their Deſire, and ſtrangle Jambolat, as he had done the others, being the only Means to quiet and compoſe this Trouble of his Army.

But as after ſome great Storm, there is always remaining for a while a ſwelling and fluctuation in the Waters, ſo there ſtill remained on the Spirits of the Souldiery, Diſcontents and unquietneſs of Mind: Wherefore the Vizier fearing leſt the Enemy taking advantage of the preſent Seditions, ſhould charge them at a time of Diſorder, he retired at a diſtance from them into the Plains of Erzrum: But he was not able to continue long in thoſe Parts for want of Fuel, and of Wood and Planks to ſecure them againſt the Rains and Snow; for it being Winter, which is rigorous and cold in that Country, their Tents were not ſufficient proof to defend them againſt the Extremity of the Weather.

Van beſieged by the Perſians.

Whilſt the Turkiſh Army remained at this Place, advice came, that the Perſians had Beſieged Van, which is a ſtrong Fortreſs ſituate on an inacceſſible Rock, on the Frontiers of the Province of Diarbequir. And though the Perſians were not able to take this Place, neither by Storm nor Famine, yet during this Siege, they made uſe of their time to ruin all the Country of Diarbequir, which they left ſo deſolate, that the Turkiſh Army could not quarter there, nor extract the leaſt Proviſion or Subſiſtence from thence.

To all theſe Misfortunes a greater was added by the Treachery of a certain Curd, one who pretending to be ill-ſatisfied with the Perſian Party, voluntarily offered himſelf to the Service of the Turks; and having done them ſome little Services, by being their Guide through certain difficult Paſſages, he gained a confidence ſo far with them, as that deſigning to ſurpriſe a quarter of the Enemy, they committed themſelves to his Guidance and Conduct; who having brought them into a narrow Paſſage, where an Ambuſh of the Enemy lay, he then turned his Coat, and fought againſt the Turks, of whom 15000 were killed and taken in this Snare.

Fifteen thouſand Turks killed in an Ambuſh.

In ſhort, all Matters of this War proceeded croſs and unfortunate for the Turks; for beſides their unlucky Fights with the Enemy, their own Seditions in the Camp were greater Miſchiefs; for now enduring no longer theſe pungent Miſeries, under the pretence of wanting Pay, they cut in pieces the Treaſurer of the Army, two Aga's of the Spahees, and the Chaouſbaſhee of the Janiſaries.

Mutiny of the Souldiers.

This News arriving at Conſtantinople, when Morat was afflicted with a grievous acceſſion of the Gout, ſerved to redouble his Pains; in which raving againſt the Conduct of his Officers, he immediately deprived the Vizier of his Charge, and ordained Biram Paſha, late Chimacam, to ſucceed him in his Employment.

A new Vizier ſent to the Army.

The new Vizier immediately ſet forth the Horſes Tail, which is a ſignal of departure, with ſound of Drums and Trumpets, making Corban, which is a diſtribution of Mutton to the Poor, in divers Places: His Retinue was ſpeedily equipped with ſuch ſumptuous Magnificence, that it looked rather like the Train of an Ambaſſador, which intended to make Peace, than to the Troops of a General, whoſe Buſineſs was nothing but Blood and Deſtruction. And indeed Matters ſeemed to be inclining that way, the Perſians having far advanced in this Negotiation; for they wiſely pondering the immenſe Force of the Ottoman Empire, with which they were now contending, judged it the moſt politick courſe to make Peace, under the auſpicious Planet of their good Fortune; for not knowing how long that might remain conſtant, they might, ſo ſoon as the Wheel turns on the other ſide, be forced to accept Terms of leſs Advantage than at preſent they might promiſe to themſelves under their happy Stars.

A Perſian Ambaſſador ſent to the G. Signior.

Wherefore a Propoſition being made of ſending an Ambaſſador to the Grand Signior, he accepted of it; and accordingly arrived at Conſtantinople in the Month of Auguſt, when the Vizier was ſcarce in the middle of his Journey. The Grand Signior entertaining ſome real Inclinations to Peace, laid aſide ſomething of his uſual Grandeur and State, giving the Ambaſſador Audience in a few days after his arrival; and as nothing mollifies the hard Mettle of a Turk's Spirit, like a gentle Shower of Gold, and the emulgent ſoftneſs of Rich Preſents; ſo Morat underſtanding of Gifts with which he came accompanied, afforded to the Ambaſſador an eaſy Ear and a pleaſing Countenance.

The Preſents for the Grand Signior, beſides thoſe for the Court, were theſe that follow.

Eight Indian Horſes of great Price.
Forty Dromedaries.
An hundred and fifty Meticals of Musk. As much Ambergrieſe made up in ſeveral Bags; all ſealed up with the King's own Seal.
Thirty bundles of the beſt black Sables.
Eight large Carpets mixed with Gold and Silver; with divers others of Silk, very rare and precious.
Many Pieces of the fineſt Linnen to make Turbants.
A great number of the rareſt Girdles. Porceline to a great value.
Divers Pieces of Satin and Velvet, with Golden Flowers.
Fifty Pieces of Silken Stuffs.
Eight Bows of excellent Work.

Theſe Preſents ſo well diſpoſed and prepared the Mind of the Grand Signior towards an Accommodation, that he beſtowed a kind Aſpect and gentle Words on the Ambaſſador, ſo that all the World expected that a Peace would have enſued.

And indeed one might well have believed his Reality in this Intention, ſince the ardent Paſſion he had to be revenged of Ragotski, availed more with him than all other Conſiderations in the World. His Honour alſo called him to give a ſtop to the Progreſs of the Moſcovites, who had taken Aſac; and the Tartars and Coſſacks gave ſome ground of Jealouſy, that before long they deſigned ſome Action on the Turkiſh Territories: the Reaſons whereof we ſhall diſcourſe in this following Year.

We have already related, ſome Years paſt, on what Terms the Tartars ſtood with the Turk, how they refuſed to accept that King which the Port recommended to them, though the eldeſt and firſt of the true Line: how they fought and overthrew the Forces which the Grand Signior ſent to compel them to the Election he deſired; and this laſt Year, upon pretence of a War with Cantemir, they refuſed to ſend their Army againſt the Perſian, as had always been accuſtomary to do againſt the Enemies of the Sultan, whenſoever required.

Troubles in the leſſer Tartary.

The Paſha, Muſtee, and Kadi of Caffa (which is the Grand Signior's Town in Tartary) urged the Tartar Han to prepare and forward his Forces, according to the Duty and Obligation which was incumbent on him; and enlivening their Arguments with Reproaches of Cowardiſe and Ingratitude; ſo far provoked the Han, that he cauſed them all three to be ſtrangled.

Notwithſtanding this high Provocation, the Grand Signior diſſembled the Injury, leſt a due Reſentment ſhould raiſe them into an open Rebellion: and diſſembling an approbation of the Fact, as done with Reaſon and Juſtice, ſent to the Tartar Han a Sword and a Veſt, as Signals of his Favour: And farther ſuſpecting, leſt in proſecution of ſo ſenſible a Blow, the Tartar joining in League with the Coſſacks and Moſcovites, ſhould make himſelf Maſter of Caffa, he prudently touched the Wound with a gentle Hand, offering to ordain ſuch a Paſha, as ſhould be warranted with his Aſſent and Approbation.

The Tartar being overcome by ſuch Lenitives as theſe, proteſted that he never entertained other Thoughts, than to maintain his Faith and Allegiance inviolable towards the Grand Signior; and that the Alliance he had made with the Nogay Tartars, and the Forces now raiſed, were maintained with no other Deſign, than to ſuppreſs the Rebellion and Inſolence of Cantemir.

Cantemir makes a new Colony.

This Cantemir being a Perſon of a bold Spirit, and daring in all his Actions, did oftentimes, by virtue of his own Authority, lead a ſtrong Party to the Field, being followed by the braveſt and ſtouteſt Souldiers of Tartary; for which Reaſon being hated by the Tartar Han, and his Life often attempted, and his own Spirit not ſupporting a Subjection to any other, he paſſed the the Nieſter, and retired with his own Troops, and ſuch others as would follow him, into the Country of Budziak, near to Beliegrod and Kilia, confining on the Frontiers of Moldavia; where he intended to plant and form a new Colony and Government.

In a ſhort time, divers chief Captains being deſirous to follow the Enſigns of ſo famous a General, came in to him; and multitudes of People forſaking the Sands and barren Rocks of Tartary, came crowding into this Country; that the Plains of Budziak not being capable to contain them, they paſſed into Moldavia; where incroaching on the Lands of the proper Inhabitants, gave a Jealouſie as if they intended to take poſſeſſion of the whole Province.

The Poles being jealous of theſe ill Neighbours, which lay at the Gate of their Country, ready to enter on all occaſions, had made Proviſion in their laſt Articles of Peace with the Grand Signior, that he ſhould force them to return, and urged that Point by the Ambaſſador with all earneſtneſs.

The Tartar Han alſo finding his Countries depopulated and weakened by ſo large an Evacuation, made alſo his Complaints and Addreſſes to the Port. But the Grand Signior looking on this Colony, as an increaſe of his Dominions, and to be compoſed of ſuch People whom Neceſſity muſt render obedient; and that they could eaſily, at his Command, make Irruptions into Poland, Hungary, and Tranſylvania, ſeemed deaf to all Applications in this Buſineſs; and as if they were a People in whom he had no part, ſhewed no concernment for them, though ſecretly he promiſed them his Protection.

Hereupon Vladiſlaus King of Poland, being wearied with Delays, reſolved by force of Arms, to drive out this deteſtible Neighbourhood: But the Tartar Han, whom this Buſineſs more nearly concerned, being more ſpeedy in execution than the Poles, having raiſed an Army of thirty thouſand Men, encountred Cantemir with twenty thouſand, and charged him ſo furiouſly, that he killed ſeven thouſand of them on the Place, and put the reſt to flight, purſuing them through the Plains of Dobruc on the other ſide of the Danube.

He is overthrown by the Tartar Han.

The Grand Signior, who had all this Time remained a Spectator of this Succeſs, began now to take the part of Cantemir, and ſeverely to reprove the Proceedings of the Tartar Han, for having diſturbed Cantemir, whilſt he was preparing to ſerve him in the Wars of Perſia. But the Tartar, having ſhaken off much of his Reſpect and Reverence towards the Grand Signior, deſpiſed the Menaces which he vented againſt him, and proceeded in his own Buſineſs, compelling his People to return again to their Country, and to their Ancient Habitations. Morat being forced to ſuffer what he could not remedy, ſummoned Cantemir, with all diligence, to render himſelf at Conſtantinople; where being arrived, he was at firſt regarded with a favourable Eye; but his Son ſoon after having in a private Quarrel killed a Tartar near the Walls of the Seraglio, was for that Fact juſtly ſtrangled by Order of the Grand Signior; the day following, Cantemir was alſo impriſoned, and in a ſhort time underwent the like Fate with that of his Son.

Cantemir put to death.

During theſe Troubles, a Nephew of Cantemir feigning himſelf to be diſguſted with his Uncle, revolted to the Party of the Tartar Han, with no other than a treacherous Deſign to take away the Lives of the two Brothers; the which he compaſſed at a time of their hunting, when being far remote from their Attendance, following their Game in untroden Paths, he ſet upon them with an hundred Villains, and perfidiouſly took away their Lives. The News hereof was highly applauded at Conſtantinople, and the Traitor extolled as a Perſon of mighty Courage and wonderful Ingenuity; ſo that now different Counſels, and new Meaſures, were taken concerning the Affairs in Tartary.

The King of Tartary killed.

Bechir Gherry, Brother to thoſe Princes of Tartary which were killed, was then at Jamboli, a City in Thrace, retired thither under the Protection of the Grand Signior, for fear and jealouſie of Treachery from his elder Brother. Morat cauſed him to be brought to Conſtantinople, where he was ſumptuouſly received, and conducted to Audience by the Chimacam, who gave him the upper-hand, which is the Left amongſt Men of the Sword, as the Right is amongſt Men of Learning or of the Pen; for as the right Hand governs the latter, ſo the firſt is appendent to the left Side.

Bechir Gherev ordained K. of Tartary.

The Bodies of the two dead Brothers were brought to Conſtantinople, where fetulent or ſtinking, they were expoſed to the ſight of Morat; who to gratify his own Humour of Revenge, cauſed them to be thrown into the Sea.

This good News from Tartary, was attempered with a worſe from Aſac, which the Moſcovites and Coſſacks had beſieged. This Town is ſituated at the Mouth of the River Tanais, upon the declining of a Hill; it is in form four-ſquare, and may be about twelve hundred Paces in Compaſs. Before it fell into the Hands of the Turks, it was a famous Scale for all ſorts of Merchandiſe, eſpecially for Butter, Cheeſe, ſalt Fiſh, Leather, Slaves, and other Commodities brought hither by Turks, Tartars, and Moſcovites. The Venetians when they addicted themſelves more to Traffick and Commerce than they do at preſent, took this Scale for their Way into Perſia. The Town was fortified with ancient Walls, flanked with capacious Towers, and with a Caſtle which being in the middle, and on the ſide of the Water, divides the Town, as it were, into two equal parts. The Gariſon conſiſted not of above three or four hundred Men; for being a place remote from powerful Enemies, it fell not under any great jealouſie, nor was it deemed worthy of the Charge of numerous Defendants.

Aſac beſieged.

The City being in this weak Condition, the Coſſacks ſoon made themſelves Maſters of it; which after they had ſacked and pillaged to the utmoſt, they conſidered it as a place worthy of better Fortifications; and therefore applying themſelves to raiſe new Works, and repair the Old, they ſoon made it a Fortreſs of Strength and Conſideration. This happening at a time when the Turks were diverted by the Perſian War, the Coſſacks injoyed this new Conqueſt for the ſpace of four Years without moleſtation, until that in the Year 1641, it was recovered with much Blood and Slaughter by the Arms of Sultan Ibrahim, as we ſhall hereafter recount in the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

Is taken by the Coſſaks.

And now becauſe the taking of this Place was the Original from whence the Diviſions and Civil Wars between the Poles and Coſſacks derived their beginning, and was the Occaſion that the Coſſacks revolted from their juſt Obedience, to the Protection of the Turks; the Relation will not only be curious, but a digreſſion neceſſary to the clearer Light of the preſent Hiſtory.

The Cauſe of the Civil War between the Poles and Coſſacks.

Uladiſlaus the Fourth King of Poland being wearied with conſtant Complaints of the Robberies and Incurſions made by the Coſſacks upon the Turks, contrary to Articles and Treaties of Peace, was at length perſwaded by his Barons and Counſellors, that the only Means to ſuppreſs the Violence of this unruly People, was to diſarm them; and taking away their Weapons of War, to ſupply them, in lieu thereof, with the Shovel and Mattock, with Ploughs and Pruning-Hooks: by which induſtrious Diververſion, from a wicked Life of Blood and Robbery, to honeſt Husbandry and lawful Arts of living, they might with time be rendred uſeful to their own Prince, and capable of Faith and juſt Communication with their Neghbours. It is not one Age paſt ſince theſe people were called Coſſacks, derived, as is ſuppoſed, from Coſai, a word in their Language which ſignifies a Goat, perhaps becauſe of their Agility of Body, or becauſe their Garments are chiefly made of Goats Skins.

The Coſſaks Country deſcribed.

Pellibus & laxis arcent mala frigora bracchis,
Oráq; ſunt longis horrida tecta comis.

The Country inhabited by them, was at firſt on the Banks of the River Boriſthenes, about fifteen Leagues in length to the entrance into the Euxine Sea, where it is reported, that Ovid was baniſhed; and ſome ſay, that from him a Village thereabouts called Ovidoua derives its denomination; and hereunto we may afford the greater belief from one of his Elegies, in his Book De Triſtibus, which ſeems to deſcribe this Country, and the fierceneſs of the Inhabitants. Eleg. 8. lib. 5.

Quam legis à Scythicâ tibi venit Epiſtola terrâ,
Latus ubi æquoreis jungitur Iſter aquis.
Miſta ſit hac quamvìs inter Gracóſq; Getâſq;
A malè placatis plus trahit ora Getis;
Sarmaticæ major Geticæq; frequentia gentis,
Per medias in aquis ítq; reditq; vias.
In quibus eſt nemo, qui non Coryton, & arcum,
Teláq; vipereo lurida felle gerat.
Vox fera, trux vultus, veriſſima mortis imago,
Non coma, non ullâ barba reſecta manu.

At preſent the name of Coſſacks, and their Country alſo, is of a far greater extent than it was formerly; for they call now all ſuch in Poland Coſſacks, that are light Horſe armed with Bow and Arrow and Fire-arms: and their Country ſince the late Commotions is meaſured from the fartheſt parts of the Palatinate of Chiovia, for the ſpace of an hundred and twenty Leagues on one ſide, and the other of the Boriſthenes, which comprehends likewiſe all the Country of Ukrania. This Country was always inhabited by the moſt Warlike People of Ruſſia; for that being ſubject to the frequent Incurſions of the Tartars, neceſſary Defence, and conſtant practice in Arms, endued them with a Bold and Martial Spirit.

Ukrania is a Country ſo fertile, that it may compare with the moſt fruitful Soil in the World, producing ſuch quantities of Corn, with little labour, that the Husband-men being made negligent by their abundançe, produced with little Toil, have leiſure to apply themſelves to Violence and Rapine. They have no Wine, but uſe themſelves much to Strong-waters. Their Houſes are not built of Wood or Stone, but of Oſiers, interwoven and daubed over with Earth and Lime; ſo that they uſe no Nails or Iron: they have no Merchants unleſs in Kiow; nor do they ſerve themſelves of Phyſicians or Apothecaries. Their learned Language, or the Tongue wherein they write, is the Sclavonian, anciently called the Illyrian: ſo that in all things this People is rude and barbarous; and though their manner of Government and Policy is not refined or methodically diſpoſed, yet nevertheleſs it is ſolid and of deep Foundation, appropriated to the nature and diſpoſition of that People.

This honeſt Deſign of King Uladiſlaus, to reduce this People to a juſt and an induſtrious courſe of living, not agreeing with their Temper and Cuſtoms, they rather reſolved to leave their Country, and betake themſelves to various Fortunes; ſome of them paſſed into Moſcovia to plant a Colony in thoſe uninhabited Parts: a Body of them, to the number of ſix thouſand, joining together, reſolved to paſs into Perſia to offer their ſervice unto that King; and being on their Journey, as far as the Tanais, they encountred with a Party of Moſcovite Coſſacks, who inhabited certain Iſlands of that River; with whom entertaining Diſcourſe, they underſtood that Aſac might eaſily be ſurpriſed by them, if they could agree to unite Forces, which together might compoſe a Body of ten thouſand Men: The Importance of the Place being well conſidered, it was reſolved, that the March into Perſia ſhould be ſhortned, and this City be ordained for the ultimate End of their Travels and Place of Repoſe. According to this counſel Aſac being aſſaulted and taken, (as we have already intimated) the Coſſacks fortified it in the beſt manner that they were able, making an Arſenal for their Boats and Saicks, whereby afterwards they did much more infeſt the Turks than before.

The other Coſſacks who continued in their Country, being much perſecuted by the Poliſh Nobility, choſe Kilminieſchi for their General, (the Son of a Noble Family in Lituania, but baniſhed and degraded of his Honour for his Criminal Offences) and rebelled againſt the Government. At firſt not being able to reſiſt the Force of Poland, they retired within the Woods; but joining afterwards with other Coſſacks, they iſſued forth at the beginning of the Spring, beat the Poles, and carried away a conſiderable Booty. Afterwards joining with the Tartars, they made their Incurſions as far as Zamoſca, within twenty Leagues of Warſaw; and ſo Matters continued with various Succeſſes not appertaining to this Hiſtory. Only thus far it is pertinent to the Matter diſcuſſed for us to have ſhewn, That the Counſels of Poland were in a great Error, when they reſolved to change the Life, and alter the Humour of this Warlike People, which being protected in their Priviledges, and encouraged in their Wars, would at all Times, as occaſion ſerved, have been ready to have ejected great numbers of good Souldiers into the Ottoman Territories, and might ſtill have been conſerved to ballance the Power of the Tartars, which now daily infeſt and ruin the Borders of Poland.

Theſe People were like Ill Humors, which being vomited out into the Dominions of the Turk, eaſed and made healthy the Body Politick of Poland; but being conſerved within the Stomach, cauſed Syncopes, Convulſions, and ſuch Commotions, as have of late Years ſhaken the whole Body of the Poliſh Kingdom: and at length withdrawing themſelves entirely from all Obedience, together with that large Province of Ukrania, as they have weakned that Government; ſo now of late years ſeeking protection from the Turk, have added to his Kingdom, and enfeebled that of Poland.

When the News arrived firſt at Conſtantinople that Aſac was beſieged, the Captain-Paſha going then to inſtate Bechir into his Kingdom of Tartary, received Orders to relieve Aſac, and if poſſible, to raiſe the Siege; but the Succours coming too late, and the Town being taken, the loſs thereof was not eſteemed important enough to divert either Thoughts or Forces from the Perſian War.

Preparations for the War in Perſia.

For now Morat reſolving to proſecute the War in Perſia, which could not be ſucceſsful without the united Power of his whole Empire, conducted by his own Perſon, he reſolved to make a ſecond Journey into thoſe Parts, and with his own Hand to knock at the Gates of Babylon. To prepare and diſpoſe all matters in order hereunto, he in the firſt place countermanded his Decree, which prohibited a farther increaſe of the number of Janiſaries; for now being deſirous to augment his Army beyond the account of ancient Regiſters, he opened the Janiſaries Door, (as they call it) and enrolled ſix thouſand more into that Order.

To conſerve ſtill the Order of this Militia, he appointed Officers ſtrictly and ſeverely to take the Decimation of the Chriſtian Children in Europe, and leſt (as was uſual) they ſhould be corrupted by the Parents, who often give Preſents, whereby to blind the Eyes of the Miniſters, that ſo they may overſee their Children, or in lieu of the comlieſt and moſt fit for Service, accept of the Sickly and Impotent, or ſuch as are unworthy of the Bread and Education given them by the Sultan, he moſt ſeverely injoined this Service, and under a thouſand Menaces encharged the care hereof to be executed without Favour or Partiality to any. He carefully reviewed the Books of the Timjar-Spahees, counting the number exactly that every Country yields, and comparing them with thoſe muſtered in the Field, he confiſcated the Lands of thoſe that wanted, being forfeited for non-appearance: he would admit of no Excuſe or Delay to the Matter in hand. The Superintendant of the Ordnance but making a Scruple about the Proportion of ſome Guns, as too weighty and unwieldy for ſo long a March, loſt his Life, for doubting or making a difficulty in what the Grand Signior propoſed or deſigned.

And that no Commotions at home might divert or call him back before his Buſineſs was perfected, he encharged his Paſha's of the Frontiers to live quietly with their Neighbours, and to be ſure to give no occaſions of Complaint, or Cauſe for War during his abſence; recommending to the prudence of the Paſha of Siliſtria the care of compoſing certain Differences between the Princes of Moldavia and Walachia.

Having ſecured Matters as well as he could at home, he ordered the Horſe-tail to be ſet forth at the gate of the Divan, and all Paſha's and Officers of the Army did the like at their own Doors. His Troops began now to grow numerous; the Spahees and Timariots appointed for the Guard of the Grand Signior's Tents, together with other Cavalry, which hold their Lands under Service, amounted unto two hundred thouſand. From the hundred ſeventy two Chambers of Janiſaries he drew forth thirty thouſand. From the Topgees or Gunners, whereof there are no more than twelve hundred in their Chambers at Conſtantinople, yet make up twelve thouſand in other parts, he drew out three thouſand for the preſent Service. The Shepherds and Plough-men of Bulgaria made up twenty thouſand; which with Water-bearers, Smiths, Bakers, Butchers, and all other Tradeſmen which followed the Camp, were in vaſt Numbers: ſo that the whole Army, with the Attendants belonging thereunto, were at a moderate calculation computed to amount unto near five hundred thouſand Men; whereof three hundred thouſand were fighting Men.

The Peſtilence, which is the Epidemical Diſeaſe of Turkie, and which abates the Numbers and Pride of that People, raged this Year greatly in Conſtantinople, and in the parts of Romagnia; it entred into the Seraglio, and amongſt others, took away the only Son of the Grand Signior of two or three Years old. This cauſed Morat to paſs moſt part of the Summer at a Palace on the Boſphorus, where he recreated himſelf with his drunken Companion the Perſian Traitor; and hereby he contradicted the Proverb, That Princes love the Treaſon, but not the Traitor; for Morat it ſeems loved them both, entertaining this Fellow in his Boſom: His Cloaths, his Garb, his Horſes, and Equipage, might rival with that of the Sultan's; He took place of the Chimacam in all Publick Appearances; and what was moſt ſtrange, he preceded the Mufti; which was a new Form never before practiſed, and would have afforded matter of Wonder and Diſcourſe, but that the World conſidered this Novelty, as a Method agreeable to the extravagant Humor of the Sultan.

The extravagant Pleaſures and Cruelties of Morat.

Amongſt his Paſtimes, nothing was more pleaſing than ſome Divertiſement acted with Blood; he ſhot the Son of a Paſha with his Gun, for daring to approach near the Walls of his Seraglio, ſuppoſing that he came with curioſity to diſcover his Pleaſures, and manner of voluptuous Recreations: For the ſame Reaſon he would have ſunk a Boat laden with Women, as it glided ſlowly by the Banks of the Garden. He would himſelf behold two Thieves impailed, which were condemned to die for robbing ſomething out of his Seraglio. He commanded the Head of the Treaſurer of Cyprus to be cut off in his preſence; as alſo the Maſter of his Muſick, for daring to ſing a certain Air which ſeemed Perſian, and to praiſe the Valour of that Nation. The Paſha of Temiſwar he put to Death at a full Divan, for fighting unfortunately againſt Ragotski.

To theſe ſevere Acts of Cruelty, which he called Juſtice, he added one not unpleaſant; A certain Greek called Stridia Bei, or Lord Oyſters, who had been Prince of Walachia, and one whom we have before mentioned, having, by his oppreſſion and haraſſing that People, amaſſed a conſiderable Sum of Mony, eſſayed a ſecond time, by force thereof, to obtain the Principality; and making his Offer and Requeſt before the Grand Signior, he was heard with ſome railery: At length the Grand Signior told him, That he was too proud and aſpiring, and therefore ordered the tips of his Noſe and Ears to be cut off, telling him, that that was to clip the Wings of his Ambition.

But that before his departure for Perſia, he might conſummate his Acts of Tyranny, he practiſed one upon his Brother, a Youth of twenty two Years of Age, of great Hopes, and good Endowments. He was conducted to the preſence of his Brother, at the Biram, to pay his Reſpects, as is uſual at that Feſtival; and having performed the Ceremony, he enlarged himſelf in high Praiſes and Admiration of the Grand

Signior's Generoſity and Bravery; who for recovery of Bagdat, was contented to expoſe his Perſon to the Inconveniences of a long Journey, and the Dangers of a hazardous War, and that therein he equalled, if not ſurpaſſed, the Glory of his Anceſtors: Which courtly and rational manner of Diſcourſe did not pleaſe Morat, but rather adminiſtred Subject of Jealouſy, fearing that he knew too much; and that as he could Speak well, ſo he might Act accordingly; wherefore the ſame Day he cauſed him to be ſtrangled, to the great Sorrow of the People, and deteſtation of his Abominable Tyranny: But to amuſe the Minds of the Multitude, and ceaſe their Murmurings, he cauſed it to be divulged abroad, that fourteen of his Women in the Seraglio were with Child: which was all falſe, there remaining none of the Ottoman Race beſides his Brother Sultan Ibrahim, who was Weak, as well in Body as Underſtanding, and whoſe Imperfections ſecured and compounded for his Life: And to ſuppreſs the Diſcourſe about his Brother's Murder, he changed it into a talk about his Preparations for War, and his departure for Perſia. Wherefore the Forerunners and Harbingers of the Army being ſent away with Labourers to repair Bridges, and to level the Ways for the more eaſie paſſage of the Cannon. Morat paſſed over to his Tents at Scutari, cloathed in a Coat of Mail, and with a Head-piece ſet with Precious Stones, and his Sargouch or Feathers claſped to it with Buckles of Diamonds.

As he landed at Scutari, he was received by three Squadrons of Souldiers, each Squadron conſiſting of four thouſand Men well Armed, and richly Attired; the Garments of one Squadron of which were provided at the Expence of the Grand Signior, and of the other two at the Charge of his Favourite, and of the Captain-Paſha: the latter of which preſented to the Grand Signior thirty Purſes of Mony, for beſtowing on him the Honour to command that Gally which tranſported him to the Aſian Coaſt. The Ambaſſador ſent from Perſia was detained at Conſtantinople until this time, and after the Turkiſh Faſhion not permitted to depart at his own liberty; but being now ordered to follow the Camp, his Port and Quarters were aſſigned, that ſo he might be a Spectator of that Tragedy which was now to be acted. All things were now diſpoſed in good Poſture, with much Solemnity, in order to a March; the Conacks, or days Journies, with their Places of Quarters, were laid out in an hundred and twenty days of March from Scutary to Babylon, and ſeventy days of Otorack or Repoſe. The Journies with the groſs Body of ſuch an Army could not be long; and the joyning with other Forces in the way, required leiſure and time.

The March of the Turkiſh Army.

In ſhort, the Horſe, after the Turkiſh manner, having eaten their Graſs and been ſoiled, this powerful Army decamped from Scutari about the end of May. The firſt day of Otorack or Repoſe was appointed at Iſmit, where the Grand Signior made a review of his Army; ſuch as were Aged, and unable to endure the Fatigues of a long March, he diſmiſſed, giving them half Pay for their Lives, with the Name of Otoracks, which is the ſame with Milites Emeriti among the Romans: with exact Order therefore and ſevere Diſcipline, to which their fierce Monarch had reduced them, marched this numerous Army; no Villages were abuſed, nor Country-people plundred, and all things were purchaſed with ready Mony: And the Grand Signior himſelf being rendred more gentle and tractable in the Field than in his Seraglio, heard all Complaints, and diſtributed Juſtice with an equal and impartial Hand.

In the mean time, at Conſtantinople, due care was taken to keep things Quiet and in Order; the Boſtangibaſhee, like Lord High Chamberlain, had the Charge committed to him of the Seraglio, and the Moveables of it; he frequently made his Rounds both by Sea and Land, puniſhed thoſe whom he found in Taverns; nor would he ſuffer any Candles to be lighted after two hours in the Night. The Chimacam, and the Captain-Paſha, likewiſe executed their Offices with all care and ſeverity in their reſpective Stations.

Cyrillus the Patriarch ſtrangled.

At this time, to the great diſſatisfaction of the Greek Nation, Cyril the Patriarch, who had been in England, and greatly affected with the Diſcipline of our Church, was depoſed, impriſoned in the Seven Towers, and ſtrangled: in his place one Carſila was ordained Patriarch, and his Commiſſion or Baratz obtained from the Grand Signior at the expence of fifty thouſand Crowns, one Moiety whereof was paid from Rome, the whole Deſign againſt Cyrillus being managed by the Jeſuits and other Religious living at Galata, who accuſed him before the Turks, of keeping a ſecret Correſpondence with the Moſcovites and Coſſacks; for which loſing his Life, Carſila, a pretended Friend to the Roman Faction, was inſtituted Patriarch.

The Grand Signior marching with his potent and numerous Army, all the World remained at a gaze what the Iſſue ſhould be of this mighty Enterpriſe; yet moſt were of Opinion, that the Honour and Riches of the Ottoman Empire being now at Stake, the War could not otherwiſe conclude than with the Conqueſt of Babylon. All that could be feared, was ſome diverſion by the Chriſtian Princes; who taking hold of the preſent Conjuncture, ſhould enter the Frontiers with a powerful Army, and thereby force the Sultan to return. But as to Poland, the Jealouſy ſoon vaniſhed. When the News came of a Civil War between the Poles and the Coſſacks, and that ten thouſand of the latter were ſlain in a Battel, this Intelligence came moſt ſeaſonable and grateful to the Port, expecting now a Meſſage from the Coſſacks, deſiring Succour in their Extremity; for ſuch Accidents as theſe have nouriſhed the Turkiſh Intereſt, which hath grown out of the Civil Diſcords of Chriſtian Princes.

The Pirats of Algier and Tunis infeſt the Gulf of Venice.

By this means, as the Apprehenſions of War by Land ceaſed, ſo there appeared ſome Clouds of Storm at Sea; which doubtleſs might have produced a War with Venice, had the Turks been at leiſure to attend it; for ſixteen Gallies belonging to Algier, Tunis, and Biſerta, well armed with Slaves and Souldiers, and provided ſufficiently with Cannon, Powder, and Bullet, Commanded by Ali Picenin, united together and formed a ſmall Fleet, with deſign to rove over the Adriatick Sea, and infeſt the Coaſt of Italy. Their Intentions were to plunder the Riches of Loretto; but being hindred by contrary Winds, from entring ſo high into the Gulf, they made a deſcent in Puglia, and ſacked all the Country of Nicotra, carrying away a great Booty, with Slaves, and amongſt them ſeveral Nuns which they proſtituted to their Luſt; thence they paſſed over to the ſide of Dalmatia, and in ſight of Cataro took a Veſſel, and made Prize of all Ships which they met in thoſe Seas; the Rumor of which made great noiſe over all Italy, the People exclaiming againſt their Princes for ſuffering 1638. fering their Lives and Eſtates to remain ſubject to the petty Force of a few Pirats. For the Veſſels of Malta and Florence were disjoined, and roving after purchaſe in the Archipelago, took little notice of what was acted in the Gulf. The Spaniards, after their faſhion, were ſlow in Arming, and ſpent the Summer in Preparations, till the Pirats, laden with Booty, were departed towards the Winter; ſo that none remained to take care of Italy, and the Venetian Gulf, but Venice only, to whom the Dominion of thoſe Seas are rightly appropriated.

To ſuppreſs therefore the Inſolence of theſe Pirats, the Republick ſet forth a Fleet conſiſting of twenty eight Gallies and two Galleaſſes, under the Command of Marin Capello, with Inſtructions to ſink, burn, and deſtroy thoſe Pirats, either in the open Seas, or in Harbour of the Turks; for that by the Articles of Peace, between the Grand Signior and the Venetians, it was agreed, That no Port or Harbour of his ſhould be priviledged to afford entertainment or protection to any Free-booter or Pirat of that nature.

It happened about that time, that the Malteſes and Florentines cruſing in the Archipelago, had done great Miſchief to the Turks in thoſe Seas; to revenge which, and to prevent farther damage, the Captain-Paſha ſent Orders to theſe Veſſels of Barbary immediately to come to his Aſſiſtance; to which they were now more eaſily perſwaded; for being already laden with Booty and Spoils, they contented themſelves with a change of their Station. But to give a farewel to thoſe Parts, they firſt reſolved to ſpoil, and plunder Liſſa, alias Leſina, an Iſland belonging to the Republick; but being overtaken by the Venetian Fleet in their Voyage thither, near to Valona, a Port and Harbour belonging to the Turks, they put themſelves under the Defence of the Town and Caſtle, which received them willingly to their Protection, notwithſtanding all Articles and Agreements to the contrary. The Venetian Fleet ſaluted the Caſtle without a Shot, deſiring, that according to the Capitulations of Peace, the Pirats might be rejected, and commanded to abandon their Port: in anſwer hereunto the Turks replied with a Shot, making known their Intentions to defend their Friends: wherefore the Venetians retiring at ſome diſtance came to an Anchor, deſigning to block up the Port. Many days had not paſſed before the Pirats endeavoured, by help of their Oars, and a gentle Gale, to make their eſcape; and being, with the gray of the Morning, advanced without the Port, they were eſpyed by the watchful Venetians, who dividing their Fleet into two Squadrons, charged them with high Courage; the Fight continued for the ſpace of two hours, during all which time the Caſtle of Valona fired at the Venetians, and ſhot down a Maſt of one of the Galleaſſes, a Splinter of which wounded Lorenzo Marcello the Commander; at length five of the Gallies of the Pirats being diſabled, and many of their People killed, they began to fly, and retire again under the Protection of the Town; as alſo did the Venetians to their Place of Anchorage.

Capello blocks up the Pirats in Valona.

A diſtinct Advice of all Particulars being diſpatched to Venice, the Senate wrote to Capello, That ſince the reſpect which the Republick owes to the Ottoman Court was not unknown to him, he ſhould by no means make any attempt againſt thoſe Pirats upon the Land, but meeting them fairly at Sea, he ought then to make uſe of all the valour and force he was able.

1638. In the mean time the Duke of Medina las Torres, Vice-King of Naples, diſpatched an Expreſs to Capello, with Letters applauding the generoſity of the Deſign, wherein he was now engaged for the Glory of his Republick, and the Common Good of all Chriſtendom, proffering to ſupply him with Refreſhments and Ammunition, and what elſe might ſupply his Occaſions; expecting, that by ſuch Encouragement as this, he might be induced to Aſſault the Enemies in Valona, without reſpect to the Grand Signior, or any Inconveniences which might ariſe thereby. On the contrary the Governour of the Caſtle, and Kadi of the Town, wrote a Letter to Capello, putting him in mind, that he was within the Grand Signior's Dominions, and that he ſhould be careful how he offered any Violence to thoſe Places, which would certainly prove a Violation of the Peace, and be the Original of an inevitable War.

Capello had now lain a whole Month before the Port, having all the time injoied fair Weather, and a ſmooth Sea, againſt the hope and deſire of the Turks, who expected that by means of ſome Storm, the Enemy would be forced to remove their Quarters to ſome ſecure Harbour, and thereby afford them an opportunity to eſcape. But Capello growing weary of ſuch tedious Attendance, reſolved to expect no longer, nor yet to loſe the preſent Advantage of rendring himſelf Maſter of the Veſſels of the Enemy: wherefore dividing his Fleet into ſeveral Squadrons, he advanced near the Port, firing ſeveral Shot at the Tents of the Pirats, of which one from a Galeaſs ſtruck a Moſch; and arming with ſtore of Men the Galeots and Brigantines, they entred the Port, and to the aſtoniſhment and vexation of the Turks, poſſeſſed all the ſixteen Veſſels, and brought them to their Admiral: which though they had diſfurniſhed of all their chief Booty, yet their Cannon and Arms remained, of which there were twelve Pieces of great Braſs Guns, beſides others of Iron, with divers Falcons and leſſer Arms.

He aſſaults them in the Port.

The Intelligence hereof being carried to Venice, Orders were given, that all the Veſſels ſhould be ſunk in the Port of Corfu, excepting only the Admiral of Algier, which was to be brought to the Arſenal of Venice, there to remain as a Trophy of Victory, and for a perpetual Memory of this Glorious Atchievement. Howſoever this Exploit was variouſly interpreted at Venice, and approved, or diſproved, according to the diverſity of Humors. The younger Men applauded it as an Action of great Gallantry, excuſing his Tranſgreſſion of the Senats Orders by a tranſport of Paſſion and Zeal towards his Country, and deſire of Glory. But the Senators, and Men of mature Judgments, highly reſented this Breach of their Orders, which as they are ſtrictly Enjoined, ſo they expected that they ſhould be punctually Obeyed. That this action was a ſufficient and Juſt Cauſe alone to kindle a War, and that it was a matter intolerable, that a ſingle Citizen ſhould of his own Head and Humor, preſume to act ſuch things, as muſt neceſſarily involve the Publick in a War, contrary to their Pleaſure, and in oppoſition to their expreſs Commands. For which Crime and other ſubſequent Defaults, Capello was afterwards forced to juſtify himſelf, as will be ſignified in the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

The Particulars of this Advice, were by an expreſs Meſſenger diſpatched to Luigi Contarini the Bailo or Ambaſſador for the Venetians at Conſtantinople, a Perſon of great Reputation and Eſteem, having been converſant in the principal Courts of Chriſtendom, and employed for the ſpace of ſeven years at Munſter, where he was Aſſiſtant with the Nuntio Chigi, afterwards Alexander the 7*th*, in the general Peace of Europe.

The Turks alſo receiving this News aggravated to them with all the foul Circumſtances imaginable, the Chimacam immediately ſummoned the Bailo to Audience, and with an Angry Countenance began to exclaim: “That taking advantage of the Grand Signor's abſence in remote Parts, the Venetians had, in a perfididious and hoſtile manner, aſſaulted and deſtroyed the Fleet of Barbary, which were his Subjects, and ſuch as he had called to his aſſiſtance againſt the Corſares of Malta and Ligorn. That being accidentally compelled by ſtorm to enter into the Port of Valonia, they were forcibly taken thence, and violence offered to the Grand Signior's Port and Caſtle, by way of a manifeſt and open Breach. If this preſumption were grounded on the long diſtance of the Grand Signior from theſe parts, the Venetians would do well to conſider, how that they provoke an angry Prince, and one who eſteems neither Expence, Hazards, nor Labours to compleat his Revenge. If this were a deſign to divert the Grand Signior's Arms from Perſia, they would do well to conſider, that the Sultan was not ſo far advanced, but that he could turn a Current, if he pleaſed, ſufficient to drown, and in an inſtant to overwhelm the Dominions of Venice; or could at leaſt collect Forces from nearer parts able to revenge his Quarrel, and vindicate his Honour from the Diſdain and Scorn of ſuch petty Neighbours.

Hereunto the Bailo or Ambaſſador made this Reply: “That this Piratical People was the ſame which the Year before had landed in Candia, and made ſpoil of the Eſtates of the Inhabitants, and carried many of them into ſlavery; and not contented with this Booty, they entred the Gulph, and penetrated into the very Bowels of Italy, with deſign to Sack and Plunder the Iſland of Liſſa, which was under the Dominion of the Republick. That the Venetian General friendly ſaluted the Caſtle of Valona, which was returned with ſeveral Shots from thence; that had it been his intention to have attempted the Port in the beginning, he would not have lain thirty ſeven days in expectation of the forth-coming of thoſe Pirats, it being only reſpect to the Grand Signior, which obliged him to that attendance. At length being wearied, and provoked by the inſolenee of that People, he forcibly entred the Port, knowing, that by Capitulations with the Grand Signior, it was agreed, That all Ports ſhould be forbidden, and that to theſe Pirats, unleſs they firſt gave Security and Caution not to injure and make Prize of the Subjects of the Republick.

The Chimacam replied hereunto, “That there were ten thouſand Souldiers and Slaves belonging to thoſe Gallies, which had taken their Refuge in Valona; and therefore he required the Venetians to permit them free paſſage into their own Country, and to reſtore their Gallies, unleſs they intended to come to an open Rupture with the Grand Signior.

The Chimacam alſo preſſed more urgently for reſtitution of the Gallies, in regard, that having adviſed the Grand Signior of this Diſaſter, he had at the ſame time given him hopes, and almoſt aſſurance to believe, that by his Negotiations he ſhould recover them out of their Hands: But the Senate was of a different Opinion; and therefore gave expreſs Orders to their Officers of the Marine Affairs, immediatly to ſink all thoſe Veſſels; that ſo the expectation of the Turks being diſappointed by an impoſſibility of recovery, might not, by the rude Inſtances and Threats of Morat, oblige them to a diſhonourable and an undecent Reſtitution.

The Algerines angry at this News.

The News of this Misfortune made greater noiſe and diſturbance in the Divan of Algier than at Conſtantinople, that rude Rabble raved, and railed, and threatned, laying the blame ſometimes on one, then on another, being ready to come to blows amongſt themſelves; but that being obliged, by order of their Divan, to keep their Thumbs within their Girdles, they durſt only expreſs their Anger by Punches and Thruſts of their Elbows. At length coming to cooler Terms, they charged all the Fault on their Admiral Ali, and reſolved to make Applications to the Grand Signior for Redreſs, and Reparations on the Eſtates af the Venetians in his Dominions.

The G. Signior's Anger againſt the Venetians.

The News alſo hereof overtaking Morat in his March into Perſia, angred him to the Heart, and tranſported him to that heat of Indignation, that he immediately ordered, that the Venetian Bailo, with all his Nation in the Ottoman Dominions, ſhould, without exception, be cut to pieces; but the Great Vizier, and his Favourite, ſuffering him for ſome time to vent the impetuoſity of his Fume and Rage without contradiction, gave a ſtop for thirteen days to the diſpatch of theſe fatal Orders; until taking him in a more gentle mood, they perſwaded him to change this Sentence of Death, to the impriſonment only of the Bailo; and ſuch care was taken, leſt the News of a War with Venice ſhould fly into Perſia, and thereby prejudice the Terms of Peace, that this Accident was kept as a Secret, and communicated to none, but ſuch as were nearly concerned in the Government.

The Command for the Bailo's Impriſonment being arrived at Conſtantinople, he was ſummoned to Audience by the Chimacam; and though at that time he was exceedingly afflicted with the Gout, yet the Turkiſh Obedience to Imperial Commands admitting of no Excuſe, he was forced to an attendance; and being brought in his Sedan, he was carried to the Chamber of Audience, where he expected ſome time until the Chimacam came to him: in the interim being entertained by ſome Aga's, whom the Chimacam had employed to ſound him touching the reſtitution of the Veſſels; who finding by his Diſcourſe that they were ſunk, without poſſibility of recovery, and that there could be no compenſation made for them, they returned with this Anſwer to the Chimacam: of which being now informed, he came in, and having no farther to expoſtulate on this Matter, produced the Grand Signior's Command for his Impriſonment, and kiſſing it firſt, cauſed it to be read. The Bailo replied, That he was ready to ſubmit, being not only willing to ſuffer Impriſonment, but alſo Martyrdom, accompanied with the ſevereſt Pains, for the ſake of his Prince and his Country.

The Venetians Bailo impriſoned.

To ſoften and mitigate Matters, the other Chriſtian Ambaſſadors then reſident at the Port, had made Arz to the Grand Signior, wherein, with all reverence and reſpect, they offered themſelves for Mediators in this Difference, engaging themſelves, but not the Parole of their

Princes,

1638. Princes, for the Perſon of the Bailo, that he ſhould not fly from the Port, nor yet refuſe any reaſonable Terms by way of Accommodation. This Mediation of the Ambaſſadors, ſeconded with ſome Preſents from the Bailo to the Turkiſh Miniſters, ſo facilitated Matters, that the Bailo at firſt was conducted to the * Kahya's Chamber, and afterwards was confined to his own Houſe in Galata, guarded by four Chiaouſes, with free Liberty to all Viſitants whatſoever.

* The Chimicam's Steward.

There was now no other Rumour or Diſcourſe in Conſtantinople, but of a War with Venice, ſo ſoon as that with Perſia was concluded: And in the mean time the Grand Signior gave Orders, that ten Gallies ſhould be built in his own Arſenal at his Charge, and preſented to the Barbarouſes, with condition that they ſhould ſtay until the Spring, and accompany his Fleet to Sea. But Ali Picenin the Admiral ſuſpecting that this was only a Snare to engage him and his Men for ever in the Grand Signior's Service, refuſed the Obligation, and ſet two Gallies on the Stocks for his own Account.

Advice of the Bailo's Confinement being come to Venice, with a Report of the Paſſion and Rage of the Sultan, they expected nothing more than a War with the Turk, which they communicated to all Chriſtian Princes, requeſting their Succours and Aſſiſtance againſt the common Enemy. Theſe Addreſſes produced rather Compaſſion of their Caſe, than ſubſtantial Contributions: Pope Urban himſelf giving them great Aſſurances of ſome help from the Eccleſiaſtical Revenues, beſides Proceſſions, Maſſes, and Benedictions for their good Succeſs, in as great a Number as they could deſire: Notwithſtanding which due Care was taken to make ready and provide againſt all Encounters. Letters were wrote to the Captain-General in the Levant, to make due Preparations againſt the Enemy: Sixteen Gallies were armed out of Candia, to which were joyned other Galleaſſes under the Command of Antonio Piſani and Sebaſtiano Veniero: Souldiers were levied in every Place, and all Garriſons provided with Ammunition and Victuals, and reinforced with Numbers of an Auxiliary Militia. Howſoever it was not the Buſineſs nor Advantage of the Venetians, to make a War with the Turks, but rather, whilſt they feared the worſt, and made Proviſions againſt the utmoſt Extremities, they endeavoured to enter into Treaties of Peace, and to qualifie the hot Spirit of the Grand Signior with the gentle Lenitives of fair Words, and proffers of making Atonement with the Sacrifice of Gold and other Preſents: In order unto which they wrote a Letter to the Grand Signior to this Effect.

"That being provoked by the Inſolence and "frequent Robberies of the Pirates of Barbary, "who did not eſteem Faith or Obedience to his "Majeſty, nor the Commands which he had often ſent to reſtrain them, they were induced, "out of natural Defence of themſelves, to chaſtiſe and correct them; but as this was acted "without intention to diſoblige his Majeſty, ſo "they were ready to maintain and cultivate that "ancient Friendſhip and Correſpondence which "was ingrafted on the firm Root of his Glorious "Progenitors.

Morat, though he received this Letter in an huff, and gave an Anſwer to it with Diſdain, which breathed nothing but Threats of Revenge, and total Deſtruction; yet he ſent it by an Expreſs of his own to Venice, couching ſomething within the Terrour of his Words, as if there was place left for an Accommodation, if the Venetians knew what Salve was to be applied to obduct the Skin of this bleeding Wound. The Venetians quickly apprehended, that Gold was the only Remedy, of which they were ready to contribute freely; ſince they could make no better a Purchaſe with their Money than Peace, nor could make a better Bargain than with ſuch a Sum as would ſerve only to make the firſt Preparations of War, to evade all Hazards, Troubles, and Calamities by a happy and ſafe Concluſion of Peace. The which notwithſtanding took no Effect, until the Return of Morat from Perſia; and therefore we ſhall defer Diſcourſe thereof to its proper place. 1638.

Morat marches to Perſia.

Amurat marched now at the Head of a formidable Army, cloathed in the Habit of a Janiſary, to render himſelf acceptable to the Militia, whom having ſubdued by Rigour and ſevere Diſcipline, he would now oblige by Courteſie and fairer Treatment: With Courage and great Patience he marched through ſandy Deſarts and unfrequented Places; and being the firſt who offered to expoſe himſelf to Dangers and Sufferings, the Souldiery followed willingly his Example, eſteeming no Attempts either hazardous or tedious, in which they ſaw themſelves preceded by their Valiant General. In this March he was overtaken by one who rode hard to demand Moſtaluck, which is the Reward of good News for the Birth of a Son, of which one of his Sultana's was delivered at Iſmit: the Meſſenger was ſecured until the News was confirmed; which being afterwards turned to the Birth of a Daughter, the poor Man ſuffered Death, being cruelly impaled for his unadviſed haſte and exceſs of officious Reſpect towards his Prince.

The Great Vizier met his Maſter at Iconium with a moderate Equipage, to give more Room for the Quarters of the Army, and rendring himſelf more gracious in his Eyes by a Preſent of fifty thouſand Dollars, he was again remunerated with a Cemiter and a Veſt of Sables, which are the uſual Signals of the Sultan's Favour.

A Shegh rebels.

All Aſia was now in Arms, and the Princes and great Men came in to perform their Duty, accompanied with their Forces and Attendance: Only Complaints were made of a certain Shegh, Santone or Preacher belonging to the Mountains of Anatolia, who had refuſed to do Homage, or ſerve in the War: He was one, who by a feigned Sanctity had acquired a great Reputation amongſt his People; and having declared himſelf to be the Mehedy, or the Mediator, which, according to the Mahometan Doctrine, is to fore-run Antichriſt, for reducing all the World to one Unity of Faith: He had perſwaded his People, that he, and they under him, were by Priviledge of his Office, exempted from all Taxes, Contributions, or Impoſitions by any Secular Power whatſoever. The Grand Signior who could not underſtand or believe this Doctrine, preſently detached a ſtrong Body with ſome Cannon under Command of the Captain-Paſha (who, as we have ſaid, was to accompany the Grand Signior in the War) to confute the Principles of this Rebel, and to reduce him to Obedience. Theſe Forces being entred on his Dominions, Proclamation was made to the People, that they ſhould deliver up their Impoſtor into the hands of Juſtice; which if they refuſed to do, then Fire and Sword was to be their Portion, and Deſtruction to extend even unto their Children of ſeven years of Age. This terrible Denunciation of the Sultan's Sentence ſtruck all the People with cold Fear and Amazement; howſoever the Shegh availing himſelf on certain Prophecies, which he in-interpreted in his own Favour, adventured to ſtand a ſhock with the Grand Signior's Forces; but being overcome by them, the Shegh was taken alive and carried to the Grand Signior; who having given a ſtop to his March at Iconium, until the end of this Buſineſs, he condemned him to be flead alive; and in this Guiſe being a horrid Spectacle to all Beholders, he was carried upon an Aſs to the Wheel, on which he ſeemed to endure the Remainder of his Puniſhment without any ſenſible Touches or Pangs in the Torments.

He is overcome and puniſhed.

This Succeſs being attained, Morat proceeded in his March, and paſſing through Alexandretta or Scanderone, he was there ſaluted by the Guns of all the Engliſh and Dutch Ships then in Port, and preſented by the Merchants and Conſuls, eſpecially by the Venetian called Marco Foſcolo, whoſe Preſents were computed to amount unto the Value of ten thouſand Dollars. Thence he proceeded to Antioch, where he refreſhed his Army for a few days, obſerving the Antiquities of that Place. At Aleppo he was met by the Paſha of Grand Cairo, who brought with him a rich Tribute, accompanied with an Army of twenty four thouſand Souldiers, all choice Men well armed and well cloathed; at the ſame Place alſo the Forces of Paleſtine joyned with him, ſo that his Army was now increaſed to a vaſt Number. Proceeding forward new Sangiacks came in daily belonging to the Countries through which they marched, and a ſtrong Party of Tartars deſpairing of being able to act any conſiderable Matter againſt Aſac, offered themſelves to the Service of the Grand Signior.

The Perſian Army dares not give Battel to the Turk.

The King of Perſia entred the Field at the Head of an hundred and twenty thouſand Horſe; but being inferiour in Force, made only uſe of them to reinforce his Garriſon of Bagdat with an Addition of thirty thouſand Men; which now being well provided, he judged that the Force within, and the Strength of the Place would be able to endure a long Siege, and with time weaken, if not deſtroy the vaſt numbers of the Turks, of which there were former Examples: With the reſt of his Forces he returned to encounter the Great Mogul, who (as we have ſaid) promiſed Morat to aſſiſt him in this War, and attack the Perſian on the other ſide of his Dominions, which ſerved for an advantageous Diverſion to the Turk. This was the Reaſon that no memorable Battels ſucceeded in the Field, there being none of greater Note than a Fight which Quinan Paſha had with two thouſand Perſians belonging to Revan, with whom accidentally encountring, he killed fifteen hundred of them on the Place, and took the reſt Priſoners, which being five hundred in number were brought before Morat, and all barbarouſly put to death by him.

During the time of this March, Morat often exerciſed himſelf in Feats of Arms, to ſhew his ſtrength of Body and dexterity of Hand; amongſt other things wonderful to the Souldiers, he pierced a Suit of Arms of Musket-Proof, with a Dart, called by them a Gerit, thrown from his Hand; for evidence of which, the Armour is placed on one of the Gates of Aleppo, with an Inſcription under it.

The Turks paſs the River Euphrates.

About the Beginning of the Month of Auguſt the Turkiſh Army paſſed the River Euphrates, by means of a Bridge, which was not ſo well built, but that it ſunk under the weight of Horſes, Camels, and Baggage, by which Diſaſter many periſhed in the Water, which great Rains had ſwelled above the Bounds of its Banks. As this numerous Army proceeded, ſo all Petty Princes applied themſelves to perform their Homage; amongſt which one Tarpos a King of the Arabs came with his Wife, Mother, and Son to proſtrate himſelf before the Sultan: He was entertained in the Tent of the Favourite, who being always in company with Morat, was never ſuffered to ſeparate from him, and his Tent, more for Oſtentation, than to ſerve his occaſion. Tarpos being admitted to Audience, was received with Reſpect and a favourable Countenance, and preſented with a Veſt of Cloth of Gold lined with Sables, and a ſmall Purſe of Gold: In recompence whereof the Arab Prince returned certain choice Horſes and two Leopards. In like manner the Georgians and Mengrelians, who are Tributaries to Turk and Perſian, and commonly incline to the ſtrongeſt ſide, whoſe Nations we have deſcribed in the preſent State of the Ottoman Empire, would not be wanting at this time to bring their Tribute of eighty thouſand yards of Linen-cloth, which they pay every three year, with ſome Children of both Sexes choſen out of the comelieſt and moſt healthful amongſt them.

The Turkiſh Army at Moſul.

At Moſul the Army lay encamped for ſome time, where was a general Rendezvous and Confluence of People from all Parts, and every thing ordered and modelized for a War. Severe Diſcipline was kept amongſt all, Offenders were Impaled, Flead alive, their Bowels ript out, and thrown into the publick Ways: Nor did Takers of Tobacco eſcape with leſs Puniſhment than the reſt. In the mean time Wine was forbid to his whole Camp, unleſs to himſelf and his Favourite, being a Royal drink; and when the chief Phyſician commended the admirable vertue of Opium, adviſing Morat to uſe it in the place of Wine, he enjoyned him to make his Words good by his own Example, and thereby forced him to take ſo much, that he was overcome, and died by ſwallowing too great a quantity.

From Moſul the Army marched in due order to Babylon, where the Great Vizier arrived with thirty thouſand Men about the 19*th* of October: But by reaſon of the great weight of Artillery, and the many Impediments which attend ſuch vaſt numbers, the Grand Signior came not thither till the 5*th* of November, and on the 9*th* the whole Turkiſh Army preſented it ſelf before the Walls of Babylon.

The Deſcription of Babylon, or Bagdat.

Babylon the ancienteſt City of the World, reported to be built by Nimrod on the Banks of the River Euphrates, and afterwards beautified and enlarged by Semiramis the Wife of Ninus, is recorded in Hiſtory for the vaſtneſs thereof to be one of the ſeven Miracles of the World. Afterwards the furious Inundations of the River, and the Iron Teeth of devouring Time, and the ſubjection thereof to the Macedonian Empire, did much eclipſe the Glory of that City, and cauſed Seleucus Nicanor, one of Alexander's Captains, to build a new one where the Tigris and Euphrates meet, forty Miles more Northwards than the old Babylon, which he therefore called Seleucia after his own Name. In the Year of our Lord 753, Abugiafer Almanſor, an Arab King, enlarged this City to the Eaſtern ſide of the Tigris, as being leſs ſubject to the Inundations of the River, giving it the Name of Badgat, or the place of Gardens; but his Son Almolied being more pleaſed with the Weſtern ſide, encouraged People to build the ſtatelieſt Palaces and beſt Fabricks near the place where he delighted to keep his Court, ſo that the River Tigris divided the City. The which with the Country thereabouts was ſubdued by Solyman the Magnificent; and afterwards in the Year 1625, it was re-

1638. recovered by Abas King of Perſia, until at length in this of 1638. it was vanquiſhed by the mighty Force and Proweſs of this Magnanimous Sultan, as we ſhall now underſtand.

Bagdat beſieged.

The numerous Troops of the Ottoman Army covering all the Plains, a General Council of War was called of the Chief Commanders of the Janiſaries and Spahees, eſpecially of ſuch who had been practiſed in the Sieges of the ſtrong Fortreſſes in Hungary. After ſome Debate and long Conſideration, it was agreed, That the City ſhould be battered in three Places. One Battery of twelve Pieces of Cannon commanded by the Great Vizier was to be erected againſt the Bright Gate; the ſecond againſt the Dark Gate of ten Pieces of Cannon, under the Command of the Captain-Paſha: and a third of eight Pieces directed againſt the Gate of Perſia, under the Government of Chuſaein Paſha Beglerbei of Anatolia. The Grand Signior in the mean time habited like an ordinary Souldier, that he might be the leſs expoſed to Danger, viſited all Poſts and Places, encouraging them with his Words and Preſence, proteſting that he would not change his Cloaths for ever in any place but within the Walls of Bagdat. In the ſpace of three days the Trenches were opened, the Batteries raiſed, and the Cannon planted; and Morat having made Korban, gave fire to the firſt Cannon with his own Hand, as he had brought the firſt Basket of Earth to raiſe the Works. The Defendants within conſiſted of eighty thouſand fighting Men, with which they made frequent Sallies of four and five thouſand Men at a time, who being retired, were again ſeconded by another of the like Number, which put the Turkiſh Camp into much Confuſion, and into danger of having their Trenches levelled, and their Cannon ſpiked; but the Turks valiantly fighting, the Slaughter proved bloody on both ſides; and being guided rather by the Bravery of their Courage, than by Art or Experience in in War, they carried their Works forward to the very Brink of the Ditch, having an Italian and a Candiot for their chief Engineers; who though they were not Perſons of that Ability, as our modern Times have produced, yet they were ſuch, as for want of better, ſerved the preſent occaſions, where Force and Numbers, with ſmall Additions of Art, were the moſt available. For in this Siege the Sword was more exerciſed than the Spade or Mattock, and there was more need of Arms than Works; for the conſtant Sallies kept the Turks always watchful and imployed, and perpetually diſturbed them, until at length they were forced with great Labour to raiſe a high Circumvallation, with a very deep Ditch, defended by ſeveral Redoubts; whereby the Beſieged being kept in, their Numbers decreaſed by former Sallies, and their Courages abated by deſpair of Relief, they began to grow cold in the Acts of Bravery, and to reſerve their Men for the ultimate and laſt Efforts of Defence. In the mean time the Turks plied their Batteries ſo hotly, that in a few days the Walls were laid open almoſt fifty paces wide. In this Condition the Defendants having no other Refuge than ſome ſmall Retrenchments, which they had made during the Siege, were expoſed to the open Force of the Enemy. For now the Turks having filled up the firſt and ſecond Ditches with Sacks of Wool, Faggots, and other Rubbiſh, crowded in vaſt Numbers to enter the Breach, which the Perſians defended as ſtoutly with Stones, Bullets, Artificial Fires, and all Inſtruments of Death, which fell like Showers of Hail on the Heads of the Enemy. The Great Vizier ſignalizing himſelf above all by his undaunted Courage, commanding with his Hand and Voice, was unhappily ſhot by a Musket-bullet, and fell on the heaps of the dead, amongſt whom there is no diſtinction between the common Souldier and the braveſt Captain. This Fight within the Breach continued for five days, where both ſides fighting like Men in deſpair, the dead Bodies lay in heaps, and Blood was ſtagnated like a Pool to wade thorough. At length the Numbers of the Turks prevailing, commanded now by Muſtapha the Captain-Paſha, entred the Town by force of Arms on the twenty ſecond of December about the time of Sun-ſet, when the Royal Standard of the Turks was planted in this City. Howſoever twenty four thouſand of the Perſians remaining ſtill alive, and united in a Body, capitulated for Quarter, otherwiſe threatning not to die unrevenged: Pardon, and Quarter for their Lives was readily granted, on Confidence of which the Perſians threw down their Arms, and ſubmitted to the Publick Faith, or the Sultan's Clemency. But the Grand Signior afterwards conſidering, that the granting Quarter at Revan had been the cauſe of the Loſs of the City, he repented him of his Promiſe, and gave Order to the Janiſaries moſt inhumanely to open a Torrent of Blood, and make a barbarous Maſſacre of thoſe who had newly thrown down their Arms at his Feet, not ſparing either Woman or Child, either Sex or Age; the which Slaughter, like a Work of Darkneſs, was acted in the Night by the light of Torches and Lanthorns, and appeared a horrid Spectacle to all, eſpecially to the Perſian Ambaſſadour, who being conducted like a Priſoner in the Camp, was a ſad Spectator of his Countries Deſtruction on the horrid Theatre of its Capital City.

So ſoon as Bagdat was taken, Morat diſpatched away Poſts immediately with the News into all Parts, and wrote a Letter with his own Hand to the Chimacam, ordering a Dunalma or Feaſt of Thankſgiving, and rejoicing for the ſpace of twenty Days; during which time no Buſineſs was to be acted, the Houſes were to be adorned both without and within with the beſt Furniture, and every Houſe was to ſet forth Lights, Torches, and Fire-works agreeable to the Condition and Ability of the Perſon. The People exclaimed hereat as too great an Expence, and the Vacation from Buſineſs ſeemed too long for thoſe who lived by their daily Labour. The chief Miniſters and Grandees evidenced external actions of Joy, but inwardly feared and trembled, ſuſpecting that the fierce and cruel Humour of their Sultan would be elated, and rendred more tyrannical and untractable by Succeſs and a favourable Fortune. The Chriſtian Princes received this Intelligence like bad News, and as an Alarm to awaken them from the eaſineſs of Peace, to expectations of War: For War with Perſia was like an Ulcer in the Bowels of the Turkiſh Empire, which gangreen'd and conſumed the Strength and Marrow of their Power; which now being cured, and the Body Politick rendred healthy by ſuch a ſeaſonable Succeſs, would convert it ſelf to Enterpriſes pernicious and dangerous to the neighbouring States.

After the Conqueſt of this City, Morat gave out, That he reſolved to proceed with his Army into Perſia, and to enter the Walls of Spahan; but having ſome indiſpoſitions of Health upon him, and recalled by the charming Letters of a Favourite Miſtreſs, whom he had left at Diarbechir, he inclined to return again to Conſtantinople. Wherefore muſtering firſt his Army, 1638. he found that it was abated near an hundred thouſand Men, two thirds whereof being killed in the War, the reſt periſhed by the Peſtilence, and other Diſeaſes and Maladies incident to Camps; a great part of the Slaughter fell on the moſt veterane Souldiers of the Janiſaries and Spahees, of which many of the Chief being ſlain, their Lands and Revenues returned to the Grand Signior, and gave him both Opportunity and Ability to reward many with ſuch Offices and Gifts as came by the Death and Fall of other Commanders. Thus the Captain-Paſha, whoſe Valour had rendred him Famous, was made Great Vizier in the place of him that was ſlain, and the Perſian Favourite was conſtituted Captain-Paſha; and though many repined at this Advancement, as conferred on a Stranger, and a Perſon without Merit, yet the Grand Signior conſidered him as one whoſe Experience in that Country, and the Information he had given him of the Scituation and Strength of Babylon, had made abundant Compenſation for the Favour and Honour he had beſtowed upon him.

1639. The Grand Signior having left a Gariſon of thirty thouſand Men in Bagdat, diſpatched the Great Vizier with a conſiderable Army to penetrate far into the Country of Perſia. And having now releaſed the Perſian Ambaſſadour, giving him liberty to return to his Maſter, wrote by him this braving Letter.

I That am Lord of Lords, and Conquerour in the parts of Arabia, Perſia, and Greece: King that Commands with eminent Rule in the World, exalted by Divine Aſſiſtance to the Empire of the Univerſe; the moſt Invincible Poſſeſſor of the White and Black Seas, and of all the Cities and Fortreſſes which encompaſs them. Lord of the Divine and Prophetick Temple, that is, of Mecha and Medina, as alſo of Jeruſalem, Aleppo, Damaſcus, and of all thoſe Holy and Venerable Countries, of Grand Cairo, Salutiferous Babylon, and of Van, of Ethiopia, Balſora, and the Leſſer Aſia; of all the Countries of the Curds, Georgians, and Tartars; of Moldavia, Walachia, and univerſally of all the Provinces and Regions of Greece and Anatolia. And in ſumm, Supreme Lord of the Seven Climates, the Victorious and Triumphant King in the Service of God Sultan Amurat Han, to the Valiant Sofi, to whom may God give Peace, if he deſerve it. This Imperial Letter worthy of Obedience being come to thee, Be it known unto thee, That the Ambaſſador which Thou didſt ſend to my happy Port with deſires of Peace, I have detained until this time in which I have ſubdued Bagdat, by means of the keen Edge of my Invincible Semiter. If Thou deſireſt Peace, ſurrender thoſe Provinces which belong to the Dominions of my Victorious Predeceſſors, into the Hands of my Beglerbeys, who are now Marching at the Head of my Victorious and Inexpugnable Army: Otherwiſe expect me next Spring with my Troops more numerous than the Sands of the Sea, within the Bowels of thy Dominions; where I will appear on Horſe-back to unkennel Thee from the Caverns wherein thou now lurkeſt, not daring to manage thoſe Arms, which are unworthily girt to thy Side. That afterwards ſhall ſucceed, which was determined from all Eternity. Peace be to him who directs his ways aright.

This Letter being diſpatched, the Grand Signior recalled the forty thouſand Men which he had lent, from the Service of the Great Mogul, which he quartered about Bagdat to hinder the Attempts of the Perſians, in caſe they ſhould deſign to purſue him in the Rear, and diſturb his return into Europe. By reaſon of the Rigour and Extremity of the Winter, and a certain Defluxion which falling on his Nerves, made him ſomething Paralytical, the Grand Signior departed not from Bagdat until the 15th of April, and then for recovery of his Health, and to ſoil the Horſes by the way with convenience of Graſs, ſhort Days Journeys were appointed.

The Grand Signior returns to Conſtantinople.

The Grand Signior's Indiſpoſition encreaſing, with ſome cold and ſhivering Fits, gave the firſt Symptoms of a Feaver; but afterwards it plainly appearing to be a paralytical Diſtemper, ſuſpected by the Phyſicians to end in an Apoplexy, it was rumoured abroad, that Morat was dead; but it was whiſpered with ſuch Caution, as if they had feared leſt the Grand Signior would have over-heard them, and riſen from his Grave to puniſh their ſecret and inward Joy. Being ſomewhat recovered from the laſt Acceſſion of his Palſie, the Humour fell into his Legs, and ſwelled ſo much, that he could ſcarce ſit upon his Horſe; howſoever he haſtened as faſt as he could to Conſtantinople to diſprove and confute the falſity of that Report concerning his Death.

In the mean time it is not to be expreſſed with what Fear and Terrour the Chimacam and other great Miniſters of State expected the return of their formidable Prince, not knowing where the Thunderbolt of his cruel Diſpoſition would ſtrike, until at length it fell on the Head of the poor Sultan Muſtapha, whoſe weakneſs, as it rendred him unable for Government and Command, ſo it made him ſtupid and inſenſible of Death.

The Grand Signior's Entry into Conſtantinople.

At length on the 10th of June the Grand Signior arrived at Conſtantinople: The Favourite Soltana, which had accompanied him to the War, paſſed by Water from Iſmit attended with ſix Gallies, and took her Lodging the firſt Night of her arrival at a ſmall Chiosk or Houſe of Pleaſure under the Wall, ſo as to make a magnificent Entry the Day following. Her Coach was covered with Cloth of Gold, and the Spokes of the Wheels were gilded, and the Wheels ſhod with Silver; ſhe was followed by twelve Coaches, and the Mufti, Paſha's, Kadees, and other Officers went before to conduct her to the Seraglio. The Grand Signior, who arrived the ſame Day, attended with fifty ſix Gallies, made not his ſolemn Entry until two Days after, being performed with all the Ceremony, State, and Magnificence which could be contrived. The Grand Signior in his own Perſon appeared in the Perſian Habit, with a Leopard's Skin thrown over his Shoulders, after the manner of a Kauſee (as they call them) or a brave huffing Champion, having his Stirrup attended with twenty two of the chiefeſt Nobles, whom he had reſerved at Bagdat, purpoſely to lead in Triumph when he made this Entry. The Treaſure brought to Conſtantinople, was landed at the Seraglio out of ten Gallies, and calculated to amount to a greater Sum than that which was carried from thence; for beſides the Riches taken in the Plunder of Babylon, ſeiſure was mad in divers places of the Eſtates of Paſha's and other Great Men, which by Death, or for Crimes, eſcheated to the Grand Signior.

An Ambaſſador ſent from Perſia to the Grand Signior.

After the Grand Signior's Departure out of Perſia, little of Action ſucceeded, as if by mutual Agreement, a Truce or Ceſſation of Arms had been contrived. The Perſians deſired a Peace, becauſe they were enfeebled and tired with the War: The Turks had regained their Honour by the Conqueſt of Badgat; and being unwilling to loſe it by change of unconſtant Fortune, and longer conſume their Riches and Men in a tedious and remote March, were attending to receive Propoſitions of Peace firſt offered by the Perſian. To effect which the Great Vizier, who was left at Badgat to command the Army, intimated to the Governours of the Frontiers, that a proffer of Peace ſhould be accepted; which being made known to the King of Perſia, he immediately diſpatched an Ambaſſadour to the Grand Signior to propoſe Terms of Accommodation. The Ambaſſadour being arrived at Conſtantinople, was grateful and acceptable to all, and his Day of Audience appointed after the uſual manner on the Pay-day of the Janiſaries, when the Floor of the Divan is covered with Sacks of Mony; before the Door of the Chamber of Audience ſtood the Perſian Captives all cloathed in rich Veſts. The Ambaſſadour being conducted to the Royal Preſence with the uſual Ceremonies (of which we have given an Account in another place) was received by the Sultan ſitting upon a Saffaw covered with Crimſon Velvet, embroidered with Pearl; his Turbant was encompaſſed with a Chain of Diamonds, cloathed with a rich Veſt lined with Sables; he caſt no Pleaſantneſs of Aſpect on the Ambaſſadour, but beholding him with a fierce and ſcornful Look, received the Letter in a kind of careleſs Diſdain, behaving himſelf in every Motion, as if he neither eſteemed the King, nor his Ambaſſadour; or as if the Perſian had been wholly conquered by him, had ſent to beg Peace, and Pardon for his Life: The Ambaſſadour was ſoon diſmiſſed from his Preſence; and matters being referred to the Negotiation of the Chimacam, no other difficulty aroſe beſides the Diſpute concerning Revan, which at length was agreed by another Ambaſſadour ſent to the Vizier on the Frontiers to remain unto the Perſian, as Bagdat was confirmed to the Turk: And ſo Peace was without long Debate clapt up; the Grand Signior, by reaſon of his Indiſpoſition which increaſed upon him, being not inclinable to trouble his Head with the Burden of Buſineſs.

A Peace concluded.

Troubles in Moldavia and Walachia.

Peace being thus concluded with Perſia, there appeared a perfect Sun-ſhine and fair Weather in the Ottoman Court, neither Diſſenſions at home, nor Wars abroad troubling the Quiet and Repoſe of the Sultan: Until ſome Differences happening between the Princes of Moldavia and Walachia exhaled the firſt Cloud of Diſturbance. At that time Lupulo was Prince of Moldavia, a Perſon of evil Principles, covetous, and unjuſt. Matthew was Prince of Walachia, a good Man, zealous for the Chriſtian Religion, and one who adminiſtred equal Juſtice to his People. Lupulo not contenting himſelf with his own, but deſirous alſo of his Neighbours Poſſeſſion, made inſtances to the Port to have the Principality of Moldavia conferred upon his Son, alledging that thereby he ſhould be better enabled to balance the Power of Ragotski in Tranſylvania, and on all occaſions be rendred more ſerviceable to the Grand Signior's Deſigns and Intereſt: And ſeconding this Propoſition with a Preſent of fifty thouſand Dollars to the Chimacam, and promiſe to increaſe the annual Tribute, he obtained the Chimacam's Friendſhip, at whoſe Inſtance the Grand Signior was perſwaded to write unto Matthew to ſurrender up his Province into the hands of the Son of Lupulo; declaring, That it having been accuſtomary to charge the Princes of thoſe Countries every three years, he ought after an Injoyment of above ſeven years to content himſelf with a quiet and voluntary Reſignation, unleſs he would deſire to draw upon himſelf a Ruin by the Anger and Diſpleaſure of the Sultan. Matthew having no Poſterity, reſolved not to ſurrender his Government but with his Life; and having a particular Animoſity againſt Lupulo, could by no means incline his Mind to make his Enemy happy with the Spoils of his Eſtate. Wherefore having obtained Aſſiſtance from Ragotski, he reſolved to withſtand the Forces of young Lupulo, and engage with him: And being ready to mount on Horſe-back, and begin the Battel, he firſt diſpatched an humble Meſſage to the Grand Signior, acquainting him, "That he was ready at his Command to reſign his Principality into the Hands of the meaneſt Greek his Majeſty would appoint; who being the Source of all Equity and Juſtice, he hoped that he would not oblige him to ſuch Terms as would raiſe his Mortal Enemy upon his Ruin; a Man ſo intent to his own Intereſts, and ſo unconſcionable to compaſs them, that all late Revolutions, Wars, and Commotions have been raiſed either by him, or by his Inſtruments.

This Letter being received and read by the Grand Signior, was ſeconded in a few hours after, with News of the total Defeat of young Lupulo; which put the Grand Signior ſo much into choler, that he immediately committed the Chimacam to the ſeven Towers, for being the Projector and Author of this Counſel. It was ſuppoſed however, that Morat's Anger would not proceed to that degree, as to extend to his Life; but being informed, that he was rich, and that he was poſſeſſed of two Millions of Dollars, which lay by him in ready Mony, it was concluded, that ſo vaſt a Wealth could not in a ſhort time be honeſtly gained; which appearing as an undeniable Evidence and Teſtimony of his Violence and Oppreſſion, the Grand Signior made no Difficulty to paſs the Sentence of Death againſt him, nor to condemn the Mony to his own Exchequer: His Office was given to Sinan Paſha, and the Principality confirmed unto Matthew.

The Chimacam put to Death.

During all this Time, the Quarrel which the Turks conceived againſt the Venetians, for violating their Port of Valona, was not yet compoſed; but now having time to peruſe and conſider old Accounts, the Venetian Bailo was called by the Chimacam to Audience, and to a Conference with him concerning this Matter. In the firſt place therefore the Bailo alledged, "That the Pirates of Barbary had for the ſpace of twenty Years roved in the Venetian Gulf, and made Prize in that time of ſo many Ships and Goods belonging to Merchants, that the Republick had been prejudiced by them in ſeveral Millions; which alſo did in ſome manner prejudice the Cuſtoms of the Grand Signior, to whom the Venetian Merchants pay for the moſt part yearly the Sum of an hundred thouſand Dollars in Cuſtom for their Goods, beſides the benefit which the Ottoman Dominions receive by ſo profitable a Commerce.

1639. Hereunto the Chimacam replied: “That the damages which the Turks received by the Corſairs or Free-booters at Sea under the Colours of Malta, Leghorn, Majorca, and other places, were greater and more diſhonourable to the Majeſty of the Ottoman Grandeur, than the depredations of the other ſide were to Venice: And therefore it would be neceſſary for the good of the World, that ſuch Violences were prevented in all places: and that Men of ſuch wicked Profeſſion ſhould be eſteemed for univerſal Enemies, and to have no other Quarter, nor Articles granted them, than what we give to wild and hurtful Beaſts, whom we deſtroy by Snares and Gins, and all Advantages. The which alſo was never denied to the Venetians, whilſt they encountred and took them in the open Seas; but to enter into priviledged Places, and violate a Sanctuary of the Grand Signior's, without reſpect to the mighty Power of ſo dreadful a Monarch, was an act ſo inſolent, as could never obtain Pardon without due Compenſation for the Offence; which could not be done, but either by a Reſtitution of the Veſſels, or elſe of a like Number in the places of them.

Hereunto the Bailo replied: “That if an Accommodation could not be made on other Terms, nor Peace maintained, but by a ſubmiſſion to Pyrats, and ſupportation of all their Injuries and Robberies, a War muſt inevitably enſue; for the good ſucceſs of which they depended on the Bleſſing of God Almighty, and the general Aſſiſtance of all Chriſtendom, which will eſteem it ſelf univerſally concerned in this Cauſe, and obliged as well to make good this Quarrel againſt Pirates, as to preſerve Venice for their main Bulwark and Defence againſt the Ottoman Force.

“You make me Smile (anſwered the Chimacam) when you tell me of the Power of Chriſtendom, which contains nothing more of Terrour than the Name. Do not I know, who have been Paſha of Buda, that the Emperour hath no Mony; and that when the Sweeds, a ſmall and inconſiderable People, have made War upon him, they have almoſt over-run his Country? As for France, if they underſtand their own Politicks, they will ſcarce be perſwaded to lend aſſiſtance to the Empire, when we make War againſt it. The Spaniards have ſo much to do at Home, and to conſerve themſelves from the Incroachments of their powerful Neighbour the French, that they are wholly unable to lend Forces to wage a War at ſuch a diſtance from their Dominions. Wherefore conſidering the Advantage we have upon you, which we well know and underſtand; you muſt either have War on theſe hazardous Terms, or elſe purchaſe your Peace with a conſiderable Sum of Mony. In making of which Bargain you muſt conſider, that you have to deal with a mighty Prince, and not with a Merchant; and therefore your Offer ought to be large at firſt, ſo as it may gain Credit, and be received with a favourable Ear; for a ſmall Sum to him is like a little Morſel given to an hungry Stomach, which ſerves only to increaſe the Appetite. And you know, that we our ſelves are often forced to ſacrifice to the Avarice of our Prince, by effuſions of vaſt Sums of Money, which are always beſt compounded for, when they are done readily, and at firſt, before we give our Maſter time to conſult with his Pillow, and to make upour Accounts according to the Calculation of his own Reckoning. Let me therefore exhort you to follow the like Example, and immediately make an Offer of three hundred thouſand Zechins of Gold, which if you will do, and employ my Intereſt to make this Compoſition for you, I hope, though with ſome difficulty, to gain its acceptance. To talk and reaſon of Things paſt is but to beat the Air, becauſe the time is vaniſhed and gone; but you may conſider of the preſent, that you may ſecure the future. We ſell you Peace at this Price; if it be worth your Mony, take it; if not, refuſe it, as you judge the Purchaſe moſt agreeable to your Intereſt.

At this time Chriſtendom was embroiled in its uſual Combuſtions, ſo that Aſſiſtance from other Princes was not only uncertain, but without all Foundation; ſo that the Venetians could have no ſure Truſt to any other than their own Force. In regard that many were deſirous at that time to ſee the Venetians engaged with the Turk, that ſo they might not be able to concern themſelves in the War of Italy, which then grew hot by rhe Wars of Savoy, Modena, and Matoua, favoured by the Protection of the Spaniards, by whoſe means all the Differences aroſe about the Valtoline. Conſidering which, the wiſe Senate being willing to purchaſe ſo great a Bleſſing to their Country by a moderate Price, gave Liberty to their Bailo to compound for it at what rate and terms he was able; which by the Bailo's Dexterity in the Management, was concluded for the Sum of two hundred and fifty thouſand Zechins, which was eſteemed for a great Service, and redounded much to the Reputation of the Bailo: after which Concluſion, the former Articles were ratified, and theſe which follow added thereunto.

“That the Ambaſſadour or Bailo ſhould be ſet at Liberty, and permitted to return to his own Habitation: That Commerce be renewed as formerly between the Subjects of both Countries: That all Controverſie about the Maters happened at Valona, for ever be ſilenced and forgotten. When at any time the Pirats of Barbary ſhall happen to enter within the Ports of the Grand Signior, they ſhall give Security, that they will commit no Damage or Spoil on the Subjects of Venice. And in caſe they ſhall have taken any Prizes belonging to the aforeſaid State, they ſhall not be admitted nor protected in the Ports belonging to the Grand Signior. Wherefore in virtue hereof all Aga's, Captains of Caſtles, and other Miniſters who ſhall not obey and obſerve this Capitulation, ſhall be deprived of their Office; and if the Venetians ſhall then enter violently into the Port, where ſuch Enemies have taken Refuge, it ſhall not be imputed to them for a Crime, or eſteemed a Breach of the Capitulations. And farther, if the Venetians ſhall at any time encounter the aforeſaid People of Barbary in the open Sea, it ſhall be lawful for them to aſſault, take, and deſtroy them without notice, or exceptions of the Ottoman Port. And laſtly, the new Bailo lately elected, ſhall pay unto the Grand Signior five hundred thouſand Pieces of Eight, which make two “ hundred and fifty thouſand Zechins of Gold. “ This Writing was firmed and ratified about “ the middle of the Moon Rebiul in the Hegeira “ or Year of Mahomet 1049. Hereof Authentick Copies were immediately diſpatched to the Beglerbeys, Sangiacks, and Kadi's on the Coaſts of the Mediterranean Sea, and to the Paſha of Boſna, for better Publication of the Peace, and free Traffick and Commerce between the Subjects of both People.

An Envoy ſent from the Emperor to the Grand Signior.

The Baron Chinski arrived at that time from the Emperour in Quality of Envoy Extraordinary, to congratulate the Grand Signior's Succeſs in taking Bagdat, and making a Peace with Perſia; but not bringing with him Preſents to that value, which on this occaſion were expected, he was not looked on, nor conſidered with that Favour and Reſpect, as was agreeable to his Character and Quality. And there happening a Diſpute between this Envoy and the Engliſh Ambaſſadour concerning Precedency of place; the Turks yielded it to the Engliſh, being made to underſtand the Difference which Chriſtian Princes make between the Title of an Ambaſſadour and that of an Envoy, though the Turks uſe but that one word of Elchi to expreſs both. And though the Baron Chinski laboured to diminiſh the Dignity of an Engliſh Ambaſſadour at Conſtantinople, by alledging, that he was elected by the Company of Merchants for Conſervation of their Trade only, and afterwards confirmed and honoured by the King: yet this Argument was in no wiſe prevalent with the Turks, who eſteeming the Commiſſion of the Prince, and the Charge of an Office the only Qualification to ennoble a Perſon, made no Difficulty to determine the Point in behalf of the Engliſh. And though ſome Italian Writers ſay, that the Engliſh Ambaſſadour gave fifteen Purſes of Mony, or ſeven thouſand five hundred Dollars to the Chimacam for this Favour; yet thoſe who underſtand how unwillingly the Turky-Merchants part with their Mony on defence of ſuch Punctillio's and Niceties, eſpecially where the Ambaſſadour might have avoided the bringing them into Diſpute, will more readily believe, that the Turks from free motives of their own Juſtice and Reaſon judged this Honour due to the Ambaſſador, than that he ſhould purchaſe this indiſputable Point by the diſgraceful means of Mony.

1640.

The Turkiſh Counſels uncertain about a War.

All matters being now determined between the Turks and Perſia, and the black Clouds blown over from the Venetians, the Grand Signior ſtudied how and where he might turn his Arms with moſt Advantage: he had conceived an irreconcileable pique againſt Ragotski and Matthew for the Cauſes before related; but having an intention to make uſe of their Force againſt Poland or Germany, or againſt them both together, he diſſembled the Paſſion he conceived againſt them, and rather deferred his Revenge, than pardoned the Liberty which they had exerciſed without his Licence or Aſſent. Sometimes he reſolved to recover Aſac out of the hands of the Coſſacks; ſometimes he thought of making War upon Poland, judging himſelf much affronted by that King, for not ſending an Ambaſſadour to congratulate his late Succeſſes: Then he ſuppoſed, that a War in Germany would be more eaſie, and the Conqueſt more profitable by reaſon of the Riches of the People, and the Fertility of the Soil, to which pretences could never be wanting on the ſcore of thoſe Differences which always ariſe amongſt the People of the Frontiers. During theſe Debates and Counſels, Preparations were made for War both by Sea and Land, as yet uncertain where they ſhould be imployed: To command them the Great Vizier was ordered to haſten his Journey from Perſia, whoſe Arrival was celebrated at Conſtaminople with a ſolemn Entry; and for a particular and diſtinguiſhing Honour, the Grand Signior ſent him a Veſt from his own Back to wear on the day of his Triumph. This Vizier was a Perſon very auſtere in his Behaviour, bold and valiant, as he evidenced by his Actions in taking Bagdat, zealous for his Maſter's Intereſt; and, what is rare in a Turk, not much addicted to his own: He had acquired a great ſhare in the Eſteem of his Maſter, and his Authority increaſed, as the daily Decay of the Grand Signior's Health rendred him leſs able for Government. For now the ſtrong Complexion of Morat began to grow feeble by exceſſes of frequent Debauchery, his Stomach was become cold and weak, not able to digeſt the lighteſt Meats, his hand ſhook, and a paralytical Diſtemper ſeized him in every part; ſo that his Mother and the Phyſicians perſwaded him to forſake the uſe of Wine, as Poyſon and Deſtruction to his Health; and he, whilſt he was ſenſible of his languiſhing Condition, like a true Penitent, made many Proteſtations and Vows againſt it, forbidding the accurſed Poyſon to be received within the Walls of the Seraglio: Howſoever his kind Heart could not poſſibly withſtand the Temptation of a Banquet, to which his Pot-companions did ſometimes invite him; amongſt which the Great Vizier would not be wanting alſo to pleaſe and cajole the Humour of his Maſter with the Liquor that he loved. But his chief and conſtant Camerades in drinking were his Perſian Favourite, and Muſtapha Paſha of Boſna, one educated in the Seraglio, promoted to the place of Selictar Aga, to whom he gave the ſtately Palace of Ibrahim Paſha on the Hippodrome, together with his eldeſt Daughter in Marriage. Theſe two ſtout Sons of Bacchus perſwaded the Grand Signior to appoint one ſolemn Drinking-day in time of the Biram, which is the great Feſtival of the Year, and iutroduced by their Prophet in imitation of our Eaſter. Morat being at this time poſſeſſed with the Spirit of Debauchery, accepted the Motion, and invited the two Drunkards to dinner with him. The Perſian provoked his Pleaſure of drinking by ſalt Meats, and by peppered and ſpiced Diſhes; the ſort of Wine they moſt uſed, was a ſweet Malvoiſia, ſometimes twiſted, and encouraged with the ſtrong Waters, called Roſa Solis, of which they ſucked ſo long, and with ſuch Exceſs, that falling under the force of it, they were inſenſibly carried away to their ſeveral Beds. This diſſolute Repaſt became fatal to the Grand Signior; for a Fire being kindled in his Veins and Bowels, he fell into a violent and continued Feaver. The Phyſicians being called, were fearful to adminiſter Remedies, leſt proving unſucceſsful, their Lives ſhould pay for the ineffectual Operation: At length they agreed to let him blood, but this haſtened his Death. For he died the fourth Day of his Feaver, being the 8*th* of February, in the ſeventeenth Year of his Reign, and the one and thirtieth of his Age, having ruled in the height of all Diſorders and irregular Exceſſes, ceſſes, which his youthful Years enabled him to ſupport. With his Death all his thoughts and Deſigns of making a War againſt Chriſtendom periſhed, having ſworn after his Return from Perſia to reduce all his neighbouring Countries to the Mahometan Law. He was of a moſt cruel and implacable Diſpoſition, having amongſt his other Acts of Tyranny imbrued his Hands in the Blood of his two Brothers, Orchan and Bajazet ; as alſo ſtrangled his Uncle Muſtapha, whoſe innocent Weakneſs had been ſufficient to ſecure his Life againſt any, but the moſt horrid Monſter of human Tyranny. He left no Son ; for though he had divers, they died in their Infancy, notwithſtanding which his Kindred were ſo deteſted by him, that he envied the Deſcendence of Monarchy on his Brother Ibrahim, who was preſerved by a ſtrange Providence from his Fury: often ſaying, that he wiſhed that he might be the laſt of the Ottoman Line, that the Empire of that Family might end with him, and devolve unto the Tartar. He was certainly the moſt abſolute Prince that ever ſwayed the Ottoman Empire ; but of no Religion, ſeldom faſting in the Month of Ramaſan, contemning and laughing at the Santones, and others of their Religious Orders. He was very inquiſitive into all Actions of the City, for which he maintained his Spies, and oftentimes took his Rules and Meaſures from Diſcourſes of People concerning his Government. He was a great Diſſembler, ready, active, and revengeful, covetous to Extremity, having left fiteen Millions of Gold in his Treaſury, which was empty when he entred upon the Soveraignty. In ſhort, he was ſo bad, that he had ſcarce any Allay of Vertue ; being ſo great a Tyrant, that at length he became his own Aſſaſſinate, and fell unlamented by all but the two Companions of his beſtial Exceſs.

IBRAHIM TVRCARVM IMPERATOR DVODECIMVS 1640

I that of Ott'man blood remain alone,
Call'd from a Prison, to ascend a Throne.
My easy mind I bend to soft Delights,
Hateing th' unpleasent thoughts of Naval Fights.
Till mad with wanton Loves, I fall at first
Slave to my owne, then to my peoples lust.

THE REIGN OF Sultan IBRAHIM, TWELFTH EMPEROR OF THE TURKS.

SUltan Amurath, or Morat, after a Fever of eight Days continuance, cauſed by an exceſs of Debauchery in Wine, having on the eighth of February, 1640, according to the New-Stile, expired his laſt Breath. His Mother, called Kioſem, comforted her ſelf with the thoughts that her Son Sultan Ibrahim ſtill lived, and was the ſole Surviver, and undoubted Heir of the Ottoman Family. To whoſe Succeſſion, that ſhe might make the more facile and undiſturbed Entrance, ſhe conſulted with all the Viziers, requeſting their Conſent and Aſſiſtance, in the lawful promotion of her remaining Son to the Throne of his Anceſtors: For ſhe had underſtood, that Morat, who always abhorred the ill-ſhap'd Body, and weaker Mind of his Brother, envied him the Dignity of the Ottoman Scepter, and therefore had bequeathed the Succeſſion to the Tartar, having, in the Heat of a Debauch, and Fumes of Wine, compelled his Paſha's to ſwear to the performance of his Teſtament.

Vid. the Ott.State.

Wherefore the Queen, aſſembling them together, with gentle Words, deſired them to remember, That Ibrahim was the Lawful Heir, and their true Emperor; that the Tartar Han was a Stranger, odious to the Souldiery, and not beloved by the People: that an Alteration of this Nature could never be contrived and executed, without danger to the Actors; and that they, to whom ſhe aſſured the continuance of the ſame Honours and Offices, in Reward of their conſtant Allegiance, would be in hazard of loſing all, by the coming of a Foreign Prince, who having Confidents of his own to prefer, and grand Neceſſities to ſatisfy, would make bold even with Eſtates and Provinces to prefer his Favorites, his Kindred, and Country-Men, and eſtabliſh the firmneſs of his Government on their Ruin. Yet, ſetting aſide thoſe Conſiderations, touching their own Safety and Intereſt, ſhe promiſed, That if they would reach out their Hands unto her Son, for to lift him unto the Throne, he ſhould acknowledg his Empire from them, and accordingly love, tender, and eſteem ſuch faithful Subjects.

The Viziers, after ſome Reflections on the Tye and Obligation which Sultan Morat had cauſed them to make to him, declared, and publiſhed it to be unlawful, and void; proteſting, That they were reſolved to maintain inviolable the Allegiance they owed unto Sultan Ibrahim, deſcended from the Ottoman Blood, which they reverenced and adored, with an Awe equal to the Religious Eſteem which their Fore-fathers had of it; and therefore, with one Voice they cried out, Let Sultan Ibrahim live.

Herewith the Council breaking up, the Viziers, accompanied with all the Officers and Attendants of the Seraglio, went with Shouts and loud Acclamations, to the Priſon of Ibrahim, to ſalute him Emperor; for he, poor Prince, had now for four Years remained a ſad Recluſe in a dark Room, where he had received neither Light nor Air, but what came from a little Window, which ſometimes in favour was opened to him from Above; and what was worſe, the continual expectations, and fear of Death, without Friends, Converſation, or Hope, rendred thoſe Apprehenſions worſe than Death it ſelf; which daily were repreſented to him in that Solemnity, as might terrify a Mind more conſtant and firm than his.

So ſoon as he heard the Shouts and Voices of a Multitude near his Door, he immediately conceived, that the Fate was now come which he had ſo long expected, and therefore he barred his Door, and denied to give Entrance: And when the Viziers proclaimed him Emperor, (fearing it might be ſome Artifice of his Brother, to ſee with what Joy he would entertain the News) he anſwered, That he did not ſo much as think of the Empire, nor deſire it, but only prayed that Sultan Morat might live, to whom he pretended not to be a Brother, but a Slave: And when he perceived that they began to force the Door, though with terms of Reſpect and Obſervance, he ſtill endeavoured to keep it cloſe; for Nature had taught him to conſerve a Life, howſoever Miſerable, and void of Conſolation.

He continuing thus reſolute not to open, Reverence to his Perſon commanded them to forbear any ruder Violence; until the Queen-Mother over-hearing all this Stir, deſcended her ſelf in Perſon; and firſt cauſing the dead Corps of Sultan Morat to be extended before his Door, with gentle Compellations, and confident Aſſurances, averred the Death of his Brother. The Voice of his Mother began to diſſipate the Fears, and being in part already convinced by his Ears, he adventured to peep at the Door, and giving then entire Credence to his Eyes, his Heart and Spirits conſented to revive; and ſo retiring back into his Chamber, he willingly received the Congratulations of the Miniſters and Souldiers; which being paſt, he readily applied his Shoulders to the Coffin of his dead Brother; and having bore his ſhare of that dear Burden to the Gate of the Seraglio, he there reſigned it to his Domeſtick Officers, who buried him in the Sepulchre of Sultan Achmet.

From thence he took Boat, and paſſed to the Moſch of Jub's Seraglio, where in the ſpace of eight days, he compleated all the Ceremonies of his Coronation; and afterwards, according to the Cuſtom of his Anceſtors, he rode through the City to his great Palace; but whether it were for want of practice, or by reaſon of a Poſture natural unto Fools, he ſat ſo ridiculouſly on his Saddle, as moved rather the Laughter than the Acclamation of the People.

In fine, being entred the Seraglio, he began to breath, and enjoy the Air of Liberty, with ſo much contentment and ſatisfaction, that he unwillingly would empair the leaſt Particle of his late acquired Freedom, by thinking, or attending to Buſineſs, and as if he enjoyed ſufficient, committed all to the management of his Mother; howſoever, being deſirous to handle ſomething of the Government, he did it with ſo little Grace and Dexterity, that it plainly appeared, that that Soul animated a Body not fit to ſway or wield a Scepter.

The Queen-Mother, to maintain the Word ſhe had given to the Viziers, continued them all in their reſpective Offices; ſo that, though there was great diſproportion in the Mind of the two Princes, yet the Miniſters being the ſame, there ſeemed to be little or no Alteration in the Government.

Reaſons for a War with the Coſſaks.

The Great Vizier remembring well the thoughts of War which Sultan Morat meditated againſt the Coſſacks, and being deſirous of Glory, and continuance of his Power, reſolved to proſecute the ſame Deſign, hoping to meet a Spirit in Ibrahim equal to the Generoſity of his Brother. To this War many and various were the Motives; as firſt, A natural deſire of Revenge on the Coſſacks, for having infeſted the Black Seas, that they might thereby provoke Poland to a War, which when they had reduced to ſome Extremity, the Emperor would conſequently fall in to their Aſſiſtance, and thereby create Quarrels, which muſt neceſſarily open a large Field of Troubles; which being ſown with the Seed of Diſcord, could not fail to produce Cauſes and Pretentions for a War.

It being thus reſolved, to which the Vizier neither wanted Eloquence nor Reaſons to perſwade, great Preparations were made for a War, which was intended to be maintained for many Years: During which time, God, who diſpoſes all Things at his Pleaſure, permitted a falſe Report to fly, that the Perſians were providing a great Army to beſiege Bagdat; to which the Turks giving entire Credence, it was reſolved in the Divan, that thoſe Preparations againſt Chriſtendom, ſhould be diverted towards the Parts of the Eaſtern Countries. By this vain Rumour only were all theſe Grand Deſigns diſappointed, and all farther Thoughts vaniſhed for the preſent of moleſting the Chriſtians. From whence it is obſervable, how neceſſary are the Foreign Reſidences of Miniſters, and how abſurdly the Turks err; who, by reaſon of their Pride, vouchſafe not to entertain Ambaſſadors in the Courts of Strangers, being beholden to the Jews, or Armenian-Merchants for all their Intelligence they receive touching the Affairs of Neighbouring Kingdoms.

The Wars being thus ſuſpended, the Great Vizier had time to caſt his Eyes about him, and contrive the Ruin of ſuch whom he ſuſpected moſt dangerous to his Condition. Amongſt the reſt, none appeared more formidable than Muſtapha Paſha, Captain-Paſha, a young briſk Perſon, and Favourite of the Queen-Mother, whom to remove was difficult and dangerous, being a Vizier as well as he, and in one of the moſt eminent Degrees of Dignity in the whole Empire: And therefore that he might touch him with ſmooth and gentle Terms, he practiſed upon him the ordinary Decoy of Preferment, proffering him the Government of Buda; which whilſt the one ſeemed out of modeſty to refuſe, the other with the greater force of Complement, and obliging expreſſions of Friendſhip, preſſed him to accept. At length, overcome with importunity and kindneſs, Muſtapha received the Proffer; whereby being diveſted of the Queen's Protection, he was ſoon after overtaken in his Journey towards his Principality, and by another Mandate required to take his way to the Province of Siliſtria, the ſmalleſt, and moſt inconſiderable of the Empire: in which he was no ſooner inveſted, than a ſecond Edict took off his Head.

But another Muſtapha, more fortunate, was ſent Paſha to Grand Cairo in Ægypt; he was a mortal Enemy to the Crim Tartar, of whom he ſhewed his hatred at Rhodes, by putting his Son to Death, for having ſaid, That Sultan Morat, and Sultan Ibrahim dying without Iſſue, the Empire was to deſcend to his Family. This Son of Tartar was then at Rhodes, it being a Cuſtom always to have one of them as a Hoſtage for the Father's obedient Comportment towards the Turks, their place of Reſidence being either at Rhodes, or ſome Town on the Black Sea, as we have elſewhere declared.

The Sultan in this Interim had little regard unto the Government, both for want of Capacity, and by reaſon of his luxurious and wanton Appetite, the which he indulged in the higheſt exceſs of Senſuality; for having been accuſtomed to a Priſon, and Reſtraint, he knew not how to enjoy that freedom he had recovered, but by ſubjecting it to the imperious ſervitude of his Luſts. This Humor the Vizier and great Miniſters cheriſhed in him, by continual Banquets, Feaſts, and Entertainments, in which he always took took high contentment and ſatisfaction. His other Recreations were, Horſe-races, and Shooting with the Bow, rewarding the moſt dexterous Archers. Buſineſs was a Stranger to him, he knew not what it meant, nor thought there was other Employment for the Emperor than to ſtudy thoſe Paſtimes, which moſt correſponded with his Youth and Nature: only the Vizier would ſometimes, in Matters of high Importance, demand his Aſſent, which was either out of formality, or elſe to ſecure himſelf with the Name and Authority of his Maſter.

Ambaſſadors ſent to complement Sultan Ibrahim.

The News of Sultan Ibrahim's promotion to the Throne being arrived at Venice, the moſt ſerene Republick diſpatched Pietro Foſcarini as their Ambaſſador Extraordinary to complement the Sultan. The Prince of Tranſylvania in like manner ſent his Tribute, which was ſome Hawks, and twelve Veſſels of Gilded Plate, as feudatary Acknowledgments for the Lands held, and for his Confirmation in the Principality.

The Miniſters of other Princes having paſſed the like Addreſſes, which were cuſtomary, the Ambaſſadors of Poland made Complaints of the Tartars, whoſe Incurſions againſt them, the Turks, by Conditions of Peace, were obliged to reſtrain; but in this, as in other Occaſions ſince that time, the Poles could obtain no Redreſs from the Turks, who willing to have the Chriſtians oppreſſed or ruined, either ſeemed not to give Credit to the Subject of Complaints, or elſe to find out Excuſes to acquit the Tartar; which being ſo known and common a Practice with the Turk, it is to be wondred why the Poles have ſent ſo many late Meſſages of this Nature, which in former, as well as in this preſent Age, have proved fruitleſs; a pregnant Example of which we ſhall find in the Reign of Sultan Mahomet, Son of this Ibrahim.

Amongſt other Corruptions of theſe Times, Aſpers were ſo cut and clipt, that the Dollar roſe from eighty to an hundred and twenty Aſpers; which Irregularity being complained of in the Divan, all Monies were reduced to their intrinſick Value; and the Aſpers called in to be coined in the Mint, to the great Damage of the People.

But this Matter will not appear ſtrange, if it be compared to the Vellion of Spain, and to the Permiſſion in Turkey, of the baſe Alloy of Temins, by which never any Nation before was ever ſo cheated and abuſed.

And now the Storms of War, which threatned from Perſia, being blown over, it was judged ſeaſonable to reaſſume the thoughts of War ſo long meditated againſt the Coſſacks: In order unto which, Gallies were commanded to be built, which ſhould draw little Water, and purpoſely made to paſs the Shoals on the Black Sea near Aſac, for the recovery of that Place out of the Hands of the Enemy. Another Squadron alſo of Gallies was deſigned for the Archipelago, to oppoſe the Gallies of Malta and Naples, which much infeſted thoſe Seas.

To the firſt Enterpriſe, the Tartar much excited the Turk, by reaſon that Aſac did not only hinder his Incurſions by Land, but rendred his Navigation in the Black Seas very unſecure. To the ſecond, The Gallies of Malta much provoked them, under the Command of Frederick the Landgrave of Heſſe; who by the Perſwaſions of the Cardinals of Savoy, and Barberini, from a Proteſtant was become a Roman Catholick, and had obtained the great Croſs of Malta; and with ſeveral Gallies and Ships, performed ſome Exploits at Biſerta, and at the Golletta near Tunis.

The Year 1641 being now entered, the Sultan paſſed a moſt Luxurious Life in his Seraglio, conſuming an immenſe Treaſure on his Women; and whilſt theſe two Fleets were preparing to proceed on their reſpective Expedition, that intended for Aſac had almoſt been diverted by the Rumors and Diſturbances on the Frontiers of Hungary; but they were ſoon afterwards appeaſed, by an appearance of an Envoy from the Emperor, and return of a Chiaus to Vienna, with Ratification of all the former Articles and Conditions of Peace. Howſoever the German Internuncio was braved at the Port, for not appearing ſooner with his Preſents and Complements of Congratulation, for the happy Entrance of Sultan Ibrahim to the Ottoman Throne; ſo apt are the Turks to believe Acts of Civility, or Ceremony, to be Parts of Obedience and Submiſſion; and what Chriſtians have once given them voluntarily, is afterwards exacted as a Matter of Debt or Duty.

And being thus freed from a Suſpicion of Troubles in Hungary, and exempted from the Fears of waging two Wars at once, (which the Turks always ſtudiouſly avoid) they diſpatched a Letter into Poland, to demand paſſage for their Army, through that Country, to the Siege of Aſac; but that not being conſented unto, the Turks prepared to open their way by Force, and the Poles to defend the Paſſage. In which interim, many Diſaſters concurred, ſufficient to diſcourage the Turks in their Deſign; who are a People, that ſuperſtitiouſly calculate the Succeſs of their Enterpriſes, by the difficulty or ſmooth ſucceſs of their firſt beginnings: For when the Vizier was ready to depart, a dreadful Fire happened in Conſtantinople, to the quenching of which, applying not only his Orders, but his own Perſon; he adventured ſo far, that he burned both his Hands, and ſinged his Beard in that manner, that he was forced to take his Bed for ſeveral Days, where he was honoured with a Viſit of the Sultan.

News alſo came at the ſame time, that Tauris, or Ecbatan, on the Borders of Perſia, was miſerably ruin'd by an Earthquake; and what was worſe, the Sultan himſelf was ſeized with an Apoplexy, which turned to a Paralytical Diſtemper, the Cauſe whereof was attributed to his exceſſive uſe of Women; to whom he was ſo immoderately addicted, that he conſumed his Days and Nights in their Apartments. This Diſeaſe, which is rarely or never cured, being joined to a Report given out by his Ladies, that notwithſtanding his Venereal Heat, he was yet Impotent as to Women; created a Belief, or at leaſt a ſtrong probability, that he might die without Iſſue, which cauſed high Confuſion in the Counſels of the Grandees, that no Deſign could make any chearful Progreſs, until Proviſion was firſt made for Supply of the Ottoman Houſe; for the Succeſſion of the Tartar was in no manner convenient or ſecure; but rather that the Throne ſhould be furniſhed with the Son of a Siſter, or of a Niece, than to ſubject themſelves to the Rule and Paſſions of a Foreign Prince. And though the Sultan did afterwards recover his Health, yet all ſuſpected and feared, that by the immoderate Heat of his Venerial Inclination, he would die without Children; every one diſcourſing, as moved by his Paſſion, or his Intereſt.

About this time arrived an Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople from the Soſtá of Perſia, bringing a Ratification of the Peace; who was ſo much the more welcome, by how much more the preſent ſent Conjuncture rendred it advantagious; and being uſhered in with exceeding rich Preſents, raviſhed the Hearts of the Turks, whoſe good Nature melts and diſſolves with the ſight or hopes of Gifts.

In Dalmatia, near the Confines of Zara, the Turks made Incurſions on the Venetian Territories, and cauſed ſome Diſturbances: but being chaſtiſed by an Ambuſh laid for them, whereby about two hundred of them periſhed; all Matters were again reconciled, and the Peace renewed.

And now one would imagine, that the Deſign againſt Aſac, by ſuch diverſity of Obſtructions, were abſolutely laid aſide; which though they were of that Importance, and eſpecially the fear of Ibrahim's Death, to detain the Vizier at Home; yet he thought fit to proſecute the Deſign under the Command of the Paſha of Siliſtria, to whom he had committed the Conduct of this War.

The Siege of Aſac.

The Paſha proud of his Charge, rejoiced to be imployed in a War, wherein he apprehended ſo little difficulty, and prognoſticated to himſelf nothing but Glory and Victory; eſteemed the Defendants for no other than Fiſhermen, and better experienced to ſail their Boats, and govern their Saiks in the Black Seas, than to draw up an Army in the Field, or defend their Walls. This Confidence was farther increaſed, by an Embaſſy at the ſame time from the Moſcovite, who not only renounced all Aſſiſtance or Concernment for that Town, but renewed with them his Friendſhip, and Articles of ancient Agreement.

The Ottoman Army, beſides Janiſaries, and other Turks, conſiſted of Moldavians, and Walachians, and a great number of Tartars, which at firſt entred into their Trenches, and beſieged the Town; but here they reſted not ſecurely, by reaſon of the frequent Sallies the Beſieged made upon them; and more eſpecially by the Mines which they ſprang, to the terror and damage of their Enemies. The Turks moved hereat, made furious Aſſaults, but were as valiantly repulſed by the Defendants, who threw ſcalding Water, and Pitch, and burning Sulphur upon the Aſſailants; ſo that not being able to take the Town by Force, they retired to their Trenches, and deliberated in what manner, by fair Promiſes, and Mony, they might invite them to Surrender. Hereupon the Captain-Paſha, the Tartar Han, and others, tried the Efficacy of large Proffers of Priviledges to the Town, their Country, and Inhabitants; with a Gratuity of twelve thouſand Hungers of Gold: But theſe Promiſes could make no more entrance into their Hearts, than the Turks could do into their Walls, which they ſeemed reſolute to defend, wanting neither Proviſion, nor Ammunition, nor courage for the War: but on the contrary ſide, all theſe were wanting in the Turkiſh Camp; ſo that fifteen days paſſed without any Action, until they were ſupplied by the arrival of certain Brigantines, and light Veſſels, diſpatched with all expedition with the neceſſaries of War: At the coming of which, the Turks prepared for another Aſſault, which they continued unceſſantly for the ſpace of ſeven days, but were received with that vigour by the Beſieged, that they could not gain one palm or inch of ground; So that at length with diſgrace, and diſcouragement, they were forced to give over their Attempt, deſpairing to gain the Town in the time, and with the Force which was allotted for this Enterprize.

With this ill Succeſs, Extremity and Famine pinched the Turks in their Trenches ſo much, that an Ox was ſold for fifteen Zechins, a Lamb for three, and a Meaſure of Barley, which ſerved a Horſe for one time, for a Dollar; ſo that at length they were forced to raiſe the Siege; and the Captain Paſha, by tempeſtuous Weather, was conſtrained to ſhelter his Fleet in the Port of Caffa. In their return Home, the General was fearful of having forfeited his Head; the Commanders were ſilent, and aſhamed of their Succeſs, and the Souldiers diſcouraged, famiſhed, and poor; for they had loſt three thouſand Spahees, ſeven thouſand Janiſaries, and eight hundred other Souldiers, beſides Moldavians, Walachians, and Tartars; thoſe that ſurvived of the Foot were naked, and many ſick; the Spahees were without Horſes, with which they were ſupplied by the Tartars; and in fine, ſo unſucceſsful were all Matters, that the Veteran Souldiery avouched, that they never endured a more cruel, nor a more miſerable War.

The juſt puniſhment of a Perſian Traytor.

And now we ſhall end this Year 1641, with the ruin of Emir Guimir, a Perſian by Birth, a Favourite, and yet Traitor to his Natural Prince. This Emir, in the laſt Wars which Sultay Morat waged againſt Perſia, was entruſted with an Embaſſy, and with Conduct of part of his Army, but he betrayed both to the Turk, under whoſe Protection he took Sanctuary, and obtained great Gifts and Preferments, for a Reward and Price of his Treachery. Sultan Morat afterwards beſtowed a magnificent Seraglio upon him, ſituated on the Boſphorus, enriched him with a vaſt Treaſury, and what is more, with his Favour, making him his Companion in his Paſtimes, and his Confident in his ſerious Counſels: It was he that firſt perſwaded the Sultan to drink Wine, in which both of them were beaſtly intemperate, and mighty and valiant to bear, until the heat thereof having extinguiſhed the natural heat of their Stomachs, it became too cold and crude, unleſs corrected, or fortified with Rach, or diſtilled Spirits. The Fumes of ſuch ſtrong Drinks, were the cauſe of the extravagant Actions which Morat practiſed in his Life, and afterwards became the means to haſten his Death; whoſe days being ended, it was time alſo for proſperous Wickedneſs to expire, and to meet a Puniſhment equal to its Demerits. Wherefore one day, (having deſired Licenſe of the Vizier to return to his own Country, where it is believed he had by Mony purchaſed his Pardon) he was called to the Vizier's Preſence, and there, without any Impeachment, Proceſs, or Accuſation, had the String applied to his Throat, and ſtrangled on the place; the reaſon hereof ſome give, to be the immenſe Riches which Sultan Morat had beſtowed upon him, though there wanted not many Cauſes to render him ſuſpected, and obnoxious to the preſent Government; firſt, becauſe he was too well acquainted with the Secrets of the Seraglio, and of that State, to live in any other Country than the Turkiſh Dominions; then it was feared that the Perſian Ambaſſador might make uſe of this Perſon to act what Treaſon he pleaſed on the remainder of the Ottoman Family, on promiſe that ſuch an Attempt ſhould expiate his former Villany, and regain the favour of his natural Prince. But ſuch ſignal Actions as theſe, are commonly wrote in ſuch large Characters of Divine Juſtice, which never left Treaſon unpuniſhed, either in this Life or the other; that we need not ſearch or enquire for a further Cauſe or Occaſion of this Puniſhment.

The Year 1642 being now entred, and the Turks deſirous to repair their laſt Years Diſgrace, reſolved again, with better Preparation and Conduct, to attempt Aſac; but before they would engage, according to their uſual Cuſtom, they determined to conclude all Umbrages, and Matters of Diſpute ariſen on the Confines of Hungary. To which end, the Emperor deputed the Baron of Queſtemberg, with other Barons; and the Turks on their ſide commiſſionated the Paſhaws of the Confines, with Inſtructions not to inſiſt too ſtrictly on the Conditions, leſt it ſhould retard the Peace, and obſtruct the other Deſign of War: Whereſore the Turks condeſcending to Matters reaſonable, and yielding up part of their Uſurpation, a Peace was concluded for twenty Years, much to the Advantage and Favour of the Chriſtians.

The Birth of Sultan Mahomet.

And now, to give farther Courage to the Proſecution of higher Attempts, the whole Turkiſh Empire was repleniſhed with Joy, for the Birth of a young Prince Sultan Mahomet, that now reigns; ſo that the ſuppoſed Impotency of the Father (whereby the Ottoman Family might have been extinguiſhed) was proved otherwiſe by plain Effect; and the fear of thoſe that ruled the Empire vaniſhing by the Riſing of this new Star, all places were filled with Joy and Triumphs; only the Tartar Han finding himſelf thus diſappointed, was ſuppoſed not willing to concur heartily in this common Joy. In this manner vaniſhed the appearance of Civil Diſſention in that Family, which now flouriſhes and encreaſes every day, and inſenſibly creeps forward to the Deſign (which they hope) of an Univerſal Monarchy. Pardon me, O Chriſtian Kings, if I ſay inſenſibly, for methinks you are ſenſible of the leaſt touch you receive from one another, but feel not the gripes and pinches of your Common Enemy, who like a Hectick Feaver hath mingled with your Blood, and ſtolen into the Marrow of your Strength, where he will lurk until he hath diſſolved the Fabrick of your Chriſtian World, unleſs expelled by Concord amongſt your ſelves, and the Divine Aſſiſtance favouring your united Forces.

*The War renewed againſt A*ſac.

But now to return again to the famous Siege of Aſac; It being the cuſtome to caſt all Miſcarriages in War on the General, the Viſier diſplaced the Captain-Paſha, taking upon himſelf that Office and Title, of which there was never any former Example. In the Place likewiſe of the Paſha of Siliſtria, was conſtituted Muſtapha Paſha of Ægypt; which Government, though much inferiour to his former, yet was received without ſence of Diſgrace, it not being the Riches or Power of any Office that confers Honour, but the Favour and good Will of the Sulan. Nor did only the Miſcarriage of the late War tend to the diſrepute of the former Paſha of Siliſtria, but the Report of his having poiſoned the Tartar Han encreaſed the difficulty of reconcilement with his Superiors, which being a Matter rather ſuſpected than proved, excuſed him from farther puniſhment than only a deprivation of his Office.

The new Paſha of Siliſtria thus taking upon himſelf the Command of the Army, and Conduct of this War, aſſembled a Force of Turks, Tartars, Moldavians, and Walachians, far exceeding the number of the laſt Year. At the News of which, and of the Fleet of Gallies deſigned to beſiege them by Sea, they apprehended their Danger ſo great, that without the Aſſiſtance of the Moſcovite, they concluded it impoſſible to defend their City; to him therefore they made Applications for Succour, repreſenting unto him the extremity their Affairs were in, by reaſon of that powerful Enemy which threatned them; and that having always acknowledged him for their Protector, there was no Refuge left them but under the defence of his Arms. But hereunto the Moſcovite gave a brief reply, That he had lately concluded Peace with the Turk; ſince which, having received from him no occaſion of breach, he could not with any Juſtice engage ſo ſoon againſt him in a War.

The Inhabitants abandon Aſac.

The Coſſacks being thus diſappointed of their principal Hopes, reſolved to abandon their City; but to make the beſt advantage of their flight, they carried with them all their Moveables; and demoliſhed their Walls, and ruined their Houſes, leaving the Place a notorious Spectacle of Deſpair and Ruin; and no other Poſſeſſion to their Enemies, than the compaſs of ſo much ground peſtered with Rubbiſh, and rude heaps of Stones. The Paſha howſoever abundantly contented, that his very Name was ſufficient to affright his Enemies, entred the City with Triumph, where he began to repair the Walls, and invite the Inhabitants to return, with all aſſurance of Security, and Protection. This gentle Treatment recalled many back to their Homes, ſo hardly are Men weaned from their Native Country; and in a ſhort time the City beginning to fill, all Matters ſeemed to return to their priſtine State and Condition.

The Perſian renews his League.

About this time the Perſian, by his Ambaſſador, renewed his League with the Turk, and confirmed it in the Name of the new King; which was performed on condition that the Softi ſhould demoliſh the Fortreſs of Fortrina, which he had, contrary to Articles, built on the Frontiers, not far from the Caſpian Sea; which that it might aſſuredly be performed, a Capugibathee was diſpatched to ſee it effected.

The Turks ſeek to take Rab by Stratagem.

And in this manner, Aſac being ſubdued, and a Peace ſecured with the Perſian; The Turks, who can neither live in quiet with their Neighbours, nor obſerve Capitulations longer than they turn to their advantage, contrived to take Giavarine, aliàs Rab, a ſtrong Fortreſs on the Confines of Hungary, by a Stratagem which they deſigned in this manner: Certain Souldiers habited like Peaſants, were crouded into ſeveral Carts, covered with Hay, which being entered within the Walls, were immediatly to leap forth, and ſurpriſe the Centinels and Guards at the Gates (which might eaſily be executed on Men, whom twenty Years before of Peace had made ſecure) theſe were to be ſeconded by four thouſand Souldiers, which lay ready in a Neighbouring Vally; but it happened, That an Officer of the Garriſon returning from Hunting, had by chance diſcovered this ſtrong Party of Turks, which cauſed him to quicken his pace towards the Town, and overtaking in his way certain Carts of Straw, which appearing to be laden in a form different to what was uſual, increaſed in him a farther ſuſpicion of Treachery; howſoever, he proceeded forward with the more haſte, yet without any appearance of Jealouſy: until being entred into the Town, he declared what he had ſeen, at which the Gariſon was immediately in Arms; and having permitted the Carts to enter, the Bridg was drawn up, and the Carts being ſearched, the whole Fraud and Treachery was diſcovered; and having made the Turks Priſoners, and armed the Walls with Souldiers, the whole Deſign was diſappointed; ſo that thoſe who lay in Ambuſh returned to their own Cities. The Emperor hereupon reſolved to ſend 1642. an Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople, to complain of this Treachery; whereof the Turks being aſhamed, and the more becauſe it did not ſucceed; refuſed to admit the Ambaſſador, unleſs the Emperor would firſt agree to pay a yearly Charge of an hundred thouſand Rix-Dollars to the Port; not by way of Tribute, but of Preſent; in which unreaſonable Demand, they took more confidence, in regard they perceived that the Emperor was engaged in a War againſt the Swede. Upon this diſhonourable Demand, the Emperor deferr'd the Embaſſy intended, ſuppoſing it leſs perilous to adventure a War in Hungary, than diſhonourable to condeſcend unto a Propoſition ſo derogatory to the Majeſty of his Ceſarean Greatneſs.

1643. This Year 1643 being entered, the Prince of Tranſylvania conveyed his Annual Tribute, being ten thouſand Zechins, to the Port; which when the Agents of that Prince preſented before the Vizier, he ſeemingly refuſed it; pretending that the compleat Tribute was to be fifteen thouſand, according to Agreement: but the Agents replied, that five thouſand had been remitted unto Bethlem Gabor, not by way of Gratuity or Recompence for his Service, but in Exchange, or as the price of two Cities, which the Prince had yielded to the Sultan, out of his own proper Eſtate in Hungary: With which Anſwer the Vizier remained ſatisfied, being jealous of the Turbulent and active Spirit of that Prince.

During all theſe Wars and Revolutions in Kingdoms and States, Sultan Ibrahim contained and contented himſelf within the Precincts of his Seraglio; where becoming a faithful and valiant Soldier of Venus, he conſumed more Treaſure in that War, than his Brother Morat did in Foreign Conqueſts; and being, as it were, entered into the Mahometan Paradiſe, where the Company of fair Women is the chiefeſt Felicity promiſed, he laboured to increaſe the Ottoman Family, and to acquit his People of the apprehenſion they had of wanting an Heir to ſucceed in the Throne; ſo that on the 15th of February he had a ſecond Son born, and a third on the 12th of March following; which abſolutely took away the Reproach of his Frigidity or Impotence, proving afterwards the moſt laſcivious and devout Sultan that ever aſpired to the Mahometan Heaven.

This Year the Turks armed out twenty Gallies more than uſual, beſides thirty Sail of Ships, and Gally-Groſſes; in the beginning of June, riding at the Seraglio Point (where the Commanders in Chief came to take their leave of Sultan Ibrahim) they divided into two Squadrons; one of which conſiſting of twenty Gallies, under the Command of Beker Paſha, took their Voyage into the Black Sea; the remainder under the Captain Paſha, ſailed for Cyprus, with intention to do Juſtice on the Paſha of that Iſland, whoſe Riches gained by Oppreſſion, had debauched him from due Obedience towards his Prince; and being arrived there, without Rumor or Noiſe, giving ſigns of good Will and Reſpects towards the Paſha, one day he ſent to invite him Aboard to banquet with him; where the Paſha fooliſhly coming, and having well eaten and drank with him, his Entertainment had not time to digeſt, before he breathed his Laſt; for being on his departure, the Slaves aſſaulted him, and ſtrangled him by Order of the Captain-Paſha.

No other Matters remarkable did the Turkiſh Fleet perform this Year at Sea, before they returned again to their Winter-Quarters. Howſoever 1643. this Year proved favourable to many poor Chriſtians in Slavery; for there happening a moſt miſerable Plague in Alexandria, which relaxed the Spirits of Men, and rendered every one ſo negligent in his Office, that about four-thouſand Slaves taking advantage of ſuch Remiſſneſs in their Guardians, ſeized a Ship in Port, and crouding themſelves therein, ſet Sail, and landed ſome of their People at Candia, others at Malta, the reſt at Marſeillia, by which means they happily regained their Liberty: on which incouragement eight hundred more adventuring to perform the like, and fighting in a Body at the Gate of Alexandria, three hundred of them were ſlain, the reſt leaped into a Gally, which though without Oars, had yet her Sails to the Yard, and having the fortune of a favourable Wind, arrived ſafe at Candia; in like manner they became free, taking convenient paſſage from thence to divers parts of Chriſtendom: Theſe Slaves were all redemanded by the Grand Signior from the Venetians; in which no Satisfaction being given, was one Cauſe and Original of that War which afterwards enſued.

1644. And now the Year 1644 being begun, Ragotski, who was never contented but in Combuſtions, and never at eaſe but when he was proving new Projects, made Demands of certain Places on the Confines of Moravia, ſcituated within the Mountains, which he challenged as the Inheritance of his Son; beſides other Pretences which he made in right of Bethlem Gabor. To forward which Deſigns, moved with an inveterate Enmity to the Auſtrian Family, he endeavoured to win the Hearts of the Commonalty with a plauſible Declaration for Liberty, and to throw off the Yoke which had ſo long gauled the Neck of Hungary; whereby having raiſed an Army of twenty thouſand Horſe, and thirty thouſand Foot, he entred, and ſpoiled the Country of his old Enemy and Neighbour the Count of Humanay an Hungarian, took Solnock by force, and beſieged Fileck, and Caſſovia: For ſuppreſſion of which Inſurrection and Rebellion of Ragotski, the Emperor was forced to a War; and having Rendezvouſed his Army at Fresbourg, the Conduct thereof was committed to the Charge of Count Puceain.

The Turks having intelligence of theſe Preparations for War, commanded twenty thouſand Men to march into thoſe Parts to oppoſe theſe Combuſtions on the Frontiers; with ſix-thouſand of which the Count Puecaim encountering furiouſly, aſſaulted and routed them. And in the mean time Ragotski laying aſide all care for the War in Hungary, applied himſelf to relieve Olimz in Moravia; but in his March thither he was recalled by the Inhabitants of Sendar, which is a Caſtle erected on a Hill near Caſſovia, offering to ſurrender unto him; but the Governor Forgatz, and the German Gariſon oppoſing this Mutiny of the People, a Civil War began amongſt themſelves, but at length the advantage falling unto Ragotski, the Gates were opened unto the Tranſylvanians; with which Succeſs their Spirits being raiſed to higher Matters, they proceeded forward, until General Getz with a ſtrong Body, gave a ſtop unto their Progreſs. And thus was the Fire of War rekindled again in Hungary, by means of Ragotski; to whom notwithſtanding the Turks would never adhere, being well acquainted with his turbulent and unſteady Humour. In the mean time the Emperor diſpatched his Ambaſſador with rich Preſents to the Sultan, deſiring him to forbear giving farther Aſſiſtance unto Ragotski; but what between Skirmiſhes, Propoſitions, and Treaties, Matters were not compoſed until the 14*th* of Auguſt 1645, at which time all Articles were concluded and ſigned between the Emperor and Ragotski.

But to return now to the Affairs of Conſtantinople; Sultan Ibrahim having the Fortune of Active and Prudent Miniſters, attended entirely to his Paſtimes and Pleaſures, without Prejudice to his Intereſt, and the State of his Empire; for the firſt Vizier being Faithful and Vigilant, immediately cut off thoſe Members with the Sword, which he ſuſpected in the leaſt manner inclinable to Sedition; amongſt which were the Paſhaws of Aleppo and Caffa. For by this kind of ſeaſonable and ſpeedy Remedies, the Plethory of the Ottoman Empire is commonly evacuated, and the Body Politick thereof reſtored to its priſtine ſtate of Health and Safety.

In like manner the Valede Sultana, being a Woman of great Courage and Abilities, attended carefully to the Welfare of her Son, whom ſhe ſometimes decked up, and ſet forth as a Property of Majeſtick Gravity to the People, whilſt ſhe her ſelf aſſumed the Authority, and carried all things with a high and imperious Spirit; and being ambitious to be feared as well as honoured, ſhe laid violent Hands on the firſt Vizier, called Muſtapha, and ſtrangled him; for though he was an Active and Faithful Miniſter, yet becauſe he paſſed ſomething on her which ſhe imagined did ſavour of neglect, and becauſe ſhe apprehended his Power, which was greatly confirmed by the Intereſt and Favour he had with the Janiſaries, and their Favourers, ſhe reſolved to make him an Example, as well of her Revenge, as her Power; after whoſe Death the Charge of firſt Vizier was conferred on Mahomet the Paſha of Damaſcus.

The ſame Fate befel the Captain-Paſha, who was likewiſe ſtrangled for having over-boldly, or peremptorily, made anſwer to ſome Impertinencies of the Grand Signior; and his Office was afterwards conferred on Beker Paſha of Rhodes. With ſuch Rigour as this do the Sultans govern, who reſolve to be obeyed, and to have their Commands executed without delay or contradiction.

The Tartars make Incurſions into Poland, notwithſtanding the Peace.

Whilſt theſe Matters were in agitation, the Tartars forgetful of their Peace, made another Incurſion with thirty thouſand Men into Ruſſia, againſt whom Koniſpolski having made Head with twenty thouſand Men only, overthrew them, and killed twelve thouſand, and took three thouſand Priſoners, purſuing the reſt to the Borders of Walachia. In like manner Wiſnowick, a noble Polander, happily encountred another Party of Tartars, as they were on their return from ſpoiling the Countries of Moſcovia; of whom having killed 10000 Men, he recovered their Booty, and ſent the reſt Home naked and empty. This was the true and moſt effectual Means for the Polanders to avenge and right their Injuries, and more prevalent than Ambaſſies and Meſſages of Complaint unto the Port; which we have experienced ſince, and in the preſent Reign of the Son of Ibrahim, to have been ſo far from producing Matter worthy ſo much as the Charge of the Ambaſſador, that they have been retorted with Ignominy and Affronts.

But here Ibrahim perceiving how the Poles had avenged themſelves with their own Sword, would ſeem to approve of the Action, which he could not hinder; and to appear a ſincere Obſerver of the Peace, he depoſed the Tartar Han for his unlawful Incurſions; which was ſuch a ſatisfaction to the Crown of Poland, as they never could obtain by force of Juſtice, Complaints, and Vertue of paſſive Valour, until their active Fortitude took their Cauſe in Hand, and pleaded for them.

On the 19*th* of March of this Year, a fourth Son was born to Sultan Ibrahim; and on the 19*th* of February following, being in the Year 1645, notwithſtanding all the Reports of his Impotency, was born a fifth Son, named Solyman, to the great contentment of his People.

The Turks Gallies this Year, under the Command of Beker their new Captain-Paſha, made an Attempt on the Coaſt of Calabria, bringing from thence two hundred Slaves; and attempting the like near Corton, paid for their former Booty, with the loſs of five hundred Men.

Howſoever, the Gallies of Malta, being ſix in number, had better Succeſs as to themſelves, though the Conſequences thereof proved fatal to the Venetians, having given the firſt occaſion of that long War, which afterwards enſued between the Turk and them.

The Story of Kuzlir Aga, his Slave and Son taken by the Malteſes.

The truth of which Story is this, free of all Romance or Fable, which the Knights of St. John or Malta would mix therewith: It happened that the Kuzlir Aga, or chief Eunuch, which governs the Women in the Signior's Seraglio, having caſt his Eye on a fair Slave, then ſet to ſale by a Perſian Merchant, became ſo enamoured of her, that he purchaſed her for himſelf, under the Notion of a Virgin, at the price of four hundred and fifty Dollars: But the Eunuch had not long entertained this Lady in his Service, before ſhe proved with Child; not by him (you may conceive) if you underſtand how the Eunuchs of this Country are diſarm'd of their Virility: At which he was ſo greatly offended, that he baniſhed her from his Society, and confined her to the Houſe of his Steward. The time being come for her to be delivered of her great Belly, it proved a Son; and ſome Months after, the Aga being deſirous to ſee the Babe, was ſo pleaſed with the Aſpect of it, that he reſolved to adopt it for his own, ordering it Cloaths, and other Neceſſaries agreeable to its Condition. It happened that about that time Sultan Mahomet (which now reigns) was then born; and there wanting a Nurſe for the Child, this beautiful Slave was preferred to the Honour; ſo that ſhe was entertained near two Years in the Seraglio: During which time Sultan Ibrahim took ſuch an affection to the Nurſe's Boy, that he loved him better than his own eldeſt Son, who was of a bad Complexion, and of no better Air in his Face than his Father, and took great delight to play and ſport with him; at which the Mother of Sultan Mahomet was ſo diſpleaſed, that ſhe could not longer endure either Nurſe or her Boy; and for her ſake, took ſo much diſpleaſure againſt the Kuzlir Aga, who preferred her, that neither his Preſence nor Service were acceptable; and ſo violent ſhe was in her Paſſion, that one day, when Sultan Ibrahim was playing with his Women and Children in the Garden, according to his uſual Cuſtom, throwing them one on the other into the Water, the Queen grew ſo furious, that ſhe could not contain longer from venting her Anger in unhanſome Terms, and jealouſy againſt the Nurſe and her Son. At which the Sultan being much diſpleaſed, and being ill-natured, (if we may ſpeak boldly of an Emperor) took her Son (which is now Sultan Mahomet) out of her Arms, and with ſome few Curſes ſwung him into a Ciſtern; where he had been certainly drowned, had not every one in that inſtance applied themſelves to ſave him; at which time he received the Mark or Scar he wears at this day in his Forehead.

All theſe Matters ſerved for farther Fuel to nouriſh the implacable Spirit of the Queen; which the Kuzlir Aga well obſerving, judged it prudence to give way to her Fury, and ſo begged his Diſmiſſion from the Court, together with his Slave and Son; and that having viſited Mecha, according to his Law, he might enjoy a Retirement in Egypt, which is the Portion of baniſhed Eunuchs.

The Queen eaſily conſented hereunto; nor was it difficult to procure the Licence of the Sultan, who was as eaſily perſwaded to any by thoſe who were about him; wherefore the Eunuch having provided to be gone, ſhipped himſelf with his great Treaſure, on the Fleet which was now deſigned, and ready to depart for Alexandria, which conſiſted of three Ships; one a great Gallion, and two others of leſſer Burthen, and ſeven Saiks; theſe having at the beginning of their Voyage found contrary Winds, put into Rhodes; from whence looſing with more favourable Weather, they unfortunately met with ſix Malta Gallies, excellently well manned, and provided. The Admiral Gally immediately Boarded one of the Saiks, and took her, manned only by Greeks; by whom they were informed of the Condition, Quality, and Cargo of the greater Ship, which gave Heat and Reſolution to the Souldiery. In like manner, with little Oppoſition, the Gallies called the St. John, and Joſeph, poſſeſſed themſelves of one of the leſſer Ships, which being laden only with Timber, brought from the Black Sea, to build Ships at Alexandria, was of little value, having forty Turks aboard, eight Women, and a Child which ſucked at the Mother's Breaſt. In the mean time, the three other Gallies, called the St. Mary, St. Lorenzo, and Victory, attacked the great Gallion, and having caſt their Iron Graples into the Ship, with the Motion of the Ship, the Irons gave way and broke, only that of the St. Lorenzo held faſt, ſo that the whole force of the Ship, both of ſmall and great Shot, was poured in upon the Gally, to their damage and loſs of Men. In the mean time the Admiral Gally came in to their Aſſiſtance, and Aſſaulting the Ship on the other Quarter, made a Diverſion of their Men; and having thrown in their Graples, they ſcaled the ſides of the Gallion, as if it had been a Fortreſs; where being entred, they remained for ſome time at handy-blows with the Turks; but at length, all the Gallies coming to their help, having made an end of ſubduing the other Ships, the Turks were forced to retire under Covert of their Decks, which they defended ſtill with ſingular Valour, wounding the Chriſtians with their half Pikes, through the Gratings.

The Engagement of the Turkiſh with the Malta Gallies.

But, in fine, the Captains of the Gallies, perceiving that this was not the way to compel them to a ſpeedy Surrender, ordered ſeveral Muſquetiers out of every Gally, to fire in at the Windows and loop-holes of the Ship; by which having killed their Commander in Chief, their Valour and Conſtancy began to fail, and deſirous to ſave their lives with loſs of Liberty and Eſtates, they caſt down their Arms, and begged Mercy.

In this Engagement were killed the Captain of the St. Mary, and ſeven Cavaliers, of which five were French, one Italian, and one German; the Admiral himſelf, and the Captain of his Gally were both wounded; ſeventy nine Souldiers and Mariners killed, and an hundred thirty two wounded: Of the Turks it is not certain how many fell, in regard as they were killed, according to Cuſtom, they caſt them over-board; the Eunuch himſelf, though always educated in the ſoftneſs of the Seraglio, and in the Converſation of the Female Court, yet in the end concluded his days like one of the Maſculine Sex, fighting valiantly with his Sword, until overwhelmed by his Enemies: by which it is obſervable, that thoſe Perſons loſe not their Courage with their virile Parts; for it hath been known in former days, how that Eunuchs have been Generals in the Turkiſh and other Armies, and conducted their Affairs with admirable Courage and Succeſs.

The Prize which the Chriſtians had gained in this manner, was very conſiderable; for beſides the Gold, Silver, and Jewels, which were the Treaſure this Eunuch had amaſſed in the Reign of three ſeveral Sultans, they gained three hundred and fifty Slaves, beſides thirty Women, ſome of which were young and Virgins; ſo that there was not a Souldier or Seaman who had not a conſiderable ſhare of benefit proportioned unto him. With this Fortune, towing their Prizes, they in a ſhort time came to an Anchor in the Port of Caliſmene, in the Iſland of Candia, called anciently Phenice, on the South-ſide of the Iſland, remote from all Venetian Gariſons; and where (as it is reported) they were ſupplied with no Proviſions, excepting a ſmall quantity of Bisket, which was furniſhed by a Country Fellow, who for that very Cauſe was ſhot to Death. From hence the Gallies departing, arrived in Malta with their Prizes, where they were received in great Triumph. The young Son of the Eunuch (for ſo we call him) was reported to be a Son of the Grand Signior, ſent into Egypt to be Educated, and was accordingly ſaluted, treated, and reverenced by the Grand Maſter; the ſame Opinion was diſperſed and confirmed in all parts of Europe, and the Errour for many Years maintained at the Expence of the * Religion, until the Boy growing up to a good Age, and not judged worthy of a Ranſom, or enquiry after by the Turks, it was thought convenient for him to put off his State, and Greatneſs, and become a Fryer, and I think a Dominican, and this is he who now goes under the name of the Padre Ottomano.

* Of the Knights of Malta.

The News hereof arriving at the Ottoman Court, Sultan Ibrahim was tranſported with Anger, threatning Deſtruction and Ruin unto Malta; beſides he ſhewed a moſt inveterate Paſſion againſt the Venetians, for not guarding the Seas from his Enemies, and for relieving them in their Ports. In which Rage and Fury, he put his own Captain Paſha to death, and Summoned the Chriſtian Ambaſſadors, braving them all for the little reſpect was ſhown to his proper Shipping; and in ſhort, was angry with all, but reſerved the Effect of his Wrath to be poured on the Venetians, to which this Accident adminiſtred the firſt Original, and will afford us ample matter of Diſcourſe in this enſuing Hiſtory.

For the Grand Signior firſt made his Complaints againſt Venice, to their Miniſter, or Bailo, then reſident at Conſtantinople, called Soranço; alledging, that contrary to the Articles of Peace, they had afforded Proviſions and Entertainment to his Enemies in Candia, and at a time when having made Prize of his own Ship, and Domeſtiques of his Seraglio, they ſeemed, with more extraordinary demonſtrations of Hoſpitality than uſual, to receive them into their Harbours.

1644. To which the Bailo made Anſwer, That his Majeſty was ill informed of the true ſtate of thoſe Matters; for that the Port to which the Malteſes came, had neither Caſtle nor Fortreſs belonging to it, but was an open, wide, and unfortified place; for if the Grand Signior is not able to defend thoſe Ships from carcening, as they have often done before Rhodes it ſelf, how was it poſſible for the Venetians to drive them from the Seas, and deny them the uſe of that Salt Water, which hath neither Fort nor Caſtle to reach and command them? With which Anſwer Ibrahim ſeemed to remain ſatisfied; and Matters appeared ſo appeaſed on the ſide of the Venetians, that Soranço, though a Perſon of a moſt acute and penetrating Judgment, imagined nothing leſs than a War: and though he was aſſured otherwiſe, by ſomething that the Engliſh Ambaſſador had diſcovered in that Matter; yet becauſe it came not firſt from the Report of one of his own Interpreters, he would not ſeem to believe or give credit thereunto, notwithſtanding the ſtrong Probabilities that might perſwade it.

Indeed, Chriſtian Miniſters muſt neceſſarily, with much Difficulties, and leſs Inſpection, govern and penetrate Affairs in the Turkiſh Court than in any other; becauſe acceſs to the great Miniſters is ſeldom privately or familiarly admitted, from whence wiſe Men moſt commonly take their Meaſures and Obſervations; but on the contrary, are forced to act all by the Negotiation, of their Druggermen or Interpreters; and as they hear with their Ears, ſo are they often-times beholden to their Reflections; which how ſubject they may be to Error, is beſt known to thoſe Miniſters who have practiſed much and long in that Court.

And in this manner Ibrahim covered his Deſign againſt Candia, by pretence of making War upon Malta, to which he had lately received ſo juſt a provocation.

To this Enterprize, none inſtigated him more than a certain Hagia, or Tutor, which had accompanied him in the time of his Solitude, and had inſtructed him in the firſt Principles of the Mahometan Doctrine; he was a ſubtil and underſtanding Man, and one who kept a ſecret Correſpondence in the Chriſtian Courts; for being Maſter of what Gold he pleaſed, he paid for his Intelligence with Liberality and Secreſy; and though he was no Prophet, yet he pretended to be a Magician, or Conjurer, or one that had a Command or Soveraignty over Familiar Spirits; an Excellency greatly admired and reverenced by the Turks. This Man had for a long Seaſon attended an opportunity to promote a War againſt Venice; eſteeming their Territories very convenient to be laid to the Turkiſh Dominions, and their Force an under-Match for the Puiſſance of the Ottoman Empire. And now this Accident provoking the Deſire of the Turks to this War, and the Opportunity appearing commodious to cover the Deſign, under pretence of Aſſailing Malta, it was ſecretly reſolved to attempt the Iſland of Candia; for as its Strength and Situation made it the Key to all the other Iſles of the Archipelago, ſo it would be the Bulwark of the Maritime Countries, from whence the Paſſage would be ſhort and eaſy into Africa; from whence the Gallies might advantagiouſly relieve Cyprus, and guard the Fleet from Egypt, and from thence might be opened a Door to invade Sicily, and the other parts of Italy. On theſe Conſiderations, War being reſolved againſt Candia, Reports divulged the Deſign only againſt Malta, and for that end, Orders were iſſued for building and fitting an hundred Gallies, and as many Ships of War; and Commands ſent into Barbary for aſſiſtance of all their Naval Force, and the Day appointed for Rendezvous and Departure; all which time the Enterprize was kept ſecret, and by no more Symptoms ſuſpected, unleſs by the unuſual Careſſes the Turks at that time over-acted in their officious kindneſs towards the Venetian Bailo. 1644.

The Report of theſe great Preparations flying over all Parts of Europe, was entertained at Malta, with ſome Apprehenſions, as being the Place on which all the Storm was to refund its Fury.

Whereupon the Cavaliers or Knights of that Place, ſummoning a Council, reſolved to cite all the Fraternity to repair to the Defence of their Capital Seat, and of their Order and Patrimony. Likewiſe Letters were directed to the ſeveral Officers, to prepare and ſend Powder, Match, and Lead, Iron Buckets, and Timber to make Carriages for Cannon, and for other Uſes; as alſo Corn, Bisket, Salt, Fleſh and Fiſh, Vinegar, Wine, and all other ſorts of Ammunition. They likewiſe inſtituted ſome Officers over the Waters, to ſee that the Fountains and Conduits ſhould be made clear which were to ſerve the City; and that thoſe without, that were to remain in the poſſeſſion of the Enemy, ſhould be carefully and artificially poiſoned; all the Mills remaining in the Fields were tranſported into the Town; the Doors and Windows of Wood belonging to the Peaſants Houſes, were taken down and carried into the City, with all their Utenſils, and what elſe was portable, ſo that nothing remained but the wide Fields, and an open Air to breath in.

In the mean time, the Venetians being a wiſe and jealous State, ſuſpected the worſt of all Events, and feared what their Miniſter at Conſtantinople could not diſcover; which cauſed them to make ſome Preparations, but yet with that dexterity and ſecreſy, as not to render them diffident of the Turks Proceedings. For to be jealous of a Friend, is ſometimes to make him an Enemy; and Diſtruſt always argues Diſaffection, which Prudence teaches to conceal from thoſe who are more powerful than our ſelves. Some were notwithſtanding of Opinion, that the Complaints of Ibrahim were only Artifices to extract the Blood of Gold, which they judged fit to adminiſter, if it were poſſible to ſatisfy the Appetite of thoſe Leeches. Others were of a contrary ſenſe, and would by no means admit it for good Counſel, or Policy, to buy their Peace of the Turk; for, beſides that it was diſagreeable to the Grandeur of Venice, it was but a Shadow that they purchaſed, ſince their Enemies could on every ſlight Occaſion reaſſume what they had ſold, and make the Menaces of War, and the Sale of Peace, ſerve them for a perpetual Fountain, and Mine of Gold and Treaſure; and that ſince it was neceſſary, at one time or other, to caſt off this Yoke of Tyranny; the ſooner it was done, the Advantage would be the greater, and the Honour more apparent to the World, ſeeming to make War rather their Choice, than their laſt Remedy. Howſoever Orders were given to the Bailo, with all Prudence and Art, to touch gently the Pulſe of the Turks, to diſcover if Mony would redeem the preſent Quiet of their State.

But the Reſentment that the Turks had conceived, was grown apparent in the comportment towards the Bailo; for having one day demanded 1644. Audience, he attended ſeveral hours without admiſſion; yet when the Ambaſſador of Ragotski come to the Vizier, he no ſooner entred the Houſe than he was received: and at the ſame time it was told the Bailo, that he might retire, for that there was no Place nor Seaſon at preſent to afford him Audience. In the mean time Ibrahim himſelf walked often to the Arſenal, to forward and haſten his Preparations, laying an Embargo on all Strangers Veſſels in all Ports of the Ottoman Dominions. Orders were likewiſe diſpatched to Thebes, Negropont, and other Parts of Greece, for making Bisket; and to the Morea for cutting and ſquaring of Timbers, and ſacking Wools to fill up Trenches; in all which Rumor and Stir, there was no other diſcourſe but of Malta, and of throwing that Iſland into the Sea with the Shovel and Mattock, and rendring it the moſt dreadful Example in the World of the Ottoman Rage and Greatneſs.

With ſuch Preludes as theſe, began a War of long continuance, maintained with various Succeſſes for divers Years; the fatal Iſſue whereof, we our ſelves have ſeen and heard. But it is ſtrange to conſider, that an Exploit ſo Martial as this, ſhould commence in the Reign of a Sultan wholly given up to his Pleaſures, and ſo ſwallowed in Senſuality, that all thoſe luxurious and wanton Actions which are recounted of Sardanapalus and Heliogabalus, are flat and faint Similitudes of that prodigious Effeminacy, in which this Sultan outdid all other Examples of former Ages.

Amber was the common Perfumes which burned perpetually in the Womens Apartments, and the common Sauce to moſt of his Viands; not perhaps becauſe it ſo much pleaſed his Palate, as that it was a provocative, and incitement to his Luſts.

And this puts me in mind of a Story I have heard of an Engliſh Merchant, living then at Galata, who was Maſter of a rare piece of Ambergrieſe, which was in form like a Pyramid; the News whereof was told to the Grand Signior late at Night, when the Smoke of the Perfumes began to abate: Which ſo ſoon as he heard, though it was near Midnight, he diſpatched a Meſſenger to call the Merchant with his Ambergrieſe; who being knocked out of his Bed in haſte, by the importunity of the Officer, came to the Seraglio Gate two hours before Day; where he attended until it was broad Light, and then, without more words, found a Market for his Amber, and before his departure received 13 thouſand Dollars. The Female Court was then extreamly rich and ſplendid, all Italy was ſcarce able to ſupply it with Silks, and Cloth of Gold; ſo that the Trade was in thoſe days flouriſhing above other Times, and gave great employment to Engliſh Shipping: and ſo impatient were the Women for their Gay Cloaths, that ſo ſoon as the News of a Ship from Italy came, and that ſhe was arrived within the Caſtles of the Helleſpont, but there detained by contrary Winds, Gallies were immediately diſpatched to bring up their Silks, which they oftentimes forced away without any Account or Price made with the Merchant; of which that worthy Gentleman, Sir Thomas Bendyſh then Ambaſſador, complaining to the Vizier, and finding no other Relief than good Words, reſolved on an Expedient of making known his Cauſe to the Grand Signior, which was this.

In Turkie they have a Cuſtom, that when any one receives a notable Injury, or Injuſtice, from the Chief and Great Miniſters of State, they put Fire on their Heads, and running to the Grand Signior, no Man can hinder or deny them acceſs to his preſence. In like manner the Engliſh Ambaſſador not being able to obtain Satiſfaction from the Vizier, in return to his many Complaints, drew out all the Engliſh Ships in Galata, which were then thirteen in number, and drawing in their Guns, and ſhutting the Ports, put fire on every Yard-Arm of their Ships, and came to an Anchor juſt before the Seraglio. The Cuſtomer being the firſt that eſpyed this unuſual ſight, immediately apprehended the Reaſon, and ſent to acquaint the Vizier thereof in all haſte; the Vizier likewiſe fearful leſt the Complaints ſhould by this means come to the Grand Signior's Ear, ſent the Cuſtomer aboard with a conſiderable part of the Mony, and deſired that the Fires might be extinguiſhed, promiſing faithfully to comply in paiment of the reſt; hereupon Conſultation being had between the Ambaſſador and the Merchants, the Ships returned to their Stations, not ſeeming to have been taken notice of by thoſe in the Seraglio.

And notwithſtanding the great number of Women within the Seraglio, all which were at the Devotion of the Sultan; yet Ibrahim not being contented herewith, paſſing one day to Scutari, had by chance caſt his eye on an object which much pleaſed him: what it was, becomes not the modeſty of my Pen to relate; but being returned to his Seraglio, he ſent Orders to the Vizier, to ſeek out for him the biggeſt, and beſt proportioned Woman which was to be found in all Conſtantinople, and the parts thereabouts. Hereupon Emiſſaries were diſpatched into all Quarters of the City; at length they happily procured a huge tall Armenian Woman, well proportioned according to her height, and a Gianteſs for her Stature; which being found, ſhe was preſently waſhed and perfumed in the Bath, and as richly Cloathed and Adorned as the ſhortneſs of time would permit: There was no great difficulty to perſwade her to become Turk, having ſo high preferment in her proſpect. So that being introduced to the Grand Signior's preſence, he became immediately Enamoured, and was ſo pleaſed with her Society, that he preferred her before all the Women of his Court; an Evidence whereof he gave, in that he could not deny her any requeſt ſhe could make, and particularly about that time the Paſhaluck of Damaſcus being void, this Woman begged it for her ſelf, ſubſtituting another in the Office, who was accountable to her for all the Profits and Emoluments thereof: By theſe particulars of favour the Queen-Mother becoming jealous, one day inviting her to Dinner, cauſed her to be ſtrangled, and perſwaded Ibrahim that ſhe died ſuddenly of a violent Sickneſs, at which he poor Man was greatly afflicted.

But not to inſiſt long on theſe luxurious Paſtimes, we ſhall return again to Matters of higher Concernment: Ibrahim had now underſtood, that the Venetians growing jealous of his Preparations, began likewiſe to Arm, and provide for the worſt; which being in no wiſe pleaſing to the Turks, who were apprehenſive that their Marine Forces conſiſted moſt in ſurprize, cauſed Ibrahim to complain of the Defenſive Poſture in which they Arrayed themſelves, alledging, that Suſpicions of this Nature argued no hearty Diſpoſition towards their Friends; nor was any thing more contrary to a good Correſpondence, or more diſobliging than ſuch like Jealouſies, which oft-times beget that Enmity which was never deſigned; and farther it was judged neceſſary, 1644. ſary, if poſſible, to diſſwade the Bailo from a belief of any Hoſtility deſigned againſt his Republick; to inculcate which, none was eſteemed ſo proper an Inſtrument as the old cheating Hogia, who was the firſt Motive to the War; a Preacher who imagined that the excellency of his Religion afforded him a priviledg to falſify, lye, and commit any Act for advantage thereof, though never ſo contrary to Truth and Morality. This Santone, with the Teſtimony of one or two more grand Profeſſors, with many Alleverations and Vows, endeavoured to perſwade the Bailo, of the Grand Signior's good Intentions towards Venice, and his fixed Reſolutions to deſtroy Malta. And though the Concernment which thoſe godly Elders ſhewed, and the earneſtneſs they uſed, whereby to inculcate a Credence to what they affirmed, were enough to diſcover their contrary Intentions; and though it is ſaid, that the Venetians could not heartily believe what they ſo ſtrongly ſuſpected; yet hereby, and by the common vogue of the People, they abated much of their Caution and Heat, which they otherwiſe had uſed in due Preparations and Proviſions againſt an Evil ſo fatal and deſtructive in the ſequel.

The beginning of the War.

The firſt Act of Hoſtility was committed by Giacomo da Riva, who being ſent for Sopraveditor to Tino, was in his way to touch at Candia, there to deliver Ammunition and Proviſions for War; but being encountered by ſome barbarous Veſſels, who aſſailed him for a Merchants Ship of ſmall Force, were received ſo warmly that he ſunk one of them, with which the reſt left him and fled, relating at Conſtantinople, that they had been ill treated by the Venetians, and that they gave the firſt Aſſault upon them, becauſe they were called to the Aſſiſtance and Service of the Grand Signior.

The Fleet and Land Forces being already put to Sea, the Report and Opinion ſtill continued, that the War was deſigned againſt Malta; wherefore ſuch as apprehended the Hazard, and were acquainted with the Difficulty of ſuch an Enterprize, began to inform the Grand Signior how impoſſible it was that this Action ſhould be accompanied with good ſucceſs. To which Arguments he made no other reply, than by a ſeeming obſtinacy, reſolved with the Ottoman Sword, to cut all thoſe Knots and Difficulties which oppoſed him in the Work. At length one Salee Efendi, a Preacher, who had obtained ſome more than ordinary Eſteem with the Grand Signior, adviſed him, That before he commenced a Work of that importance, he ſhould inform himſelf of the true ſtate of that Place, from a certain Aga, who was lately returned from Malta. The Grand Signior being very willing to hear any thing of this nature, called the Aga, who related to him how impregnable both the City and Caſtle were; how the Knights were provided againſt all Aſſaults; that the Iſland it ſelf is only a Rock, not containing Earth enough for an Army to intrench; that the Approaches muſt be made by the Pick-Axe and Mattock, it being all Stone. In ſhort, it was not a place to be taken in one Summer, and the Winter coming on, it affording no ſhelter, nor proviſions of it ſelf, was not capable of relief in Seas ſo ſtormy, and from Countries ſo remote, without hazards, loſſes, and frequent Shipwracks. Ibrahim, who had deſigned all along to make War upon Candia, ſeemed little concerned or moved at this Diſcourſe. The Gallies and Ships which were now all in a readineſs, being come forth to the Seraglio point, 1644. the Grand Signior entered his Grand Chiosk; ſituated on the Bank of the Sea; where the Selictar Aga, General, and all the Chief Commanders, came to perform the uſual Ceremonies of Obedience and Duty before their Departure. At this ſolemn Aſſembly the Grand Signior declared, That his Intentions were to make War upon the Infidels, according as every one ſhould underſtand by his reſpective Commiſſions, which ſhould now be delivered unto them: That he expected the higheſt Demonſtrations of Courage in them imaginable, and what was agreeable to the Conductors of the Ottoman Armies: That Reward and Puniſhment were in his Hands, and that he reſolved to diſpenſe them according to their Merits: That they ſhould not doubt of all due Aſſiſtance and Succours; for he had ſo well contrived, and ſo juſtly fitted all his Meaſures, that he was already provided of Men, Timber, Ammunition, and Mony ſufficient to maintain and carry on this War for ſeven Years. At which they all gave a ſhout, and declared, that they were ready to ſpend their Blood and Lives in Execution of his Commands. Whereupon every one received a rich Coſtan, or Veſt, and the General a Scimitar ſet with Diamonds; who being a young Man of about 26, or 27 Years of Age, had a Council of ſix graver Paſha's allowed him; and then the Commiſſion for the War was brought forth ſealed, with Orders not to open it, until they were paſt the Dardanelli. Hereat the noiſe of great and ſmall Shot from the Gallies and Ships, reſounded through all Conſtantinople, and the Commanders repairing to their Veſſels, the Aſſembly broke up, and every thing was put in a poſture to make Sail.

1645. It was now the laſt day of April, 1645, old Style, when the Fleet firſt broke ground, which conſiſted of 73 Gallies, beſides the 3 Gallies of Barbary; 2 Mahons, or Galleaſſes, one great Gallion called the Sultana, 10 Ships of Alexandria, 2 of Tunis, and 10 of Engliſh and Dutch Ships, which coming to Conſtantinople for Trade, were there preſſed into the Service, with about 300 Saiks and Caramuſſals, which carried Souldiers, Proviſions, Ammunition, and Utenſils for War. Their Militia conſiſted of 7000 Janiſaries, 14000 Spahees, and about 50000 Timariots, and other Souldiers, with about 3000 Pioniers; theſe all were to Rendezvous at Scio; where they arrived the 7th of May. But before their departure from Conſtantinople, the Bailo Soranço, or the Venetian Ambaſſador, thought fit, in Complement, and for diſcovery, to make a viſit to the Captain-Paſha, by whom he was received with frank Courteſy, and aſſurance of Friendſhip; ſo that though he ſuſpected the worſt, yet could he collect no certain aſſurances of Peace, or War; however he adviſed Signior Cornaro, then Governour of Candia, that though he could not certainly penerate into the bottom of the Turks Deſign, yet he apprehended that the Storm might fall on that Kingdom, underſtanding that the Captain-Paſha was not well inclined towards the moſt Serene Republick: wherefore, he ought to be watchful and circumſpect, yet with as little demonſtration of jealouſy as was poſſible; ſo that if the Turks ſhould there arrive, he ſhould afford them all conveniencies of Watering, Proviſions, and other Refreſhments.

The Fleet being departed from Scio, for Napoli di Romagnia, the Northern Wind ſo freſhned, and blew ſo hard, that the Gallies were ſeparated, and forced to put into divers Ports, and the Saiks and Caramuſſals to Anchor at Micono 1645. and Tino. At the latter of which, belonging to the Venetians, they had licence to Water, and and were refreſhed with ſuch proviſions as the Iſland afforded; and now after this flurry of Wind, the Fleet being again united, they were ſeen off at Sea from Cerigo, an Iſland of the Venetians at the Mouth of the Archipelago, and ſailing towards the Channel of Braccio de Maina; and the next day 9 Gallies, a Gallion, and a Brigantine, made towards the Iſle of Cerigo, and ſent a Letter a ſhore by a Boat to the Proveditor, from the Paſha of Rhodes, demanding their uſual preſent of Coffee and Sugar, which was given them, they aſſuring all Friendſhip, and real good Intentions towards the People, and Dominions of Venice.

But in the mean time a Satia laden with Arms and Ammunition from Venice, bound for Retimo, unhappily falling into the Turkiſh Fleet, was intercepted by them, and taken, which unmasked all the Deſign, and made the Turks appear in their true Colours, notwithſtanding all their religious Proteſtations, and outwardly fair Comportment, the uſual diſguiſe of the Mahometan Sincerity.

Towards the end of May the Turkiſh Fleet was diſcovered from Carabuſo, a ſmall Fortreſs of the Venetians, ſome diſtance off at Sea, ſtanding to the Weſtward, which gave ſome jealouſie to them at Candia; and being compared with ſome precedent Acts, as that of ſounding the depth of Water about St. Theodoro with a Brigantine, (which is a ſmall Rock lying off of Canea) which pretended to come from Sancta Maura with Turky Merchants, afforded undeniable grounds of aſſurance to thoſe in Candia, that the War was deſigned againſt them; howſoever, the Ottoman Fleet rendezvouſing again at Navarino, a place far diſtant from Candia, altered their Apprehenſions at Venice, and elſewhere of this War, deeming it now certain, that this Deſign had no other aim or mark but that of Malta.

But this opinion was no ſooner entertain'd, than it was confuted by open Acts of Hoſtility; for the Captain-Paſha being arrived at Cape Colonna, by ſome called Sunio, immediately diſpatched a Brigantine to Conſtantinople, with advice of his Proceedings and Intentions to paſs directly for Candia; whereupon it was thought ſeaſonable to publiſh the War againſt Venice, which was performed with committing the Amballador Soranço to Priſon, and giving Orders through all the Archipelago to deſtroy or enſlave all the Subjects of that Republick. And here the Turk practiſed his uſual beginnings of War with more than ordinary Caution; for though with other Princes, whoſe Territories border on him by Land, he uſually endeavours to ſtrike at the ſame time when he gives the Salutations of Peace; Yet here being to contend at Sea, where he is conſcious his Forces are inferiour to thoſe of Venice, he practiſed all thoſe feigned Artifices, confirmed with as many holy Vows and Proteſtations, as their Religion hallows, and makes lawful, when they can bring advantage and encreaſe to the Mahometan Faith.

But though the Venetian Republick was ſo politick as outwardly to demonſtrate a Religious Confidence of their potent Neighbour, whom they were conſcious not to have provoked by any breach of Capitulations; yet were not ſo ſecure of his Faith, and ſo eaſie to believe his fair Diſſimulations, as not prudently to provide againſt the utmoſt Effects of his Power and Treachery. Wherefore, whilſt the Turk prepared, they armed likewiſe ſecretly, made conſiderable Levies without noiſe, commiſſionated thirty extraordinary Commanders of Gallies, took up ſeventeen Engliſh and Dutch ſhips into their Service, armed out two Galliaſſes extraordinary; and when the Turk had unmasked his Deſign, they then imparted their Condition to all the Chriſtian Princes, craving their Succour and Aſſiſtance to maintain the common Bulwark of Chriſtendom againſt the common Enemy. The Galleaſſes were commanded by Girolamo Moroſini; the Gallies, of which fifteen were made ready, and afterwards put to Sea, all commanded by Noblemen, were under the Conduct of Antonio Capello. Franceſco Molino was made Proveditor General, a Perſon of untainted Juſtice and Honour, and extraordinary zealous and vigilant in the Publick Intereſt, whoſe indefatigable Labours and Care of his Country, promoted him afterwards to be Doge of Venice. By his Order and Counſel, extraordinary Proveditors were ſent to Candia, Cerigo, and Tino, as Places moſt feared, and in danger; and Orders were diſpatched to Andrea Cornaro, then General and Inquiſitor in Candia, to arm out twenty Gallies from the Arſenal of Canea; and to promote this Deſign the better, he hired two Engliſh, and one Dutch Ship, then in Port of Malomocco, to carry unto Candia Timbers fitted, and already ſquared at Venice, for building Gallies; beſides which he ſent Cannon, Corn, and all Ammunition of War, with fifty thouſand Zechins in Gold for encouragement of the Militia, with a recruit of two and twenty Companies of Foot, formed and collected out of divers Nations. 1645.

Intelligence being come of the impriſonment of the Bailo at Conſtantinople, the Senate by a common and unanimous Suffrage elected Franceſco Erizzo, then Doge, General of the Sea; judging, that their Arms would proſper under his Command, which had formerly been ſucceſsful under the auſpicious Conduct of his Anceſtors; and he, though a Perſon of ſeventy four Years, worn out with Age and Cares of the Publick, did yet chearfully conſecrate the remainder of his days to the Service of his Country. But whilſt he prepared to crown the end of his Life with the Glory of this important and generous Enterprize, Death terminated all his Intentions, leaving him with the honourable memory of his paſt Actions, and with a Lawrel hanging over his Head, which had his Life continued, had been planted on his Brows. But that this Accident might not give interruption to the weighty Affairs now in hand, Molino took his place, and proceeded in his Voyage and Deſigns, and arrived with the Venetian Fleet at the Iſland of Corfu. In the mean time the Turkiſh Fleet careened and fitted themſelves at Navarine with all Neceſſaries to aſſault Candia; in which interim advice came to Canea, that the the Bailo was impriſoned at Conſtantinople, by a Letter from Soranço himſelf; which he had dropped from the Window of his cloſe reſtraint, and diſpatched by one of his Confidents with a Veſſel expreſs; which was not ſooner arrived, than it was that Night confirmed by all the Beacons or Watch-Towers of the Country; who having diſcovered the Turkiſh Fleet far diſtant at Sea, gave a general Alarm by the Fires they made.

The next Morning being the $\frac{23}{13}$ of June, they diſcovered the whole Fleet, near Cape Spada, which being drawn up in the form of an half Moon, took up a vaſt tract of 1645. Sea; and ſailing ſlowly with fair Weather, and a ſmooth Sea, diſplayed themſelves with the greateſt terrour imaginable to the Iſlanders. At length the lighter Veſſels began to edge in with the Bank of Gogna, (which is a place diſtant about eighteen miles from Canea) and were followed by the groſſer and heavier part of the Armata.

And now, before I proceed farther, I ſhould make a pauſe, and deſcribe the Antiquity, the Geography, and the preſent State of this famous and renowned Iſland, but that is already performed ſo diſtinctly and elegantly by other Pens, that it ſhall be ſufficient for me to declare here in brief terms, how this Kingdom became the Patrimony or Poſſeſſion of Venice. In the Year 1204, a Sale thereof was made to this Republick, by the Marqueſs Bonifaccio of Montferratto, by an Inſtrument ſealed the 12*th* of Auguſt at Adrianople, and ſigned, and delivered, in the preſence of Marco Sanudo, and Ravano du Verona, Ambaſſadours in the time of Enrigo Dandola Doge; but the People of this Iſland not conſenting unto the ſale, oppoſed themſelves againſt it, until the Venetians by force of Arms procured their Obedience, and confirmed their purchaſe by a double Title. Hereupon ſuch noble Citizens as adventured their Lives in this acquiſition, obtained the Eſtates of the Rebellious Greeks, being obliged in proportion to the Lands they held, to maintain Men and Horſe at their own Charge, and are therefore called the Feudatary Cavalry. So that the whole Country is divided into three parts; viz. the noble Venetians or Cavalry; ſecondly, the noble Candiots, or Colony, which were Infantry that came to inhabit from Venice; and thirdly, the Greeks or Natives of the Country which never rebelled, but took part with the Venetian State: the firſt two ſpeak Italian, and are of the Roman Church; the others ſpeak Greek, and conſerve the Right of that Religion.

The Ottoman Fleet now touching the Shoar at Gogna, took Livery and Seizin quietly of that flouriſhing Iſle of Candia, where they Encamped a while to refreſh their Forces, and prepare all things in order to their Conqueſt. In the mean time, the news hereof alarmed all Venice, and not only haſtened them in the expedition of their Fleet, but warmed their applications to all Chriſtian Princes, from whom they craved help in the general defence of Chriſtendom: which ſome at firſt imagined would have been granted, as it was once in the time of the Holy War; or that thoſe whom the Declaration of a common Cruſada, or Devotion, or ſenſe of Religion could not move, yet at leaſt the conſideration of their Countries Defence, or the maintenance of a Bulwark of Chriſtendom, might perſwade to wage Arms againſt the Turk, as a Common Enemy: but what cold Apprehenſions the Chriſtian Princes entertained hereof, both the faint Supplies and Aſſiſtances they adminiſtred, and their bloody and vigorous Wars one againſt another, have abundantly teſtified, to the fatal loſs and ruin of that Country. And though in the beginning there were better hopes, by means of the Pope's earneſt interceſſion with all the Princes of Italy, to whom he ſhewed a fair Example, by uniting his own Gallies with the Venetian Fleet, and amongſt the reſt prevailed alſo with the Republick of Genoua, to employ their Gallies in this Noble Enterprize, which tended to the Glory of God, and the common Safety and Preſervation of Italy: yet that Leaven of vain Punctilio's, which hath ſo often betrayed the Chriſtian Cauſe to the advantage of the Turk, gave a ſtop for ſome time to theſe Proceedings. For before they would enter into Arms, they deſired the Genoeſes, that the right of bearing the Flag ſhould firſt be determined in favour of their Admiral, before that of Toſcany, or Malta: And though the Pope, to take away this occaſion of diſpute, propoſed to have no other Flag worn beſides his own, under which all Italian Princes, without impeachment of their Honour, as Auxiliaries, and Military Adventurers might promiſcuouſly wage War; yet this could not appear ſatisfactory to the Genoeſes, who not only took this occaſion to demand the precedency before Toſcany and Malta; to which the G. Duke (who was not inferiour in State, and ſuperiour in Title) and the Malteſes (who time out of mind, and by Decree of Charles the Fifth, claimed Precedency on the Seas before them) would never aſſent; but alſo thought fit to avail themſelves in this Conjuncture, to obtain from the Pope the Grant of a Royal Court, and that Treatment which is given to Kings, or Crowned Heads. But becauſe theſe Demands ſeemed to contain thoſe Difficulties in them, which could not be granted without the manifeſt diſpleaſure of other Princes, the Pope reſolved to afford what aſſiſtance he could from himſelf, and therefore granted a Levy of a thouſand Foot out of his own Dominions, with free liberty to buy what Ammonition and Proviſions were to be found in the Eccleſiaſtical State, with impoſition of a double Tithe or Tenth on the Goods and Dominions of the Clergy; ſo that theſe Succours of the Pope, and the Auxiliary Forces of Naples, Toſcany, and Malta, under the Command of Prince Ludoviſio, General of the Church, being united to the Venetian Fleet, did ſpeedily compoſe a moſt puiſſant and formidable Force; however, by reaſon of Diſſentions amongſt the Commanders, and other Misfortunes derived from thence, to the Chriſtian Arms, nothing ſucceeded fortunately this Year. For the Turks having gained their landing at firſt without oppoſition, overthrew the Chriſtians in ſeveral ſmall Skirmiſhes, and afterwards forced Canea, the ſecond City of that Iſland, which they took with much blood and ſlaughter of the Chriſtians.

1646. The Turks having made ſo ſucceſsful a progreſs this firſt Year, as to poſſeſs themſelves of one of the moſt conſiderable Cities, took Courage to proceed in their Conqueſts; in which they had the fortune to make themſelves Maſters in the next place of Retimo; in defence of which, the General Andrea Cornaro, loſt his Life by a Musket ſhot. Nor more ſucceſsful were the Venetians this Year at Sea; for what with Quarrels among the Commanders, and with their coldneſs and negligence in their Buſineſs, they ſuffered the Turkiſh Veſſels to paſs freely, without giving them that interruption which was very facil to Men reſolute and concerned: Nor was the opportunity which preſented to ruine the Turkiſh Fleet made uſe of, then lying half diſarmed, and ill provided, at the Iſle of St. Theodoro, (which is a Rock oppoſite to Canea) where at that time, it is believed, they might all have been burned, had the occaſion been improved, agreeable to that Advantage which then offered: ſo that towards the latter end of the Year, the General Molino returning Home, either by reaſon of ſome diſtemper, or by revocation from the Senate, which ſeemed to be ill ſatisfied with his ill Fortune, or his ill Management of the Publick Affairs; he was diſmiſſed 1646. from his high Charge. And Gio. Capello, Procurator of St. Mark, was conſtituted in his place.

This Year was remarkable for the ruinous Differences between Sir Sackvile Crow Baronet, our King's Ambaſſador then reſiding at Conſtantinople, and the Turky Company. The Original of which ſeemed to ariſe from the Civil Diſſentions at Home; for ſo unhappy were thoſe Times, and ſo ill affected were Engliſh Minds with Rancour and Malice againſt each other, that this Leaven of Diſcord could not be confined within the Banks of Great Britain and Ireland, but ſeemed to diffuſe it ſelf over the Seas, and as a Contagion, infected the Minds, Goods, and Intereſts of the Engliſh, to what Quarter or Climate ſoever they were tranſported.

In the Year 1638, Sir Sackvile Crow was, with the Conſent and Approbation of the Turky Company, dignified by his Majeſty with the Title and Authority of his Ambaſſador to the Grand Signior. For Maintenance and Support of which, the ſaid Company were to pay him the yearly Sum of five thouſand Zechins, in four equal Proportions, which is above the value of two thouſand Pounds Sterling. And farther, before his departure from England, paid him ſix hundred Pounds Sterling towards the Furniture of his Houſe, Plate, and other Neceſſaries; defraying all the Charges expended for Tranſportation of his Lady, Followers, and Proviſions to Conſtantinople.

Sir Sackvile Crow, from the time of his arrival at the Ottoman Court, until the end of the Year 1645, managed the Affairs of the Company to their general Satisfaction, and with the Eſteem and Honour of the Turkiſh Miniſters, who conſidered him as a Perſon of Courage and Reſolution, and in every way qualified for that Employment.

At length Differences aroſe between this Ambaſſador and the Company, touching the Right and Title to that Benefit which is called || Strangers Conſulage; the firſt pretending to the ſame on a Grant made to him thereof by his Majeſty, and the Cuſtom of Sir Peter Wych, and other preceding Ambaſſadors. The others challenging the ſame, as the chief and principal Means they had to eaſe the vaſt Expences they were at, for maintenance of their Trade and Government; for which they had always contended and ſtruggled with the Power of preceding Ambaſſadors, and which Sir Sackvile Crow himſelf ſeems, by an Article which he had made with the Company to have relinquiſhed to them in theſe words.

|| Strangers Conſulage is 2 in the hundred, in the value of all the goods belonging to Stranger-Merchants, laden on Engliſh Ships, and all other Ships which not being in amity with the G. Signior, ſet up the Engliſh Colours, & come under the Engliſh Protection, as is lawful by our Capitulations.

That during the time of his Employment as Ambaſſador, he would content himſelf with ſuch Allowance from the ſaid Company for his Pains and Care to be taken in their Buſineſs, as is ſpecified in the ſaid Articles, being 5000 Zechins per Annum.

This Right of Strangers Conſulage, is now confirmed to the Turky Company, by virtue of their Charter which his Majeſty was pleaſed, in the Year of his Happy Reſtauration, graciouſly to Renew, Confirm, and Amplify to them; the which was more eaſily granted, by the concurrent Aſſiſtance of the Right Honourable the Earl of Winchelſea, then deſigned for Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople, who on ſome Conſiderations offered from the ſaid Company, aſſented thereunto.

But Matters of a higher Nature than this, inflamed the Accounts and Differences between the Ambaſſador and Company. For firſt, one John Wolfe, at that time Treaſurer at Conſtantinople, becoming Inſolvent for great Sums of Mony, 1646. Sir Sackvile Crow alledged, that thoſe Debts were National, ariſing from the late Changes of State Officers, their extravagant Exactions, and Avanious Practices: and therefore to extinguiſh this Publick Debt, he made a Leviation of one hundred and ten thouſand, nine hundred and fifty Dollars on the Engliſh Eſtates at Conſtantinople and Smyrna, detaining the Companies Ships in thoſe Ports, until the aforeſaid Debt was ſatisfied and cleared. The Ground and Cauſe of which, will more plainly appear by this following Warrant.

Sir Sackvile Crow his Order, dated in Pera of Conſtantinople the 26*th* of January 1645. Directed to all Captains, Commanders of Ships, &c. Prohibiting the lading of any Goods or Eſtate on their Ships.

W*Hereas by the unhappy failings of ſome of our Nations here, and at* Smyrna, and through the many late Changes of this State's Officers, and their extravagant Exactions on us in thoſe Difficulties; and by ſundry other avanious ways, our Nation is brought into a great Debt: For which We, or thoſe, and that Eſtate which ſhall remain on the Place, who, and whatever, in caſe of Exigent, and force of Paiment, when-ever that ſhall happen, muſt (if not otherwiſe provided for) in all probability, and according to the rude Cuſtoms of this State in like caſe, look to be made liable unto. There being at preſent a full and competent Eſtate of the Levant Companies arrived here, and at Smyrna, which as well by the Obligations of their Charter, as by the Laws of England, the ſaid Companies own Inſtitutions and Cuſtoms in caſes of like Nature, ought as well to bear the ſaid extraordinary as ordinary Charges, and ſo pay thoſe Debts, which either are, or ſhall be adjudged and declared to belong unto them. We having taken pains in drawing the ſaid Accompts to a Head, and for diſcovery of the Truth thereof; and (after a Certificate being directed thereon) for the more formal Satisfaction only of the ſaid Company, being advertiſed that ſome of thoſe who with us have had the view, and been preſent at the Examination of the ſaid Accompts, whom it concerns on the Companies behalf to make ſuch Certificate, on our Order; for ſome private Reſpects, make ſcruple to certify the ſaid Debts, as they appeared before us and them: And hearing alſo that the General Ships here in Port, and that at Smyrna, prepare, and make haſte to be gone: In Providence, as well for own ſafety in the Premiſſes, as for that due regard we owe to his Majeſty's Honour, and the Publick Intereſt for the future, We find it requiſite, and hereby order and require, that until the ſaid Debts ſhall be fully declared, and their paiment ſetled by Leviation, and the ſame paid or or undertaken, in, and by ſome ſuch fitting and ſecure way, or ways, as in ſuch caſe is requiſite, and by us ſhall be determined and ſo declared: That none of the Factors of this Scale, or that of Smyrna, by themſelves, or others whoever, after publication hereof, here and there reſpectively, lade on Board either of the General Ships, or other Ships whatever, any Goods, Faculty, or Eſtate whatever, for themſelves or other whoever. And that the Captains and Commanders of the ſaid Ships, in the mean time, and until Our farther Order in this behalf, not only forbear to take in, and lade aboard either of their Ships any ſuch Goods or Faculties for any of his Majeſty's Subjects, or other Strangers whoever; but alſo that they abide and depart not, either this Port, or that of Smyrna *Reſpectively, until our farther Order and Licence in that behalf: Whereof not only the Merchants, Factors, Maſters, and Commanders aforementioned; but our * Druggermen, and other Under-Miniſters here or there, are to take notice, and obſerve accordingly; as they, and every of them concerned herein, will anſwer the contrary at his or their Peril. Dated in* Pera of Conſtantinople this 26th of January, 1645.

* Interpreters.

To all Captains, Commanders of Ships, Merchants, Factors, Druggermen, and all other his Majeſty's Subjects and Miniſters whoever, in the Ports of Conſtantinople and Smyrna.

SACKVILE CROW.

The Turkie Company was altogether unſatiſfied with this Leviation, alledging that a great part of this Debt aroſe from Monies lent by Sir Sackvile Crow himſelf to Wolfe, at a high Intereſt; for ſecuring of which, and of his Principal, he had in this manner taxed and charged their Eſtates. But Troubles and Differences ended not with this Paiment; for ſtill the Controverſy about Strangers Conſulage was depending, which with other Matters, cauſed great Heats and Animoſities on both ſides: So that ſome of the Turkie Company, Men of the better Principles, thought it moſt adviſable to Petition his Majeſty to conſtitute another Ambaſſador, with Letters of Revocation, to recal this; but others, who were the zealous Men of thoſe Times, who had taſted the ſweetneſs of Sequeſtrations, and proved it to be the Grand Catholicon of all Remedies, perſwaded that his Eſtate ſhould be Sequeſtred. This, I ſay, may perhaps have been the attempt of ſome few; though the generality of the Company have ſo far diſavowed the Seizure of his Lands and Eſtate in England, that they declared themſelves ignorant of any Eſtate he had there. Howſoever this Apprehenſion being fixed in the Mind of Sir Sackvile Crow, he proceeded to ſtrange Extremities againſt the Company: For he not only cauſed all the Goods and Monies belonging to them, within the Grand Signior's Dominions, to be ſequeſtred and ſeized by his Agents, but alſo impriſoned the Perſons of all the Engliſh Merchants and Factors which were conſiderable, either at Conſtantinople or Smyrna. The Particulars of all which will appear with more clearneſs by this following Warrant.

Sir Sackvile Crow his Second Warrant; dated in Pera of Conſtantinople the 30th of April 1646, directed to John Hetherington, Lorenzo Zuma; Enordering (upon falſe Pretences) the Sequeſtration of the Merchants Eſtates at Smyrna, according to a Schedule.

WHereas the Levant Company, ſometime before our coming to this Place, by a Court of their Aſſiſtants, thereunto eſpecially authorized, treated with Us touching a yearly Allowance for our Care and Pains during our reſidence here as his Majeſty's Ambaſſador; to be had and taken in ſuch Particulars as might have relation to their Trade and Occaſions: And for a concluſion of ſuch Treaty as aforeſaid, did offer unto us the election of any one of their Agreements, formerly made with any of our Predeceſſors in like occaſion. And for a further manifeſtation of their ſincerity in their ſaid Offer, upon our accord thereunto, did, at the Court aforeſaid, in publick give into our Hands and Poſſeſſion the Copies of five of their Agreements, made with our ſaid Predeceſſors, with Power to chuſe which of them we ſhould beſt like of, to be a Rule and Pattern for an abſolute Concluſion and Condition to be drawn up between us and them; thereon alſo promiſing that they would make, grant, and confirm the like unto us. And whereas we thereon, and to the Purpoſes and Ends aforementioned, choſe and fixed upon that Agreement, which the ſaid Company had made with Sir Thomas Glover, formerly Ambaſſador, Reſident for the Crown of England, with this State: And his Majeſty by his Favour, did aſſure the ſame unto us, graciouſly promiſing to make his Employment of us here, as good and beneficial in all the Allowances and Perquiſites thereof, as it had been to any of our Predeceſſors whoever, and we expected no leſs. The ſaid Company finding themſelves miſtaken in their Offer, (as they pretended) firſt retired from the ſame, denying their ſaid Agreement, (though ſufficiently proved before his Majeſty); and then by force of Preſents and Mony given under-hand to the Officers of that Time, ſo prevailed againſt us, that we could not only not obtain that Right, which ſince hath appeared unto us, and (as well by their own Agreement, as by his Majeſty's Judgment then, Cuſtom, and their former Contracts) was due unto us; but were forced after to other Agreements with the ſaid Company, by which (over and above all ſuch Rights, Priviledges, and Perquiſites, as then were and ſhould be granted unto us by his Majeſty's Capitulations; and beſides all other Gratifications and Allowances accuſtomed to be given to his Majeſty's Ambaſſador, (which in Houſhold Proviſions only the ſaid Company aſſured us, were to the value of 800 l. per Annum Sterling, at leaſt) and over and above ſuch Plate and Houſhold-Stuff as they aſſured us, we ſhould find of theirs here, and hold to our uſe during our Reſidence, (of which we found not the value of an Aſper) the ſaid Company did covenant with us, (for and in reſpect of our Pains and Care only therein agreed to be taken by us, in their Affairs and Occaſions as aforeſaid, for and during all our time as his Majeſty's Ambaſſador with this State) they would pay, or cauſe to be paid unto us, the Sum of 5000 * Chickeens per An. to be paid by equal Proportions quarterly before-hand; by their failing wherein (beſides our other Engagements for them to a very good Value) twenty and five thouſand Dollars or thereabouts, reſts at this day due and unpaid unto us: And whereas alſo after the Agreements aforeſaid, upon ſeveral Arguments held before his Majeſty, concerning the Rights of that Conſulage, which amongſt other things is granted by the Grand Signior, and payable by his Capitulations to his Majeſty's Ambaſſador Reſident at this Imperial Port from Strangers, (to which the ſaid Company could ſhew no likely or probable Title) the ſaid Company were adjudged to relinquiſh their Pretences to the ſaid Conſulage; and a Grant thereof under his Majeſty's Royal Hand and Signet, was thereon made and given to us, for our better ſupport during the time of our Reſidence here. The ſaid Company (upon Conditions between them and us agreed) did alſo promiſe to give us Content therefore; with intent nevertheleſs thereby to get advantage of our credulity and abſence, and to draw us out of ſuſpect of their evil Intentions towards us, which hath ſince (as well by their ſeveral interruptions and hinderances here in the Collection thereof, as their practices, and endeavours at Council Table before his Majeſty, and by their other Appeals to the Courts of Parliament, where in theſe Times of Diſtractions, they preſumed of ſome better advantage) hath appeared unto us: Whereby, and by ſuggeſting ſeveral Untruths againſt us, and by other falſe ways they have endeavoured not only to deprive us of the Strangers Conſulage, and benefit thereof; but under that colour alſo, and theſe their Pretences, to keep themſelves from paying, as us from taking ſuch other Conſulage, as was, and is as much our right and due unto us from themſelves, by the ſaid Capitulations, and the Grand Signior's Grant thereon, for all their own Goods traded in: And now of late, but ſuſpecting our juſt Intentions of making a claim thereto, (for until this preſent day we never made any demand thereof, or publick pretence therein) to prevent what they ſuppoſe we might juſtly do in our own Right, (for we take God to Witneſs we knew no other cauſe): under like unjuſt and ſcandalous Pretences, we are certified, that they not only go about to get us removed from our Employment here, but upon falſe Suggeſtions, looſe and bare Suſpicions only, have gotten Order for the ſeizure of all our Lands and other Eſtates in England into their power; as ſome of their own Servants and Factors here have the confidence to report and affirm: and as we are aſſured from thence, without hearing of us; nay, ſo much as intimation to us of the Grounds thereof, or ſuch Matters and Things as they pretend at leaſt to have againſt us, whereby we might anſwer for our ſelves; and ſo, whilſt we are labouring (as for theſe many Years we have done, with all fidelity) for them and their publick Intereſt (whereof, as we have proof ſufficient in our Actions, ſo we have him that is Judg of the World for Witneſs to our Conſcience) they are contriving the ruin of us and our Poſterity. Which manner of proceeding, ſo unjuſt, horrid, and odious before God and Man (as in all reaſon we ought) taking to heart, and our ſerious conſideration, and as well that Violence which is offered to the Laws, and his Majeſty's Honour and Intereſt therein, as our Self and our Family; not pretending to extend that Authority which his Majeſty hath put into our Hands to unlawful Ends, but only to make a juſt uſe of it for the right and lawful defence of our ſelves and it, in the ſeveral Occaſions aforementioned; finding by Accompt under the Hands of the Treaſurer of the ſaid Company here, that for ſuch Goods as they have brought in and carried out from the Port of Conſtantinople, there is due unto us according to the Capitulations, and the Grand Signior's Grants therein, to the value of Dollars Ryals of $\frac{8}{8}$, ſeventy four thouſand: and that for the like in Smyrna there is due Dollars Ryals of $\frac{8}{8}$, one hundred thouſand in circa; and rating that Eſtate in Land which they have gotten into their power as aforeſaid, but at the value we were offered for it, viz. at ninety ſeven thouſand and five hundred Dollars; in all, two hundred ſeventy one thouſand and five hundred Dollars. Beſides, (for ought we know to the contrary) they may elſe have prevailed themſelves upon of ours, and as due to us by Privy Seal to the value of one hundred thouſand Dollars; and Leaſes under the Great Seal to near as great a value more. We hereby enorder Sequeſtration of all Monies, Merchandizes, and other Goods and Faculties whatever, within the Dominions of the Grand Signior whereever, belonging to the Parties and Members of the ſaid Company, in the Schedule hereunto annexed, the chief Fomentors, Contrivers, and Abettors of theſe unjuſt and horrid Proceedings; requiring you, John Hetherington, and you Lorenzo Zuma, or one, or both, or either of you, by the help and

* VIII ſterling.

1646. and means of that Officer ſent by the Vizier, and thoſe Commands in your Hands, (being now at Smyrna on other like Occaſions) according to your Inſtructions herewith ſent, to board and enter all Ships and Veſſels, and to break open, and enter into all and every of the Houſes, Ware-houſes, Counting-houſes, of all and every of the Parties in the Schedule hereunto annexed and aforementioned; and there to Attach, Arreſt, and take into your cuſtody and poſſeſſion; and as arreſted and ſequeſtred, to take, carry away, and put into ſafe cuſtody, all ſuch Monies, Merchandizes, other Goods and Faculties of what Nature ſoever that you ſhall diſcover, find out, and get into your power, belonging to any of the Parties, or under the Marks of the Schedule hereunto annexed; and the ſame to keep, ſo arreſted and ſequeſtred, for our better Indemnity, Satiſfaction, and Defence, againſt all Pretences of the Levant Company beforementioned whatever, until we may be heard therein by due courſe of Law, and till farther Order from us in that behalf; for which this is to be your Warrant. Dated in Pera of Conſtantinople, this 30th of April, Anno. 1646.

To our loving Friends and Servants, John Hetherington, and Lorenzo Zuma.

Sackvile Crow.

To perform and put in execution the foregoing Warrant, it was neceſſary to make uſe of the Turkiſh Officers Power and Authority: Wherefore Sir Sackvile Crow demanding Audience of the Grand Vizier, and repreſenting Matters unto him in that manner, as he judged moſt agreeable to his Cauſe, was heard by him with a gentle and gracious Ear; and aſſurances made to him of all Reſpect, Favour, and Aſſiſtance imaginable. For the Turks had now ſmelt out a Cauſe in Tranſaction, which with good improvement might be worth them many Purſes of Mony; and was of ſuch a Nature, as that their Religion, and Doctrine, obliged them to nouriſh, having the proſpect of gaining Mony, and enflaming Chriſtian Diſcord. On theſe Grounds Sir Sackvile Crow eaſily obtained Commands from the Vizier, directed to the Kadi of Smyrna, to act all things according to direction of him the Ambaſſador; and to enforce Matters with better execution, a Chaous, or Purſuivant, accompanied with John Hetherington, and Lorenzo Zuma Interpreter, was diſpatched to Smyrna, with Commands to carry up the Conſul and Factors to Conſtantinople, and to break open the Warehouſes, and make ſeizure on ſuch Eſtates belonging to the Turkie Company, as would anſwer the Demands and Pretentions of the Ambaſſador. Accordingly the Conſul and Factory were carried up, and with that other of Galata, impriſoned in the Ambaſſador's Houſe.

In the mean time the Agents at Smyrna, with aſſiſtance of the Kadi, ſealed up all the Merchants Ware-houſes; but when it came to execution and Seizure, more Difficulties aroſe; for the Turks, Armenians, and Jew-Merchants, made high Clamours to the Juſtice, that many of the Goods belonged unto them, ſome were not yet paid for, others were only Pawns in the Engliſh Hands; and all the Town being deſirous to favour the Cauſe of the Merchants, a great Uproar and Hubbub aroſe amongſt the People: The Kadi affrighted hereat, grew more ſlack and faint in his Proceedings; but the Cordial of 1500 Dollars, and Gratuities to his Servants, overcame the Difficulties, and gave him new Reſolution; ſo that at length, being attended with the Principal Officers of the Town, he began firſt with the Conſul's Houſe, making Seiſure, and delivering out of the Ware-houſes all the Goods found there; with ſome Caution howſoever, and reſpect to thoſe Pretenſions which Stranger-Merchants made thereunto; as appears by the following Letters.

Joh. Hetherington and Lorenzo Zuma, their Letters to Sir Sackvile Crow, adviſing further of their Proceedings, dated in Smyrna, June 16. 1646.

Right Honourable,

Yeſterday we received your Lordſhips of the 4th preſent, being the Copy of the 3d: And to day we received your Lordſhips's of the 8th, and rejoice to hear your Lordſhip is in ſuch a readineſs for your juſt Demands, and wiſh your Lordſhip leſs Trouble, and better Succeſs than we this day have had, and we doubt for many days ſhall incounter here. This morning the Cadie's Son, with his Neipe and principal Officers came; and we began firſt with the Conſul's Houſe. But before we began, 'twas ſpoken in the Kaddie's own Houſe, and all over the Town, our Deſign to ſeize what we could find; about ſeven a Clock his Son came and entred the Conſul's Houſe, and opened all the Warehouſes, and took from thence, with Elford's and Keeble's, ſome four hundred Clothes, and nine Bales Mohairs; we left behind us 38 Bales of Silk, 13 Bales his Servant pretended were ſold by his Maſter to Mr. Brent, to be paid by Bill of Exchange at Conſtantinople, and when advice came the Bills were paid, the Goods ſhould be delivered; in the mean time they lie in Mr. Lancelot's Warehouſe, with ſome 40 Clothes, 60 Barrels of Tin, which Tin belongs to Mr. Sainthill, and ſealed up by the Neipe and us. Before we had ended at this Houſe, the whole Town was in an Uprore, being fomented by Jews, and ſome of the young Fry left behind, and proclaimed in the Streets, that the Town would be undone, the Trade loſt and go to wrack, if this was ſuffered; ſo that before the Conſul's Door were ſo many of the ſcum of the Town, the Streets were packed thick of them. On the other ſide, a more unruly Enemy threatned worſe things, the Maſter of the Golden Lion, who had before given Barnardiſton 9000

1646. Dollars at Cambio, and had no Goods in his Poſſeſſion, hearing how it would fare with them, Lands forty Men at Barnardiſton's Houſe, and vowed he would have his Mony or Goods, or ſwore he would beat down the Town; ſo likewiſe the Jonas got her Sails to Yards, that the Kaddie's Son and the Chiouz, deſired to let it alone until another day, for fear of worſe Events: So when they had made an end at Lancelot's Houſe, would ſtay no longer, but promiſed to come another day. The Eſtate before mentioned we carried away in ſpight of Envy, and have put it up in a ſafe Cane. As ſoon as this was done, becauſe the Captain would not come aſhore, I got Jordan to go aboard the Golden Lion, and know the Maſter his Intent, and to acquaint him with the Danger might enſue thereon; all we could urge was nothing, except he had ſatisfaction for his 9000 Dollars; at laſt told him, if we knew where his Eſtate lay, we would endeavour to help him to it; ſo he found it out, and we delivered it to him, and the Man was very well ſatisfied. And now we hope to find little Impediment, and to morrow Morning the Caddie's Son promiſeth to come again, and we doubt not the ſame day but to make an end. If your Lordſhip ſaw the little regard theſe People bear to the Grand Signior's Commands, the Caddie, or ought elſe but their private Ends, your Lordſhip would (as we hope your Lordſhip will) not blame us if we procured but the half of what your Lordſhip's Letter mentions. To morrow (if God bleſs us) we ſhall ſend your Lorſhip more punctual Advice, and for the preſent crave leave to ſubſcribe our ſelves,

Smyrna, June 16. Your Honours

and moſt humble Servants,

John Hetherington, and Lorenza Zuma's Letter to Sir Sackvile Crow; dated in Smyrna, June 19. 1646.

Right Honourable,

Ours of the 16th adviſed your Lordſhip, how with the Caddie's Son, his Niepe, and Chia, we had entred the Houſe of Mr. Lancelott, and taken into our poſſeſſion the Goods we found therein, not pretended unto by Strangers; and how by the inſolency of Nicholas Terrick, Maſter of the Hopewell, (formerly the Golden Lion) we were interrupted that day from proceeding any farther; and how by the means of Captain Jordan, we had pacified that young, raſh, and undiſcreet Man; and that we hoped the next Morning to proceed without interruption, but it fell not out ſo: for the next Morning we went to Barnardiſton's Houſe, thinking to make all ſure there; and when we had begun, in comes the Maſter with a Crew of his own, and ſaid, thoſe Goods he had received were not ſufficient to give him ſatisfaction, and demanded of us the reſt. We anſwered, We could not give him theſe Goods we had ſealed up before he came into Port, for what he demanded; but aſſured him, if he knew of any thing ſtanding out, we would endeavour, the beſt we could, for his Satisfaction: Upon this, as we underſtood ſince, a young Man of the Houſe whiſpered the Maſter in his Ear, and told him, if he were not ſatisfied before the Goods went out of the Houſe, all was loſt, he would never have a Penny of it: Upon this, away goes the Maſter aboard, with this young Man in his company, and looſed his Sails, but threatned nothing. Upon this comes in the Jews, and told the Niepe and the Chia, that the Maſter would ſhoot down the Town; but for all our perſwaſions that he durſt not, away runs the Niepe & his Company, and leaves us there alone: ſo we reſolved to have done it our ſelves; but the Merchants had ſo worked with the Hamalls, that there was not one to be ſeen; ſo being alone, and ſeeing his Boat coming aſhore, well mann'd, and fearing a ſurprize, we preſently repaired to the Chiouzes, and deſired him to go with us to the Caddies, to ſee if we could have any better aſſiſtance from him. By this time the Town was in a great Uproar, and the People ſomething too inſolent; the Caddie, to prevent the worſt, preſently cauſed the Shops to be ſhut up, and immediately ſent for all the chief Men of the Town, (who by Preſents before we had made our Friends) and there before them all, and a great company of the Townſmen, cauſed the Commands to be read, and told them how much they were bound to ſee the Grand Signior's Commands put in execution, and what diſhonour it would be for one Ship to command the Town. So after they had diſputed the Buſineſs, the Caddie ſends an Officer aboard (accompanied with the Druggermen to the Nation) to know whether he would hinder the proſecution of the Grand Signior's Command, or no, and to know his Anſwer? He preſently denied he ever intended to ſhoot at the Town, only deſired his own: So preſently after the People were a little appeaſed, we went to work again, and ſo this day have finiſhed all: it being done in ſuch confuſion, we cannot give your Lordſhip that exact Accompt 1646. you may expect within a day or two; for then we will ſend your Lordſhip the Particulars, with the Values; in mean time we ſtand upon our Guard, having ſome 20 or 30 of the Souldiers of the Caſtle to keep watch every night; for (my Lord!) here is no ſmall Hubbub in the Town, and threatning both of us and the Eſtate, but we will ſecure both as well as we can. We have ſent your Lordſhip a rough Draught of what we have, and what we have left ſealed up, and find it fall ſhort far of what your Lordſhip expected: the ſooner your Lordſhip diſpoſes of it, the better; for aſſure your ſelf, there is daily ſome Deſign or other hatching: We ſhould be very ſorry, after all this, to have it miſcarry, therefore pray (my Lord!) diſpoſe of it (to prevent the worſt) as ſoon as you may. Your Lordſhip was pleaſed to inorder us to change our Lodging, being too near the Water-ſide, and in a Merchant's Houſe; which, as ſoon as we can get a ſecure Houſe, we will; but the farther from the Water-ſide, the more dangerous, if the People of the Country ſhould intend us any ill.

The French, and many others, pretend Debts of many of thoſe People that are gone up, and would know who ſhall pay them, and pretend to be paid out of their Eſtates; but we have put them off, telling them, we believe your Lordſhip will hardly let your Eſtate go to pay their Debts; nevertheleſs, ſhall adviſe your Lordſhip of it: ſo have ſecured none, only to one Huzoone Amet Aga, one of the chief Men in the Town here, Mr. Lancelott having given him a Bill of Exchange for 475 Dollars, and the Bill returned unpaid, we were forced to deliver into the Hangee's Hands, for his Security, 10 Cloathes.

We have given the Ships liberty to lade, by reaſon of their continual grumbling, but fear our Deſign on the Jonas will not take; for the Caddie ſeeing the ſtubbornneſs of Terrick, will not aſſiſt us as he promiſed. We have not ought to inlarge at preſent, but to ſubſcribe our ſelves,

Your Honours,

John Hetherington,
Lorenzo Zuma.

Matters running thus high, and the Breach made ſo wide, there remained little hopes of an Accommodation: For now the Merchants at Galata, having obtained their Liberty from the Ambaſſador's Houſe, by the Vizier's Command, entred into a Conſultation in what manner to govern their Affairs, electing ſome particular Men to that Employment, which they called by the Name of the Sealed Knot, which much provoked the Anger of Sir Sackvile Crow, and more, becauſe that deſerting his Protection, they made Applications to the Heer Coppes, Agent for the States of Holland; who readily embraced the defence of their Cauſe, and willingly repreſented to the Grand Vizier the Aggrievances, and ill Treatment of which they complained. The French Ambaſſador, on the other ſide, being a great Favourer of Sir Sackvile Crow and his Proceedings, aſſiſted him both at Smyrna and Conſtantinople. All which will more particularly appear by the following Letters.

The Factors General Letter to the Levant Company, dated the 28th of June, 1646, in Conſtantinople.

Right Worſhipful,

SIrs, at preſent we have our Heads and Hands full, and all little enough to preſerve your Eſtates from devouring, and our ſelves from that Evil Conſequence might enſue upon ſuch unheard-of Proceedings and Intentions, as have been long in private agitation; but when the Monſter came to the Birth, there wanted ſtrength to bring forth; ſo, in a good hour we may ſay, the Snare is broken, and doubt not the Devices of the Crafty is fruſtrate by him, whoſe Almightineſs ſhews it ſelf moſt, when we Mortals are leaſt capable to help our ſelves. We ſhall, according to our Obligation, give your Worſhips ſome account of the laſt Progreſſions of his Lorſhip Sir Sackvile Crow, whom his Majeſty ſent hither Ambaſſador, and to be a Protector of your Eſtates, and our Perſons; how he hath performed this Charge and Duty formerly, your Lorſhips have in part heard; what hath happened of late, we ſhall now chiefly inſiſt upon.

After his Lordſhip had cauſed the ſtay of the Ships in this Port, and at Smyrna, under pretence of this State's requiring it, in reſpect of their Wars with the Venetians, the Sampſon and Smyrna Merchant, having been here almoſt ſeven Months, to the great loſs and damage of Ships and Goods; he picks a quarrel with the Factory of Smyrna, for not complying according to his Order, in the paiment of their Parts of the laſt Leviation-Mony; and hereupon ſends down John Hetherington one of his Servants, a moſt lewd, debaucht, prophane, riotous Fellow, (yet his Lordſhip's Kinſman) accompanied with two Chiouzes, two Druggermen, a Janizary, and other Servants, to proceed with thoſe who ſhould refuſe to pay their Leviation according to the Inſtructions he had given the ſaid Hetherington, and Lorenzo Zuma, Druggerman: But before the arrival of theſe Agents, the Nation there had undertaken the paiment by an Obligatory Letter to his Lordſhip; this would not ſatisfy, nor depoſition of Goods for Security, until Anſwer ſhould come from hence of the paiment of their Bills of 1646. Exchange, which was tendred; but the ſecond day after their arrival, Hetherington and his Retinue goes to the Caddie's, and thither cauſes the Conſul and all the Nation to come; where it was pretended they had laden the William and Thomas with Corn, and ſent her away; and therefore, by virtue of an Imperial Command, (very privately here procured) the Conſul, and ſix more of the Nation, were delivered into the Hands of the Chiouz, and ſo brought up hither, not being ſuffered to return to their own Houſes, but put a day and a night into an offenſive dark place, the Doors and Windows not only ſhut, but nailed upon them, not ſuffering either their Friends or Servants to come at them, or a Window open till the evening, for which alſo they paid Dollars 100. In this diſgraceful manner they were brought hither, where they have been ſince the 22*d* of the laſt Month, Priſoners in his Lordſhip's Houſe to the 21*ſt* preſent, notwithſtanding they had complied in paying the Leviation Monies in leſs than a Week after their arrivals; and by fair Promiſes, put off from day to day, for their diſpatch to their Buſineſs at Smyrna, which could not but much ſuffer by their abſence: Their Magazines and Counting-houſes continued ſealed from the time of their Attachments; the Ships not permitted to lade, or depart, though empty; and no Debts due to them would be paid in this their Abſence and time of Diſtraction.

The Leviation Monies being ſatisfied, (of which Dollars 31000, his Lordſhip forced into Cancellaria); and we of Smyrna expecting no more rubs in the way, his Lordſhip, the 16*th* Inſtant, calls a Court, and there declared, That of what Monies had been collected, there would not remain much on the old Accompt; therefore proviſion muſt be made for the future growing Charge, for ſo much as upon this pretended Imbargo, no Ships would come in haſte, and he and his muſt be maintained, which he would provide for: Hereupon, when we could not do otherwiſe, Dollars 25000 was promiſed, half by this Factory, for which his Lordſhip cauſed us to enter into Bond, as he did thoſe of Smyrna for the other half; this being effected, which we ſhould not neither altogether have been ſo ready to have complied in, but thereby to put a period to all other Demands, and enable our ſelves to proceed in our Buſineſs for your Worſhips better Service.

The 18*th* preſent his Lordſhip calls another Court; and after arguing of ſome General Matters, with a ſeeming ſadneſs, tells us how that he had been wronged by falſe Information from hence and Smyrna, (but he was ſo far from proving it, as that he would not diſcover ſo much as whom he ſuſpected) and thereupon the Levant

1646. Company at Home had, by means of the Parliament, procured Sequeſtration of his Eſtate and Lands in England, and endeavoured to ſurprize his Perſon; and therefore, according to Religion, Reaſon, and common Policy, he ought to ſecure himſelf and his Hoſtages; and thereupon he departed from us, requiring the Nation ſpeedily to reſolve of ſome preſent Satiſfaction that might ſecure his Eſtate at Home, and Perſon here, otherwiſe he vowed to God, he would ſuddenly do it himſelf, with no little diſadvantage to our ſelves and Principals. Theſe ſtrange, unreaſonable, and unexpected Demands, filled us with amazement, not knowing what Anſwer to give to ſuch a groundleſs demand; we deſired the Secretary Signior Dominico to know his Lordſhips more particular Deſires therein, that ſo we might better underſtand him, and to put his Demands into ſuch a moderate way, as he might receive ſome Satisfaction. He returned us Anſwer, that we muſt reſolve to ſatisfy his aforeſaid Demands before we went thence: Whereupon the Gates were ſhut, and alſo Guards ſet upon us, that we ſhould not converſe with any, or convey ſo much as a Paper out of Doors. Thus we are all ſurprized, made cloſe Priſoners, and our Counting-houſe, Ware-houſe, and Chambers ſealed up, to make ſure of our Goods and Eſtates there alſo. Continuing in this ſad Condition all Night, and finding no Motion to proceed from his Lordſhip to declare himſelf farther, four or five of us was appointed by the generality, perſonally to crave his Lordſhip's particular Deſires and Demands of us: Whoſe Anſwer was, That the loweſt value he could put upon his Lands the Company had ſequeſtred, was 25000 pounds Sterling; and for the loſs he ſhould ſuſtain by being put out of the Ambaſſadorſhip, which he ſaith his Majeſty hath granted him for his Life; therefore the Strangers Conſulage he rates at Dollars 5000 per Annum; which for the clear Gain of ſeven Years to come, is Dollars 35000; for which he declared that he would not accept of any Perſonal Security or Obligation whatſoever, but a preſent diſpoſition of Dollars 160000 in Mony or Goods, into his own hands muſt be made. And if to this we would not condeſcend, he told us, That he at the laſt Sacrament had vowed to God (as he doth now) to ſacrifice his Eſtate, Himſelf, Wife and Children, for the execution of this his abſolute Intent; and till then, neither our Perſons, Eſtates, Ships here, or at Smyrna, ſhould be free. We told his Lordſhip, that finding not any of us had heard of any ſuch Things was (or intended to be) done againſt him by the Company, it would give us great Satisfaction, to ſhew

1646. us thoſe Advices he grounded this Pretence upon. To this no Anſwer was then given by himſelf, but diſmiſſed us, leaving it to our laſt and ſpeedy Reſolution, becauſe he was reſolved to ſtrike home. Immediately after he ſent us word by a ſecond, That he could not let his Honour deſcend ſo low, as to ſhew his Advices to any. This empty Reply, gave us too much reaſon, not only to conclude this to be a feigned Pretence, but made us ſuſpect his Intention and Aim was at all the Nation's Eſtate in the Country; and therefore we returned him this reaſonable and defenſive Anſwer, as your Worſhips will particularly perceive by the incloſed Paper: whereunto is adjoined his Reply to that our Anſwer, as he pretended; tho it appears it was intended before, it being dated a day before our Anſwer. Whilſt thus we continued, it happened that thoſe four of us were fortunately abſent from Court that day, who hearing of our Conditions, wherefore, and why we were thus detained, and what an ill Period theſe Proceedings tended unto, if not timely and prudently prevented; they uſed their beſt endeavours to free us and your Livelihoods from the Claws of Tyranny and Covetouſneſs; they applied themſelves to Signor Illuſtriſſimo Coppes, the States of Hollands Agent: who as he was ever a Friend and Favourer of the Nation, ſo now he gave us good and great teſtimony thereof in this our greateſt Need and Extremity: and chiefly by his means with a Sum of Mony; together with the Clamors of the Jews, and many other of the Grand Signior's Subjects againſt this our preſent Abuſe, and deſtruction of future Trade: The Vizier (whom they had well and fully poſſeſſed with the Truth of all Things) after three days Impriſonment, ſent a Chiouz for us to his Lordſhip's Houſe, from whence we were carried before the Vizier, who much upbraided his Lordſhip, ſaying, He never gave him Commands for ſuch Proceedings, notwithſtanding his Lordſhip's avaneous Allegations againſt his own Nation, by ſaying, an Engliſh Ship at Smyrna was laden with Powder, Ammunition, &c. and there reſided for aſſiſtance of the Turks Enemies; and other the like Abuſes, and deſtructive Courſes againſt thoſe here; tending not only to the confiſcation of Ships and Eſtates, but the riſgo of enſlaving our Bodies, if not the loſs of all or ſome of our Lives, had his Helliſh Plots taken effect. The next day after our general Commitment, arrives five more of our fellow Factors from Smyrna, there ſeized upon and made Priſoners; and ſo by his Lordſhip's Command, in that nature brought to his Houſe, and put amongſt us, notwithſtanding the advice from their Correſpondents hence was at Smyrna, (before their departure thence) that their part of Leviation Mony was all paid in here; yet their Leviation, with one third more in Monies and Goods, was taken again from them by his impudently impious Miniſters there, and all the reſt of their Goods continued ſealed up: So the Intent (as your Worſhips may plainly perceive) was no other than firſt to get the Monies here paid, then to ſeize upon their Perſons, and next to take away and ſecure their Eſtates; thereby to prevent a juſt, reaſonable, and natural Defence; and now it too plainly appears, (becauſe his Lordſhip's Imployers had taken courſe no Meſſengers ſhould come unto us); Horſemen are daily diſpatched unto us by our Friends at Smyrna, adviſing us to the 20*th* Inſtant, of the unnatural and devouring Progreſſions they had there made; which was done by the aſſiſtance of the Caddie, whom they had well bribed, beginning to act there at the ſame time as we were here all impriſoned; ſo there was no intent of ſtaying for our Anſwer to his extravagant Demands. They firſt fell upon Mr. Lancelot's Houſe, thence proceed all throughout the Nation; ſo that they have not only taken away all the Goods, Monies, and Effects whatſoever they could find in their Houſes, at Home or Abroad, but broke open and ranſack'd all our Chambers, Trunks, and Counting-houſes, which mounteth to a far greater value than his demands of Dollars 160000; and by large Promiſes to Informers, endeavour to diſcover and take what is owing them abroad by People of the Country; and have ſo threatned our Friends and Servants to deliver our Books, and declare where's more of our Eſtates, that they are conſtrained to leave our naked Houſes to the open World, and betake themſelves to the Ships in Port for Refuge. All this it ſeems contents them not, but are contriving Proviſions, by policy and force of ſome Rogues of the Country, to unlade what Goods the Nation had put on board the Jonas. For all which, we have not only the advice of our diſtreſſed Friends there, but ſuch infallible Information, as your Worſhips may perceive by the incloſed authentick Copies of Letters from his Inſtruments at Smyrna to his Lordſhip here; by which you will too plainly perceive his Lordſhip did, and ſtill doth aim at all the Eſtate the Nation had in the Country; and for that cauſe he was ſo much enraged for the departure of the Hercules, and William and Thomas, whoſe Goods he eſteemed as ſo much loſs to him.

We have been now ſeven days out of his Lordſhip's hands, and are endeavouring to free that Eſtate they have already taken at Smyrna, as alſo to defend

1646. our Selves and your Eſtates in future from him, and free the Ships out of Port, (which no queſtion at laſt will be proved have been detained by his Lordſhip to this ill purpoſe) and if poſſible, to procure the return of Dollars, 20 in 30000, his Lordſhip hath unavoidably forced from us in the Leviation Accompt, upon ſtrange Pretences. All which (by the aſſiſtance of our obliged and worthy Friend Signior Illuſtriſſimo Coppes; together with the expence of Dollars 30 in 40000, to the Vizier and other Turkiſh Miniſters) we doubt not but ſpeedily to effect; for without this honeſt defenſive Remedy, we can expect nothing but ruin to all your Eſtate in the Country, which ſtill he threatneth, and endeavours by all his deviliſh Policy and Means to effect: But the Vizier, and the two Caddeleskiers, who are our Judges, are ſo poſſeſt with the Truth and Reaſon of our Cauſe, as well by the People of the Country, as our Selves, that they have given us full aſſurance, by Promiſes, Proteſtations, and ſound Probabilities, that our juſt Demands ſhall be accompliſhed; for which we all faithfully and earneſtly endeavour Night and Day, and ſo do hourly expect a good determination of it: and till there be an Iſſue or Settlement given to this our confuſed Condition, (which we hope will not continue for many days) no particular Principal muſt expect Advice from any Factor here, becauſe no private Man can fitly adviſe any thing, till the general Buſineſs be better ordered: And as we proceed therein, we ſhall by all Ways and Conveyances give your Worſhips a true and exact Account. We do humbly beſeech your Worſhips to acknowledg the good Offices of the State's Agent to their Ambaſſador with you, and ſo fully certify him, that Illuſtr. Sign. Coppes appeared no ways againſt his Lordſhip as Ambaſſador, or trenching on the King's Honour, but reſpectfully and modeſtly for the ſafety of your Eſtates.

To particularize all Paſſages and Circumſtances in this Buſineſs, would prove more troubleſom than needful to your Worſhips, ſo pleaſe to accept of this Relation; for this is the preſent ſtate of yours and our Condition; which though not ſo well as we could wiſh, yet better than we could imagine; for the Hand was up, the Match lighted, and a little more time would have blown up all. We need not put your Worſhips in mind ſpeedily to ſend us another Protector, ſeeing the Neceſſity of your Occaſions craves it too plainly; and in confidence of your ſpeedy Reſolution thereof, we ſhall continue, hoping our Deſires will be ſatisfied, and the Eſtates in better ſecurity, by his ſpeedy arrival here, which God in Mercy grant.

1646. His Lordſhip's Cauſe is ſo bad, that Signor Dominico your Secretary, Signior George, and all other Druggermen, have not only declined his Lordſhip, but apply themſelves to us, (and eſpecially the former). In fine, we conceive his Lordſhip finds his former bad Proceedings have made him uncapable to return into England, and alſo uncertain of his Reſidence here; which, together with the improvident uſe he hath made of his Golden Time, that he intended to ſeize upon all He and his unworthy Inſtruments could catch hold of; for to this purpoſe he diverted the Golden Fleece's advantagious Deſign for Venice; which at firſt was approved and cauſed by his own conſent; and occaſioned her Factor here, to whom ſhe was conſigned, to let her him to fraight, that ſo Himſelf, Family, and undue gotten Eſtate, may be conveyed (as is ſuppoſed) into France, with whoſe Ambaſſador, there hath been often a more than ordinary correſpondency of late.

Galata of Conſtantinople,
June 28. 1646.

Before the ſealing up of our Letter, we have procured an Imperial Command for the recovering of the Eſtate into our Hands, taken away at Smyrna; as alſo for the attaching the Perſons, and bringing thoſe good Agents of his Lordſhips hither, to anſwer their Proceedings and Behaviour: the obtaining of which Command, we are not a little glad of, being our Obligatory Teſtimony of the Vizier's being our Friend, and ties him thereby to continue ſo, which we hope effectually to find, two days hence, when his Lordſhip is to appear with us before him; but in caſe he refuſeth (as already he hath done) the Vizier will give Sentence againſt him.

Your Worſhips may be pleaſed to take notice, that his Lordſhip's chief Counſellor, in theſe his undue Proceedings, is Mr. Henry Hyde, of whoſe good Service in your former Occaſions at the Morea, we need not to give teſtimony; but can aſſure your Worſhips, that ſince his coming hither, he hath occaſioned great Diſturbance among the Nation; and now at laſt (had the Deſign before mentioned taken effect) might have raiſed his decayed Fortunes, by the ruin of Yours and our Eſtates; but, thanks be to God, the Counſel of Achitophel is turned into Folly. And for your late Treaſurer John Woolf, the ſatisfying of whoſe Debts hath ſo mounted the laſt Leviation, he is ſo far from acknowledging the Courteſies done in acquitting him from his Creditors, that he is become Aſſiſtant (though a weak one) to his Lordſhip in the Proceeding aforementioned: And having deſerted Galata, with Mr. Henry Hyde, 1646. Hyde, reſides at his Lorſhip's, laying their Heads together in contriving Miſchief againſt thoſe from whom they have had their Maintenance.

In caſe your Worſhips ſhould not be in a poſture to procure an Ambaſſador ſo ſoon as you may deſire, that you would pleaſe in the interim, and as ſoon as may be, to obtain a Letter from his Majeſty to the Grand Signior, or Vizier, in approbation and acknowledgment of what is done; and that his Lordſhip be not nimbler than your Worſhips in getting the like againſt us, which doubtleſs he will endeavour. We ſhall not farther inlarge at preſent, but intend ſhortly, when all things ſhall be fully and abſolutely ſetled, to write to your Worſhips again. So we reſt.

At Inſtant a Copy of his Lordſhip's Letter, with others directed to him, being come to hand, we ſend them herewith; and from Smyrna are adviſed that the Perſons of Hetherington and the Druggerman are detained aboard our Ships there; and by this time the Command is with them, which will warrant the bringing them up with their Papers, that are alſo aboard; by which the Plot will more plainly appear. To morrow we expect his Lordſhip's appearance before the Vizier, when we have hopes to reward the Trouble he intended others, &c.

July, 1646.

The Factors General Letter from Smyrna, dated the 4th of July, 1646, to the Levant Company.

Right Worſhipful Sirs,

IT may pleaſe you, our laſt from hence was by the Ship William and Thomas, adviſing his Lordſhips Proceedings for another Leviation, for diſcharging your Debts at Conſtantinople, being then informed that the whole amounted unto Dollars 118109; and how we were reſolved to withſtand it, until your Worſhips further Pleaſure ſhould be ſignified unto us concerning the ſame, for ſuch Reaſons as we then preſumed to lay open unto you; and that in the mean time we had preſented our Grievances to his Lordſhip's gracious peruſal, the Copy whereof went annexed to our ſaid Letter, to both which you may pleaſe to have reference.

The 24*th* of March following, our Conſul called a Court, and declared his Lordſhip's Anſwer to our ſaid Letter, diſliking our Proceedings; and by a new Order prohibited the lading of Goods, and receiving them on Board, and the departure of Ships, until the ſaid Leviation were paid, according to his former Order, and Schedule now ſet down, ſhewing each Man his proportionable part for his Factory of Smyrna, amounting in all to Dollars 54950, and for the Factory at Conſtantinople, to Dollars 56000, is together Dollars 110950. Whereupon, we generally deſired that his Lordſhip would be pleaſed to ſuſpend the execution of the ſaid Order of Leviation, until ſuch time we ſhould receive your Worſhips farther Order about it, without which we our ſelves were like to pay it out of our own Purſes, as in the laſt Leviation; receiving ſince particular Orders from ſome of our Principals, not to pay any Leviations, otherwiſe it ſhould be for our own Accompts, and not theirs.

The 24*th* of April, the Conſul called another Court, ſignifying unto us, that his Lorſhip did require an account for the departure of the Ship William and Thomas, and Succeſs, contrary to his Lordſhip's Commands, there being an Officer of the Vizier's come down to apprehend Captain Tho. Porter, and to carry him up to Conſtantinople, (which Ships departed at their own pleaſures, being not in our powers to ſtay them). And that concerning the Leviation it was inevitable, and his Lordſhip was reſolved upon it, and therefore would force us unto it, and expect repair of Honour from the Delinquents. Whereupon fearing his Lordſhip's farther diſpleaſure, which might beget ſome greater Inconveniences amongſt us, we preſumed to yield unto his 1646. Lordſhip's Commands, by way of a ſubmiſſive orderly complyance, and conform our ſelves unto the paiment of our parts of the ſaid Leviation, in proportion to the Eſtates were received on the laſt general Ships, Hercules, Sampſon, and Smyrna-Merchant, according to our particular Aſſeſſments; as appeareth by our general Letter preſented to his Lordſhip, and entred in Cancellaria, grounded upon the reſult of this days Court; deſiring his Lordſhip would be pleaſed to allow us four Months time for paiment, for ſuch Reaſons as we have alledged in the ſame.

The 6th of May, the Conſul told us he had received other Letters from his Lordſhip, prohibiting not only the Lading of Goods, and the Departure of any Ships, until the Leviation be ſetled; but alſo therein more fully ſignifies and declares, That until the Grand Signior's Fleet be gone forth, he cannot permit any Ship, either at Conſtantinople, or here, to lade or be diſpatched; and that accordingly his Lordſhip is ſo required of this State. And in like manner hath ordered and commanded thoſe whom it concerns, both above, and in this Port, to obſerve the ſame. And moreover farther witneſſing, which accordingly (as he ſaid) he was bound to acquaint us, how that the Embargo at Conſtantinople, and here, was ſeconded; and his Lordſhip, to avoid farther Dangers and Inconveniences to the Publick, could not refuſe his Conſent thereunto.

The 10th of May arrived here Mr. John Hetherington, a Servant to his Lorſhip, and Signior Lorenzo Zuma a Greek, one of his Lordſhip's Druggermen, from Conſtantinople; who the next Morning moved our Conſul to call a Court for the Nation; where being aſſembled, the Conſul told the ſaid Hetherington and Lorenzo, That their Deſires were performed, and therefore required them to deliver what they had in Commiſſion from his Lordſhip: who produced an Order of the 27th of April, directed to the Conſul and Us, for paiment of the ſaid Leviation forthwith, or elſe to proceed according to his farther Order, Warrant, and Inſtructions in ſuch behalf; and we to be anſwerable to ſuch Loſs, Damage, and Inconveniencies as may enſue thereby. To which we anſwered, That the Leviation was ſubſcribed unto, and therefore deſired the ſaid Hetherington and Lorenzo to ſtay four or five days, until his Lordſhip ſhould return Anſwer to our Letter of the 24th of April. The ſaid Lorenzo told us, He would retire and peruſe his Lordſhip's Commiſſion, and in two hours return, to have a more full and ſatisfactory Anſwer from us: which being expired, he declared, That his Lordſhip's Commiſſion required forthwith ready Mony or Goods, (being his Inſtruction, from which he could not vary). 1646. Whereupon Mr. John Lancelot firſt anſwered, (as he was a Merchant) He could not depoſit his Cloth, for his Credit's ſake, but would give his Bills for his and Mr. Dixwell Brent's proportionable part of the Leviation, payable at Conſtantinople per Mr. Thomas Pigot, at five days ſight, into his Lordſhip's Cancellaria; which was refuſed, unleſs they would depoſit the value in Cloth, and one third part more towards Charges, in the poſſeſſion of him the ſaid Lorenzo; which they ſaid again, for their Credits ſake (as they were Merchants) could not conſent unto; ſo referred themſelves unto the ſaid Lorenzo's farther proceedings, if theſe Proffers would not be accepted of, being not poſſible for them at preſent to procure Monies at Intereſt, or otherwiſe.

The like Conditions we all in general proffered for our proportionable parts, but were refuſed by the ſaid Hetherington and Lorenzo. Whereupon the Conſul told them, they had all our Aſſents for paiment of the Leviation; and if that, with ſuch Reaſons and Proffers as we propounded, might not be ſatisfactory, the Conſul, and we in general, referred our ſelves to the ſaid Lorenzo's farther Proceedings.

After this, the ſaid Hetherington and Lorenzo preſently repaired to the Caddies, accompanied with a prime Chiouz of the Vizier's, and declared their farther Commiſſions: After publication whereof, the Caddie ſent for the Conſul, and all our Nation, where the Capitulations were firſt taken away by Warrant, and the Conſul in a moſt barbarous manner was laid hold on, with Dixwell Brent, Daniel Edwards, John Pixley, Samuel Barnardiſton, George Hanger, and James Moyer, and committed Priſoners into the Cuſtody of the ſaid Chiouz and Officers, and tranſported to a Houſe (taken by them on purpoſe) where they were violently, and in a formidable manner, thruſt into a dark Chamber, and at length were forced to preſent Dollars 300, to have a Window ſet open to give them Light and Air; the Conſul telling the ſaid Hetherington and Lorenzo, before he was ſurpriſed, in the preſence of the Caddies, That neither he, or the Nation, had any ways tranſgreſſed the Grand Signior's, or his Lordſhip's Commands, and that he did not fear what they could do unto him, no not ſo much as to die, in performance of his Faith and Truſt to the Levant Company, whom he had truly ſerved; as likewiſe for his Love and Affection he bore to the Nation here under his Charge, whom he would never betray, hoping ſhortly to ſee his own Country again. And in two hours after, the ſaid Hetherington, Lorenzo, and Chiouz, Caddie,

1646. and Neipe, ſealed up all the Counting-houſes, Magazines, and ſome Chambers; and in two days after, tranſported the Priſoners over-land up to Conſtantinople, where they were delivered to his Lordſhip's Power and ſafe Cuſtody; we in the mean time being left like ſo many Sheep without a Shepherd, and ignorant where to ſeek protection.

The next day after departure of theſe Priſoners, the ſaid Hetherington and Lorenzo ſealed up our Cloth in our own Warehouſes, for what concerned our proportionable part of the Leviation, at the rate of Dollars 45 per Cloth, and one third part more towards Charges.

The 18*th* day of May, at the inſtance of the ſaid Hetherington and Lorenzo, the remainder of us left here behind met together, where the ſaid Hetherington told us we had not brought in our Bills of Exchange for Conſtantinople, for the parts of our Leviation, and one third part more; unto which we anſwered, We had complyed with his Lordſhip's Commands, in all willing and obedient manner, according to our preſent Poſſibilities, until we ſhould be able to ſatisfy the ſame with our ready Monies here, or by our Bills payable in Conſtantinople, at five days ſight, wherein we promiſed to uſe our utmoſt Endeavours, hoping to redeem our Cloth again, which we had depoſited, and they ſealed up, for our proportionable Parts of the Leviation.

In few days after arrived here one of the principalleſt Chiouzes of the Grand Signior, with new Commands ſent down by his Lordſhip; by virtue whereof the ſaid Hetherington and Lorenzo ſeized upon the Perſons of John Ball, Henry Davey, Phillip Farwell, Nathaniel Barnardiſton, and John Ingoldsby, who were committed Priſoners to the ſaid Chiouz, who uſed them with ſome humanity, and ſent up the next day to Conſtantinople, to be delivered unto his Lordſhip's Power; after whoſe departure (all Law being ſet aſide) the ſaid Hetherington and Lorenzo by this Command came down, opened all our Warehouſes, and by Violence carried all our Goods away into ſeveral Canes of the Turks; as well what they had ſealed up, for the Leviation, as all other Goods of what nature ſoever they could find, unleſs it were ſuch as was ſealed up, and belonged to Turks, and other of the Grand Signior's Subjects; and left many of us ſo bare, that we had not wherewithal to afford us a piece of Bread to keep Life and Soul together, only bare Promiſes. The ſaid Chiouz remaining behind, put us daily into great Fears that we ſhould all be ſent up, or clapt up here in Priſon, which cauſed many of us to repair on board the Ship for Succour, here being in Harbour the Ships Rainbow, Jonas, Hopewell, and Triangle. 1646.

In all which time of this Diſtraction and Sufferings, our Miſeries have been much condoled by the chief Turks and Inhabitants of this Place, who ſeem to ſympathize with us in our ſad Conditions; and had not the Commands been ſo powerful, the whole Town would have riſen up in our Defence and Protection, who have privately adviſed of theſe Abuſes; which as they themſelves confeſs, are like to ruin, not only this Scale, but that of Aleppo and Conſtantinople alſo, to the Diſhonour of the Grand Signior, and ruin of many of his Subjects; and of a profitable and acceptable Friend (our Nation) to become a potent Enemy againſt them.

The 28*th* of June came Letters from Conſtantinople, adviſing the Vizier's Order for reſcuing both Factories from his Lordſhip's Impriſonment, and particular Advice to ſome of us here left, for apprehending the Perſons of the ſaid Hetherington and Lorenzo, and to keep them in ſafe Cuſtodies on board our Ships, fearing (we having no Order as yet to receive our Eſtates out of their Poſſeſſions) they might convey our ſaid Eſtates away, or ſell them for half their Worth, and ſo make their private eſcapes out of Town, expecting daily a Chiouz to carry up their Perſons to Conſtantinople, and to free our Goods, hoping all will go well again for us. Hereupon the very ſame day, the ſaid Hetherington and Lorenzo, (without any noiſe or rumour) were by the Mariners conveyed on board ſeveral Ships from the ſaid Hetherington's Lodging, viz. Hetherington on board the Triangle, William Hodges Commander; and Lorenzo on board the Hopewell, Nicholas Terrick Commander; where now they remain, to the contentment of the Inhabitants here, who daily expect their ſending up to the Port, there to anſwer to ſuch Crimes and Inſolencies as ſhall be objected and proved againſt them.

Thus we have preſumed plainly and diſtinctly (accordingly as we conceive it becomes us) though briefly, to preſent unto your Worſhips peruſal, the whole Proceſs of his Lordſhip's Proceedings againſt us here in Smyrna, (ſince our laſt) according to our experience of the Paſſages; by which your Worſhips may eaſily conjecture his Lordſhip's farther Intentions. And for what hath occurred at Conſtantinople, your Worſhips will receive by this Conveyance, adviſe to both which we pray you to be referred; which being taken into your deliberate Conſiderations, may afford ſuch future Means of Protection, and incouragement to enter into a way of ſetling this Turky Trade in ſuch a poſture,

1646. poſture, that we hope theſe Loſſes may be repaired with advantage.

And ſo we humbly take our leaves, having given your Worſhips teſtimony of our Concordance, in the diſcharge of our Obligations and Duties; and in conformity we ſubſcribe, evermore reſting,

But not to inſiſt long on a Subject ſo ungrateful, as the Difference was between the Ambaſſador and his Merchants; the Concluſion, and Iſſue of all was this. After Sir Sackvile Crow had ſpent at the leaſt ſeventy thouſand pieces of Eight of good ready Mony, and the Turky Company two hundred thouſand; the Turks finding the Ambaſſador's Exchequer to be almoſt exhauſted, for that Preſents and Purſes of Mony came not in ſo plentifully as at firſt; and on the contrary, feeling the Spring of the Levant Companies Treaſury ſtill to run freſh and quick, their Inclinations towards the Ambaſſador grew more cold and faint, his Agents were not admitted ſo readily to Audience as formerly, nor his Petitions and Addreſſes received with that candor, as when Mony and Intereſt made their entrance eaſy; in the mean time, the Merchants were heard with great patience, their Cauſe and Complaints eſteemed reaſonable; and in ſhort, Sir Sackvile Crow was diſmiſſed from Conſtantinople, in a manner not uſual for Ambaſſadors, nor agreeable to that Quality and Character: and was ſucceeded by Sir Thomas Bendyſh, who was Authorized and conſtituted in that Embaſſy, by Commiſſion from his Majeſty King Charles the Firſt of ever bleſſed and glorious Memory.

1647. Gio Capello being conſtituted General in the place of Molino, as we mentioned at the end of the preceding Year, departed from Venice early in the Spring, having under his Command fifty Gallies, ſix Galleaſſes, and forty Ships of War, and four Fire-ſhips, beſides other Veſſels, which are neceſſary Attendants on ſo great an Armata; which grand Preparations raiſed the Minds of the Chriſtian World to expect the abatement of the Ottoman Pride, and other Effects equal to the magnificent Oſtentation, and triumphing Glory of this mighty Power: But God, who gives not always Succeſs to the Powerful, nor the Battel to the Strong, was not, it ſeems, ſo well ſatisfied for the Sins of Chriſtendom, as to judge it worthy to be delivered from the Scourges of its Grand Oppreſſor.

Whilſt Capello remained with the beſt part of the Fleet at Candia, Tomaſo Moroſini, Admiral of the Ships, ſhewed himſelf in a Bravado with twenty two Sail before the Caſtles of the Helleſpont, called the Dardanelli, defying the whole Turkiſh Power, with Colours flying, and Drums beating: nor did they dare to anſwer the bold Challenge, until in a dead Calm, ſome few light Gallies preſented themſelves in a ſeeming Battel, with whom, for want of Wind, the Ships were on the diſadvantage, and rather received Prejudice than gave it; ſo that both ſides were contented with the Action.

Moroſini withdrew from that Station, and returned to his General at Candia; to whom having joined his Forces, he earneſtly perſwaded him, together with the Proveditor Grimani, to engage the Turkiſh Fleet, which they aſſured him was much inferior to them, both in number of Veſſels, and in Skill and Courage of the Combatants; and that the Succeſs of this Year conſiſted in the cutting off the Enemies Succours, which was their ſole Relief and Dependance, without which they could not longer maintain the Ground they poſſeſſed, but muſt deliver up that and themſelves to their pleaſure. But the cautious General would not aſſent to this Reſolution, judging it over-raſh and precipitate; for that the Fortune of Candia, and other Iſles of the Archipelago, was not to be hazarded on the Succeſs of one Battel.

During which Diſpute, and irreſolution of Affairs, the Turkiſh Fleet, conſiſting of three hundred Sail, arrived at Canea, where they landed forty thouſand fighting Men, which turned the Scale of the War, and rendred the Turks ſo powerful, as not ever more to be expelled, or their Off-ſpring extirpated from the Confines of that Iſland. By this time the Pope's and Malta Gallies were come to their Aſſiſtance, and united with the Venetians; ſo that Capello ſetting ſail from the Port of Suda, reſolved to engage the Enemy at St. Theodoro; which was effected accordingly, though with little Succeſs, for the Turks had fortified themſelves, and ſecured their Gallies with that advantage, that they could not be aſſaulted without great hazard of the Chriſtians; and when they endeavoured to burn them, their four Fire-ſhips took fire too ſoon, and proved of more fear and aſtoniſhment to the Turks (to whom this Invention was as yet unknown) than of real dammage. After this the Venetians returned again to Suda, where having intelligence that thirty Turkiſh Gallies, with Men and Proviſion (which they had collected in ſeveral parts of the Archipelago) were on their Voyage to Canea, Capello preparing to intercept them with a Force of Galleaſſes and Gallies, and leaving Grimani and Moroſini to command the main Body of the Fleet, he in Perſon bent his Courſe towards Cerigo.

In the mean time Muſtapha Paſha departed from Canea, in order to his return to Conſtantinople, with fifty ſeven light Gallies, two Ships, two Galleaſſes, and many Saiks; but meeting in his Paſſage with a hard ſtorm of Northerly Winds, he loſt ſeven of his Gallies, and ſeveral other Veſſels, ſo that he reſolved to divide his Fleet, and ſend part of them to Scio, and himſelf with the other part to make for Negropont. This Fleet was followed by ſome other Veſſels under the Command of Mahomet Celebee, Brother of the Paſha of Algier, who being as far in his way as the narrow Streights of Andra, he was there ſtopped by the Fury of the Northern Winds, (which are the Maſter-Winds of thoſe Seas) and by the impetuous rage thereof, was carried to the Iſland of Zia; where having given Licence to the greateſt part of his Souldiery to Land, they careleſly ſtrayed abroad, and without ſuſpicion of Surprize, merrily paſſed their time in eating and drinking. In the interim, advice hereof being carried to Tomaſo Moroſini, roſini, then with ſome Ships in the Port of Milo, he immediately, without loſs of time, applied himſelf to aſſault the Turks; and being followed by the Proveditor Grimani, he took two of their Ships, whilſt Mehmet Celebee, with about two hundred of his Men, betook themſelves to the weak ſhelter of an old demoliſhed Fort, and afterwards ſurrendred themſelves to the diſcretion of the Conqueror.

Moroſini and Grimani, encouraged with this Succeſs, reſolved to purſue the Enemies Fleet; in order unto which, Moroſini firſt putting out to Sea, was inſtantly carried away by a fierce gale of Wind towards Ambro, and ſeparated from the reſt of his Fleet, and thence again was toſſed by the impetuoſity of the Storms unto Raſti; of which Muſtapha Paſha having Intelligence, made haſte to attack this ſingle Veſſel, with forty Gallies; giving order to the Bey of Rhodes, to lay him aboard with fifteen Gallies, the ſtrongeſt and beſt armed of all their Squadron: Moroſini nothing diſmayed, bearing the ſame conſtancy of Mind in the midſt of his Enemies, as at a diſtance, boldly ſhewed himſelf on the Quarter Deck, encouraging his Men with his words, and by his Example, to Actions worthy their Religion, Faith, and Country for which they contended. The Turks continued for ſome time to batter the Ship at a diſtance with their Cannon, but with little dammage to the Chriſtians; who returned their Shot to better advantage. Hereby the Turks perceiving that Blows given ſo far off did little Execution, reſolved to Board the Veſſel, and ſubdue Her by force of Arms, and being come to the ſide of the Ship, the Souldiers were fearful to enter, ſuſpecting ſome trains of Powder to blow them up, until Emurat, one of the Captains, ſtruck off the Head of one or two of his own Men, whom he perceived backward in the Aſſault, which affrighted the reſt into the greater danger, and forced them to enter the Ship, who were ſoon followed by the Gallies of the Bey of Rhodes, of Milo, of Mehmet Bey, and others; ſo that now two hundred of the Enemy were Combating with Swords and Half Pikes upon the Deck; in which ſtorm, Moroſini fighting amongſt the thickeſt, was ſhot through the Head with a Muſket Bullet, and ſo glorioufly finiſhed his Days in the Service and Defence of his Country; gaining to himſelf a Laurel, and an Immortal Name of Glory and Renown.

Moroſini ſlain.

The Chriſtian Souldiers little regarding all this time the fall of their General, ſtoutly maintained their Fight, in which they received encouragement from the proſpect they had of two Galleaſſes making haſte to their Succour; at whoſe nearer approach, the Turks deſiſted from their farther Attempt; being unwilling to purchaſe a Victory at the dear rate it would coſt them.

The Body of Moroſini was tranſported to Venice, and his Obſequies Celebrated in a manner more Triumphant than Funebrous; the Proveditor Grimani was likewiſe declared Captain General in the place of Capello; who having, as it were, Beſieged the Caſtles at the Mouth of the Dardanelli, taken ſeveral places in the Archipelago, and put the Enemies Fleet often unto flight, he thereby, and by other Acts of Valour, rendred him juſtly renowned through all Chriſtendom.

Theſe were the chief and moſt memorable actions by Sea, performed this Year; Thoſe by Land were acted chiefly in Dalmatia, where the Turks poured in their Forces on the Venetian Dominions, but were bravely repulſed by Leonardo Foſcolo, who took Ali Bey Priſoner, the Commander in Chief of the Sangiac of Licca, and ſlew his Son; beſides which, he took Saccovar, Poliſſano, Iſlan, and other Fortreſſes and Caſtles, full of Arms and Ammunition, which were the Magazines of the Country; he alſo recovered Novegrade out of the hands of the Turks, which was afterwards demoliſhed by Order from the Senate; which Victories were followed with other Succeſſes; nothing being able to oppoſe the Valiant and Proſperous Arms of Foſcolo; for beſides the taking and ſacking of ſeveral other Forts and Caſtles in Dalmatia, Obraozzo, Carino, Ottiſſina, Velino, Nadino, Vrana, Tino, and Salona, in the Confines of Croatia, and Boſna, became a Prey to the Venetian Arms.

But to this ſucceſsful Progreſs of the War, a ſtop was given for ſome time by the ſickneſs of Foſcolo; in which interim, the new Paſha of Boſna, called Mahomet Techli, a Circaſſian born, a Perſon both Generous and Valiant, with an Army of forty thouſand Men, beſieged the ſtrong Fortreſs of Sebenico; but was bravely repulſed by the Valour of the Inhabitants, the very Women exceeding the imbecillity of their Sex; and Children and old Men, with the weakneſs of their Age, ſtrengthened themſelves with Reſolution againſt their Enemies, and ſo valiantly behaved themſelves in defence of their City, that the Turk was forced to raiſe his Siege, having gained nothing but the loſs and ſlaughter of many of his People, and the beſt of his Souldiery; whereby he gained an aſſurance of the Invincible Strength of that place, and the Valour of the Inhabitants.

Foſcolo in like manner recovering his Health, continued the un-interrupted courſe of his Victories, and thereunto added the taking of Scardona; ſo that in Dalmatia the Venetian Affairs ran ſo proſperouſly, that nothing could be deſired to render them more happy and glorious. For the Turks not only were expelled from the Confines of Dalmatia, but likewiſe that Province became more quiet and ſecure than ever it had been in the Times of Peace.

But the joy of theſe Succeſſes was very much allayed by the unhappy Fate of a great part of the Venetian Fleet, at the Iſland of Pſara; which being lanched from Candia with intention to aſſault the Turks within the Dardanelli, unfortunately were driven by contrary Winds to that unſecure ſhore; where contending with a moſt furious Storm, a great part of the Fleet was caſt away, and the General Grimani himſelf drowned. About which time, the Turks, for the greater Terror of the Chriſtians, laid cloſe Siege to the City of Candia, and made many and various Attempts thereupon, carrying on their Aſſaults with the height of bravery and Reſolution, the Particulars of which require a diſtinct Hiſtory; but by the invincible Fortitude and Courage of the Chriſtians, they were repulſed with that ſlaughter, and with the loſs of ſo many Men, by Sallies and other Stratagems of War, that the Turks were at length conſtrained to raiſe their Siege with diſhonour and confuſion; during which time many of the Nobility and Perſons of Quality loſt their Lives; amongſt which, the principal were, Vicenzo della Marra, Governour General of the Arms of Candia, and Count Remorantino, natural Son of the Duke of Loraine, Commander in Chief of the Forces that came from beyond the Alpes.

The ruin of the Venetian Armata at Pſara.

1647. Cliſſa taken. General Foſcolo encouraged by the many glorioes Enterpriſes that he had obtained, reſolved to conſummate all by taking the ſtrong and famous Fortreſs of Cliſſa, ſcituate in the Conſines of Dalmatia, and Borders of Boſna, on the top of a ſharp and craggy Mountain, invironed with Rocks and unacceſſible Paſſages; the difficulty of the attempt rather inflamed than abated the Courage of Foſcolo, ſo that he Valiantly Beſieged and Aſſaulted that Place; during which time, the Prieſt D. Stephano Sorich, Captain of the Morlachs, intercepted the Succours which were ſent thither, and Georgio the Proveditor, overthrew Teccheli Paſha in a Field Battel; ſo that the Inhabitants deſparing of Relief, ſurrendered up themſelves to the mercy of the Venetians; and thus Cliſſa being taken, the Senate Commanded that it ſhould be more regularly Fortified.

And here the Chriſtian Arms met ſome interruption. For the Morlachs deſirous to caſt off the Turkiſh Yoke, and return to the protection of the Venetians, deſigned to ſurprize Scutari; and at the ſame time the Arch-biſhop of Durazzo, with ſeven thouſand Albanians, was to ſeize upon Croia, and Aleſſio; but the Deſign being diſcovered by the traiterous practices of ſome falſe Brethren, before Matters were maturely grown, or the time of Execution, it had certainly coſt the Life of all the Morlachs, and ſeven hundred Venetian Souldiers joined with them, had not the increaſe of the Waters hindered the ſpeedy March of the Turks, who reſolved to cut them all off without mercy, or regard to any; ſo that having time to diſperſe themſelves, and take refuge in the Mountains, the moſt of them preſerved their Lives from the Cruelty of their Enemies; only ſome certain Eccleſiaſtical Perſons falling into their Hands, they imputed unto them the cauſe of the Rebellion, and in a barbarous manner impaled them on Stakes.

The Turks enraged for the loſs of Cliſſa, diſpatched Dervis Paſha into the parts of Boſna, with a potent Army, threatning to Aſſault Spalatro; whom to divert, Foſcolo, together with Prieſt Sorich, Captain of the Morlachs, entered into the Enemies Country; ſpoiling, burning, and deſtroying whereſoever they came. The Morlachs more greedy of Prey than ambitious of Glory, divided themſelves into ſmall Parties to rob and pillage; in which interim they were aſſaulted by the Turks, but being ſcattered, were ſo far from making a ſtout reſiſtance, that they committed themſelves to a ſhameful flight, in which great numbers of them were miſerably Butchered; nor could the valour of Sorich, nor of the Governour Poſſidaria, reduce them by their Examples into any Order: whilſt together with ſome few valiant Dalmatians, and Morlach Captains, they endured the ſhock of all the Enemies Fury; in which Skirmiſh the Turks loſt ſeven Agas, and about ſeventy Souldiers: On the Chriſtians ſide were killed four hundred, ſome few Slaves, and about ſeventy Enſigns taken; amongſt the reſt the good Prieſt Sorich ſcorning to turn his back, had the miſfortune to fall into the Enemies hands, whom they flead alive, and afterwards impaled; and though they ſubdued his Body, yet he was ſtill maſter of his mind; bearing the ſame conſtancy in his Torments, as he had ſhewed Magnanimity and Courage in the Face of his Enemy.

Whilſt theſe Martial Affairs were tranſacting, with the Blood and Life of many thouſands on both ſides, Sultan Ibrahim, like a ſtout Souldier 1647. of Venus, waged another War in the Elyſiums of Cupid; and caſting aſide all thoughts of Candia, remitted the ſole care and management thereof to the Vizier and Paſhas of the Divan; following a Life ſo laſcivious and ſenſual, as can neither be imagined with a chaſt Fancy, or deſcribed by a modeſt Pen.

A principal Inſtrument of his Delights, and Engine to compaſs his Amorous Deſigns, was a certain caſt Wench of his, which he named Shechir Para, which ſignifies a little piece of Sugar; for it ſeems ſhe was ſo complaiſant and dulcid in her Humour and Diſcourſe, as merited that apt Name to expreſs the ſweetneſs of her Converſation; this Woman having the convenience to viſit all the Baths in Town, took notice of every Woman which ſhe ſaw of more than ordinary Features and Proportion, and having enquired her Condition and Dwelling, preſently reported the ſame with all advantage to her Sultan, who having heard the Beauty deſcribed, became paſſionately Enamoured, and could find no repoſe in his Fancy, until his Inſtruments, either by fair words or violence, had ſeduced her, or forced her to his Bed. But growing now extravagant and over-wanton in his Amours, he fell in love with the Sultana, or Widow of his Brother Sultan Morat: To win her Affections he had recourſe to his Dear Shechir Para; who uſed all her Arts in this Service: but her pretty wheedling Terms could prevail nothing on this Lady, who anſwered her in ſhort, That at the Death of her Lord Sultan Morat, ſhe had reſolved upon a perpetual Widowhood, for that the memory of him was ſtill ſo lively in her, that ſhe could not entertain the thoughts of admitting any new Embraces. This repugnancy and oppoſition inflamed the heat of Ibrahim like a Feaver, ſo that he reſolved to aſſault her himſelf one day by force, and took his time juſt as ſhe came out of the Bath; but ſhe being a bold Woman, and diſdaining the wandring loves of Ibrahim, laid her hand upon her Dagger, (which Sultana's and great Ladies uſually wear) threatning to wound him in her own defence; the noiſe and brawling hereof being over-heard by the Queen-Mother, called her from her Retirements, and concerned her in the Quarrel; who whilſt ſhe reproved her Son, for the rape he intended on his Brother's Wife, gave opportunity to the Sultana to eſcape; and ſo delivered her out of the hands of this Satyr. But Ibrahim mad with love, and fuming with diſdain to be checked and oppoſed by his Mother, Commanded her immediately to the old Seraglio, where he confined her to ſeveral days Impriſonment, during which time he underſtood in what manner ſhe had treated his large-ſiz'd Armenian, of whom we have already ſpoken; whereof the Queen-Mother being conſcious, ſubmitted her ſelf with all humility to her Son, begging his Favour and Pardon; and ſo well acted her part by thoſe who carried her Addreſſes, that ſhe overcame quickly his eaſy Nature, and was again reſtored to his Grace, and her Lodgings in the new Seraglio.

In the mean time Shecher Para travelling over all the Baths in Town, to diſcover new delights for her Maſter, at length had the fortune to caſt her Eyes on a Daughter of the Mufti, a Maid of Incomparable Beauty and Features of Countenance, and proportion of Body, which ſhe reported to Ibrahim ſo ſenſibly, as if ſhe her ſelf had been in love; and after ſhe had praiſed every Part and Member of her, ſhe concluded in ſum, that ſhe was the moſt Excellent and admirable 1647. Piece that ever Nature framed. The Sultan had no ſooner heard the Story, but according to his uſual Cuſtom, fell moſt deſperatly in love, and had immediately, without farther conſideration or counſel, diſpatched his Emiſſaries; or without other Preamble, Ceremony, or Courtſhip, to have fetched her to him; had not the ſenſe of the late Rebuff he had received from his Brother's Wife, made ſome impreſſion of fear in him; and the apprehenſion he had of the Power of the Mufti, created in him a certain Caution and Reſpect in the treatment of his Daughter: wherefore he rather reſolved to ſend for the Mufti, with whom he treated of honourable Terms concerning Marriage; promiſing to take her into his Boſom, and prefer her in Honour equal to any other of his Sultana's.

The old Man who was tender of, and doated on his Daughter, knowing well the wandring humour of the Sultan in his Amours, intended rather to marry her to ſome great Perſonage, with whom ſhe might be more happy, than in being a Soltana: for he conſidered, that Ibrahim having already other Sons, her Iſſue would either be Sacrificed for ſecurity of their Brothers, or elſe ſpend their days in a Priſon, and become Grey-headed, whilſt they breath in a medium between Life and Death, and are ſad Recluſes in the Grave of their unhappineſs. Theſe conſiderations were well imprinted in the mind of the Mufti: but becauſe he durſt not deny his propoſal, he dealt with him as Inferiours uſually do with their Lords and Superiours; that is, he returned him thanks, expreſſing infinite Obligations, that he would vouchſafe to caſt his Princely Eyes on the unworthineſs of his Family: however he adviſed him, that according to the Canons of their Law, of which he was the Expoſitor, and obliged to be a ſevere and preciſe Obſerver; it was great Impiety in a Father to impoſe on the Affections of his Child; ſo that though he could heartily wiſh that his Daughter would embrace this Honour, to which he would exhort her with all the earneſt Perſwaſions of a Father; yet if ſhe proved refractory thereunto, it would not be becoming his Power to force her; and therefore hoped his Majeſty would believe, that in proceeding thus far, he had performed that Duty which became him, both as a Father, and a Loyal Subject.

Ibrahim ſuppoſing that by this Conceſſion he had gained his Deſign, thanked and imbraced the old Man, whom diſmiſſing with plenary ſatisfaction, he remained now with an impatient expectation and hopes of enjoyment. Next Morning the Mufti returned early to the Grand Signior, and having firſt ſufficiently inſtructed his Daughter to refuſe the Sultan's Proffers, told him plainly, that he had uſed all his paternal Authority and intereſt with his Daughter, that he might induce her to accept this mighty Fortune, which caſt it ſelf upon her; but that it found not that ready acceptance with her as he expected; what could be the reaſon he knew not how to conjecture, ſince Women are commonly irregular, and unreaſonble in their Affections.

Ibrahim being in this manner diſappointed, and more angry to encounter any boundary or reſtraint to the imperious violence of his Luſts, than oppoſition againſt the puiſſance of his Arms; diſmiſt the Mufti with ſome neglect and diſdain, whom he reſolved to treat with Rigour, and his Daughter with Courtſhip. In order to the firſt, he baniſhed him the Court, and forbad him his preſence in any other place; 1647. grew ſullen and unſatisfied at all his adminiſtrations of Juſtice, intending thereby to induce him to a reſignation of his Office, there being nothing more irkſome to an ingenuous Spirit, than to ſerve and not to pleaſe. On the other ſide he dealt with the young Lady in a different manner, by the crafty and flattering inſinuations of his truſty Shechir Para, who ſo forcibly mannaged her Tongue full of curious Words, mixed with Threats, repreſenting the Storms and Fury of the Sultan's Rage; and again, the Glory, Splendour, and Happineſs of the Seraglio; where ſhe ſhould Reign as Empreſs and Soveraign of the World: all which ſhe expreſſed with that paſſion, and laſcivious enticement, as would have ſhaken a firmer Conſtancy, than the Vertue of a Turkiſh Maid: but ſhe being well admoniſhed by her Father, remained obſtinate in her Denial: but to quiet the importunity of this Seducer, ſhe begged her not to ſollicite her Father in this Requeſt, but rather that ſhe would intercede in her behalf with the Sultan ſpplicating him with all humility to pardon her Childiſh refuſal, and to leave her unto her unto her own Liberty and Choice, and a ſingle Life: to obtain which favour from her, ſhe produced a Diamond of conſiderable value, deſiring her to accept of that from her, and to become her Friend, her Aſſiſtant, and Protectreſs. Shechir Para being overcome by her Maiden Modeſty, could no longer reſiſt ſuch forcible Entreaties; and having her Eyes obſcured with the luſtre of the Jewel, promiſed to change her Note, and excuſe her refuſal with all the advantagious and compaſſionate Terms poſſible; and ſo taking her leave with a courteous farewel, repaired to the Sultan, to give an account of her Negotiations.

Ibrahim having with more doubtful Fear attended the Iſſue of this laſt Conference, than he did the Succeſs of his War with Venice; received his Shecher Para with exceeding joy, who being come in, began to recount all the Particulars that had paſſed: but the ſum of all was, that this ſilly Maid was ſufficiently ſenſible of the honour of being a Soltana, of being Courted by his Majeſty, of the Joys, Delights, and Glory of the Seraglio; but that when ſhe reflected, how that ſhe was to bring forth Children to die by untimely Deaths, and to end their Days by Poiſon, or the Bow-ſtring, or at leaſt to live miſerable Lives ſeparated from Mankind, and immured within Walls, and Intombed whilſt they breathed; ſhe could not but tremble with ſome horrour, and judg, that all the blandiſhments of Worldly Fortune were but a tranſient Paradiſe; which could not poſſibly recompence, or out-weigh the ſenſe and tenderneſs ſhe conceived for the miſery of her unfortunate Off-ſpring. Howſoever ſhe ſo couched her Diſcourſe, that ſhe gave Ibrahim ſome hopes to overcome at length; by which ſhe appeaſed a little his Fury and Deſpair, and extracted ſome Jewels and Gifts in reward of her paſt Labour, and encouragement for her future Service. In this manner Ibrahim had patience awhile, expecting ſomething farther from the induſtry of Shecher Para; but finding no effect of all his expectations and gentleneſs, at length reſolved to break through all Conſiderations of Reſpect, either to the Father as the Mouth and Oracle of the Law, or to the ſimple and fooliſh innocence of the Maid; and therefore ordered the Great Vizier to cauſe a Watch to be ſet on the Girl, either going in, or coming out of the Bath, and without farther Ceremony to bring her

1647. her unto him. This Order being executed accordingly, and the Maid hurried to the Seraglio; Ibrahim poſſeſſed and enjoyed her for ſome days, but with thoſe Tears, Reluctancy, and Sullenneſs, as took off from the edg and appetite of Enjoyment; ſo that he returned her back again with ſcorn and contempt unto her Father; who at firſt diſſembled the injury with the ſame Countenance as he did before, when he was interdicted the Sultan's Preſence; ſuppreſſing his revenge like a concealed Fire, which burſts out afterwards with more violent Flames. But though the ſenſe of Obedience and Duty towards his Prince allayed much of the choler he conceived againſt him for the Rape of his Daughter, yet he knew not how to pardon the Great Vizier, whom he termed no other than a Ruffian or Pandor; the Miniſter of his Maſter's Luſts, and not of his Laws, and of Juſtice.

Thus full of indignation he applyed himſelf, and made his complaint unto one Mahomet Paſha, a principal Member of the Divan; one of great Wiſdom and Practice in the Conduct of Affairs, and one with whom he had a particular Friendſhip and Intimacy. Nor leſs intereſt had he with Janiſar-Aga, or General of the Janizaries; to both whom, with tears in his Eyes, and with ſuch words as the ſenſe of his injuries ſuggeſted, he railed at the Vizier, and aggravated the Raviſhment of his Daughter with all the circumſtances of Villany and Violence.

Theſe two Friends heard the Story with a ſenſible remorſe, and immediately concluded, That for the Honour and Security of the Empire, it was neceſſary to depoſe Sultan Ibrahim, and for the ſame Reaſon to cut off the firſt Vizier; agreeing amongſt themſelves that Mahomet Paſha ſhould receive the Seal and the Office. To effect which, they deemed it neceſſary to draw the Queen-Mother into the Conſpiracy, being a Woman of great Authority, and having, as it were, the Reins of Government in her Hands, by reaſon of the weak Judgment of her Son. But becauſe it was difficult to perſwade the tenderneſs of a Mother to the ruin of her Son, the wiſe Mufti reſolved firſt to ſound her Inclinations and diſpoſition towards this Deſign: and being well informed of her fierce Circaſſian Nature, and the Jealouſy and Anger ſhe conceived againſt Shechir Para, obtained Licence to be heard by her, as if he would beg her Interceſſion with her Son in his behalf; and being admitted to diſcourſe with her, he thereby plainly diſcovered her moſt inveterate hatred and diſpleaſure againſt her Son; not only for this, but for many other Actions of like nature.

This diſcovery which the Queen had made, gave him the boldneſs to propoſe the confinement again of Ibrahim to his old Priſon; not that he ſhould be abſolutely laid aſide and depoſed, but only corrected awhile, and being put in remembrance of his paſt Condition, might be taught Wiſdom, and inſtructed for the future, what moderation and juſtice Sultans are obliged to exerciſe in the Adminiſtration of Government; and ſo ſubtilly did he inſinuate his Diſcourſe, that the Queen-Mother aſſented to the Propoſal, and that the Seal ſhould be conferred on Mahomet Paſha; for ſhe had conceived an irreconcileable hatred againſt Achmet the Grand Vizier, by whoſe Counſel ſhe was ſent to the old Seraglio, and was united in Confederacy with the deteſted Shechir Para.

The Mufti greatly ſatisfied to have gained ſo conſiderable a Conſpirator to the Party, communicated the whole Buſineſs, with the Progreſs of it, 1648. to the two Kadileſchers, or Lord Chief Juſtices of Romelia and Anatolia; who approving thereof, and promiſing their utmoſt aſſiſtance, the 7th of Auguſt was the Day appointed for the Inſurrection of the Janizaries, who being all in a readineſs on that day, went in a tumultuary way to call the Mufti, the Kadileſchers, and other Officers and Miniſters of the Law, whom they ſeemingly forced to accompany them to the preſence of the Grand Signior, of whom they demanded, that the preſent Vizier Achmet ſhould be deprived of his Office, and that Mahomet Paſha ſhould be conſtituted in his place. The Grand Signior at firſt refuſed their Demand, but being perſwaded by his Mother that it was neceſſary to content the Militia in that tumult; he conſented thereunto, and having called Achment, he took from him the Seal, and conferred it on Mahomet Paſha, and therewith the Office of Grand Vizier. Achmet trembling at the conſequences hereof, reſolved to commit himſelf to the Mercy of the Mufti, and therefore haſtned to his Houſe to attend his return, hoping to find him his Protector, under whoſe Shadow and Roof he fled for Sanctuary.

The Souldiery having thus obtained the firſt-fruits of their Inſurrection, accompanied the Mufti unto his Home, where finding the depoſed Vizier Achmet, the Janiſar-Aga immediately Commanded him out of Doors, from whence he had no ſooner drawn his Foot, than that he was ſeized upon and ſtrangled, and his Body thrown before the Gate of the new Moſch.

The next day being the 8th of Auguſt, 1648, the Janizaries again ariſing in the like Tumult as before, came to demand of the Mufti, Whether that according to their Law, Sultan Ibrahim as a Fool, and a Tyrant, and unfit for Government, ought not to be depoſed? To which the Mufti giving Anſwer in the Affirmative, ſent to cite Sultan Ibrahim the day following to appear in the Divan, to adminiſter Juſtice to his Souldiers and Subjects, who expected it from him. But Ibrahim ſuppoſing that he had ſufficiently ſatisfied the Souldiery, by putting the Vizier out of Office, laughed at the Summons which the Mufti made him; which being ſeconded by a Fetſa, which is a point of Law reſolved by the Mufti, who is the Mouth or Oracle thereof, viz. That the Grand Signior being called to account, is obliged to appear before the Juſtice; the Sultan in high diſdain tore the Paper, threatning the Head of the Mufti: but it was now too late, he having already ſufficiently fortified himſelf with the Power and Strength of his Rebellious Companions. This Fetſa was immediately ſeconded by another of a higher nature, which declared, That whoſoever obeyed not the Law of God, was not a true Muſſulman or Believer; and though that Perſon were the Emperor himſelf, yet being become by his filthy Actions a Kafir or Infidel, was ipſo facto, fallen from his Throne, and no farther capable of Authority and Government. This Fetſa being ſeen by Ibrahim, he tore it in pieces, commanding the Grand Vizier inſtantly to put the Mufti to Death, as guilty of Treaſon againſt his Prince: but having now loſt his Authority, his Commands were not longer regarded, nor any reverence had of his perſon: For the Janizaries being again aſſembled about five a Clock in the Afternoon, came with their uſual tumult to the Gates of the Seraglio.

And now Sultan Ibrahim loſing all Courage at this third attempt, fled into the Arms of his Mother, begging her Aſſiſtance and Protection.

She

1648. She being a bold and ſubtle Woman, employed all her Rhetorick and Eloquence to perſwade the Souldiery not to offer Violence to the Perſon of their Lord and Maſter; promiſing that he ſhould relinquiſh the Government, and retire himſelf with a Guard into his old Lodgings. Ibrahim comforted a little, that he ſhould ſave his Life, ſhrunk himſelf willingly into his old Shell, wherein he had ſo long conſerved his Life.

In the mean time the Conſpirators taking forth his eldeſt Son Sultan Mahomet, ſet him on the Throne of his Father, and planting the Sargouch, or Imperial Feathers on his Head, ſaluted him for Emperor with loud Acclamations. Ibrahim continued his Impriſonment for ſome days with great patience, but at length growing deſperate and furious, often beat his Head againſt the Wall, until at length, he was on the 17*th* ſtrangled by four Mutes.

In this manner Sultan Ibrahim ended his Days, which puts me in mind of the ſaying of a wiſer and a better King than he, That there is little diſtance between the Priſons and the Graves of Princes. And this Example made a great Officer underſtand how King Charles the Glorious Martyr was put to Death. For he, I think it was the Great Vizier, falling into Diſcourſe with the Chief Engliſh Interpreter at Conſtantinople, not then calling to mind the Fate of Sultan Ibrahim, demanded, How, and when King Charles was put to Death? Sure, ſaid he, Your King muſt have no Power, or your People muſt be more Rebellious and Mutinous than other Nations of the World, who durſt commit an Act ſo horrid and vile as this. See, ſaid he, How our Emperor is revered and obſerved; and how ſubmiſſive and obedient half the World is to the Nod of our Great Monarch. To which the Interpreter replyed, that to recount unto him the Hiſtory and Occaſion of this prodigious Fact, would be too long and tedious for him to hear: but that the time it happened, was ſome Months after the Death or Murder of Sultan Ibrahim; which was an Item ſufficient to give him a perfect underſtanding of what he required.

Sultan Ibrahim having in this manner ended his Days, the Government was committed into the hands of the Grand Vizier, and the old Queen-Mother (which is ſhe whom we call Kioſem in the Ottoman State) and of twelve Paſhaws; who were to manage all Affairs with ſupream Power, during the Minority of Sultan Mahomet, who now Reigns.

Ibrahim was the fifth Son of Sultan Achmet, born of the ſame Mother with Sultan Morat, Educated like the other younger Sons of the Ottoman Family, within the Walls of an obſcure and unhappy Priſon; ſo that 'tis no wonder, if wanting the advantages of ſeeing and practiſing in the World, he ſhould neither have ſtudied Men, nor been experienced in the Art of Government. Nor leſs ſtrange is it, being natural to humane Infirmity; for Men who have lived under Reſtraint, Affliction, and fear of Death, to become licentious and immoderate in all kind of Pleaſures, whenſoever they paſs on a ſudden from the depth of Miſery to ſome tranſcendent degree of Happineſs and Proſperity; which as, I ſay, all Men are naturally ſubject unto, ſo more eſpecially thoſe whoſe Religion indulges them all kind of ſenſual Carnality in this Life.

Ibrahim was in his own Nature of a gentle and eaſy Temper, of a large Forehead, of a quick and lively Eye and ruddy Complexion, and of a good Proportion in the Features of his Face, but yet had ſomething in the Air of his Countenance, that promiſed no great Abilities of Mind. And giving himſelf up to all kind of Effeminacy and Softneſs, attended not unto the Government of his Affairs; and therefore it was his greateſt misfortune to be ſerved by wicked and faithleſs Officers to whom he truſted, and to whom he gave Credence, wanting in himſelf the Talents of Wiſdom and Diſcretion to diſcern their Malice.

The continual apprehenſions that he entertained of Death during his Impriſonment, had ſo frozen his Conſtitution with a ſtrange frigidity towards Women, that all the dalliance and warm Embraces of the moſt inflaming Ladies in the Seraglio, could not in a whole Years time thaw his Coldneſs; which was the occaſion at firſt of that Report, which ſpoke him to be impotent towards Women: during which time he attended to his Miniſters of Juſtice, and to a management of the Affairs of his Empire, which in the beginning of his Reign gained him a Credit and Reputation, and raiſed a great expectation of his goodneſs and Care of his Subjects Welfare; an evidence of which, he gave in his Charge to the Great Vizier, that he ſhould put no Man to Death unleſs for Capital and Enormous Crimes. But at length loſing himſelf in Luſts and Senſualities, he forſook the Helm of his Regency, committing the guidance of his Empire to other Hands: and as he was ignorant of War, ſo he fooliſhly ſported in the Calms of Peace; and ſuffering himſelf to be guided only by Fortune, felt the Stroke thereof in his laſt Unhappy Fate.

OR
THIRTEENTH
OF THE TURKS.

ANNO 1649.

Sultan Ibrahim periſhing in this manner, by the mutinous Violence of the Souldiery, his Son Mehmet, or Mahomet, being a Child of ſeven Years of Age, ſucceeded in the Throne: During whoſe Minority, (which was to continue for the ſpace of ten Years longer) his Mother, who was the firſt Sultana, aſſiſted with the Counſel of twelve Paſhaws, took upon her ſelf the Regency, and in the firſt place reſolved to continue the War againſt the Venetians, which Ibrahim intended to conclude, having engaged himſelf far in a Treaty of Peace with the Bailo or Ambaſſador, which reſided at the Port for that Republick.

Whilſt theſe Matters were tranſacting, and Preparations making to proſecute the War; the Malignant Humours of the Empire began to ferment unto that degree, as affected the Body Politick at firſt with unnatural Heats, which ſoon afterwards proceeded to a Feaver, and then to a dangerous Convulſion. The ill-affected Part was the Militia, which is the Heart and Principal of the Life of that Government. For the Spahees and the Janiſaries, being the Horſe and Foot, entred into a deſperate Controverſie.

The firſt judged it their Duty to revenge the Death of their Soveraign, Sultan Ibrahim; and in order thereunto demanded the Head of the Great Vizier, as the Chief Author and Contriver of the Death of his Lord and Maſter. The others being conſcious to themſelves of having, by their Arms, carried on the Conſpiracy, not only declared their Reſolutions to defend the Vizier, but owned that what he had acted was by their Order, and at their Requeſt and Inſtigation.

The Spahees being highly provoked with this Declaration, ſwelled with Anger and Malice againſt the Janiſaries; and both ſides being equally proud and rich, could not bear each others Reproaches. The Spahees being Men of Eſtates in Land, looked on themſelves as the Gentry, and to have the greateſt Share in the concernment of the Empire. The Janiſaries living regularly in their Chambers, or Martial Colledges, looked on themſelves as the better Souldiers, and the more formidable Party; and the truth is, both of them were proceeded to that height of Command and Authority in Government, that had they not been ſuppreſſed by the cruel Hand, and bloody Diſpoſition of Kuperlee, as ſhall be more largely related hereafter, this Empire was then in danger of falling into as many Diviſions, as there were at that time Paſhaws, or great Captains. The cauſe here-

1649. of proceeded from the warlike diſpoſition of Sultan Morat, who being the moſt Martial Man of his Age, preferred none but Men of great Courage, and ſuch as had ſignalized their Valour by undoubted proofs; And ſuch Men as theſe he loaded with Honour, and raiſed them to the higheſt and moſt eminent Charges in the Government.

But Morat dying ſoon afterwards, theſe Great Men had time to enrich themſelves during the gentle and eaſie Reign of Sultan Ibrahim; which being ſeconded by the Minority of this Young Sultan, their Pride knew no bounds, either of Modeſty towards their Commanders, or Reverence towards their Sultan. Hence it was that the Souldiery dividing, ſo great a Sedition aroſe amongſt them, that at laſt they came to Blows, reſolving to decide the Controverſy by the Sword. But the Quarrels of Turks amongſt themſelves not being commonly of long durance, the Care and Vigilance of the Magiſtrates prevented all open defiance in the Field; but yet could not ſo pacifie their Animoſities, but that ſeveral Skirmiſhes, or Rencounters, paſſed between them in the Streets, wherein the Spahees were always worſted, and at length were forced to abandon the City, ſcarce daring for ſome time to own the Name of Spahee within the Walls of Conſtantinople.

Theſe Diſturbances gave the Venetians ſome hopes to accommodate their Peace with better Advantage; but the Reply to this Propoſition was more fierce and poſitive than ever, and ſo ill reſented, that the Bailo going from his Audience, was on the 27th of April ſeized on, and with all his Retinue clapped into Priſon and Chains; being ſent to thoſe Caſtles which are ſcituate on the Boſphorus, in the middle way between Conſtantinople and the Black Sea. But this furious ſeverity, by the interceſſion of other Chriſtian Miniſters, continued not long, before the Bailo received more gentle Treatment, by the Sacrifice which the Turks made unto themſelves of Grillo, his Interpeter, who being called down from the preſence of the Bailo, was immediately, by two Officers, ſtrangled, and his Body thrown out at the Window of the Caſtle; the which act, though it may ſeem unjuſt and barbarous to us, hath yet been frequently practiſed amongſt the Turks, being to this day their common uſe to threaten the Druggermen, or Interpreters; which is the cauſe that they often mince, or wholly alter the ſenſe or meaning of their Maſters, on thoſe Occaſions, when words are ſpoken by them ungrateful to the Turks.

The Turks bearing this Diſdain to the Venetians, laboured to re-enforce their Armies in Candia, and ſupply them with Ammunition and Proviſions; and though the Venetians lay before the Mouth of the Dardanelles to intercept all Succours which might be carried thither; yet the Turks, notwithſtanding their Diviſions, having recruited their Fleet with forty Gallies, and ten Great Ships, broke through the Venetians, and in deſpight of them, convoyed five Gallies laden with Souldiers and Ammunition, and landed them ſafe at Canea; and about the ſame time ſix Gallies, and ten Ships of Barbary, entered into the Port of Suda.

The General which commanded in Chief was named Chuſaein Paſha, a Perſon of great Courage and Experience; he had for ſome time beſieged the City of Candia, but for want of Men and Ammunition was forced to riſe from that Place, and retire to Canea and Retimo, whilſt in the mean time the Candiots received recruits of Men, and ſupply of Proviſions, improving their leiſure-time to fortifie their Town with ſuch Works as rendred it almoſt impregnable, and made it become the Wonder and Diſcourſe of the World after ſome Years ſucceeding. 1649.

Nor was the War only carried on in Candia, but alſo in Dalmatia, Morea, Boſna, and Albania. For Foſcolo, the General of Venice, deſigning to force ſome Corn from the Parts of Caſtel-nuovo, he landed ſome Men there, but was ſo ill received by the Turks, that he was forced to retreat unto his Veſſels with great diſorder, and no leſs diſhonour. But he had better fortune in the Parts of Boſna, where he repulſed the Enemy to the very Gates of Sarſay, the Capital City of that Province, and took upon compoſition the Fortreſs of Riſano, which is ſcituate between Cataro and Caſtel-nuovo; but at length the Turks receiving an additional Aid of fifteen or ſixteen thouſand Men, the Venetians were forced to quit their new Conqueſts, and retire into their own Country.

During the time that theſe Affairs were in agitation, the young Emperor was proclaimed, and his Inauguration celebrated with the uſual Ceremonies, but with Rejoicings, and hopes extraordinary; who being yet ſcarcely arrived to eight years of Age, many Mutinies and Troubles aroſe in divers Parts of the Empire, as in Damaſcus, Syria, Anatolia, and other Countries, where the Paſhaws refuſed to pay in the cuſtomary Taxes and Tribute, declaring, That they would keep the Mony in their Hands during the Minority of the Grand Signior; and that when he came to Age of Government, they would be accountable to him both for the Principal and for the Improvement.

The Turks in Hungary making incurſions into the Territories of the Emperor, were overthrown by the Count Forgatz, near Buda, where the Paſha was taken Priſoner, and his Son ſlain.

Nor better fortune had they in the Aſſault they made on the Fortreſs of Cliſſa, where having loſt five thouſand Men, they were forced to retire with great diſhonour.

The Coſſacks alſo in this Conjuncture grew more bold, ſo that they covered the Black Sea with their Boats, doing great damage to the Saicks, and other Veſſels, which traded in that Sea; and at length came up the Boſphorus above Therapea, giving a great Alarm, with much Fear and Confuſion to all Conſtantinople.

Amidſt theſe Misfortunes, and inteſtine Troubles, new Diſorders, aroſe in the Ottoman-Empire; For, as commonly, all the blame of miſcarriages and ill ſucceſſes in Turkie are caſt upon the Head of the Commander in chief; ſo the Enemies of the Great Vizier took the advantage in this conjuncture to reproach his ill Government, and carried the accuſation ſo far, as to depoſe him from his Charge and Office; in whoſe place the Aga, or General of the Janiſaries, ſucceeded.

The Spahees in Aſia, being diſpleaſed with this Election, aſſembled in a Body of ſeven or eight thouſand, and marched towards Conſtantinople, pretending to revenge the Death of Sultan Ibrahim; their Numbers daily encreaſing, the Divan very much feared leſt the Party which favoured the Spahees in Conſtantinople, ſhould join themſelves to the Aſian Mutineers; to prevent which it was judged good Reaſon and Policy, to anticipate the Juſtice they demanded, 1649. manded, by taking away the Life of the depoſed Vizier; which being eaſily aſſented unto, and without much heſitation performed, gave ſome little ſtop to the Fury and Heats of the Spahees.

Notwithſtanding all which, as the Diviſions which the Turks entertain amongſt themſelves, were never ſo great as to afford the Chriſtians any Advantage thereby, ſo the Venetians did not reap any Benefit from theſe Quarrels; but on the contrary, the Turks ſtudiouſly attended to their Affairs in Candia, paſſing thither with ſixty Gallies, thirty great Ships, and twenty five other ſmaller Veſſels, laden with Men, and all ſorts of Proviſions and Ammunition for War; ſo that in this Year 1649, the Affairs of the Turks remained in that Iſland in this happy and hopeful poſture. Amongſt theſe Ships were thirteen Engliſh, which the Turks took up at Smyrna, and forced into their Service. For though the Ambaſſador, Sir Thomas Bendysh, then Reſident at Conſtantinople, oppoſed the Engagement of theſe Ships what was poſſible, and alſo the Commanders and Seamen were very unwilling and diſſatisfied to undertake the Deſign, yet the Turks with Menaces, and Promiſes of Reward, forced them to carry Men and Ammunition to Candia; ſo that, making a Virtue of Neceſſity, they complied with that which they could not reſiſt.

ANNO 1650.

CHuſaein Paſha, Governour of the Iſland of Candia, having received theſe Succours and Recruits, reſolved to beſiege the Chief City of Candia; to which intent, drawing out from the Ships, and Gariſons of Retimo and Canea, what Men he was able, he formed an Army of thirty thouſand Men, with which he marched, and pitched before the Town. He was provided alſo with twelve Pieces of Cannon, four thouſand Sacks of Wooll, three thouſand Ladders, and with a good quantity of Granadoes; with this Force he attaqued the City in two places, viz. on the Forts of Martinengo, and Mocenigo; and preſſed ſo hard on the latter, that notwithſtanding the generous reſiſtance of the Defendants, he won the Fort, and there planted the Ottoman Colours; fortifying it with more Cannon, and a good number of Men.

Count Coloredo, Governour of that Place, was then ſick, the Gariſon very weak, and things reduced to the laſt terms of extremity; when General Balbiani, Admiral of Malta, arrived with ſix Gallies, and there landed ſix hundred Men, and ſixty Kinghts; which with great Courage mounted the Guard of the Fort Martinengo, which was the place of moſt Danger and Honour. The Turks excited with a deſire to welcome the new Gueſts, made three deſperate and furious Aſſaults on this Fort, but were with equal Valour repulſed by the Defendants; at which Diſgrace and Foil being highly enraged, they reſolved on a fourth Attempt, which they purſued with that Courage and Succeſs, that the Venetians were forced to give way to their Violence, with the ſlaughter almoſt of all thoſe which defended this Fort; until the Cavaliers of Malta, who having no greater Glory, nor readier Will, than to ſpill their Blood for the Chriſtian Cauſe, rallied all the Force they were able, and made ſo proſperous an Attaque upon the Fort, that they recovered it again, with the Blood and Deſtruction of all thoſe who defended it; but they enjoyed it not 1650. long, before the Turks regained it with the like ſucceſs and ſlaughter: which variety of Fortune the Venetians being ſenſible of, and that they could not bear ſuch coſtly Interchanges with the Turks, had recourſe to their ultimate Remedy of Mines, which ſucceeded ſo happily, that the whole Fort was carried into the Air, and therewith two thouſand good Souldiers of the Turks; with which Deſtruction, and other Repulſes in divers places, they were ſo weakned and diſcouraged, that they raiſed the Siege on the fifth of October new Stile.

In this Interim, the Tartar Han, called the Krim, demanded the Guardianſhip of the young Sultan, as of right belonging unto him; but the Council anſwered hereunto, That their Maſter was already in better Hands than thoſe into which they deſired to transfer him; and that his Grandmother, and the Divan, wanted neither Wiſdom nor Fidelity to direct his Affairs: with which anſwer the Tartar being forced to remain ſatisfied, was able to revenge himſelf no farther, than by exciting the Coſſacks to infeſt the Seas; which gave ſome diverſion to thoſe Arms, which otherwiſe had all been employed againſt the Venetians.

But theſe Deſigns from Tartary did little trouble the Council, in compariſon of that Spirit of Diſcord which was ariſen between the Spahees and the Janiſaries; for both Parties being emulous of each others Greatneſs, endeavoured on all Occaſions to elevate their Chief Commanders to the higheſt and moſt profitable Places of the Empire: which Diſſention touching the principal Miniſters of State, who were all engaged on the one ſide or the other, adminiſtred great Troubles, and retarded the execution and ſucceſs of all the grand Deſigns of the Empire. Nor was it of leſs importance and diſhonour to the Divan, that their Fleet was hindred paſſage by the Venetians, who blocked up the Mouth of the Dardanelles; whereby all intercourſe with Candia was interrupted: but being reſolved to remove this Obſtacle, they commanded the Captain-Paſha to force his Paſſage; which he accordingly performing, was ſo warmly received, that he quickly loſt two Gallies, and after much Blood, and loſs on both ſides, was forced at length to retire again within the Streights. But what was of worſe conſequence to the Turks, was the inveterate Diſcord between the Spahees, and Janiſaries; who having been unadviſedly embarked promiſcuouſly together, came oftentimes to Words, and then to Blows; which ended not without the Blood and Death of divers of each party. Theſe miſchiefs increaſed the rage which the Turks at Conſtantinople conceived againſt the Venetians; who were all thereupon (not excepting the Bailo Soranzo, nor his Secretary Ballarino) interdicted the Territories of the Grand Signior; and ſent back into their own Country.

The Captain-Paſha, that he might be in a capacity to make a ſecond Attempt to force his paſſage, ſent to Conſtantinople for new Recruits: when News came that the Siege of Candia was raiſed, and that the Turks had loſt the Fort of St. Theodoro; which ſo angred the Spirit of the Queen-mother againſt the Vizier, that ſhe immediately depoſed him from his Charge, and therewith had taken away his Life, had not the Faction of the Janiſaries protected him in this Extremity.

The Paſha of Buda was introduced into his place, a Perſon of a turbulent and ambitious 1650. Spirit, who to increaſe his Favour with his Miſtreſs the Sultana, evidenced his Heat and Zeal againſt the Venetians, and to that end ſent immediately expreſs Orders to the Paſha of Boſna, to inveſt Cliſſa with all the Power he was able; and therewith he preſented him with a Cimeter, and a Halter; the former to be his Reward in caſe of good Succeſs, and the latter to be his Puniſhment in caſe of Miſfortune. But this furious Vizier continued not ſo long, as to experience the Iſſue of this Command; for he was in a few days laid aſide, and Chuſaein Paſha, the General of Candia, was placed in his ſtead; howſoever his Orders were to remain with the Army, by which means, much Emulation and Conteſt was prevented, which might otherwiſe have happened between the Spahees, and Janiſaries, at the Election of a new Vizier; and thereby all excuſes taken from the Souldiery of abſence from the War, who could now pretend nothing of Reaſon to withdraw themſelves, on ſcore of attendance on the Vizier's Perſon; and to ſupply his Authority at the Regal Court, a Chimacam was ſubſtituted to adminiſter Juſtice in place of the Vizier, which is uſual on ſuch Occaſions.

Notwithſtanding all which, Affairs ſucceeded not extraordinary well for the Turks in Candia; for being ſtraitned for Proviſions in Canea, by the near approach of the Chriſtians, the Turks were forced to make a Diverſion, by appearing in great Troops before Candia; which they were enabled to do, by the Supplies they had lately received, with the arrival of their Fleet of Gallies; for the Winter Seaſon approaching, the Venetians were conſtrained to abandon their ſtation before the Dardanelles, and to leave the Paſſage open for the Enemy. And ſo this Year ended, rather with Advantage than Diſgrace to the Chriſtians.

WIth theſe great Succours and Supplies ſent to Candia by the Turks, Affairs muſt neceſſarily have ſucceeded proſperouſly to their Deſigns, had not inteſtine Diſcords at Home interrupted their proceedings; which aroſe from a Jealouſy and Emulation between the Grandmother and Mother of the young Sultan. For each of them pretending to the tuition or guardianſhip of the Emperor, during his Minority, divers Parties and Factions formed at Conſtantinople, from whence all that Trouble and Combuſtion aroſe, which we have at large related in the third Chapter of the Preſent State of the Ottoman Empire.

So that now it was no time to talk to the Souldiers or People of a War in Candia; For the firſt thought themſelves engaged to contrive a Settlement and Determination of Diſputes at Home: and the latter being irritated with a new Tax laid on them, for want of Mony in the Treaſury, exclaimed, and talked loud, and at length, inſtead of paying, broke out into open Rebellion; which by aſſiſtance of the Souldiery, was appeaſed, under no leſs Terms than the Death of ſeveral principal Miniſters of State.

During theſe Diviſions, the Venetians had time to arm out a very conſiderable Fleet for defence of Candia; Foſcolo, who had been General in Dalmatia, being ſent thither with title of Generaliſſimo in the place of Mocenigo: But theſe Diſſentions amongſt the Turks, according to their uſual Cuſtom, laſting not long before they came to a Concluſion, by the entire de- 1651.
ſtruction of one of the Parties; the Chief Miniſters began to reaſſume again the thoughts of proſecuting the War in Candia, and to ſend Recruits to reinforce the Army under the Command of Chuſaein Paſha, who was returned with new Forces and Courage to aſſault the City of Candia.

At this time a certain Greek, pretending to be a Perſon of Quality, and diſcontented with the Turks, fled from them to the Chriſtians, where being received with all kind and obliging entertainment, he had thereby liberty of ſeeing and viſiting all the Fortifications of the Place. After he had obſerved and diſcovered as much as he deſired, this traiterous Fugitive fled again to the Turkiſh Camp, where he revealed what places were moſt ſtrong or beſt fortified, and where the Town was weakeſt, and moſt eaſily to be aſſaulted. The Venetian General being awakened at this Diſcovery, and conſidering the numbers of his People to be few, in reſpect of the Enemy, and that the Outworks could not be maintained without a more numerous Gariſon, he reſolved to deſtroy ſome of thoſe Forts; and accordingly blew up with Mines four Baſtions, which being at a diſtance could not be relieved without much danger. The Turks hereby making conjectures of the weakneſs of the beſieged, cheerfully aſſaulted the Fort of St. Demetrio, thinking to carry it without much trouble; but contrary to their expectation, they encountred ſo bold a reſiſtance, that they loſt three thouſand Men on the Place.

At Conſtantinople they were ſtill ſo intent to carry on this War, that having prepared, and laden on the Fleet great quantities of Granadoes, Bomboes, and Mortar-pieces, with other Fire-works, the Captain-Paſha, with hopes agreeable to his Force, ſet forth to Sea, with eleven hundred Sail, conſiſting of Gallies, Ships, Galleaſſes, Saiques, Brigantines, and ſmaller Veſſels, with reſolution to engage the Venetian Fleet, whoſe Commanders alſo were equally deſirous and ready to conſent with them to a Battel.

On the 7th of July, the Venetians being at an Anchor in the Port of St. Ermina, diſcovered the Turkiſh Fleet, to which, as they were much inferiour in number, ſo they were ſuperiour to them in the agreement and experience of their Commanders. The Turks having paſſed forward on their way, the Venetians purſued them, and the better to draw them to a Battel, Mocenigo ordered two Ships, commanded by Barbaro and Dolphino to croſs the Turks at the point of the Iſland; and his Vice-Admiral, Bataggio, with four Ships to engage the main Body of the the Turkiſh Fleet; to whoſe aſſiſtance many other Veſſels coming in, he ſo rudely treated ſeveral Gallies, that they were forced to ſeek harbour in the Port of Chios, now Scio, with the loſs of Mahomet, Paſha of Anatolia, who was ſent to ſucceed in the Office of Chuſaein Paſha, the General of Candia; but Night coming on, the reſt of the Fleet retreated to the Iſles of Naxia and Paros.

On the tenth day the Turks having watered their Fleet, gave a ſignal of defiance to the Venetians, by diſcharge of two pieces of Cannon; and the Venetians accepting the Challenge, both Fleets gave a furious charge one to the other; but the Turks were not able to withſtand the Courage and Skilfulneſs of the Venetians; for the Captain-Paſha having loſt many of his Men, and the Poop of his Gally being carried away with a Cannon-ſhot, the whole Fleet was put into Diſorder, and then unto flight, ſo that the Gallies began to employ themſelves in toaing the Ships. But one of their Mahones being ſeparated from the reſt, was aſſaulted by two Galleaſſes, and ſome Ships, and finding none to come in for Succour, the Captain was killed, with four hundred Souldiers, and two hundred were taken Priſoners.

In the mean time Mocenigo, the General, gave chaſe to the Gallies, which two to a Ship were toaing the heavier Veſſels as faſt as they could; but being hardly purſued, were forced to caſt off the Hauſer, and ſhift for themſelves as well as they were able. The Turkiſh Ships ſeeing themſelves thus abandoned, fired whole Broadſides upon the Enemy; but the Venetian Gallies leaving their own Ships aſtern, that they might purſue their advantage, Querini boarded a Great Galleaſs, called the Soltana, upon which were three hundred Souldiers, who offered to ſurrender upon promiſe of Quarter for their Lives. But the Chriſtian Souldiers heated with fight, and not then underſtanding any thing of Conditions, deſperately boarded the Veſſel, whereby the Turks being reduced to an extremity of deſpair, gave fire to the Powder, and therewith carried, as well the Vanquiſhers, as the Vanquiſhed, into the other World.

A great Victory obtained by the Venetians over the Turks.

According to this example four other Veſſels burnt themſelves, one of 60 braſs Guns, and three others of 40 to 44. Fifteen Veſſels of the Starboard Wing ſaved themſelves by good ſailing. Of the Larboard Wing, Captain Nicolo, a Renegado, with his Ship, was taken by the Admiral of the Galleaſſes, likewiſe another Great Veſſel by Lazaro Mocenigo, and another by Proveditor Melino. In ſhort, there was not one Veſſel which remained in ſight of the Venetians, which was not either taken, ſunk, or burnt. Notwithſtanding all which, conſidering the Veſſels which were eſcaped, and the 3 thouſand Men which the Turks had landed at Naxia, in order to their being tranſported unto Candia, the Victory ſeemed to be very imperfect; wherefore the Venetians attending another encounter with the Turkiſh Fleet, did happily meet them in a few days after; and being encouraged with the late Succeſs, as the Enemy was low in their Spirits and Reſolution, they bravely attaqued the Turks, and took 39 Gallies, 23 Ships, three Galleaſſes, together with the three thouſand Souldiers which were then embarked from Naxia: Thoſe which eſcaped took Refuge in the Port of Rhodes.

After this great loſs, the Turks entertained no great Deſigns of the Conqueſt of Candia; but only to conſerve Canea, and the footing that they had won in that Iſland: nor did ever the Turks after this, dare to ſtand a formal Battel with the Venetians at Sea, but rather contriving to eſcape than to fight, did ever after build light Gallies, for tranſporting of Men and Ammunition, with intention to wage their War only at Land, and not at Sea; it being a ſaying ever after common in their Mouths; That God had given the Sea to Chriſtians, and the Earth to the Turks.

To theſe ill Succeſſes abroad, were added great Diſſentions at Home; for the mutinous Spahees in Aſia, having united into a ſtrong Body, marched towards Conſtantinople, to join with their other Brethren in thoſe Parts. The Janiſaries on the other ſide, not leſs diligent to oppoſe their Enemy, to revenge the Outrages committed on their Brethren, whom the Spahees had ill-treated, having cut off the Noſes and Ears of ſeveral of them; beſides all which, they proceeded to that height of Inſolence, as to demand the Heads of the Great Vizier, and of the Aga of the Janiſaries; and being now by their numbers rendered formidable to the Court, it was judged agreeable to the preſent Conjuncture, to ſatisfy in ſome meaſure theſe Mutiniers, by diſcharging theſe two Officers of their employment, which did in ſome degree for the preſent qualify and appeaſe theſe Tumults.

ANNO 1652.

THE Seditions at Conſtantinople were ſcarce quieted, before advice came of a Rebellion of the People of Grand Cairo and Damaſcus, who both at the ſame time conſpired, as if they intended to caſt off Subjection to the Ottoman Family; the which Mutiny and Diſturbance aroſe to that Head, as gave great cauſe of fear to the Divan; and employed all their Counſels and Contrivances for this whole Year, in what manner they might reduce this People to their Duty and Obedience. During which time, the Chriſtians in Candia had time to breath, and opportunity to provide themſelves with all Ammunition and Proviſions; and to repair their old, and add new Fortifications to their Town.

ANNO 1653.

BUT theſe Troubles being with time compoſed, the Grand Vizier deſired greatly the Conqueſt of Candia, which being by experience proved to be with difficulty gained by the Sword, he endeavoured to win it by fairer Terms; and to that end wrote a Letter to the Republick of Venice, in Letters of Gold; wherein he declared, that it ſeemed ſtrange to him, that the Senate had not diſpatched their Ambaſſador to him with the ſurrender of Candia, in regard that thereby they might aſſure themſelves to purchaſe a certain Peace, which they vainly retarded by ſuch delays. Howſoever in theſe Letters no mention was made of the Cauſes, or Reaſons, why Signior Capello, who was an eminent Perſon, being Procurator of St. Mark, and ſent thither for Bailo, was ſo ill treated with Impriſonment at his Arrival, notwithſtanding the permiſſion and encouragement which was given for his kind reception, obtained at the inſtance of the French Ambaſſador; but this Reſtraint continued not long upon him, before he was releaſed with a daily Allowance (which continued for ſome time) of 1200 Aſpers a Day; and afterwards the Court returning from Adrianople to Conſtantinople, he was permitted to lodg in the Palace which belongs to the Bailo's of Venice.

The Venetian Fleet being Victorious at Sea, made it their work to keep the Mouth of the Dardanelles always blocked up, whereby they hindered all Succours from Candia: notwithſtanding which diligence, the Venetians being ſometimes forced, for the ſake of Water and Proviſion, to abandon that Station; the Turks took hold of the opportunity to eſcape forth; but being eagerly purſued by the Venetians, they were forced to take Sanctuary in Rhodes, where being again blocked up, the affairs in Candia ſuffered much, and the Complaints from thence were loud at the Court. So that Orders were ſent, and often repeated unto the Captain-Paſha, that he ſhould ſpend no longer time in

Rhodes,

1653. Rhodes, but that in deſpight of all Difficulties, he ſhould immediately proceed to Candia, and fight through the Venetians in caſe they remained in the way to interrupt his paſſage; but the Captain-Paſha notwithſtanding theſe Orders, and Menaces which accompanied them, could not perſwade himſelf to the Hazard of a Battel; till at length, the ſeaſon of the Year ſpending, and being wearied in the Port of Rhodes, he reſolved to adventure abroad; but inſtead of going to Candia, he plundered the Iſlands as he paſſed, and returned to Conſtantinople, with 40 Gallies, where he hoped with the Booty he had plundered to appeaſe the anger of the Divan againſt him: but this Sacrifice did not much avail, for he was not ſooner arrived, than his Perſon was ſeized, and Goods ſealed up for the uſe of the Grand Signior; the which Seal his Sons broke open, and taking with them the richeſt and moſt conſiderable part of their Father's Eſtate, laded it on one of the Gallies, and fled therewith into Foreign Parts, little regarding that danger in which they had left their Father to periſh. During which time the Venetians ſtill maintained their Guards on the Coaſts of Candia, not ſuffering any Recruits of Men, or Proviſions for War, to be tranſported thither; ſo that if the Turks deſigned to proſecute this War, it muſt be by new Forces, and ſuch as were able to encounter the Marine Power of the Enemy; the which being reſolved upon by the Council, a heavy Tax was laid on the people to carry on the Deſign, which they not willingly ſupporting, made a publick Inſurrection in the City; and at the ſame time alſo the ancient Quarrel between the Spahees and Janiſaries, began again to ferment; which Troubles being added to a Rebellion raiſed by the Paſha of Aleppo, who increaſing in ſtrength and number, came marching towards Conſtantinople, put that great City into a horrible Fear and Confuſion.

THE Venetians judged that theſe Troubles would naturally produce ſome Advantage to them, and much facilitate the Peace which they had long deſired: but as Seditions amongſt the Turks are always too violent to continue; ſo theſe Diſcontents evaporated in a ſhort time, and new Reſolutions were taken to proſecute the War in Candia; for notwithſtanding that Monſieur de Ventelay, Son to the French Ambaſſador, mediated with agreeable prudence to compoſe Matters in order to a Peace, yet his Endeavours were all inſignificant; for neither had Signior Capello Audience granted him, nor that liberty which was promiſed before his Arrival; the Turks ſtill inſiſting on the Surrender of Candia, would not underſtand any Terms which did not entirely inveſt them in that Conqueſt.

To effect which by Force, which could not be performed by Compoſition; the Paſha of Buda was Elected for Captain-Paſha, or Commander in Chief of the Seas; and Orders given to equippe a new Fleet of Ships, and Gallies, for tranſporting the Succours of Men and Proviſions to Candia: where Chuſaein Paſha the General, being wearied with his long Siege of the Town, withdrew his Men at ſome farther diſtance for their better refreſhment; for they wanting all Conveniencies in their Trenches, began to Mutiny, and to refuſe the performance of their Duty, until the General ſatisfying their Pay, and diſpenſing liberally Largeſſes to the Officers, gave them new Encouragement and Satisfaction; with which, being a little enlivened, Chuſaein ſent a Herald, with a defiance to thoſe in the City, challenging them to fight a pitcht Battel with him: but the Chriſtians refuſed the Offer, thinking it more prudence not to accept, than loſs of Honour to deny an Anſwer to the Challenge. Then the Turks ſought ſome means to effect their Deſign by Treachery; to which end, they treated with a certain Captain for delivery of one of the Gates of the City; which he promiſed to do unto the Turks, but gave Advertiſement unto the Governour. The Paſha the night following advanced with ſome Troops, hoping to find one of the Gates opened to him; but inſtead thereof, the Defendants having prepared a Mine to receive them, ſprang the ſame ſo opportunely, that it carried away the moſt of thoſe who were engaged in the Deſign, and therewith their hopes of becoming Maſters ſpeedily of that impregnable Fortreſs. Wherefore they reſolved for a while to repoſe, and attend thoſe Succours which were now preparing at Conſtantinople. 1654.

The Fleet being put into a readineſs, the Souldiery departed with their uſual hopes of Succeſs; but meeting with their Enemy again at the Mouth of the Dardanelli, the Fight was furious and hot for a long time between them, but concluded to the diſadvantage of the Turks, who there loſt 6000 Men, two Gallies, three Ships, and a Mahone: howſoever they broke through the Venetians, and landed 12000 Men in the Iſle of Candia. The News of this defeat, and the Confirmation thereof, by the wounded Men which were landed at Conſtantinople, made a great noiſe amongſt the people. Howſoever the Turks perſiſting conſtant to their Intentions of proſecuting the War, ſent Orders to the Captain-Paſha again to fight the Venetians ſo ſoon as the Fleet was refitted, and reſtored to a condition to engage in another Battel; but the Venetians ſcarce gave them the leiſure to repair, before they attacked them again, whereby they put them to ſuch diſorder, that they were forced to take refuge in the firſt convenient Port; where having attended a favourable Wind, they haſtned to Conſtantinople; and from thence were diſpatched into the Black Sea againſt the Coſſacks, who very much infeſted thoſe parts.

The Captain-Paſha being arrived, extolled his own great Services and Adventures, and on the contrary vilified the Great Vizier, diſparaging all his Actions, as mixed with weak Counſels, and proſecuted with Cowardiſe, or want of true Reſolution: the which took ſuch deep impreſſion in his abſence, having none to anſwer for him; that all being given for granted which was alledged againſt him, Orders were diſpatched to Candia by an Officer to take off his Head, in whoſe place this Captain-Paſha ſucceeded.

Amidſt of all theſe Combuſtions of War, the mediation of Peace was carried on by the French Ambaſſador: For though Signior Capello was actually Reſident on the Place, qualified with the Character of Bailo for the Republick of Venice; yet the Turks would ſcarce vouchſafe to Treat perſonally with him; and indeed his ſufferings by Impriſonment, and other barbarous Uſages, had affected him with ſuch a melancholy, as rendred him uncapable for ſome time of adminiſtring publick Affairs; for having loſt his Reaſon, by giving way to ſad and black Thoughts, he laid violent Hands on 1654. himſelf, by wounding himſelf in two or three places of his Belly; but the Wounds proving not Mortal, he was in a ſhort time reſtored again to a ſound Eſtate both in Mind and Body; as I ſhall ſome few years after have occaſion to relate from the words of his own Mouth, which he was pleaſed to utter to me on his Death-bed, the day before he departed this Life.

THE Great Vizier after all his evil Inſinuations againſt Chuſaein Paſha, fell very ſick and infirm; ſo that the Court conſidering him as a Perſon uncapable of farther Service, caſt their eyes on the Paſha of Aleppo, who being a daring Martial Man, was eſteemed to be the better Chief in ſuch a hazardous War, which for being on the Sea, was unuſual and diſpleaſing to the Turks. Againſt him nothing could be objected beſides his Rebellions and Contrariety to the Government; but hereunto it was preſently anſwered, that the extravagance of his humour proceeded only from his Ambition of being Great Vizier; which when he had attained, that thirſty deſire of Glory, which he exercis'd for acquiring this Office, would be buſied in thoughts to advance and improve his Honour in Actions beyond his Predeceſſors.

Letters being arrived at this Paſha's hands, which called him to Court to accept this Charge, did ſecretly pleaſe the humour of his haughty Spirit; howſoever, he remained for a while in ſome ſuſpence and irreſolution, not being aſſured whether ſome Deceit might not be concealed under this ſpecious appearance of Preferment: But conſidering, that the way unto Gains and Advantage was by daring Adventures, he reſolutely accepted the Proffer, and put himſelf in his March towards Conſtantinople, with a glorious Equipage of forty thouſand Men, thinking therewith to make good his Retreat, and ſecure his Perſon in caſe that Deceit were diſcovered which he rationally ſuſpected. Being arrived near unto Conſtantinople, he received from the Great Signior ſeveral Meſſages of Kindneſs, and a good welcome; and was accordingly received into the City, and inveſted in the Office, with all the Circumſtances of Favour and Honour imaginable.

Having thus taken poſſeſſion of his Charge, he promiſed the Grand Signior that he would employ all his Endeavours to reſtore the decayed Eſtate of Affairs, and reform the Government. And as an earneſt thereof, he began to remove ſuch Miniſters from the Court which were ſuſpected by him; and to render himſelf the more Abſolute, he cut off ſeveral others, whom he imagined might in any wiſe diſturb or controul him in the management of his Affairs.

After which he diſpatched his Orders to all Maritime Towns of the Empire, to fit and make ready what Gallies and Ships were poſſible to be provided, intending thereby to ſet out the greateſt Fleet that ever was ſeen in the Levant: but to compleat this Work, two great Difficulties aroſe; The firſt was, to find a wiſe and well experienced Commander: and the next, was in what manner to perſwade the Spahees and Janiſaries to embark; for they having heard and ſeen in what manner their Companions had periſhed in this miſerable War, abſolutely refuſed to go; and though the Animoſities of theſe two orders of Souldiers were irreconcileable one to the other, yet in this common Cauſe being united, they raiſed ſo horrible a Sedition, that they aſſaulted the Mufti in his very Houſe, and purſued him within the Gates of the Seraglio with 1655. a thouſand reproaches and injuries, as an Author of evil Counſels, and a Diſturber of the common Peace and Quiet of the Empire. Nor was it poſſible to appeaſe this Tumult, but by anticipating to them four months Pay; with which their Minds being made more pliable, they gently yielded to Obedience, and ſuffered themſelves to be embarked for Candia.

Zarnozau Muſtapha was made Captain-Paſha, or General of the Fleet, which was very numerous, and well equipped, conſiſting of ſixty Gallies, eight Mahones, thirty great Ships of War, and ſixty one Gallies belonging to the Beys. After having remained three days at the Mouth of the Dardanelles near the Caſtles, they went out in this Order; The Bey's Gallies were the firſt, then followed the Ships, next the Mahones, and the Rear conſiſted wholly of the Grand Signior's Gallies. The Van of the Fleet being the Bey's Gallies, which are always the beſt manned, and provided, were ordered to attack the main Body of the Chriſtian Fleet, for that, being ſeconded with the Ships, they would be able to ſuſtain the Shock until the Mahones could come up, which were directed againſt the Starboard Wing of the Enemy, compoſed of Galleaſſes. The Venetians, though much inferior in Number, yet as great in Courage, gave evident Signs of their deſire to fight, with hopes, by God's Bleſſing, to obtain a Victory. The Venetians whilſt the Turks paſſed, remained ſtill with their Anchors apique, which the Turks interpreting as a token of their Courage and Boldneſs, were ſo daunted, that they began to ply towards the Coaſt of Greece; but being forced to paſs under the Guns of the Venetian Admiral, they were ſo ill treated by his Broadſides, that they were diſcouraged from making a ſecond Charge. The Ships, and other Veſſels fared little better, being forced to paſs under the Guns of the Enemies Fleet. The Captain-Paſha attempted to paſs on the Coaſt of Anatolia, with his lighter Gallies, but being hindred by a ſtrong party of the Enemy, he was forced to follow the reſt of the Fleet, taking his Courſe with them by the Coaſt of Greece. In this Charge one of the Turks Mahones was ſunk, and two diſabled: But the greateſt Fight happened between a Squadron of the Turks Ships, and four of the Venetians, which had been hard put to it, had not the Captain Mocenigo come in to their Aſſiſtance; howſoever, the Venetian Captain of the Ship, called the Crown, was ſlain by a Musket ſhot.

In ſhort, the Chriſtians boarded the Turks with ſo much Vigour and Reſolution, that they took ſeveral of their Ships, and mixing with the thickeſt of their other Veſſels, they put many Aſhore, and others eſcaping in their Boats, left their Slaves and Gallies to the diſpoſal of the Enemy; ſo that the Venetians obtained that day a hundred braſs Guns, with a ſignal Victory, having had no other important Loſs, unleſs the Ship called the David and Goliah, which being overpowered, was burnt by the Turks.

The People of the Turks, who were in daily expectation to receive intelligence of a Succeſs, agreeable to ſo great Preparations, were much troubled to hear the News of the Defeat given to their Naval Forces; of which Miſcarriage, the World dividing it ſelf into different Conjectures, the moſt part, eſpecially thoſe of Conſtantinople, attributed the Miſfortune of all 1655. to the ill Government, and want of Experience in the General. Wherefore to appeaſe the People, eſpecially the Merchants, who were weary of this Marine War; from whence they reaped nothing but Loſſes of their Ships and Goods; It was thought fit to enter into a Treaty with Signior Capello, the Venetian Bailo, concerning a Peace; but he having his Commiſſion taken from him, for the Reaſon before related, his Secretary Ballarino ſupplyed his Office; and in Order to an Accommodation, had two Audiences with the Great Vizier, to whom, and to others of the Divan, he made Preſents of rich Pieces of Cloth of Gold, in the Name of the Republick. Howſoever the Turks thinking it diſhonourable to accord unto other Terms, than the intire Reſignation of Candia, proceeded in their Preparations as formerly; at which the Merchants and Tradeſmen at Conſtantinople received ſuch matter of Diſcontentment, that in Tumults they cryed out for Peace at the Gates of the very Seraglio; and behaved themſelves with that Inſolence, that the Janiſaries were called to drive them from thence by force of Arms; howſoever this Tumult and Riot of the People ended not without the Life of the Great Vizier, to whoſe fury he was made a Sacrifice. And though his Son appeared at the Gates of the City with forty thouſand Men, to demand Juſtice on the Murderers of his Father, yet the People were ſo far from being diſmayed thereat, that their Fury and Rage encreaſed to a greater height, and required the Authority of the Divan to keep things from running into the Inconveniences of a Civil War.

THeſe Diſorders induced the chief Miniſters to enter into another Treaty with Ballarino, propoſing to withdraw their Forces from Candia, and make a Peace, upon the paiment of ten Millions for the Charge of the War: And to incline the Venetians hereunto, the Turks gave ſevere Orders to their People living about Corfou, to moleſt the Inhabitants of that Iſland with all Acts of Hoſtility imaginable: and farther publiſhed, That their Intentions were to ſet out a more numerous and ſtronger Fleet, than any which from the beginning of this War had ſailed on the Seas; and in order thereunto, great Numbers of Slaves, conſiſting of Coſſacks and Moſcovites, were bought of the Tartars, and tranſported to Conſtantinople.

The Venetians were not in the leaſt affrighted at theſe Boaſtings of the Turk, but on the contrary, knowing that their Affairs in Candia were well ſecured and provided, gave Orders to Ballarino to deſiſt from farther Treaties, and to procure his Licence to depart. And the Turks, to evidence their intentions to proſecute the War, entered into Canea with twenty eight Sail, laden with Arms and Proviſions, on which alſo were fifteen hundred Men. By this conveyance was ſent a Janiſar-Aga with Orders from the Grand Signior, to conſtitute Chuſaein Paſha in the place of Captain-Paſha, or Admiral of the Seas; but he judging this to be a Deſign, or Lure, to draw him from his Poſt, or Office, wherein he was more ſtrong and ſecure, acknowledged the Honour of the Employment, but framed Excuſes to continue his Seat and Place of Reſidence, which the Chief Miniſters were forced to accept; it being a Conjuncture more ſeaſonable to diſſemble, than to reſent his refuſal.

A Rebellion at Conſtantinople.

Whilſt new Preparations were making againſt Candia, ſo horrible a ſtorm of Mutiny and Sedition aroſe at Conſtantinople, as conſtrained the Grandees of the Council to quit for the preſent all thoughts of providing for the War againſt the Enemy, that they might defend and ſave themſelves from the Fury of their own People; For the Spahees and Janiſaries joining together, pretended to reform the Abuſes of the State; to perform which, in a furious Tumult, putting themſelves in Arms, they ran to the Divan, where they depoſed the Great Vizier, and diſcharged divers other Officers of their Employment; The Mufti was conſtrained to fly to Jeruſalem, and the Queen-Mother ſcarce remained ſecure in her old Seraglio. And to ſo great a height their Rebellion proceeded, that they propoſed even to dethrone the Grand Signior himſelf. And having thus caſt off all Reſpect and Duty to their Prince, they entred the Imperial Palace, and forcing the Guards, broke up the Treaſury, and carried two millions from thence.

Amidſt of this horrid and affrighting Confuſion, Merchants and well-meaning Citizens remained in the moſt aſtoniſhing apprehenſions imaginable; for all Laws being broken, and Juſtice unregarded, the whole City laid open to be pillaged and ſacked by the licentiouſneſs of an unbridled Souldiery. For ſeveral days the Offices both of the Mufti, and Great Vizier remained vacant, by reaſon that the two Factions of Janiſaries and Spahees could not agree upon the Election. At length the moſt ſeditious amongſt them wearying out the others with Quarrels and Conteſts, advanced a Fellow of no Underſtanding or Reputation to the eminent degree of Great Vizier; in which condition he remained not long. For the Fire of the multitude being with time quenched, and the popular Heat abated, this new Vizier was diſplaced, all things returning to their uſual Channel, and Authority to its Fountain.

And that Matters might more eaſily be reſtored to their ancient order, the Grand Signior called for the Paſha of Damaſcus to receive the Dignity of Great Vizier; for he being a Perſon of eighty Years of Age, and of long Experience in Affairs, having managed the moſt weighty Charges of the Empire, was looked on by all as the moſt proper Perſon to compoſe and heal theſe great Diſtempers in the State; and this was that famous Kuperlee, who was Father to him who ſucceeded him in this Office. The Paſha of Siliſtria was alſo conſtituted Captain Paſha, and Chuſaein was confirmed in his Government of Candia.

And now the bright Beams of Juſtice and Government having diſſipated the Storms and Fury of popular Sollevations; the Grand Signior in Perſon mounting his Horſe, accompanied with his principal Miniſters of State, viſited all the Parts of Conſtantinople, where making Inquiſition for the principal Leaders and Fomenters of this Rebellion, he ſeized on ſome, and without further proceſs, boldly executed them in the Face of the People.

But before things were reduced to this condition, four Months were ſpent in this horrid Confuſion; and what is moſt ſtrange, this Great Empire for ſo long time remained without a Pilot, toſſed on the Waves of popular Commotions; all which ſerved to give eaſe and reſpite to the Venetians in their War, but not to operate towards a Peace; ſo reſolute were the Turks in their Deſign of making an entire Conqueſt of Candia.

For having again Equipped a moſt formidable Fleet, conſiſting of ſixty light Gallies, twenty eight Ships, and nine Galleaſſes; they attempted to make their way for Candia, and therewith to fight the Venetians in caſe they ſhould oppoſe them in their Voyage, to which they were the more encouraged upon ſight of the Venetians, who appeared at the Streights of the Dardanelli, with no more than twenty nine Gallies, and ſome Boats, or Brigantines; howſoever the Turks were not ſo confident in their numbers, but that they judged it requiſite to fortify themſelves with two Batteries; one on the Coaſt of Anatolia, and the other on the European ſhore; whereby they imagined, that they might cauſe the Venetians to give way, and open a Paſſage to their Fleet.

Engagement between the Turks and Venetians.

But notwithſtanding the continual ſhot which the Turks made upon them, they ſtill kept their Station from the 23*d* to the 26*th* of June; when the Wind coming about to the North, which was favourable for the Turks to Sail out, and to bring them nearer to their Enemies, they began gently to approach; and the like the Chriſtians endeavoured, being deſirous to join Battel; at which firmneſs of Reſolution, the Turks being a little ſtartled, became willing to avoid the Fight, and to creep under the ſhelter of the point of Babiers, which locks in one of the Bayes between the Caſtles and the Mouth of the Dardanelli. But the Wind on a ſudden turning favourable for the Venetians, the Prior of Rochelle with his Squadron, and Mocenigo with three Ships under his Command, made up towards the Caſtles, with deſign to cut the Turks off from their Retreat; the others valiantly aſſailed the Turks, who defending themſelves like thoſe, whoſe chief ſecurity conſiſts in their Arms, there enſued a moſt miſerable ſlaughter on one ſide, and the other; at length the Succeſs of Victory happened to the Venetians, who were animated by the couragious Example of their General Marcello, though he having Boarded, and become Maſter of a great Ship called a Soltana, with the Gally which attended her, was ſhot in the thigh with a Cannon Bullet, and thereby gained the glory to die Conquering, and Triumphant.

The Venetians obtain the Victory.

After whoſe Death, the Proveditor taking upon him the Command of the Fleet, proſecuted the Victory ſo cloſe, that excepting fourteen Gallies which eſcaped with the Captain-Paſha, and four Gallies of the Bey's; all the whole Fleet was either taken, ſunk, or burnt. The Venetians not being able to man all the Veſſels that they had taken, ſet many of them on fire in the Night, excepting only twelve Gallies, four Ships, and two Galleaſſes, which they reſerved for a Demonſtration or Evidence of their Victory. With this glorious ſucceſs five thouſand poor Chriſtians obtained their Freedom, and had their Chains and Shackles knocked off. What number the Turks might have loſt is uncertain; but as to the Venetians, it is reported, that beſides their General, there were not above three hundred Men in all killed and wounded.

The Venetians being encouraged by this Succeſs, attacked the Iſland of Tenedos, and in the ſpace of four days became Maſters of it; as alſo in a ſhort time afterwards of Stalimene, antiently called Lemnos; the which ſhameful Loſſes and Overthrow, ſo irritated the Mind of the Grand Signior, that he gave Orders to carry the War into Dalmatia, intending the next Summer to go thither in Perſon; and in the mean time Commanded by the Paſha of Boſna, that the City of Raguſa ſhould be put into a readineſs to receive his Troops, being judged a convenient Place for the Seat and Magazine of Arms for thoſe Countries.

But the poor Republick greatly apprehending this Miſfortune, than which there could be no greater Miſchief, nor Ruin to their Country; diſpatched certain Deputies with their yearly Tribute to the Port, with Inſtructions, that in the way thither, they ſhould ſupplicate the Paſha to intercede with the Grand Signior in their behalf, repreſenting to his Majeſty, that they paying their annual Tribute for Protection, ought not in juſtice to be expoſed to the licentiouſneſs of an Army, which their little Territories were not capable to receive, nor provide with convenient Quarters: at which Meſſage the Paſha being highly incenſed, anſwered rudely, and impriſoned them; threatning to ſtrangle them, in caſe their Government did not obey the Commands of the Sultan.

BUT the chief Miniſters at the Port, taking into their conſideration the preſent State of Affairs; that the City of Conſtantinople was full of Diſcontents; the Perſian on one ſide, and the Moſcovite on the other, ready to invade divers parts of the Empire; that there were Deſigns to depoſe the Grand Signior, and ſet one of his Brothers on the Throne; beſides a multitude of other Dangers; the reſolution of the Court's removal, and of the Grand Signior's March into Dalmatia, was ſuſpended; his Preſence and Authority being eſteemed moſt requiſite in ſuch a conjuncture of Troubles at the Heart and Center of his Empire. After which, the appearance of the Grand Signior in Publick was leſs frequent; for that he might haſten the departure of the Spahees and Janiſaries for Candia, he deferred his Journey to Adrianople for ſome time; but they being averſe to this War, refuſed to march, until firſt they had received all Arrears which were due to them; the which audacious Propoſal ſo incenſed the Grand Signior, that he cauſed the Heads of two of the moſt forward Mutineers to be cut off in his preſence.

This unſeaſonable rigour rather provoked the Spirits of diſcontented Men, than abated them; and the continual Prizes which the Venetians made on the Turks, and ſtoppage of Proviſions, which did uſually ſupply Conſtantinople from the Archipelago, raiſed the price of Bread, and of all Victuals in that populous City; ſo that the People murmured and exclaimed, as if they had been reduced to their laſt Extremity.

The Grand Vizier conſidering that the loſs of Tenedos was the cauſe of all theſe Inconviences; promiſed the Inhabitants of Conſtantinople, that he would regain it in a ſhort time; in order to which, he ſet forth a very numerous Fleet to beſiege that Fortreſs; but contrary Winds, and bad Weather, forced them into a Neighbouring Port, where they attended the conjunction of the Bey's Gallies with them.

The General of the Venetians having received advice hereof, put to Sea, that he might hinder theſe two Fleets from joining; and was no ſooner in the Channel of Scio, than that he met with ten Sail of Barbery Men of War, convoying a great number of Saiques, and other Veſſels, of which fourteen were laden with Proviſions, carrying alſo with them two hundred thouſand Crowns, which was the Tribute of Rhodes: Theſe the Venetians aſſailed with ſuch Courage and Succeſs, that they burnt the ten Ships, and many of the Saiques; killed a thouſand Turks, took four hundred Priſoners, delivered three hundred Chriſtians; with the loſs only of an hundred killed, and three hundred wounded.

This and other Loſſes augmented the Diſcontents at Conſtantinople, ſo that the Grand Vizier, to hold up the Spirits of the People, reſolved to go in Perſon to Tenedos; and accordingly equipped a Fleet of eighteen Ships, thirty Gallies, ten Galleaſſes, with an innumerable Company of Saiques, and other Veſſels, whereon he embarked twenty thouſand Horſe, and eighty thouſand Foot; with which Army the Vizier ſailed out of the Dardanelli, on the 17*th* of July, having firſt received Intelligence, that Mocenigo was not returned from the Morea, where he had been for ſome time in chaſe of certain Ships. Howſoever the Turks found not the Paſſage ſo clear, but that they encountred with a Squadron of eighteen Sail of Men of War, under the Command of Signior Bembo; the which ſeeming an inconſiderable number to the Turks, they aſſailed them with undoubted hopes of Victory. The Admiral and Vice-Admiral of the Turks, with five other great Ships, charged the Venetian Admiral, who defended himſelf ſo bravely, that for three hours they lay Board and Board; the reſt of the Turkiſh Fleet aſſailed the other part of their Enemies Fleet ſo cloſe, that the Fight became terrible and bloody, both for one and the other, until at length the Turks being worſted, were put to flight, and in the purſuit, a great Turkiſh Sultana was put aſhore near Troy; one of their Galleaſſes was diſabled, two of their Ships ſunk, and the reſt were chaſed as far as Metylene, being put by the Iſland of Tenedos.

In this Interim, the General Mocenigo was on his Voyage towards the Dardanelli; and being come within the noiſe of the Cannon, he haſtened with more diligence; and arrived ſo ſeaſonably to the aſſiſtance of Bembo, that at his appearance moſt of the Turkiſh Gallies began to turn their Sterns, and make towards the Shore of Anatolia, with ſuch diſorder, that of twenty eight Gallies, and two Galleaſſes, there were but five only which kept company with the Baſtard Gally of the Captain-Paſha, and entred with him under the defence of the Caſtles. The reſt of the Fleet was chaſed by Mocenigo; but the Turks being to windward, the Chriſtians were not able that day to come up with them. The next day the Wind being more favourable, a Council of War was held aboard the Venetian General; during which Conſultation, they eſpied five Gallies making towards the Point Baba, there to ſecure themſelves under the Shore: and thereupon reſolved, that whilſt the Captain General, with a Squadron of Malta, attempted thoſe five Gallies, and others which had taken the ſame place of Refuge, the reſt of the Fleet ſhould keep firing at thoſe without.

Accordingly the Captain-General made towards the Point Baba, where paſſing within Musket-ſhot, and under the reach of five Batteries, an unfortunate Shot in the Powder-room blew up the Ship, and therewith ended the Days of this valiant Mocenigo, who died full of Honour and Glory; his brave Actions continuing his Memory in all the Hiſtories of Venice. The Proveditor ſucceeding in his Command, proſecuted the ſame Deſign; and as if he would imitate the ancient Funeral Piles, he celebrated the Obſequies of his General, by burning the Admiral Gally of the Turks, and thence retired towards Tenedos.

After the Turks had reſitted their Veſſels, and put their Fleet in a reaſonable poſture, they departed from Metylene the 28*th* of July at Night, and on the 30*th* were on the Coaſt of Tenedos; where immediatly landing five thouſand Men, and great numbers approaching ready to ſet their foot on Shore, the Defendants of the Fortreſs ſummoned a Council of War; at which all agreeing that the Iſland was not tenable againſt ſo great a Force, embarked their Men, Ammunition, and Artillery, and reſigned their place to the diſpoſal and command of the Enemy. After which Succeſs the Turks in like manner landed ten thouſand Men on the Iſland of Lemnos; where, having laid a formal Siege to the Caſtle, they made a general Aſſault, but were repulſed with the loſs of five hundred Men, leaving their Scaling-Ladders to the Beſieged. They made afterwards divers Attempts, but in all were beaten off with conſiderable loſs; ſo that they had abandoned the Enterprize, had not the greater fear and apprehenſion of the Divan at Home, confirmed their Courage againſt the Enemy; until at length the Chriſtians being wearied with two Months Siege, without hopes of Relief, were forced to a Surrender; which was performed on Articles, That they ſhould depart with Arms, Baggage, and have free liberty to embark themſelves for Candia.

Theſe two important Places being regained by the Turks, were the Subject of great Joy to the Court, and of Courage and Satisfaction to the Inhabitants of Conſtantinople: So that the Grand Signior apprehending that by theſe Succeſſes, the Seditions and Mutinies of the City were appeaſed, he took his Journey to Adrianople; where to evidence his Grandeur to the Bailo Capello, and the Secretary Ballarino, he made his entry with an Army of twenty thouſand Men, beſides the ordinary Attendance of the Court, and uſual Concomitants of the Ottoman Train.

After which Oſtentation, the Grand Signior encharged Ballarino to write to the Senate, That though he was able to over-run all their Country, and take from them their Capital City, yet ſuch was his Clemency, that he was contented to grant them Peace, on Conditions that they ſurrendred to him all the Iſland of Candia, with the Fortreſs of Cliſſia in Dalmatia, and paiment of three Millions of Gold for the Dammages of the War.

But theſe ſeemed to the Senate to be ſuch unreaſonable Propoſitions, and ſo prejudicial to their Honour, that they reſolved to maintain the War, and to defend themſelves more vigorouſly than ever.

NOtwithſtanding the Deſigns of the Turks againſt Dalmatia, they were not leſs intent to their Affairs in Candia, deſigning to try their Fortune once again in the Siege of the principal City of that Name, for that falling into their Hands, the whole Iſland would quickly be reduced, and with that Conqueſt an end would be put unto the War.

The Venetians, on the other ſide, attended to their Buſineſs with all diligence, not neglecting any Proviſions which might ſecure their Intereſt in that Country; and that they might regain what they had loſt, they held Intelligence with ſome Perſons in Canea, hoping by their means to ſurpriſe the Town; but the Turkiſh Governour, being very vigilant, reinforced his Gariſon with five hundred Men: and Chuſaein Paſha coming to his Aſſiſtance with thirty Gallies, diſappointed the Venetians of landing at that place.

The Rendezvous of the Army which was to march into Dalmatia, was ordered to be at Adrianople, where the Brother-in-Law of the Paſha of Aleppo, who was Commander of the Forces of that Place, arriving later than the day prefixed, was for that reaſon put to death by the Great Vizier.

This Severity ſo enraged the Paſha, that immediately he raiſed an Army of forty thouſand Men, and marched towards Scutari, threatning Conſtantinople it ſelf, unleſs the Head of the Great Vizier were given him by way of repriſal for that of his Brothers. The Divan being ſtartled hereat, returned him a gentle Meſſage, neither denying nor granting his Demand, as if they intended to amuſe him with Hopes: But he interpreting this Delay for a Refuſal, did not only perſiſt in requiring the Head of the Vizier, but of four other principal Counſellors, whom he judged to have concurred in the Sentence for his Brother's Death; and in farther proſecution hereof, he burnt and ſpoiled all the Country about Conſtantinople; and the Plague raging at the ſame time in the City, affected the Inhabitants with ſuch Sadneſs and Diſcontent, that the chief Miniſters apprehended more Evil from thence, than from the Enemy without.

The Army of the Paſha daily increaſing, and being grown from forty to ſixty thouſand Men, cauſed the Vizier to abandon all other Thoughts and Deſigns but thoſe which tended to the deſtruction of the Paſha, and his Complices; ſo that there neceſſarily followed a Revulſion of the Forces from Dalmatia; the Vizier himſelf diverting them from thence and Tranſylvania, marched with the whole Army towards Conſtantinople.

Yet before the Great Vizier departed from Adrianople, he perſwaded the Grand Signior to ſet the Bailo Capello, and the Secretary Ballarino at Liberty, that thereby he might give ſome jealouſy to the Rebels, as if he deſigned to make a Peace with Venice, to have more Power, and better leizure to make his War againſt them. This Counſel, though prudently given, had yet little Influence on the Humor of the Paſha, who continued his March, fortifying himſelf in the moſt advantageous Paſſes of the Country: But what was moſt bold of all his Actions, and rendred his Pardon beyond the Clemency of his Soveraign, was the proclaiming a Youth of twenty Years of Age, then with him in his Army, to be the Son of Sultan Morat, and conſequently the lawful Heir of the Crown; and that in right of him, he had taken poſſeſſion of a great part of Aſia, and was marching towards Conſtantinople, with reſolution to diſpoſſeſs Sultan Mehmet, and exalt this lawful and undoubted Heir on the Throne of his Anceſtors.

This and other Rumors from Perſia, that that King taking the advantage of theſe Diſorders, was making Preparations to regain Bagdat, or Babylon, and revenge himſelf of all thoſe Cruelties which the Turks had inflicted on his Subjects and Country, increaſed the Fears and Cares of the chief Miniſters of State.

Notwithſtanding which, Chuſaein Paſha proſecuted his Buſineſs no leſs in Candia than formerly, in hopes to put an end to the War there before the end of the Summer; and in order thereunto, he received a Recruit of five and twenty thouſand Men from the Morea. But the daily increaſe of the Paſha's Forces, and his approach towards Conſtantinople, as it was a Matter of the higheſt Conſequence, ſo it required the moſt prudence and caution in the management.

In the firſt place therefore by Fetſa, or Reſolve from the Mufti, the Paſha was declared a Rebel, and guilty of High Treaſon againſt the Sultan; notwithſtanding which, a Chaous was diſpatched with Letters of Pardon, if now repenting of his Fault, he would diſband his Army, and return to his former Obedience, he ſhould be received into Grace and Favour. The Paſha received the Chaous with the ſame Ceremony and Honour, as if he had been an Ambaſſador, being willing to conſider him under that Character, rather than under the Notion of a Purſuivant, or Officer ſent to affright him into his Duty; and in Anſwer to the Meſſage, replied, That it was not in his power to condeſcend to any Conditions, for that ſince he had aſſumed the Cauſe of this Youth, who was the Son of Sultan Morat, concealed to that Age by his Mother, for fear of the Power of his Uncle, he could not aſſent to any Terms or Conditions leſs than the Exaltation of him to the Ottoman Throne. And ſo carrying this Young Man with him, as a Property, whereby to cover his Rebellion with the Guiſe of Juſtice and Duty, he maintained a Court for him after the Ottoman Faſhion; and cauſing the Tagho, or Standards, to be carried before him, he permitted him to give Audiences, ſend Diſpatches, and to take on him all the Royal Marks of Empire.

The Army of the Paſha was by this time encreaſed to ſeventy thouſand Men, one part of which he ſent towards Scutari, and another towards Smyrna, which alarm'd all the Countries round about, and gave the Grand Signior ſuch cauſe of Apprehenſion, that he tried divers Means, and made many Propoſitions of Honours and Benefits to the Paſha, whereby to allure him to Obedience: One while he offered to him the Government of Grand Cairo: but that being rejected, he endeavoured to raiſe Men in Aſia to oppoſe the progreſs of his Arms; of which ſome numbers being got into a Body, and perceiving the formidable Force of the Paſha, revolted, and joined themſelves to his Party.

This Extremity of Affairs, cauſed the Grand Signior not only again to proclaim the Paſha a Rebel, but to give liberty to his People to deſtroy him and his Souldiers in any parts where they ſhould encounter them. In purſuance of which Licenſe, a Village in Aſia having killed twenty five or thirty of the Paſha's Men, which came thither to refreſh themſelves; the Paſha was ſo enraged thereat, that he cauſed his Souldiers to put Man, Woman, and Child to the Sword throughout the Village. And in this manner the Affairs of the Turks remained in the greateſt Confuſion imaginable through the whole courſe of this Year 1658.

NOR did this Year begin with better Omens of Succeſs, for to the other Dangers, was added a Report, that the Perſian had taken the Field with two hundred thouſand Men, for re-

1659. covery of Bagdat, or Babylon, which was the ancient Patrimony of his Foreſathers; ſo that the Grand Signior being rendred thereby more willing to agree and accommodate Affairs with the Paſha, proffered to him the Government of the Province of Soria for ever, paying only a yearly Homage of an hundred thouſand Sultanees, in lieu of three hundred thouſand, which that Country always yielded. But the Pride of the Paſha ſcorned a Proffer of ſo mean a Conſideration, having nothing leſs in his Thoughts than the entire enjoyment of the Empire, or at leaſt to partake an equal ſhare thereof with the Sultan.

For the Hopes of the Paſha encreaſing with his Army, which was now grown to eighty thouſand Men, he took up for ſome days his Head-quarters near the Fortreſs of Tocacaia, within ten days march of Smyrna; and thence approaching towards Conſtantinople, the chief Miniſters concluded, that there was no other Safety but in their Arms; and that the Paſha was not to be reduced to any terms of Gentleneſs or Moderation. Accordingly the Great Vizier paſſed into Aſia with a numerous Army, and ſpeedily joined Battel with the Paſha, which continued for ſome Hours with great ſlaughter on one ſide and the other; but at length the fortune of the Day turned in favour of the Paſha; and the Vizier's Army being routed, he loſt all his Cannon and Baggage, and he himſelf was forced to ſave himſelf in the Neighbouring Countries; where not being purſued by the Paſha, he had time again to collect his torn and ſcattered Troops. The News hereof multiplied the Diſorders and Confuſions at Conſtantinople, to which being added the Motion of the Perſians, and that they were to join with the Paſha; as alſo ſome Troubles in Tranſylvania, cauſed by the unquiet Spirit of Ragotski, together with the ill Humour of the Male-contents in the City, made all things appear with equal or greater Danger at Home than Abroad.

Wherefore, as the ultimate Remedy of theſe imminent Dangers, it was reſolved, that the Grand Signior ſhould go in Perſon to the War, on ſuppoſition that Reverence to his Royal Perſon would produce that awe on the Spirits of his Subjects, which was not to be effected by Violence, or force of Arms. According to this Reſolution the Grand Signior paſſed into Aſia, and joining his Forces with thoſe of the Vizier, compoſed an Army of ſeventy thouſand Foot, and thirty thouſand Horſe; with which marching boldly towards the Enemy, the Heart of the Paſha began to fail him; ſo that calling a Council of his Officers, he propoſed his Inclinations towards Terms of Agreement, rather than to hazard all on the Uncertainties of a Battel; the Spirits of the Souldiery being now become tractable by the appearance of ſo great a Force, aſſented to the Propoſition; and thereupon Articles being ſpeedily drawn up, were ſent to the Grand Signior for his Approbation; who, though he would not ſeem to refuſe any thing therein contained, yet declined a perſonal Treaty, as being a Matter too mean for his Imperial Perſon to capitulate with his Vaſſals; and therefore ordered, that Mortaza Paſha ſhould Treat in his behalf, promiſing to confirm whatſoever Act Mortaza Paſha ſhould conclude in this Matter.

Mortaza being thus made Plenipotentiary, refuſed to treat with the Paſha, until ſuch time as he had retreated with his Army at a diſtance of ſome days March from the Grand Signior's Camp; which being performed near a Town called Alexandria, he fooliſhly ſuffered himſelf to be ſeparated in a private Place from his Army, on pretence that Peace was more aptly concluded in a free Retirement, than under the conſtraint and force of the Souldiery. Here Mortaza meeting the Paſha, forcibly ſtrangled him, with ſeventeen of his Complices, whom he had brought with him for Witneſſes to his Capitulations with the Grand Signior. With the news hereof the Army of the Paſha ſoon disbanded, every one with ſhame and ſilence ſhifting for himſelf, retired to his own Country and Home. And herewith eaſily ended this Civil War almoſt in a moment, which but now threatned the Extirpation of the Ottoman Race.

The cruel Vizier retained his thoughts of Revenge, which we ſhall ſhortly hear in what manner he vented on the great Spahees and rich Men in Aſia, who had joined themſelves with the Paſha in this Rebellion. This good Service promoted Mortaza, and rendred him more conſiderable to the Grand Signior; ſo that he was employed in the Aſſiſtance of the Tartars, againſt Ragotski in Tranſylvania, and afterwards preferred to the important Charge of Bagdat, or Babylon, of whoſe Succeſs, and Fate, we ſhall hear in the Sequal of a few Years.

But as yet the Commotions of Aſia were not ſo wholly extinguiſhed, but that the Nephew of the Paſha of Aleppo, in revenge of the treacherous Death of his Uncle, took up Arms, and was followed by the People of the Territories depending on Aleppo. To his Aſſiſtance came in alſo the Son of Chuſaein Paſha, late General in Candia, whom the cruel Vizier had put to death, notwithſtanding the merit of his late Services, which might ſeem to atone for his former Miſfortunes, and make ſatisfaction for non-compliance with Inſtructions; but this Vizier, who never pardoned any Perſon, would not begin with an Act of Clemency towards one who was none of his Creatures or Confidents depending on him.

To theſe joined the Bey of Torgue, who caſting off his Obedience to the Paſha of Cairo, entred into the Cabal with ten thouſand Horſe; ſo that a formidable Army being compoſed by this Union, gave a new Subject of Fear and Apprehenſion at Conſtantinople. But the Great Vizier ſo dextrouſly managed his Affair, by ſowing Diſſention between the Chiefs, and beſtowing Largeſſes on the Souldiery, that the Army unſenſibly mouldred away, leaving their Generals, and Commanders to ſhift for themſelves, and expoſing them to the Juſtice of a Vizier, who was unacquainted with Mercy, and never pardoned any who was either guilty of a Fault, or ſuſpected for it.

Towards the end of this Year, the Vizier built the lower Forts, which are ſcituated at the entrance into the Dardanelles, commonly called by the name of the Queen-Mother's Caſtles. And diſpatched a Chaous to the Paſha of Canea, to put all things in a Readineſs for the Siege of Candia; Orders were alſo given to the Paſhaws of the Inland Countries to prepare themſelves for the Wars againſt Dalmatia, and Tranſilvania.

THE Rendezvous of the Army being appointed at Belgrade, the Vizier haſtened thither in Perſon to quicken the Preparations, 1660. and March of the Souldiers, which were flocking thither from all parts. This Vizier Kuperlee, though aged, was yet very active and vigorous, by which he created ſo much confidence of himſelf in his Maſter, that he acted nothing in all the Government but by his Counſel and Direction: which being always jealous and bloody towards thoſe who had any Power in the Empire, he for that Reaſon cut off the Caſir of Damaſcus, who though he was a good Governour, and a faithful Servant, yet becauſe he was a Favourite of the Queen-Mother, and preſerved the State of his Affairs in a laudable poſture, he grew jealous of his Power, and therefore ſacrificed his Blood to his own Security and Bloody Diſpoſition.

The which act of unjuſt Cruelty ſo enraged the Queen-Mother, that ſhe for ever after bore a mortal hatred to this Vizier, and continued the ſame to his Son, which was the famous Kuperlee; but his Moderation and Diſcretion was ſo well tempered with reſpect towards her, that She at length not only pardoned the Sin of his Father in him, but became his Friend, and reliſhed the Services which he performed for his Maſter.

The Venetians having about this time received conſiderable Succours, namely four thouſand French Foot, which his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, after the Concluſion of Peace at the Pyrenean Treaty, had moſt generouſly Spared to that Republick, were enabled to attempt ſome notable Enterpaize; and thereby ſo hardly preſſed the Paſha of Canea, that he earneſtly wrote to the Grand Signior for Succours; aſſuring him, that without preſent Relief, he ſhould be forced to ſurrender his Town to the Mercy of the Enemy. The Grand Signior promiſed him ſpeedy Relief, and for his better encouragement ſent him the Preſent of a Sword and a Veſt of Sables; in the mean time the Venetians took three Forts, viz. Calamo, Calegro, and Epicarno, and proceeded to lay Siege to Canea; but the Enemy having received a Supply of three thouſand Men into the Town, the Chriſtians quitted this enterprize in hopes of beating the Turks out of new Candia; which was lately built near to the old Candia, with deſign to keep that Town ſtraitned by perpetual Alarms, and by the vicinity of ſo bad a Neighbourhood. 1660.

The Grand Vizer being very Aged, was ſubject to many Infirmities, and falling ſick at Belgrade, he was adviſed by the Phyſicians to change the Air, as the beſt Remedy for his Diſeaſe; and indeed they were all careful to give him the beſt and ſafeſt Counſels, for that he often threatned them, if he died of that Sickneſs, he would ſend them all to the next World before him. The Vizier following the Advice of his Phyſicians, returned to Adrianople, where having in a good meaſure recovered his Health, he ſent Orders to Hali Paſha, then General of the Forces in Hungary, to haſten the Siege of Waradin, being eſteemed by the Turks an advantagious Fortreſs for carrying on their Conqueſts in that Country; of the taking of which Town, and of all the Trouble in Tranſylvania, cauſed by the ambitious humour of Ragotzki, we ſhall treat at large in the following Hiſtory. For being come to that time, in which Providence allotted me a charge at Conſtantinople; I was thereby ſomewhat elevated on a riſing Ground, whereby I could with my own Eyes ſurvey the Tranſactions of that great Empire; and for that Reaſon I call them my Memoirs; which for being Matters tranſacted in my own Time, I have thought fit to introduce them with a ſhort Advertiſement to the Reader.

HISTORY OF THE TURKS,

FROM THE
YEAR 1660, to the YEAR 1678.
With the moſt Remarkable Paſſages Relating to the
ENGLISH TRADE
In the ſpace of Eighteen Years.

TO THE READER.

Courteous Reader,

THIS following Hiſtory is ſome part of thoſe fruits ariſing from my vacant hours of eighteen Years reſidence in Turky, ſeven whereof I compleated at Conſtantinople, in quality of Secretary to the Lord Ambaſſador; and for eleven Years I exerciſed the Office of Conſul at Smyrna. In the firſt times of which, I had great advantages to obſerve, and make my Annotations; having for the moſt part been acquainted with the perſons as well as with the affairs of thoſe concerning whom I write; and indeed the incumbence which was then upon me, obliged me to a knowledg both of perſons and buſineſs. My latter time, which was that of being Conſul, conſtrained me to an attendance on matters relating to the government of our Trade; and therefore it is not to be expected, that at that diſtance from the Court, I ſhould lay down Tranſactions ſo poſitive, and particular, as in the preceding Years; yet the acquaintance, and correſpondence I afterwards continued at Court, and the care I took to inform my ſelf of what occurred, qualified me in ſome meaſure for an Hiſtorian; at leaſt put me into a condition to make a Breviate, or Collection of certain Obſervations occurring in the Turkiſh Court.

When I firſt entred on this work, I was carried with a certain emulation of French and Italian Writers, of whoſe Miniſters few there were employed in the parts of Turky, but who carried with them from thence, Memoirs, Giornals, or Hiſtorical Obſervations of their times. In which our Nation hath been ſo defective, that beſides ſome ſcattered and abrupt Papers, without coherence, or method, adjoined to the end of Knoll's Hiſtory of the Turks (which is an excellent collection from divers Authors) one ſhall ſcarce find five ſheets of Paper wrote by our Countrymen in way of Hiſtory. At which omiſſion having often wondred, I reſolved from my firſt entrance in thoſe Countries, to note down in a blank Book what occurred in that Empire, either as to Civil, or Military affairs; with what Caſualties and Changes befel our Trade, that ſo both one and the other might ſerve for Examples and Precedents to future Ages; the which after ſome years afforded me materials to compoſe and frame this following Diſcourſe. In which, having by Gods aſſiſtance thus far proceeded; As it may be an Example to my Succeſſors, to ſpin and draw out the thread of this Hiſtory through Ages to come; ſo it will be a good part, and office, of thoſe who reſide there at preſent, by a more diligent enquiry to correct, and amend what I have miſtaken, or miſunderſtood.

For next to the immediate attendance to the Charge and Truſt impoſed upon me, I judged it a chief duty towards my Country, to denote and Record certain Tranſactions relating to Trade, which is the grand Intereſt that hath engaged England to a Communication and Correſpondence with theſe remote Parts: nor doth the World perhaps expect much leſs from me, than that I ſhould add ſomething to the Hiſtory of the Turks in our time; which howſoever imperfectly I may perform it, yet the Offices which I have exerciſed, and the impartiality with which it is wrote, may gain it ſome credit and reputation in the World. For in the writing hereof, I cannot be taxed with animoſity to any perſon; nor am I to be eſteemed as poſſeſſed with affection, or partiality to any ſide; which is a point of ſobriety, and good temper, neceſſary for all Hiſtorians: For we who lived in thoſe parts, were little concerned for the Houſe of Kuperlee, or for the Favourites of the Court; nor was it of any moment to us, whether the Faction of the Spahees, or Janizaries prevailed; or whether the Courtiers, or the Soldiers, ruled the Empire: only we eſteemed it our duty, to ſpeak beſt of that Government under which our Trade thrived moſt. And tho the times of Sultan Ibrahim were the golden days for Merchants, which employed our Navigation beyond the memory of any times, either before, or ſince; and conſumed of our Manufactories (tho not in greater quantities yet) perhaps with better advantage and profit to our Nation: Yet I ought not to be ſo injurious, or ungrateful to Sultan Mahomet the Fourth, as to accuſe his Government of Oppreſſion, or Violence towards us, or of any breach of Articles, and Priviledges, which he had granted to his Majeſties Subjects; but ſhall rather applaud, and be ready to own that Juſtice which our Complaints have found, and met at the Ottoman Court, under the protection of thoſe worthy Ambaſſadors ſent by his Majeſty to ſtand Centinel on the Guard of their Country.

For whereas in the time of Sultan Morat, when the Military men bore the ſway; Injuſtice and Violence, which mingled in all the actions of Rule, had an influence alſo on the Engliſh affairs: And when in the time of Sultan Ibrahim, that the Female Court had gained the predominancy, and that vaſt Treaſures were expended in Riot and Luxury; the prodigality of great perſons made it neceſſary to be rapacious and unjuſt: But in theſe more moderate times of this preſent Sultan, when neither exceſſive Wars abroad, nor Luxury nor immoderate expence at home, exhauſted the Coffers; We may eaſily imagine, that the diſorders of State did not drive the Rulers to a neceſſity of exerciſing unjuſt Arts, which are always moſt certain Symptoms, either of a bad Government, or a vicious inclination in the Prince.

The Engliſh Trade, according to the Chronicles of Sir Richard Baker, was firſt introduced into the Country of the Turks, in the Year 1579. but Sagredo an Italian Writer, accounts only from the Year 1583. perhaps before that time Overtures were only made for a Trade, which might be ſo inconſiderable, as that until then it was not eſteemed worthy to be adorned with an Ambaſſador, or to be oppoſed by the Miniſters of Foreign Princes. For ſo ſoon as an Ambaſſador from England appeared at the Ottoman Court, with Credential Letters from Queen Elizabeth, the French and Venetian Miniſters took the Alarm, and oppoſed his reception, eſpecially the French, who (as Sagredo reports in his Hiſtory of the Turks) repreſented unto the G. Vizier, how much this new Friendſhip with the Engliſh would obſtruct that ancient Alliance which was made with his King, and would impeach and leſſen the Priviledges and Trade which they enjoyed in thoſe parts: To which the Vizier anſwered, according to their uſual phraſe and ſtile; That the happy Imperial Seat where his Maſter reſided, was called the Port, becauſe it was free and open to all ſuch who deſired to take refuge and ſanctuary therein, and therefore the Engliſh without juſt reaſon ought not to be excluded. That the Sultan ought not to be denied that freedom of love and hatred, which was common to all Mankind; and that he was as well reſolved to chuſe and cheriſh his Friends, as to proſecute and deſtroy his Enemies. Whereunto the French Ambaſſador urged, That ſince it was the pleaſure of the Grand Signior to admit the Engliſh; that at leaſt they ſhould be obliged to enter Conſtantinople under the French Colours. But the Engliſh Ambaſſador replied, that his Miſtreſs who was ſo potent, ſcorned all Dependencies on other Nations, and would rather abandon the Friendſhip of the Sultan, than admit the leaſt diminution of her own honour: And embelliſhing his Diſcourſes (as Sagredo proceeds) with the repreſentation of that advantage and profit, which the Engliſh Trade would bring to the Ottoman Empire; he ſo enſnared the hearts of the Turks, that they preferred the admittance of new Gueſts, before the Alliance of ancient Friends. Since which time our Commerce and Trade with the Turk hath been in its increaſe, and being governed by a Wiſe and Grave Company of Experienced Merchants, hath by Gods bleſſing brought an ineſtimable Treaſure and advantage to the Engliſh Nation, which that it may ſtill continue, increaſe, and flouriſh in all Ages and times to come, is the hearty deſire, and Prayer of him, who is a true, and faithful Servant to that worthy Society, and a ſincere Wellwiſher to his Country.

OF Sultan Mahomet IV.
XIII. EMPEROUR
OF THE
TURKS,
Beginning in the
OF HIS REIGN.

The Firſt BOOK.

Anno Chriſti, 1661. Hegeira, 1072.

IT was now the beginning of this Year, when the Earl of Winchelſea arrived at Conſtantinople, the firſt Embaſſadour ſent abroad from His Majeſty of Great Britain, Charles the Second, after his happy Return to the Glorious Throne of his Anceſtors, to Sultan Mahomet, the Thirteenth Emperour of the Turks; it being judged fit, that amongſt other Alliances which were to be contracted with Foreign Princes, and States, this of Turkey ſhould not be omitted, but rather in the firſt place conſidered: In regard, that as the flouriſhing Eſtate and Proſperity of England's richeſs depends abſolutely on her Foreign Trade, ſo on none more particularly than on that of Turkey, which conſumes great quantities of her moſt ſtaple and ſubſtantial Manufactures, and makes returns in whatſoever Employs, and gives Bread to the poor and induſtrious of the Nation.

But before we come to treat of the Succeſſes of this Ambaſſador, and the various Tranſactions in the Turkiſh Affairs; we ſhall relate ſome accidents which befel us in our Voyage by Sea to Conſtantinople. The Earl of Winchelſea and his Lady, with a numerous Retinue being embarked on the Plymouth Frigat, commanded by Sir Thomas Allen, and accompanied with a Catch and two Merchants Ships, the Proſperous and Smyrna Factor for Turkey, ſet ſail from the Downs on the Twentieth of Octob. 1660. And proceeding with a favourable Gale, and fair Weather, until we were come to the heighth of the Norward Cape, or Cape Finiſterre; we then contended with ſo ſevere a ſtorm, that we were forced to bring our Ship under a main courſe, to faſten our Helm, and lye, and drive. In the Twenty nineth about Five in the Morning, our main Tack flew, which ſhook and ſtrained our Maſs ſo violently, that it was ſhivered in two places between Decks: The danger hereof might have proved of ill conſequence, had the Maſt gone by the Board; for in all probability it would have carried up our Decks, unfixed both our Pumps, and laid us open to the Sea; but the Providence of God, and the diligence of our Lisbon.

Seamen was ſuch, that we ſoon ſtruck our Top Maſt boared our main Yard, and ſo fiſhed the Maſt it ſelf where it was defective, that with the help of our fore-Sail, and the benefit of better Weather we ſafely arrived on the Thirty firſt in the Port of Lisbon. The Match being then in Treaty between Charles the Second our Dread Soveraign, and Catherine the Infanta of Portugal, now our gracious Queen; all the concernments of England were extreamly acceptable to the Court of Portugal; and particularly the Perſon of the Earl of Winchelſea, a Peer of England, qualified with the Character of Ambaſſadour Extraordinary to the Ottomon Port. For at our firſt arrival there, I being then Secretary to the ſaid Earl, was employed to carry a Letter to the King, which was received by the Councel of State then ſitting: After the Letter had been read and conſidered, I was called in, and an anſwer given me by the Marquis de Niſſa, and D. Gaſper Faria de Sevarin then Secretary of State, to this purpoſe. That they were glad, ſo grateful an opportunity preſented, whereby they might Demonſtrate their warm and real affections towards the King of England, by ſerving his Ambaſſadour in ſo neceſſary a piece of Service as that which was required: That Orders were given to furniſh the Ship with a Maſt, and what ſhe wanted, out of the Kings Stores; and that both his Excellency and Lady, with all their Retinue ſhould be welcomed a ſhore, with due regard to their Quality and Condition. The Day following his Excellency was complemented from the King, by a Maeſtro de Campo ſent to him on Shipboard; and being come aſhoar, and lodged at the Houſe of Mr. Maynard the Engliſh Conſul, he was viſited by D. Franciſco de Melo, (who had before, and was afterwards employed Ambaſſadour into England) and by D. Antonio de Saouſa and others. After Eight days his Excellency had Audience of the King, and the Queen Mother, and was received by both, with many demonſtrations of a hearty deſire to contract a firm Alliance with England. He was afterwards invited by the Conde de Odemira Governour of the young King, and Chief Miniſter of Portugal, to a Quinta, or Garden-houſe at Bellain: where were preſent the Duke of Calaval, the Viſconde de Caſtel Blanco, and D. Franciſco de Melo; the entertainment was very ſplendid, with variety of Diſhes, and Wine, correſponding rather with the inordinate Tables of Engliſh, than with the frugality, and temperate Diet of Spaniards. Our Ship being in this interim refitted, we returned aboard on the Twelfth of November; the Earl of Winchelſea being preſented by the King, with ſeveral Hampers of ſweet-Meats, Veſſels of Wine, and other Proviſions for his Voyage; and his Lady by the Queen Mother, with a Jewel of conſiderable value, and with diverſe boxes filled with Purſes of perfumed Leather, and Amber Comfits.

Algier.

On the Thirteenth we ſet Sail, being deſign'd by Order of his Majeſty for Algier, to ſettle a Peace with that unſetled People; where arriving on the Tewenty ſecond day about Three a Clock in the Afternoon, we came to an Anchor about Two Miles diſtant from the Town, which we ſaluted with Twenty one Guns, but received none again in anſwer thereunto; it being the cuſtome of that People, not to acknowledge Civilities, but to repay injuries, and not requite benefits. We found that they had already begun to break the Peace: Having brought in thither an Engliſh Ship, which lay between hope and fear of freedom, or ſeizure: So ſoon as we had dropt our Anchors, a Boat came from that Ship, acquainting us of the State of Algier, and how near Matters were to a Rupture with them; by this Boat my Lord Ambaſſadour ſent a Letter to the Conſul, appointing him to come aboard; who the next Day, being the Twenty third, appeared accordingly; to whom his Excellency imparted the Inſtructions and Orders from his Majeſty to renew the Peace on the former Articles; and particularly to inſert a Caution, That the Algerines ſhould on no terms ſearch our Ships, but that the Paſſengers, and goods thereon, whether of Engliſh or Strangers, ſhould be free and exempted from all ſeizure, and Pyracy whatſoever. I being appointed to aſſiſt the Conſul in this Treaty, accompanied him aſhoar, and in the firſt place we applyed our ſelves to Ramadam Bullock-baſhee, then the Chief of their Divan, and Head of their Government; whom we acquainted, that on the Ship in the road, was an Earl of England, ſent Ambaſſadour by his Majeſty our King to the Grand Signor, and in his way thither was appointed to touch at Algier, and to inform the Government of that place of the happy Reſtoration of his Majeſty to the Throne of his Father, and to confirm the ſame Peace which was before concluded with uſurped Powers, and ſo delivered him the Letters from his Majeſty, which were ſuperſcribed in this manner:

To their Excellencies the Aga, Jiabaſhees, and reſt of the Honourable Council of State and War, in the City and Kingdom of Algier.

Ramadam anſwered us, that he was well ſatisfied with the Propoſal; that there was a Peace already with the Engliſh, and that they were Brothers; that the next Day was appointed for a general Divan of great and ſmall, at which we might freely open our breaſts, and declare whatſoever was committed to us by our King and his Ambaſſadour.

But for the better underſtanding of the State of Algier, at this time, we muſt obſerve, that for many years before, this government was compoſed of a Divan, the Chief and Head whereof was a Paſha ſent every Three years to preſide there, and had ſo continued, until that ſome few Months before this time one Halil a poor Fellow, who had no better Eſtate than the Sixteenth part of a Veſſel, but bold and deſperate, complained one Day in open Divan againſt the Paſha, accuſing him of many miſcarriages, with which he ſo affected the Divan; that he rudely threw him from his Seat, drubbed him, trampled on him, and plucked the Hairs out of his Beard, which is the greateſt mark of ignominy and contempt that any Perſon can offer to another; and having committed him to Priſon and Chains, he with the Divan took upon himſelf the unlimited Power of an Arbitrary Government: And thus for the ſpace of Six or Eight Months this Miſcreant tyrannized, and ruled without controul: Until an obſcure and contemptible Moor, an ordinary Jerbin or Countryman, inſtigated (as was ſuppoſed) by the Aga, or General of the Souldiery, approaching near him in the Streets, under pretence of kiſſing his Veſt, ſtruck him with a long Knife between the Ribs; which boldneſs of the Moor ſo aſtoniſhed the Attendants which were about him, that none had power to lay hands on the Murderer, but ſuffered him to depart, and fly unpurſued: Of this wound Halil dyed in Two days, in which time he nominated Ramadam his Kinſman to be the moſt proper, and fit Perſon to ſucced him in the Government; vernment; and this recommendation ſo prevailed on the Divan, that he was elected for their Chief: A Perſon of a moſt ſordid, and Mercenary Soul, immerſed in Covetouſneſs, and Gluttony, guided by his Luſt and Intereſt, unleſs ſome times reſtrained by the Authority of the Divan, and the fear of popular Inſurrection.

The Algier Divan.

* Jiabaſhees are of another degree; it may be in good Turkiſh Odabaſhees, or Captains of the Chambers of Janiſaries.

This Ramadam according to his Promiſe before recited, ſummon'd us the day following, being the Twenty-fourth to the Divan; which conſiſts in all of Twenty-four Bulluck-baſhees, who are Officers of the Souldiery, each commanding Twenty-four Souldiers under him, * Twenty-four Jiabaſhees, and Eighteen Ancients or grave Seniors: Though for that preſent, there appeared no more than Forty-five, the others being at Sea, or abroad; Ramadam was placed in the Chair, or in a Seat at the upper end, and the Aga ſate by him, the others ſtood on their feet, and put themſelves into Two Files, or Ranks; and then Ramadam began with a loud Voice to cry, The Engliſh are come to treat a Peace with you, and have brought Letters from their King, and from their Ambaſſadour now aboard going for Conſtantinople; which very words every one diſtinctly pronounced, and repeated them, carrying the Voice from the lower to the upper end; I fancied, that it was after the manner of our repeating Syllogiſms in diſputations, that ſo no miſtake might be, and that the Reſpondent might have time to conſider and weigh the argument. Then Ramadam demanded, whether they were pleaſed to enter into Treaty with the Engliſh; which words being repeated as before, and anſwered in the Affirmative, the Letters were read in the Turkiſh Tranſlation; with the Articles of Peace propoſed, which were as followeth:

I. T*Hat the* Engliſh ſhall be obliged to protect all Paſſengers belonging to Algier, aboard their Ships, to the utmoſt of their power, againſt any of their Enemies. And in like manner all forreign Paſſengers, Merchants and others, their goods, and Eſtates embarked, and laden on Engliſh Ships, ſhall paſs free, and be protected from the Ships of Algier, and be ſuffered to paſs without moleſtation.

II. No Shipwrack of Engliſh on the coaſt of Algier, ſhall become prize, nor their goods forfeited, nor their men made Slaves, but the People of Algier ſhall do their beſt endeavour to ſave both them and their goods.

III. That neither the Conſul, nor other Engliſhman, ſhall be obliged to ſatisfie the Debts of another Engliſhman, unleſs he hath been bound, or become Security for him.

IV. That no Engliſhman in matter of difference ſhall be ſubject to any Judgment, but that of the Divan.

V. That the Engliſh in differences amongſt themſelves ſhall be ſubject to no determination, but to that of the Engliſh Conſul.

VI. That either ſide are to furniſh men of War with all neceſſaries their Ports afford, at the Market rates, without paying cuſtom.

VII. If any grievance happen, neither party ſhall break the Peace until ſatisfaction be denied.

Theſe Articles being read, were all approved except the firſt; for they declared, that they would have a Liberty to ſearch our Ships, and take out the Goods and Perſons of Strangers; for that otherwiſe, we having this priviledge, might carry away the Trade of the whole World in our Shipping; and that French, Spaniards, Italians, Dutch, and all other Nations, had no need of other protection and ſafeguard for their Perſons and Goods, than to put them under the Engliſh colours: And that then their men of War might rove the Seas to no purpoſe, their City become poor, and their Souldiers ſtarve, when they returned home. We on the other ſide, being ſenſible how prejudicial and diſhonourable ſuch an Article as this would be, and how ruinous to our Navigation, and having his Majeſties Command to the contrary, abſolutely refuſed to aſſent, or agree thereunto. Whilſt we were thus arguing, a great fat Turk appeared with two young men his Slaves, one a Frenchman, and the other a Dutchman requeſting Ramadam to recommend him to us for paſſage to Smyrna; and having performed his requeſt to him by kiſſing his Hand, Ramadan made it his requeſt to us in behalf of that his Kinſman, recommending him to our care and protection, and conjuring us thereunto by that Sacred league of Peace that was between us: We readily aſſented thereunto, and at the ſame time took hold of the Example to repreſent the reaſonableneſs of that Article on which we inſiſted. For ſhall we (ſaid we) protect your People, and will you require, and impoſe it upon us as a matter Juſt and Sacred? And ſhall not the greatneſs of our King have a Liberty to diſpence the like Priviledge to other Nations, his Neighbours, and Allies, governed by Kings and Princes, who are Chriſtian, and of his Kindred, and near Relations? But neither this, nor any other argument was Reaſon, or Sence to them; nor did they care to anſwer it by other arguments, than that of their own diſadvantage thereby; and that if they aſſented thereunto, their Ships might better rot in the Mould, than to venture them out at Sea with expectation of booty. They told us alſo ſtories of Engliſh Ships which had delivered ſome Algerines to their Enemies; and one particularly, who had ſold a Hundred Turks to the Venetians. In anſwer hereunto, we aſſured them, that upon complaints and proofs made hereof to our King; his Juſtice was ſuch, as that he would not ſuffer a piece of ſuch Treachery to eſcape unpuniſhed. And as to that argument, which they urg'd, that in this Caſe none would be employed beſides Engliſh ſhips; we largely repreſented the neceſſity of employing French, and Dutch, and the Ships of other Nations. But theſe People being Deaf and Blind to any Reaſon, but that which agrees with their intereſt, we concluded nothing; for after a long and loud diſcourſe, and repetition of the ſame things over and over again, we at length told them, that it was not in our Commiſſion to conclude on theſe terms; but that we ſhould inform the Lord Ambaſſadour of their deſires, and reſolution, and that we would return the next Day with his peremptory Anſwer; not but we knew, that the Inſtructions from his Majeſty extended not ſo far; but that we might have occaſion to leave matters, as it were in ſuſpenſe, and part fairly from them, at the preſent. For 1661. as to my own particular, I did not like to remain with ſuch Company, not knowing how far the perfidiouſneſs of that People might tranſport them to a Barbarity againſt the Laws of Reaſon and Nations.

The wind blew all this day ſo hard at Weſt, that our Ship drove, and a great Sea went; ſo that there was ſome difficulty for me to get aboard; howſoever in regard it was neceſſary to render his Excellency an account of the proceedings of that Day, I eaſed the Pinnace of all Proviſions, and unneceſſary Company, and ſo by God's Providence got ſafe, though wet, aboard that Evening. I did not fail immediately to render an account moſt exactly, how every thing paſſed, to the Lord Ambaſſadour, letting him know, what fruit was to be expected by a farther Treaty with this People. Wherefore it was thought fit rather to keep the buſineſs in ſuſpence, than to come to an open rupture with them; and rather than to uſe long diſcourſe to them, or perſwaſions to little purpoſe, to write them this ſhort Letter, the ſuperſcription of which was to Ramadam their Governour in Chief, and to the reſt of the Divan.

The laſt Letter to the Divan.

WE are ſorry that there ſhould be ſtill one difference in our Treaty, relating to the ſearch of Ships, and delivering up Merchants Forreigners, and Strangers goods. This is an Article which the King my Maſter did not think you would have inſiſted upon, becauſe it was granted to others, who were Uſurpers, and his Subjects, and therefore did not impower me to conclude with you in it. Howſoever, I ſhall acquaint the King my Maſter of your earneſt Deſires, and Reſolves in this Buſineſs, and doubt not, but what is Juſt and Reaſonable, will be aſſented unto. Wherefore in the mean time we muſt deſire you, whilſt his Royal aſſent is expecting to your propoſals, that the Peace may continue on the ſame Terms that it now ſtands. Let your Friend and Kinſman come aboard (as is deſired) and he ſhall be welcome, and we ſhall protect him to the uttermoſt of our power. And on this Promiſe and word of ours, you may rely on, as of a Chriſtian, and a true Engliſhman. Our deſire alſo farther is, that the Lord Obryan may remain in the Conſuls Houſe until ſuch time as his Ranſom comes. And ſo we wiſh, that a hearty and long Peace may be continued between the two Nations. Given aboard the Plymouth Frigat, November 25. 1660.

Winchelſea.

Upon delivery of this Letter, it was concluded, that the former Articles ſhould ſtand in force; only that difference about ſearching our Ships ſhould remain in ſuſpence, and be ſpecified, as not fully agreed on: Howſoever they would ſearch our Ships, and it ſhould not be accounted a breach of our Capitulations, until the King ſhould intimate his diſlike thereof. And that when Notice ſhould come from his Majeſty to Algier, that he approved not thereof, then it ſhould be lawful for both ſides to break into Acts of Hoſtility. This moderate courſe we thought to be leſs prejudicial to us for the preſent, than an open, and ſudden War: For by this means we gained the releaſement of two ſmall Engliſh Ships which their Men carried in thither, and had time to give notice to our Merchants in all Ports and places, of the true ſtate of our buſineſs with Algier.

On the Twenty-ſeventh of November, we departed from the bay of Algier with a proſperous, and ſteddy Gale, ſteering N.E. and N.N.E. for Meſſina, from whence we intended to diſpatch Letters unto all places, rendring advices to his Majeſty, and the Merchants, of the State and Condition of our Affairs and Negotiation at Algier: And whilſt we pleaſantly ſail'd with a proſperous wind, on a ſudden a cry was made of Fire, in the Ship, which aſtoniſhed us all with a great amazement. For the Cooper it ſeems, going into the Steward's Room to ſtave a Cask which formerly had ſome Brandy in it, by chance a Snuff of the Candle fell in at the bung, which put the whole Veſſel into a Flame: But the ſame Man immediately ſtopping the Bung, ſoon ſmothered the Fire, and therewith extinguiſh'd that and our fears As to other Matters, our Voyage to Meſſina was ſpeedy and happy, for we arrived there on the Second of December.

Meſſina.

Some Days paſſed before we could get pratick; for having touched at Algier, a place always ſuſpected for the Plague, great ſcruple was made of admitting us to free converſe in the Town: Until the Lord Ambaſſadour gave under his Hand and Seal an aſſurance of the Health of our Ship; on confidence of which we received Pratick, and the Palace called Paradiſe, where commonly the Vice-Kings are lodged, was appointed to receive his Excellency and his Retinue, and the Furniture thereof ordered by D. Franciſco de la Villa Padierna, a Spaniard, who was Stratago, which is as much as Commander in chief of all the Caſtles and Forts in and about Meſſina. So ſoon as his Excellency landed, this Stratago made him a Viſit, and at his departure left his Guard with him in a Complement, but in the mean time the Jurati, who were ſix in number, choſe (as I think) every year, or every third year by the Citizens for Government of the City, were wanting in the like civility towards our Ambaſſador; four of which are choſen out of the Burgers, and two out of the Gentry, for they took no notice of him, nor ſent him any meſſage until the hour that he was about to depart, when his Excellency refuſed to receive their viſits, excuſing his neglect of attendance to matters of Ceremony, at a time when buſineſs urged his departure: whence this omiſſion on the Jurats ſide proceeded, may in probability be deriv'd from the antipathy they have to the Spaniards and their Government, always running contrary to that, unto which they find the Spaniſh Miniſters moſt inclined. During our abode at this place his Excellency having returned his Viſit to the Stratago, accompanied with D. Joſeppe de Luna a Cavalier of Maltha, and having wrote a Letter to the Conde de Ayala then Vice-King of Sicily, reſiding at Palermo, he gave advices unto all places of the doubtful ſtate of our affairs with Algiers, that ſo Ships might be cautious of that people, and how they adventured themſelves abroad without Convoy; and having compleated theſe Diſpatches, we again returned aboard on the ninth of this Month; when the Stratago, abounding in all points of civility, ſent an honourable preſent of all ſorts of freſh proviſions aboard Ship, and ſoon after came himſelf in perſon to bid Farewel to his Excellency. At his coming aboard we gave him nine Guns, and at his going off fifteen, and ſo ſoon as our Anchors were away, and our Foretop-Sail filled, we bid adieu to the Town with twenty one Guns more, which they returned by firing all the Guns of the five Caſtles, under command of the Stratago, which is an honour they ſeldom pay to any other, than the Generaliſſimo of Spain, the Vice-King, and the Popes Admiral.

We had ſo fair a Wind, and ſo proſperous a paſſage, that we arrived at Smyrna on the 14th of Decem-

Smyrna.

December, where we found the Proſperous and Smyrna Factor, the Merchants Ships which we had loſt in the Storm, happily arrived. Here we remained for ſome days to order and ſettle ſeveral affairs according to Inſtructions given by the Turky Company. And on the ſixth of January, being Sunday and Twelfth day, we returned aboard to proſecute this Ultimate ſtage of our Voyage to Conſtantinople; our Frigat the Plymouth Anchored near the Town within the very Port of Smyrna, from whence ſailing with a freſh Eaſterly Wind from the ſhore, we were carried without the Port, and out of command of the Caſtle; where the wind failing, and being wholly calm, we Anchored until the next morning, when with a gentle gale at South-Eaſt we proceeded forward, and being as high as Cape Caraborno, towards night the Wind came about to the N. E. with ſo ſtrong a Gale, that with ſome difficulty we weathered the Cape, and making over for the Iſland of Mytilene, and bringing our Ship under a main courſe, we intended to paſs the night under the ſhelter of that Iſle: All this night the wind ſo increaſed one hour more than another, that in the morning it was grown to a perfect ſtorm, and the Sea into a breach; the sky was ſo black, and thick, and the Sun ſo red, and louring, as ſignified the continuance of it; and the ſpray of the Sea was ſo forcibly carried by the wind over the Ship, that Maſts, Yards, and Decks were querned with a white Salt. This extremity of weather made us think of ſome Port, or Harbour, wherein to ſecure our Ship. The Iſland of Ipſera lying S. B. W. about eight Leagues from Mytilene was judged by our Maſter to be the moſt convenient and ſafe place, wherein we might ſpend the fury of this ſtorm; wherefore putting before it with our Foreſail, and our Mainſail in the Brailes, the wind was ſo forcible, that it carried away our Foreſail like Paper from the Yard; and bringing another in the place thereof, it had the misfortune to be foul of the flook of our Anchor, and ſo became as unſerviceable as the former: being thus deprived of the benefit of our commanding Sails, we ſet our Spritſail, and Main-courſe, and ſo ſteered in between the two Iſles of Ipſera the greater, and the leſs. Being ſhot within, and keeping as near aluff as we could to the ſhore, we on a ſudden ſtruck upon a Rock, which aſtoniſhed us all with a ſtrange amazement; the Ship fetched five Sallies, or Seeles upon it with ſuch violence, that we expected to ſink immediately into the deep; and indeed if we conſider the forcibleneſs of the wind, the turgency of the Sea, and the weight of our burden, having four hundred perſons aboard, and ſixty Guns mounted, it will appear little leſs than a Miracle, that the Ship brake not into more pieces than our numbers were aboard. I ſtood then by the Mate, when he fathomed our depth of water by the Lead and Line; and we had then ſeventeen foot and a half by the ſide, but the Ship drawing eighteen foot, we began to fear a total ruin, and ſhipwrack, and with caſt-up eyes, and ſtretched out arms, thought now of no other than of our laſt and ultimate Port. But in the midſt of this horrid conſternation and diſtreſs, it pleaſed God, who was our beſt Pilot, and guided us to the edg of the Rock, to bring us clear of it; when we ſoon eſpied ſome of our ſheathing to ſwim upon the Sea, and running down to the Well of our Pumps, we perceived a great increaſe of water, but not ſo much but that Pumping once every half hour, we kept our Ship in a condition of ſafety. Being thus by Gods Providence come to a convenient place of Anchorage, being well furniſhed with ground-Tackle we rode for two days in a ſtreſs of wind, with two Anchors a-head, of which our ſheet-Anchor was one, and with our Top-maſts and Yards ſtruck. Afterwards the wind abating ſomething of its late fierceneſs, though continuing in the ſame quarter, we had opportunities to go aſhore and to make ſome Proviſions of Wine, of which that Iſland yields an admirable ſort, and as rich as any in the Archipelago, though the people are as poor, or rather more miſerable than their Neighbours. In three or four days, by the ſullage and weeds which the Leak had ſucked in, the water began to ſtop, and our Ship became ſo perfectly tight, that our Captain judged it not neceſſary to enquire, when we arrived at Conſtantinople, into the damage which we had received from the Rock; and the Ship afterwards by Gods Providence arriving ſafe in the River of Thames, was brought into the Dock at Woolidg, where upon ſearch was diſcovered a great piece of the Rock, as big as a mans head, ſtruck into the bilge of the Ship, and ſo firmly fixed as if it had been riveted within; which ſeemed ſo ſtrange a thing, that the Shipwrights before they would take it from thence, firſt thought fit to acquaint the King thereof; who was pleaſed in perſon to go and ſee it; which appearing a ſtrange and almoſt a miraculous accident, His Majeſty commanded it to be taken out, and (as I am informed) it is kept in his Cloſet. And now for the better deſcription of this Rock, and for the avoiding of it, Seamen may obſerve, and take notice of it in this manner.

A miraculous eſcape from ſhipwrack

Rocks about Ipſera.

The ſhallow water, or the Rock whereon we ſtruck, bore N. N. W. ½ N. from the place where we anchored on the North of Great Ipſera, and lyes about half a mile from the ſhore. The mark is, the falling away of the South-end of the firſt gray-cliff with a gall upon the foot of the high hill, on which is a houſe, there is alſo a white ſand by the gray cliff; the longeſt way of the Rock is N. W. and S. E. and the length not longer than the Ship; the water in the ſhalloweſt part thereof is about thirteen or fourteen foot, with a Northerly wind; and ſeventeen foot or more in the deepeſt, which is the place where we ſtruck; yet as the people of the Iſland report, it hath ſix foot more with a Southerly wind; ſo that it is not ſtrange, that our Maſter, though he had frequented this place with the Venetian Fleet, ſhould not have knowledg of it, for ſuch a depth of water is ſeldom noted in Waggoners for a place of danger.

There is alſo another Rock near the Town about half a mile diſtant from the ſhore, bearing N. B. E. of the Point, the neat fluff point E. N. E. the Northermoſt point of little Ipſera N. W. B. N. the Southermoſt point of little Ipſera S. W. ½ W. the Southernly point of Great Ipſera S. E. 1 S. upon it, there is not above four foot water.

We rode here until the 14*th* day, when between one and two in the morning, the wind ſprang out of the W. S. W. with an eaſie gale, with which we weighed our Anchors, and put to Sea; the next morning early being the 15*th* day, we were up with the Iſland of Tenedos, and towards Noon we entered the Helleſpont with a freſh gale, which was neceſſary to ſtem the ſtrength of the current; and about three a Clock we paſſed the Caſtles of Seſtos and Abydos; from whence came off a boat with a Druggerman, and Janizaries, bringing Letters from Sir Thomas Bendiſh, then Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople, congratulating the Arrival of his Excellency, and ſoon returned again aſhoar to carry the news of our entrance within the Caſtles.

On the Seventeenth Day about Noon, being juſt Three months ſince the Lord Ambaſſador with his Family embarked, we came to an Anchor near the Seven Towers, from whence we gave notice to St. Thomas Bendyſh of our near approach; and having given Two hours ſpace for to carry the intelligence, we weighed our Anchors, and ſtood in for the Port of Conſtantinople: At this time, a Boſtangee, one belonging to the Grand Signior's Garden, came aboard, ſent by the Boſtangee-baſhee or Head of the Gardeners, to diſcover, and know what Ship it was of ſuch Equipage, and greatneſs; adviſing us alſo, that the Grand Signior was ſeated in a Chiosk or Summer-houſe on the corner Wall of the Seraglio. Having thus our Anchor aboard with a freſh and favourable gale, our Flags and Enſigns diſplayed, and a Streamer at every Yard-arm, our Guns and Waſt-clothes out; and being near the Wall of the Seraglio, the ſame Boſtangee came again aboard, acquainting us, that it was the Grand Signior's pleaſure, that we ſhould rejoyce with Guns, (which was his expreſſion;) the Ship having her Sails ſwelled out with a gentle Gale, and the ſwiftneſs of her motion retarded by the current, gave the Turks an opportunity to take a full proſpect of her, the decks being full of men; we fired Sixty one Guns, as we paſſed, and with that order, that the Veſſel could never appear with better advantage, had ſhe been deſcribed by the Hand of the moſt skilful Painter: And thus we came to an Anchor on Toppennau ſide, where Sir Thomas Bendyſh came immediately aboard to congratulate the ſafe arrival of this new Ambaſſador: And now here it may be enquired, whether the Seraglio returned any anſwer to this ſalute by thoſe Guns which lye under the Garden-wall, of which moſt, or all are diſmounted: I anſwer, not; for this having been the firſt Man of War, or firſt Royal ſhip, that ever carried up an Engliſh Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople; it having been the cuſtom formerly to have them tranſported thither on ſome goodly Merchant-ſhip laden with the rich Commodities of our Country, a return of Guns was never demanded, or expected; and perhaps it was a matter not then thought of; which if it had, and been required, it is probable, in that conjuncture (if ever) it would have been granted; both becauſe old Kuperlee the Father, then governed, who was a great friend to the Engliſh, and Enemy to the French, whoſe Ambaſſador was then under reſtraint, would have in meer oppoſition and hatred to them, beſtowed thoſe honours on our Nation, which at another time could not have been extorted for a great Sum of Money; and ſo much I collect from the very words of Kuperlee, who after our Lord Ambaſſador had made his Entrance in a more ſplendid manner than uſual, as we ſhall underſtand by the ſequel, he demanded of our Chief Druggerman, how the French reſented this treatment? He anſwered, not well, but with an envious Eye, as he ſuppoſed; let them burſt with malice, replied the Vizier. Of late years ſince the glory and greatneſs of France, their Ambaſſadors have been always tranſported up to Conſtantinople in the Kings Ships. Monſieur la Haye the younger came on a Man of War of the Kings, and a Fireſhip; Monſieur de Nointel, with Two men of War and a Fireſhip; and now lately Monſieur de Guilleragues with no leſs an Equipage than the former. All which before they entered Conſtantinople, made a ſtop about the Seven Towers, capitulating firſt to have a re-ſalute from the Seraglio, before they would paſs their Complement to that place; which being denied, as a thing never practiſed; the French Men of War have of late paſſed with ſilence, without giving, or receiving a ſalute: Howſoever, as things ſtand now, I ſhould ſcarce adviſe, that Engliſh Men of War ſhould inſiſt upon the like, for we having once done it, a cuſtom may be pretended; and that may give a beginning to ſuch a diſpute which a new Ambaſſador ought ſtudiouſly to avoid, the preſent circumſtances of France not ſuiting exactly with the ſole Intereſt of Trade which is exerciſed by England.

The Lord Ambaſſador landing at Conſtantinople.

Againſt the next Day, being the Eighteenth, things were provided for the entrance of his Excellency; and indeed with that ſtate and handſome Equipage, that neither any Embaſſador from England, nor yet from the Emperor, paſſed with greater Splendor and Honour than this: For when his Excellency firſt deſcended from the Ship into his Boat, the Ship fired Fifty one Guns, ſo leiſurely, that they ſo continued, until he ſet his Foot on the ſhoar; where mounting on Horſe-back covered with a rich Velvet Foot-cloth, the whole Equipage marched in this Order, on Horſe back alſo;

First, The Vayvod of Galata, and his Men.

2. The Captain of the Janiſaries with his Janiſaries.

3. The Chaous-baſhee with his Chaouſes.

4. The Engliſh Trumpeters.

5. The Engliſh Horſemen, Merchants of Conſtantinople, and thoſe of Smyrna, which came to attend his Excellency by order of the Factory, being in number Six, with their Servants.

6. The Embaſſadors, Druggermen and Janiſaries.

7. His Excellency with St. Thomas Bendyſh, attended with their Pages and Footmen.

8. The Secretary and Gentlemen.

9. The Counteſs of Winchelſea in her Coach, and Three other Coaches following with her Women, covered with Red-cloth, made after the faſhion of Waggons, lying on the carriages unhung.

10. Which were followed by ſome Officers, and Reformadoes of the Ship. Such an appearance as this being Extraordinary, the Streets were crouded with People, and all Windows filled with Spectators; and that which made the paſſage more uneaſy, was the Rabble ſcrambling for Five Sol-pieces, of which ſort of Money, 500 were by Order of the Lord Ambaſſador ſcattered amongſt the People, who regarded not the danger of being trampled under foot, whilſt they had the Silver in their Eye.

His Excellency being thus lodged at his Houſe at Pera, he was immediately ſaluted from the Emperors Reſident by his Secretary; and ſoon after by Signor Padavino Secretary to their Excellencies Balarino and Capello, of whom we ſhall hereafter have occaſion to name, being thoſe who negotiated the Affairs of the Venetian Republick. And the next Day following, the like Complement was paſſed from the French Ambaſſador, and the Dutch Agent.

The Grand Signiors preſent to the Ambaſſador.

Three days after, the Grand Signior ſent a Preſent to his Excellency of Ten Sheep, Fifty Hens, a Hundred Loaves of Bread, Twenty Sugar-loaves, Twenty Wax-candles, Ten whereof were white, and Ten yellow. This we mention particularly, becauſe it was a Gift anciently beſtowed in the times of the firſt Ambaſſadors; and though it had not been of late years practiſed, yet being found in the Old Regiſters, the cuſtom was again revived, becauſe the Turks were in an humour to gratifie, and ſhew all the Honour they could to the Engliſh Ambaſſador.

His firſt Audience with the Vizier.

On the Twenty eighth of this Month of January, his Excellency had his firſt Audience of the Great Vizier; and being attended thither, and met by the Turkiſh Officers on Conſtantinople ſide, (in the ſame manner, as when he firſt landed) he was conducted to the Viziers Palace; and being held up under the Arm by Two of his Gentlemen (that being the faſhion of great men amongſt the Turks) he was introduced to the Preſence of the Vizier; who being aged and decrepit, was ſitting on Cuſhions in a little Room with a Fire, and his Feet covered, ſeveral Paſhaws, Pages, and other Officers ſtanding by him. His Excellency and Sir Thomas Bendyſh were ſeated on Two Velvet ſtools; where firſt the Earl of Winchelſea having preſented the King's Letters to the Vizier wrote in Parchment, and put into a Bag of Cloth of Gold; Sir Thomas Bendyſh began to inform the Vizier, that this was that honourable Perſon, of whom he had formerly acquainted him, was coming to reſide for Ambaſſador in his place: That he was of that Nobility, and relation to our King, that had not his Majeſty intended highly, and in an extraordinary manner to Honour, and oblige the Grand Signior, he would not have expoſed his Kinſman, and a Perſon extraordinary, to the hazard of a Voyage ſo long and dangerous as this. Then the Earl of Winchelſea began to ſpeak, and relate the happy reſtauration of the King his Maſter to the Throne of his Anceſtors; extolling his Power, Greatneſs and Clemency in pardoning all, but ſuch, who were engaged in the Blood of his Father. That in his paſſage to Conſtantinople, he had by Command of the King touched at Algier, endeavouring to renew the former Articles of Peace, and releaſe an Engliſh Lord (meaning the Lord Obryan) taken Captive by them contrary to the Articles of Peace, but without ſucceſs, not being able to reduce them to any Terms of Reaſon, or Juſtice: And enlarging in his Complements with aſſurances of the friendſhip which the King his Maſter deſired to conſerve, and maintain with the Grand Signior, as a token thereof, he acquainted him, that he was the firſt Ambaſſador ſent abroad by his Maſter, ſince his happy return, before he had deſigned, or appointed any to Chriſtian Princes. The Vizier readily anſwered: That it was but Reaſon it ſhould be ſo; ſince the Grand Signior was an Emperor, and they but Kings; and he the greateſt, and moſt Soveraign Potentate of the World: And that as to the Buſineſs of Algier, he would take care of it, and do him Juſtice. This having paſſed, Two China diſhes with Sherbet were brought forth, and given to the Two Ambaſſadors, and Two larger bowles of the ſame to their Attendants: Then the Preſent was brought forth, and laid before the Vizier, conſiſting of Twenty Veſts; Four of them were of fine Engliſh Cloth of ſeveral colours; Four of ſeveral coloured Velvets: Four of ſeveral flowred Stuffs with Gold and Silver; Four of watred Tabbies, and Four of Sattins: In recompence hereof both the Ambaſſadors were veſted, with Six others, which Veſts are of no great matter of uſe, or value, more than that they are evidences and badges of the Vizier's favour. After this his Excellency with Sir Thomas Bendyſh aroſe, and departed, wearing theſe Veſts, until they were paſſed without the Gates of the Viziers Palace, and then they delivered them to be carried by their Servants, as the others did; and ſo his Excellency returned to his Houſe at Pera, with an appearance of a fair Correſpondency, and with aſſurances that the Capitulations and friendſhip ſhould be maintained, and conſerved with a ſtrict and inviolate Faith.

The day of giving pay to the Janiſaries drawing near, the Ambaſſador's Audience with the Grand Signior was deferred until that time, for with that occaſion the Court would appear in the moſt ſolemn manner, and the attendance of the Soldiery would render all things more great and powerful: In the mean time the Grand Signior often took a view from his Seraglio, of the Plymouth Frigat, and frequently rowed round her in a Boat; and ſome ſay, he once came Incognito aboard to ſee her; at length he was ſo pleaſed with her, that he fancied her to be a very proper Veſſel to carry Soldiers and Ammunition for Candia; but propoſing his Thoughts and intentions to the Vizier, he was diſſwaded from the demand, or conſtraint of the Ship, being admoniſhed, that this was a matter unpracticable, and uncivil towards a Prince, who on confidence of Amity and Alliance with him, had adventured his Ship within his Port.

Audience with the Grand Signior.

The Twenty ſixth day of February, being Payday of the Janiſaries, the Lord Ambaſſador had Audience of the Grand Signior, which was performed in this manner. His Excellency, with Sir Thomas Bendyſh, departing from his Houſe, with his retinue on Horſe-back, by break of day in the Morning, was met on Conſtantinople ſide by the Chaous-Baſhee, and his Chaouſes, and by them conducted to the Seraglio. We rode through the firſt Court which was very ſpacious, and then we alighted from our Horſes, and walked through another Court leading to the Divan, or place of Judicature; at the upper end of which the Great Vizier was ſeated; on his right Hand ſate Five Viziers of the Bench, of which the Captain-Paſha, or Admiral of the Seas, was one; on the left were the Two Kadileſchers or Chief Juſtices, one of Anatolia, and the other of Romelia, and by them the Teſterdar Paſha or Lord Treaſurer, with Three other Paſha's: The floar of the Divan was covered with Carpets, and on them a richer covering of Bags of Money, for payment of the Janiſaries. The Two Ambaſſadors with about Six or Seven of their retinue (amongſt which I was one) being admitted in, and placed at the lower end, their Excellencies approached toward the Vizier, and were ſeated near unto him on Two ſtools covered with Crimſon Velvet, and ſome Diſcourſe and Complement having paſſed between them, they retired to another part of the Room, that they might give way to Buſineſs. In the mean time the payment of the Soldiers went forward, every Churbagee, or Captain, taking from the heaps, the Pay of his Soldiers, and laying the Bags on their Shoulders, made up to the Vizier, and having kiſſed the Hem of his Veſt on his Knees, he retired with great Humility and haſt from him, paſſing away with his ſide towards him, it being very unſeemly amongſt them to turn their backs to Perſonages of that Dignity.

The Payment being over, Three ſmall Tables were brought in; the firſt of which was covered with a Silver Voyder, at which the Two Ambaſſadors ſate with the chief Miniſters; but the Great Vizier by reaſon of his Age and Weakneſs retired into another Room. The other Two Tables were covered with a mixed Mettal, which ſerved in the place of a Table-Cloth, at which the others ſate: We had no Knives, Forks, nor Plate; but only Wooden Spoons were laid for us, which was ſufficient in that manner of eating, for their Meats are moſt boyled, and conveniently received by the Spoon; or are ſo well roaſted, that they are eaſily parted with the Fingers. The 1661. diſhes were ſerved in by one at a time, but ſo faſt, that we had ſcarce taſted of one, before it was ſnatched away to make place for another; and I think there might be about Twenty ſeveral changes, in this manner; at the end of all, to conclude our Feaſt, a great Bowl of Sherbet was brought in, and we drank of it, as large draughts as we pleaſed. Being riſen from the Table, Eighteen Coſtans, or Veſts, being the uſual number given to the Engliſh Ambaſſadour, with one extraordinary in favour to the New Ambaſſador, were brought forth, and beſtowed; and in the mean time, the Preſent from our King to the Grand Signior, provided at the expence of the Turky Company, conſiſting of Fifty Veſts, viz. Ten of Velvet, Ten of Sattin, Ten of Cloth of Gold, Ten of Tabbies, and Ten of fine Engliſh Cloth, were brought forth and diſplayed in the open Court by Fifty men which carried them, and Four Engliſh Maſtiffs, which were more acceptable to this Grand Signoir than all the reſt. The whole body of Janiſaries then payed, conſiſting of about Five thouſand, were drawn up in a body, and ranged on one ſide of the Court-yard; amongſt them there was that ſilence, that the leaſt whiſper, noiſe, or motion was not heard; and as their Janiſar Aga, and other Commanders paſſed, the bowings they made in ſalute were ſo regular, and at the ſame time, as may well teſtify the exactneſs of their Diſcipline, and admirable obedience, which hath in a great meaſure contributed towards their Conqueſts and Enlargement of their Empire.

Being thus Veſted, and ranked in Order, the Great Vizier entered into the Preſence of the Grand Signior; and then Two Capugi-baſhes or Chief of the Porters of the Gate, with long Silver Staves, took the New Ambaſſador under each Arm to conduct him to the Chamber of Audience; thoſe permitted to accompany him were Sir Thomas Bendyſh, the Earl of Winchelſea's Brother, Sir Thomas Allen Captain of the Plymouth Frigat, the Interpreter, and my ſelf, who then being Secretary, carried the Credential Letters made up in a Purſe of Cloth of Gold. We gently knocked at the firſt Gate, which was immediately ſet wide open to us, in the Porch whereof Forty white Eunuchs attended, clothed in Veſts of Sattin, and Cloth of Gold of divers colours, and ſtood with their Hands before them with marvellous ſilence, and modeſty. Coming near to the Preſence-door, where the Kapi-Aga or Chief of the white Eunuchs attended, we made a pauſe in the Porch, and trod very ſoftly, ſo as not to diſturb with the leaſt motion, the greatneſs of that Majeſty; and ſo profound was the ſilence, that nothing was heard beſides the murmurings of a Fountain adjoining thereunto. Juſt at the entrance of the Chamber, hung a gilded Ball ſtudded with divers precious Stones, the Floar was covered with Crimſon Velvet; embroidered with Golden-wyre. The Grand Signior himſelf ſate in a Throne raiſed a ſmall heigth from the ground, ſupported with Four Pillars plated with Gold; from the top hung ſeveral gilded Balls twined with Maſſes of Pearl; the Cuſhions he ſate upon, and thoſe alſo that lay by, were richly embroidered, and beſet with Jewels, and on his right hand ſtood the Great Vizier. And having made a conſiderable ſtop at the Door, the Two Capugibaſhees, who held his Excellence under each Arm, brought him to the middle of the Room, and laying their Hands upon his Head, made him bow, until he touched the Carpets with his forehead; and then raiſing him again, they retired backward with him, 1661 unto the fartheſt part of the Room; and in like manner they took all the others ſingly and in order, placing them behind the Ambaſſadors. The Credential Letters from our King were then preſented, and appointed that they ſhould be delivered to the hands of the Reis-Efendi, or Secretary of State.

Then the Druggerman or Interpreter, by Order of the Lord Ambaſſador, read a Paper in the Turkiſh Language to this Effect.

Firſt, Declaring how the King of Great Britain our Soveraign Lord and Maſter, was reſtored to the Throne of his Anceſtors without War, or any Conditions: And the great Clemency of His Majeſty in pardoning all, but thoſe who had a hand in the Murder of his Father.

Secondly, Recommending the Merchants and their Intereſt to the continuance of his uſual Favour and Protection.

Thirdly, Begging the freedom of all Engliſh Slaves, as a particular Teſtimony of Favour, and Grace to this New Ambaſſador.

Theſe Ceremonies being performed, and the Paper read, we immediately departed, paſſing to our Horſes by the ſame way which we came: And being mounted, we drew up a little out of the paſſage to ſee the Soldiers march by us, which indeed appeared to be a very flouriſhing Militia of young Men, robuſt, and well clothed; many of them running with Bags of Money on their Shoulders, and all of them chearful, and glad of the charge they carried with them; after them followed their Commanders exceedingly well mounted: And laſt of all came the Great Vizier attended with many Paſhaes, and a goodly Equipage: And then his Excellency, with Sir Thomas Bendyſh, and attendance, proceeded forwards, and returned to their home. After this Two viſits were made: Namely, to the Captain-Paſha or Admiral of the Seas, and the other to the Muftee; at the firſt, Six Veſts were preſented; and at the latter, Five; and both were performed, and accepted with ſuch mutual kindneſs, that never did the Turkiſh Miniſters caſt more ſerene countenances on the Trade and Concernments of England, than on this conjuncture.

And thus the Earl of Winchelſea being very ſucceſsfully, and with ſignal Demonſtrations of Honour, and a good correſpondence, ſeated in the uſual reſidence of Ambaſſadors, the Grand Signior, as a particular Note and mark of his favour preſented him with Three Engliſh Slaves, and returned a kind and friendly anſwer to his Majeſties Letters, by Sir Thomas Bendyſh, who embarked on the Plimouth Frigat, and departed the Eleventh of March. And thus having given the Reader a Relation of the State of the Engliſh concernments in Turky: Let us view and conſider the Condition of the Turkiſh Affairs amongſt themſelves.

At the arrival of this Ambaſſador, the important affairs of this vaſt and ſtill growing Empire, were governed by the Great Vizier Kuperlee; a Perſon decrepit and infirm in body, by reaſon of his great Age, but of a ſolid and ſubtle judgment; by Nature cruel, and by Years froward; which diſpoſition was ſingularly well fitted to do ſervice to his Maſter, againſt the impetuous ſtorms of the Faction of thoſe times, in which the Paſhaws, and Chiefs of the Soldiery (as often it happens in Empires, whoſe Body is grown too vaſt to be ruled by a weak Head) became rich and powerful, and by the long Vacations of Peace, inſolent and wanton; for as then the Wars with Venice were carried on faintly, only by ſending forth an Armata of Gallies in the Spring; and the preparations became rather accuſtomary, returning with the Year, and made for

1661. for exerciſe of the Arſenal, and amuſement of the People, than deſigned with any probable expectation of ſucceſs or Victory, proportionable to that Treaſure and Trouble which maintained them. So that to encounter ſo many difficulties, and predominancy of Ambition and Avarice, the Prince himſelf being young, the Fortune of his Empire had more than urgent neceſſity of ſuch a rough and cruel diſpoſition as was found in Kuperlee, who ſo ſeaſonably made uſe of it, to the deſtruction of all ſuch, who might either endanger his Prince, or himſelf; that in two or three Years time he became Maſter of the Lives and Eſtates of the Grand Mutiniers; confiſcating their richeſs and fortunes to the uſe and ſecurity of his Maſter; having in his time put to Death thirty ſix thouſand perſons, whom he proſcribed in ſeveral Countries, and privately ſtrangled in the City, by vertue of his abſolute and uncontroulable Authority, without giving the Offenders liberty of Proceſſes, or Pleas for their Lives, or the ſolemnity of Scaffolds, or applauſe of a Funeral Oration at the Gallows; whereby to win the affections and compaſſions of the vulgar, but went through with his bloody and tragical buſineſs, without noiſe, or rumour, or knowledge almoſt of the Souldiery, or the people; whilſt the great Perſonages, whoſe rapine and pride had contracted them envy and hatred from their inferiours, ſtood confuſed and amaſed, not having power to rebel, nor Sanctuary to fly unto.

Such is the effect of an abſolute, and arbitrary power, which is Maſter of times and affairs, and rather fits and ſquares Enterprizes to Counſels, than Counſels to Enterprizes. Reges Hercule non liberi ſolum impedimentis omnibus, ſed Domini rerum, temporumq; trahunt Conſiliis cuncta, non ſequuntur. Liv. lib. 9. The Grand Signior in the mean time applauded the diligence and circumſpection of his Miniſter; and though yet trembling with the memory of late ſollevations amongſt the Janizaries; yet being young, and active, addicted himſelf wholly to the delight of Hunting, and to follow the Chace of fearful, and flying Beaſts; whilſt his Vizier ſo cloſely follow'd his game of Bloud, that he left no Perſon conſiderable in the Empire, who was not a Creature made by, or depending on him; unleſs the Kahyabei, or Lieutenant General of the Janizaries; Mortaza Paſha of Babylon, now called by the Turks Bagdat, and the Paſha of Magnaſia; Men, whoſe bravery, and generous Juſtice, or elſe their Guards, or Fortune, had only ſeated beyond the reach and Sword of this Tyrant. This was then the State of the Turkiſh Affairs amongſt themſelves; As to Foreign, and Chriſtian Princes; the Emperor, the King of England, the French King, and the States of Holland, had their Embaſſadors and Reſidents at the Ottoman Court, with whom as yet paſſed a fair and amicable correſpondence, excepting with the French; whoſe Embaſſadour had then lately obtained his releaſe from Impriſonment, to which he was confined contrary to the Law of Nations, and the Cuſtom of the wiſeſt, and moſt generous People of former Ages; and compelled to return into France; an Agent being there ſetled by the Merchants, to Negotiate their Affairs; the occaſions and grounds whereof we have at large ſignified in another place: which unlawful treatment of a Perſon Sacred, none will much admire, who conſiders the humour of ſupream Miniſters that judge themſelves under no reſtraint or limits of Law, either Civil, or National.

This Embaſſador from France was call'd Monſieur le Haye, the Father, a Perſon excellently well qualifi'd, having with ſucceſs paſs'd in that capacity for the ſpace of 25 years until ſome miſunderſtandings paſſing between him, and this Tyrannical Vizier, he ſuffered many indignities from him, which being added to the extream torment of the Stone, under which he laboured, made him willing on any terms to return to his own Countrey. 1661.

The Venetians notwithſtanding the War, had two Miniſters there reſident; the Eccellentiſſimo Capello, Procurator of St. Mark, a right worthy and noble Perſon; and Signior Ballarino, a Perſon vigilant, and ſubtle, who omitted no opportunities to advance his own Fortunes, and with that the benefit of his Republick. The Emperors Reſident, called Simon Renningben, a Perſon ſincere, free, and open hearted, agreeable to the Nature of the Germans; had for ſome Years, tho with ſome difficulty, continued the Peace, or rather matters from breaking out into an open War; the Incurſions on the Frontiers, and other accidents, always adminſtring occaſions of diſcontent, and complaints to both parties.

The hiſtory of Prince Ragotzki.

But that the Series of this Hiſtory may be continud with an even Thread, and clear light to the Reader, we muſt caſt back our Eyes to the Year 1657. when the Ambition of George Ragotzki, Prince of Tranſilvania, began New troubles in his own Principality, and laid the Foundation of a future War between the Emperor and the Turks. For now Poland was ſo wearied with the inceſſant Wars of Muſcovy (the inveterate Enemy of that Crown) with the frequent Rebellions of the Coſſacks, and the invaſion of the Swedes, whom the traiterous Vice-Chancellour, and his Adherents, had invited to the ſpoils of their own Countrey; that King Caſimirus was reduced to the ultimate extremity of his Affairs; the publick Exchequer, and private Treaſuries were exhauſted, the Villages diſpeopled, the Fields uncultivated, Traffick and Commerce ceaſed; nothing but Wars, Robberies, and Confuſion filled the Diurnals with News, and the hearts of the Inhabitants with Sorrow and Calamities: Wherefore Caſimer King of Poland, vexed on all ſides, and not knowing where or how to apply a remedy, diſpatched his Great Chancellor Albertus Praveſmoski, in Quality of Embaſſador, to demand aſſiſtance from Ragotzki, promiſing in recompence thereof, to adopt his Son to ſucceed him in that Kingdom. No Meſſage could arrive more grateful to ambitious Ragotzki, who by ſo deſired a proffer, ſeemed to arrive to the Zenith of his Proſperity; which like the Land of Promiſe, being only ſhewed to his Father in a long Proſpective, ſeemed now as it were, by Inheritance, to devolve upon his Son; in order unto which, many days of Treaty and Conferences were held between Ragotzki, and the Poliſh Miniſters; but Ragotzki inſiſting on certain particulars, which were not in the Power of the King or his Commiſſioners to grant without the approbation of a Diet, the Treaty was diſſolved, and Ragotzki remained diſpleaſed, and angry; pretending himſelf to have been deluded and ſlighted, reſolved to avenge the Affront, and by his Arms gain to himſelf the Crown of that Kingdom; ſo that raiſing a ſtrong Army, and joining himſelf in a Confederate League with Sweden, he invaded Poland, waſting all the Frontiers with Fire and Sword. The Ottoman Port growing jealous of the ſucceſſes of theſe Affairs, and not ſo much of the Advance of Ragotzki, as of the growing greatneſs of the Swedes, with whom unwillingly they would be Borderers, iſſued an expreſs Command, That without contradiction or delay, he ſhould immediately give a ſtop to his March, and return with his Army into Tranſilvania. And though the Emperor of Germany, and the Krim

Ragotzki joins with the Swedes againſt Poland.

1661. Tartar declared their diſlike of his proceedings, threatning to invade his Principality at home, unleſs he retracted himſelf, and deſiſted from this enterprize; yet Ragotski having his underſtanding blinded with Ambition, and the luſt of Rule and Government, ſtopped his ears to the menaces of his Enemies, and the counſel of his Friends. This Ragotski enjoyed a State moſt happy, large, fertile, and populous, in Power inferior to few, ſuperior to many; ſo that he might have paſſed peaceably and honourably with all, could his great ſpirit have bowed to, and complied with his Potent Neighbours. For on the one ſide the Puiſſant power of the Turk threatned him, to whom the leaſt Ombrages of diſpleaſure adminiſter occaſion of War; On the ſide of Hungary the Emperour over-awed him: On the ſide of Valachia, and Moldavia he lay open to the incurſion of the Tartars. So that a man might rationally expect, That this Prince ſhould have eſteemed it honour enough to have conſerved his own without rendring himſelf obnoxious to the jealouſie and ſuſpicion of his Neighbours. But his great ſpirit was ſo enamoured of a Crown, and ſo bewitched with the hopes of obtaining it, that nothing ſeemed difficult or improbable to the acquiſition of his longing deſires, which were the occaſion of all thoſe calamities and miſeries in Hungary, which afterwards enſued.

The difficulty of Ragotski's Affairs.

In contemplation of all which foreſeen evils, his Cæſarean Majeſty ſent a Meſſage to the Ottoman Port, declaring againſt the temerity and audaciouſneſs of Ragotski; who in the mean time ſubdued the Fort of Briſtia, invaded with Fire and Sword the Province of Ruſſia, plundered Podolia, and advanced as far as Camonitz, a Fortreſs ſtrong by Art and Nature; and joining afterwards with the Swedes, aſſiſted them in the ſubjection of Cracovia. About this time the Emperour Ferdinand the third began to ſend ſuccours into Poland, and to proteſt againſt the proceedings of Ragotski, but being ſurprized by ſickneſs, ſoon after paſſed to a better life; which for ſome time, giving a ſtop to the aſſiſtance of Poland, was interpreted by Ragotski, as a happy Omen of his good Fortune.

But how vain and deceitful are humane hopes, whoſe foundations are Ambition and Violence! For Leopold ſucceeding in the place of his Father to Hungary, and the Empire, immediately proſecuted the deſign in favour of Poland, and in the firſt place beſieging Turone, one of the chief Cities of Pruſſia, taken by the Swedes, forced it to a Surrender. The King of Denmark alſo growing jealous of the encreaſing greatneſs of the Swedes, nouriſhed by ancient grudges, and National Emulations, took up Arms in defence of Poland, and being at firſt, fluſh of Money, gave conſtant pay and large donatives to mercenary Soldiers, which encreaſed his Army, drawing great numbers from the Swediſh Colours; ſo that being ſtoutly recruited, he entered into the Enemies Countries, poſſeſſed himſelf of the important Fort of Olme in Norway; overthrew the Swediſh Army at Vorgaſt, and obtained a victory over their Fleet in the Baltick Sea. The Poles alſo themſelves, who at firſt revolted from their Prince, and favoured the Swediſh proceedings, perceiving the Wind change, and become contrary to that Party, began to abandon the intereſt they profeſſed, and by degrees to return to the due obedience of their King. Zerneski alſo the General, and Lubomiski the Great Chancellour of Poland met the Swediſh Forces near Cracovia, where giving them Battel, diſcomfited the whole Army, killed fourteen thouſand upon the place, took all the Cannon and Baggage, and won that day a moſt ſignal Victory. 1661.

Ragotski perceiving the face of things thus changed, and being by Command of the Ottoman Port abandoned by his Moldavian and Walachian Forces, began to turn his face towards Tranſilvania, where now he wiſhed himſelf and Army lodged in ſafety. But being overtaken by General Zerneski near the Mountains of Tranſilvania, he was, tho unwillingly, engaged to fight, and was with that fury aſſaulted by the Poliſh Horſe, that tho according to his uſual Bravery, he charged in Perſon at the head of his Troops, yet he was not able to withſtand a violence ſo diſadvantageous in number, but that his men being firſt put into diſorder, then to a Retreat, and then to open flight, his whole Army was defeated, many of them periſhed by the Sword, others flying through the Woods and Mountains, died with famine; and he himſelf obliged to buy a ſhameful Peace, engaging by Word and Oath to the payment of a great ſumm of Money, was permitted with a mean Retinue to return into his own Country. Nor did theſe miſfortunes end here; but the Tartars commanded by the Turks, in revenge and chaſtiſement of Ragotski's Enterprize without their conſent, entered into his Principality with conſiderable Bodies of Horſe, againſt whoſe ſudden Invaſion, an Army under the Conduct of his General Kemenius could not be ſo ſoon collected and diſciplined, as to be able to reſiſt that fury of Tartars, who at their pleaſure burned the Towns and Villages, and carried away multitudes of people of both Sexes, and all Ages for Captives into their own Country, amongſt which ſome were of Quality and Condition. Amidſt which troubles came Letters from the Ottoman Port, directed to the Nobles of Tranſilvania, declaring Ragotski a Rebel, and commanding that according to the Laws and Priviledges of that Principality, they ſhould proceed to the Election of a new Prince, and in caſe of refuſal, all the ruins and calamities were threatned, which they might juſtly expect in puniſhment of their diſobedience from a ſevere and angry Emperor.

Ragotski overthrown by the Poles.

The Turks threaten Ragotski.

Ragotski being well informed what was deſigning againſt him at the Ottoman Port; and knowing that his power was not able to oppoſe ſo much puiſſance, reſolved to give way to neceſſity, and voluntarily depoſe himſelf, before he ſhould be engaged thereunto by the Imperial Decree; ſo that he calmly receded from his Principality, hoping that his humility and ſubmiſſion might procure his pardon at the Court. The Nobility of Tranſilvania being as well deſirous to evidence their affection to their old Prince, as their obedience to the Grand Signior, did immediately appoint a day for Election, but with Proviſo, that a general Petition ſhould be made in behalf of Ragotski, that he might be again reſtored unto ancient Grace and Favour with the Port, who in the mean time ſwore to live peaceably in a quiet and private condition, without making diſturbance, or innovation in the Government, and that when this Grace ſhould accordingly be obtained, then that the new Prince ſhould recede, and ſuffer things to return to their former and priſtine Eſtate. For which purpoſe there was choice made of one Francis Redeius, a Perſon of a peaceable and gentle temper, who would eaſily condeſcend to the terms agreed, and as willingly reſign up his Government again, as he unwillingly received it. But though Ragotski had renounced, promiſed, ſwore, and in appearance ſeemed to recede from his Government, and ſurrender all at the irreſiſtible Decree of a ſuperior power; yet

He depoſes himſelf.

Redeius made Prince of Tranſilvania.

his high Spirit, and working Brain could not diſlodg that Ambition of his Heart, which at firſt privately countermined and enervated the Power of the new elected Prince; but afterwards his towering Thoughts ſwelled too big to be ſuppreſſed under the cover of Diſſimulation, yielded juſt Reaſon to the Ottoman Port to ſuſpect his deſigns; who not being ignorant of what was paſt, diſpatched Orders to the Paſha of Buda to demand the ſtrong Fort of Jancua for Caution and Security of the good Behaviour of the Tranſilvanians.

Ragotzki again declares himſelf Prince.

Ragotzki ſeeing himſelf thus diſcovered, unmasked himſelf openly, and threw away his Vizard, and with a vigorous Force and Courage reaſſumed the Rights and Standard of his Principality, forcing Redeius not only to relinquiſh his Power, but to ſwear never again to uſurp it, tho enforced upon him by the Authority of the Turks.

Theſe Extravagancies ſo exaſperated the minds of the Turks, that whereas before they began to entertain tender thoughts towards Tranſilvania, they now meditated its entire Ruin and Conqueſt; and ſo laying aſide Arguments and Treaties, they made Levies of Horſe and Foot both in Europe and Aſia. Ragotzki foreſeeing how unable he was to reſiſt a Force ſo unequal as the puiſſance of the Ottoman Empire, without the ſuccor of Foreign Force, reſolved, like the Prodigal Son, to throw himſelf into the compaſſionate Arms of the Emperor, as his Father, earneſtly ſupplicating, That whereas before, his diſorderly and diſobedient Life had rather merited Puniſhment than Favour; yet in this Cauſe, wherein the Intereſt of Chriſtendom was concerned, he would compaſſionate the common Good of the Chriſtian Church, rather than chaſtiſe his particular Miſdemeanours. With this meſſage Michel Meſces, his Chancellor, being diſpatched, was graciouſly received by the Emperor, and readily aſſured of powerful Aid and Protection.

Ragotzki elevated with this courteous Treatment and Promiſes, had his whole mind enflamed with hopes and deſire of Revenge; ſo that aſſembling ſuch Forces as he could, he entered boldly into the Field againſt the Paſha of Buda, who with a conſiderable Army, was ordered to March before, and enter the Confines of Tranſilvania, and there unite with the Paſha of Temiſwar.

1658. In the Tranſaction of all theſe Paſſages, July was well entered, when both Armies met in open Field; and tho the Forces of the Tranſilvanians were much inferior to thoſe of the Turk, yet Ragotzki full of his wonted Courage and Heat, ſo vigorouſly aſſailed the Enemy, that he quickly broke and diſordered their Ranks, put them to flight, and killed three thouſand upon the place. But little did this advantage benefit poor Tranſilvania, for the Great Vizier ſoon after following with the groſs of his Army, conſiſting of little leſs than an 100. thouſand Men, provided accordingly with Artillery, and all other Military Ammunition; ſeconded by the Tartars, and aſſiſted by the Moldavians and Valachians, and a Rout of other barbarous Nations; laid Seige to the ſtrong Fortreſs of Janoua; of which and of ſeveral others, in a ſhort time he rendered himſelf Maſter, laying waſte and deſolate all the Countries round with Fire and Sword. The Nobles of Tranſilvania ſenſible of theſe imminent and approaching Miſchiefs, diſpeeded three Perſons of conſiderable Quality amongſt them, in an Embaſſy to the Vizier; viz. Francis Daniel, John Lues, and Acatius Berclay, who greatly laboured by their Oratory to perſwade the Vizier, that they were in no wiſe conſenting to the diſobedience of their Prince, but did always readily ſubmit to the Ottoman Servitude; imploring his Clemency and Commiſeration of their diſtreſſed and ruined State. The Vizier inclining his Ear to their Petition, ſtopped the Progreſs of his Arms, but increaſed their Tribute to ſuch an exceſſive rate, that the burden of it became inſupportable; and appointed Berclay, one of the Embaſſadors, to be Prince; taking thereby from the People, the free Priviledg of Election; Commanding them to accept him without farther Diſpute or Repugnancy. It is uncertain whether Berclay deſigned the Principality to himſelf by any inſtance he made to the Turks, or whether his Election proceeded meerly from the Vizier himſelf; yet this is certain, that returning home, Berclay applied himſelf to eſtabliſh his own Dominion, and to diſappoint the deſigns of his Predeceſſor, and his party.

Berclay made Prince of Tranſilvania

The Turks being ſatiſfied with this Submiſſion, with the Subjection of ſeveral places of Importance, with depoſing of Ragotzki, and eſtabliſhment of a new Prince, began to disband a great part of their Forces; and the Great Vizier, with the remainder, returned towards Conſtantinople; ſuppoſing the Fire of this War to be totally extinguiſhed.

In this condition of Repoſe, matters continued for about the ſpace of two Years, when Ragotzki impatient of his loſſes, and of the exchange of his publick State to a private Condition, inveterate in his hate towards his Rival and Competitor, reſolved to tempt Fortune once more, and make his ultimate Aſſay, either to eſtabliſh himſelf in his Principality, or at leaſt to render himſelf equal with other mortal Princes in the Grave; and ſo relying with much Confidence on the zealous Affection of his Subjects, and the promiſe of powerful Adherents, he once again juſtled himſelf into the Government, by the Expulſion of his Rival; whom he could not behold with other than with an emulous and unpleaſing Eye. Berclay perceiving himſelf thus enſnared, neglected, and perſecuted by all Parties, repreſented theſe Innovations to the Ottoman Port, with the moſt aggravating Circumſtances imaginable; beſeeching them to afford him aid, and vindicate their own Honour in maintenance of him, whom they had conſtituted a Prince, and was a Creature formed by their own favour. The Turks immediately touched with the Senſe hereof, Iſſued out Orders to Ciddi Ahmet, the new Paſha of Buda; Commanded him without delay, to gather what Forces he could to interrupt the deſigns of Tranſilvania; and to put matters unto a ſtand, until a greater Army could ſecond him, under the Command of Ali Paſha, appointed General for this Expedition. The Paſha of Buda readily obeyed, and aſſembling what Forces he could in Hungary, and joining with the Paſha of Temiſwar, paſſed the Danube, and with a very conſiderable Army entered Tranſivania. Ragotzki undaunted at the near approach of his Enemy, boldly entered the Field with his Forces, and joined Battel with them in the Month of May, 1660. between the Cities of Clauſenburg, and Giulia Alba. At firſt the Chriſtians endeavoured to have intercepted the Enemies paſſage, by ſome Ambuſcado or Stratagem of Was; but the Turks ſtill advancing, were at length met by the Van-guard of the Chriſtians; to aſſiſtance of which ſeveral Bodies following one after the other, it became a general Engagement of both Armies; in which Battel, Ragotzki makes new Troubles.

Ragotzki gave his uſual proofs of Valour; declaring by his Actions, that he was reſolved to dye, or to Triumph. But being at length wounded in four parts of his Body, and his Army overpowered with Numbers, he was forced to yield the Fortune of the Day to the Turks; leaving 8. pieces of Cannon, and his Standard in their hands; and the greateſt part of his Army being either killed or taken, he himſelf with a few of his Attendants, recovered Varadin; where after 18. Days diſtemper of his Wounds, he expired his unquiet and troubled Soul. This was the end of that vain Icarus, who attempted to fly with ſeigned Wings and borrowed Feathers; this is the fate of ambitious Spirits, whom Pride elevates and exhales like a Vapour, unto that height, until it diſſolves them into Showers, or precipitates them into the abyſs of all Confuſion. This George Ragotzki was of a tall and well proportioned Stature, black Hair, and a friſled Beard: his Eyes quick and lively, of an active Body, and healthy Conſtitution: his Spirit was high and great, which betrayed him to Extravagancies: his Comportment was generous and courteous towards all, which rendered him exceedingly beloved and eſteemed by his Nobility: he was free in his Speech, and eloquent in his Expreſſions, prudent in his Counſels and Enterprizes: had not the quickneſs and vivacity of his Soul made him ſomething raſh and violent in his Attempts: he was of the Proteſtant Religion, leaving behind him a Widow, and a Son of hopeful and happy endowments.

The death of Ragotzki.

His Character.

After the Death of Ragotzki, it might well be expected that theſe Storms of War ſhould be diſperſed, and that Tranſilvania ſhould at length enjoy the Sun-ſhine, and calmer Weather of Peace and Repoſe. But Ali Paſha, General of the Turkiſh Camp, being by this time arrived the Confines with his powerful Army, reſolved not to return empty or in vain, without advantaging the Ottoman Intereſt, and making ſome Satisfaction towards the Expence and Trouble of ſo great an Army. Wherefore taking pretence againſt Varadin, for receiving Ragotzki after his Defeat, abetting his party, and following his Intereſt, deſigned to ſummon that important Fortreſs to ſurrender, which is ſituated at the foot of thoſe Mountains which open a Paſſage into Tranſilvania.

The People of Varadin crave aid of the Emperor.

The Inhabitants of Varadin terrified at the approach of this formidable Enemy, diſpatched a Meſſenger to the Emperor, imploring with moſt effectual Arguments his Sacred Protection and powerful Aſſiſtance againſt the common Enemy to Chriſtendom, repreſenting to his Ceſarean Majeſty, how that the Turks in their Capitulations with him, had agreed to Build or Erect no new Fort on thoſe Frontiers: and whereas it was the ſame thing to force and uſurp a Fortreſs already made, as to form a new one; the taking of Varadin was to be eſteemed a real Violation of the Articles of Peace. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed to reflect on the fatal Conſequences which the loſs of Varadin might prove to Hungary as well as Tranſilvania; being that Gate, which obſtructed, cuts off all Intercourſe between them and Germany. Theſe Conſiderations with ſeveral others, were exceeding prevalent in the Imperial Council; ſo that it was reſolved, that General Souches ſhould prepare his Army, and put all things in readineſs to afford the Aſſiſtance which was deſired; ſuppoſing that with the German Regiments, and Hungarian Forces, might be formed an Army of about 25. thouſand fighting men. But in regard in thoſe Inſtructions given to Souches, there was a Clauſe, that he ſhould be careful not to engage his Forces in any attempt, where the event might be doubtful, he aſſembled the principal Perſons of that Country, and the Militia, to conſult whether ſuccor and relief might be given to Varadin, without hazarding the Army in a doubtful and a dangerous Adventure: in conſideration of which point, a true Computation being made of all the Imperial Forces, they were found much inferior to that calculate which was made of them at Vienna; For that ſince Tockai, Zatmar, Kalo, and other places belonging to the State of Ragotzki, had been Gariſoned by German Soldiers, there remained not of them above 4000. effective Men; the Hungarian Forces which were ſuppoſed to have conſiſted of 2000. Men, could not form 600.; the Haiducks which were computed to be 6000. Men, did not appear in the Perſon of one; being all diſperſed and retired to their own homes. The additional Forces from the Princes of the Empire were as uncertain, as the Expectation of them long and tedious; for tho the Imperial Forces united are of puiſſance ſufficient to bid Battel, and Defiance to the numerous Troops of the Ottoman Power; yet in regard the Union of that Body depends on the Aſſembly of Diets, Treaties, and long Debates, which are ſubject to time and delays, cauſed by different Factions, (which are impoſſible to be avoided amongſt different States) whoſe Diſunions, Competitions, Emulations and Pretences, always in ſuch meetings abound, and prejudice the common cauſe and benefit of the Empire; the raiſing of ſuch a formidable Army, becomes a matter always of time and difficulty. Howſoever the Emperor, whoſe Hereditary and Elective Poſſeſſions bordering on the Confines of the Enemy, is neceſſarily engaged to be the ſtanding Bulwark of the reſt, and a Bank againſt the Inundation of barbarous Nations; whilſt other Princes whoſe Dominions are more Remote and Secure, apprehend not the Premures and Storms that the Emperor ſuſtains, and is enforced to expel with the loſs and diminution of his own People, and impoveriſhment of his peculiar Treaſure: To theſe Conſiderations, which rendered theſe pious Intentions towards Varadin almoſt impoſſible, there wanted Money, which is the Sinews of War, and the Soul of all Enterprizes: And that which farther retarded thoſe Succors and Proſecution of the deſign in hand, was the departure of His Ceſarean Majeſty from his Court at Vienna, on occaſion of a Progreſs as far as Trieſte, to take Homage of his Provinces of Stiria, Carinthia and Cragno; which was an Action much againſt the Counſel and Advice of the Arch-Duke Leopold his Uncle; who foreſaw how great diſorders would enſue by the Emperors abſence, in this Conjuncture, from his Imperial Court. Upon which Conſiderations, Count Souches ſent a true Liſt of all his Forces, with an account of the ſtrength of his Enemy; remonſtrating that it was impoſſible to convey Forces into Varadin, without hazarding a Battel with Ali Paſha, which would prove an abſolute Breach of the Peace; which in this Conjuncture, and want of Preparation, was neither honourable, nor ſafe for the Empire.

The difficulty of making War with the Turks.

Varadin beſieged.

In the mean time Ali Paſha proceeded and encamped with his Army before Varadin, breaking firſt Ground the 4th of July, 1660. and beginning a formal Siege, he ſoon begirt the Town, and continually labouring in making Trenches, Batteries and Approaches, they arrived in a few days to the Counterſcarp of the Wall. But the better to deſcribe the Siege and Aſſaults on this famous City, it will be neceſſary firſt to explain the Condition and Scituation of the place.

Varadin therefore is ſeated in a Plain, on the Banks of the River Chryſe; to the Eaſt it is environed with ſuch craggy and rough Mountains, as render it almoſt on that ſide unacceſſible; to the South the Town extended it ſelf moſt; to the North it is waſhed with the River, over which ſome ſmall, yet fruitful, Hills raiſe themſelves; it is encompaſſed with a Wall filled with Earth, after the faſhion of Modern Fortifications, and ſtrengthened with five main Bulwarks, and a very deep Ditch filled with the River Water: It was well provided both of Victuals and Ammunition, and armed with Ordnance both great and ſmall, as was ſufficient to have repulſed a puiſſant Enemy, & have ſuſtain'd a long & ſtrait Siege. But the Gariſon within conſiſted only of 850 Soldiers, an inconſiderable number, both in reſpect of the Circuit of the Fortreſs, & of that groſs Army which encompaſs'd it.

The Enemy being now, as it is ſaid before, under the Counterſcarp of the Wall, they perceived that the Ditch was ſo deep, and filled with Water, that though their great Guns had made open Breaches in the Walls, yet there was no poſſibility to ſtorm them, or bring the Soldiery to ſcaling Ladders, or handy blows. The beſieged alſo made ſuch continued Sallies, with ſucceſs and ſlaughter of the Enemy, that after Three and Twenty days of vain labour to ſew the Ditch, Ali Paſha was at length almoſt reſolved to have raiſed his Siege, and given over the Enterprize; upon which whilſt he conſidered and ruminated (as ill Fortune would have it) a certain Maid, which formerly had been a ſervant to the Governour of the Gariſon, then a Captive in the Turkiſh Camp, having obſerved how on occaſion the Citizens uſed to empty and drain the Ditch, revealed the ſecret to the Turks, hoping thereby not only to purchaſe her Liberty, but with that alſo a Sum of Money for price of her Treachery; ſo that diſcovering where another Ditch was to be opened, the courſe of the Water was ſoon diverted, and the Walls of the Town laid dry and open to the Aſſailants. As this happened without, ſo another accident within, equally dangerous, befel the Beſieged; for one day an Officer of the Ammunition going into the Stores with a lighted Candle, by chance dropped a ſpark of fire from his Lanthorn into the Powder, which taking fire, blew up the Powder, Granadoes, Fire-works, and all other military Stores, with the neighbouring houſes, and above a hundred men; which loſs alone was ſufficient to have dejected the minds of frail men; yet they ſo valiantly bore up their courages, that they ſeemed not in the leaſt abated, but rather animated with the height of anger and deſpair. The Turks having now free acceſs to the Walls, undermined ſome ſmall Forts, which they blew up, and thereby made ſo great a Breach, that with facility hoping to gain the Town, if they made uſe of the occaſion, they poured in ſuch multitudes of People as the Beſieged were ſcarce able to withſtand; and the Turkiſh Soldiery being alſo weary of their ſufferings, and irkſomneſs of their tedious leagure, reſolved now or never to put an end to their labours; ſo that advancing with their open Breaſts to the top of the Battlements, without fear either of Cannon, or Musket-ſhot, they entered within the Walls, and planted the Turkiſh Banners on the Works; but being afterwards received by a reſolute Company of the Defendants, they were again thrown from the Walls, and tumbled back into the Ditch with an incredible Slaughter. It is impoſſible here to deſcribe the anger, the courage, the deſpair which was apparent in the faces of the Beſieged, enflamed by the love of their own Country, and hatred of the Turks; ſo that three or four ſuſtained ſometimes the Aſſault of a Troop; and a ſmall number united, oppoſed a whole Sangiack of the Enemy. The Women alſo forgetting the imbecillity of their Sex, renewing in themſelves the Courage and Vigour of the Ancient Amazons, expoſed themſelves without fear upon the Walls, throwing ſcalding Water, Stones, burning Pitch, and whatſoever came next to hand, upon the Aſſailants; whom they ſo valiantly repulſed from the riſing of the Sun till twelve at Noon, that after much ſlaughter on both ſides, the Turks growing faint, retreated, and took breath a while within their Trenches. And now the Soldiery conſidering the Obſtinacy of the Chriſtians, began to mutiny, and reſolving not to caſt away their lives in vain, motioned to raiſe the Siege, and be gone; which when the General oppoſed, they threatned to ſacrifice his Life to the Ghoſts of their departed Brethren. But ſee, how many times the Devil ruines the fortune of the Chriſtians! for whilſt they were in this deliberation to depart, behold, a certain, Thracian one of the Gariſon Soldiers, adviſ'd the Turks that there were not above Three hundred ſound Men remaining in the whole Gariſon, that they were now reduced to their ultimate Criſis; ſo that if they appear'd only before them, and would but terrifie them with another aſſault, the Town was their own, without the leaſt doubt of Surrender. This advice retarded the haſty departure of the Camp; inſtead of which they again muſter'd themſelves before the Walls, and prepar'd to aſſault the Breach, reſolving to put all to a ſecond extremity. The Chriſtians within perceiving the reſolution of their Enemy, and being ſenſible how much they were infeebled by the laſt Convulſion, and loſs of blood, and as yet ſore of their wounds, immediately ſpread a white Flag of Treaty, which was as readily accepted by the Turks, and all Articles agreed on the 17*th*. of Auguſt, and on the 20*th*. the Gariſon marched freely out with Colours flying, and Drums beating, with liberty to go whereſoever they pleaſed, without hurt or injury; which Conditions were fully and faithfully performed and maintained.

Two ill accidents to the Gariſon.

A Thracian betrays the weakneſs of the Town.

Varadin ſurrendred.

Varadin being thus yielded, afforded matter of diſcourſe, of diſcontent, of fear, and apprehenſions at Vienna; ſome argued, That it was but common and natural Reaſon, when our Neighbours houſe is on fire, to look to our own; others blamed the ſlow and phlegmatick proceedings of the German Miniſters, who in ſuch urgent emergencies as theſe, could ſit as unconcerned, as Spectators at a Theatre, who regard nothing, which way the prize is carried; and in ſhort, the whole Chriſtian World ſtood Admirers of this ſottiſhneſs, eſteeming either thoſe Borderers aſtoniſhed and ſtruck into a ſtupid timidity, or moved by principles of Policy, which none beſides themſelves either underſtood, or penetrated. Only Count Nicholas Serini, a Prince who had a fair and Soveraign Inheritance in thoſe parts, Commander of Croatia, and the Confines under his Ceſarean Majeſty, a moſt mortal and inveterate Enemy of the Turks, could not endure their inſults, bravadoes and daily encroachments, but watching his occaſion of advantage, when Caniſia was almoſt deſtroyed by a dreadful fire, and thereby their Ammunition, and Proviſion for the moſt part conſumed, he gathered what Forces he could poſſible, and made uſe of the opportunity to lay Siege unto it, not doubting but in that Conjuncture, and miſerable Calamity of all things, to promote the Intereſt of his Maſter, and the common cauſe of Chriſtendom; which as ſoon as he had done, he wrote a Letter to the Emperor peror, acquainting him that God had opened him a Gate and Path to his Intereſt, and to a juſt revenge of the Ottoman perfidiouſneſs: Who having violated their Faith, and the mutual Peace in taking Varadin, would be juſtly and glorioully recompenſed by the loſs of Caniſia; which being now, as it were by miracle, put into his hands, it were a neglect of the Divine Providence not to improve with advantage an opportunity ſo chearful and ſo promiſing: to which, beſides other arguments, he added, That if his Ceſarean Majeſty ſhould not think fit to concur herein with aſſiſtance of his Imperial States, yet at leaſt he would be pleaſed not to interdict him from the Glory of that deſign, in which he queſtioned not but to ſucceed, and in a ſhort time to render not only to his Majeſty, but alſo to the whole Chriſtian World, proofs of his Valour, and a good account of his Enterprize. Howſoever, the Emperor's Council ſeriouſly conſidering that Serini's State could not be engaged with the Turk without involving his Intereſt; and that the Princes of the Empire, though when aſſaulted, would willingly contribute their Forces in the defenſive part, yet would be backward to be the Aggreſſors, and engage their States in an offenſive and provoking War, did therefore not only deny to ſecond, or abet his deſigns with Military ſuccours, but poſitively commanded him to retire, and deſiſt from his reſolution againſt Caniſia; with which Anſwer, the Zeal and Spirit of Serini was ſo inflamed, that throwing in paſſion his Cemiter on the Ground, he raiſed his well-formed Seige, and retired to his proper Reſidence at Chiacaturno.

Vienna troubled for the loſs of Varadin.

Count Serini deſigns againſt the Turks.

—is forbidden by the Emperor.

The Tranſilvanians conſult their ſafety.

The loſs alſo of Varadin moved the Tranſilvanians to conſult their ſafety in this extremity of their Affairs, which now amidſt theſe dangers and ſtorms which threatned them, appeared in a deſperate and languiſhing Condition, unleſs remedied by a deſperate Cure, and the reſolves of ſome wiſe and valiant Counſel. Wherefore in the firſt place, they concluded to depoſe Acatius Barclay, the Favourite of the Turks; and in his ſtead they conſtituted John Chiminianus, or Kemenius, the late General of Ragotski's Army.

They beg aſſiſtance of the Emperor.

In the next place, they made their Addreſſes and Applications to the Emperor for aſſiſtance, ſupplicating, as Ragotski, and thoſe of Varadin had done before, the powerful protection, and ſacred Patronage of the Imperial Eagles, alledging thoſe Arguments of common ſafety, and mutual intereſt, which apparent reaſon ſuggeſted, and which were the preſent Subject and Theme of all the Courts in Chriſtendom. To this Demand the Emperor aſſented, promiſing readily his aſſiſtance, but with Proviſo, that for his ſecurity, the Cities of Zechelhid, Chowar, Julia, and other places, ſhould receive Gariſons of German Soldiers. The Tranſilvanians willingly accepted the Propoſitions, ſo that ſoon after thoſe places were ſupplied with German Gariſons. But as yet no effectual Forces came from the Emperor, nay rather the German Councils ſeemed willing to perſwade the Turks, that there was no deſign, but to maintain the ancient, friendly and amicable Correſpondence; to which end it is ſaid confidently, that the Prince Gonzaga, wrote to the Paſha of Buda, That thoſe Gariſons ſent to poſſeſs certain places of Tranſilvania, were only in appearance, and not to create Diſſentions between the Auſtrian Court, and the Ottoman Prince; which Letters Ali Paſha ſent to the Tranſilvanians, with deſign, that diſcovering unto them an evident reaſon to diſtruſt the Emperor, they ſhould wholly reſign themſelves to the good will and diſpoſition of the Port.

Prince Gonzaga's Letter to the Paſha of Buda.

But notwithſtanding, theſe verbal aſſurances prevailed not ſo much with the Turks on one ſide, as the German Gariſons adminiſtred jealouſie on the other: So that the Vizier raged furiouſly againſt the Emperor, for encouraging Kemenius, who had treacherouſly murdered his two innocent Brothers in his Rebellion againſt Barclay, the only true and lawful Poſſeſſor. Nor did the Turks only vent their anger and diſdain in words, but alſo by the ſad and calamitous effects of War; paſſing without farther parly into the Emperors Dominions in Hungary, where they put all to fire and ſword.

Count Serini builds a Fortreſs on the Turks Dominions 1661.

Count Serini perceiving evidently hereby that the War was broken forth, and that it was not longer time to ſtand at a gaze, and not make neceſſary Proviſions for defence; about the beginning of June, he laid the foundations of a Fortreſs on the Banks of the River Muer, within the Dominions of the Turks, about a League diſtant from Caniſia, and in memory of his Family and Name called it Serinſwar, a place convenient to aſſault, and offend the Enemy, and to fix the Bulwark, or Redoubt, of the Province of Stiria, which work was laid with that ſecreſie, and executed with ſuch expedition, that it was almoſt finiſhed before it was known, or notice taken thereof by the Turks; but ſo ſoon as it was diſcovered, and the News arrived at Conſtantinople, the old Vizier Kuperlee ſtormed with rage, and in his height of paſſion, ſigned a Command for ſtrangling the Paſha of Caniſia, for not timely preventing the Erection of that Fort in its beginning. In like manner this work was an occaſion of diſguſt at Vienna; for though the Turks were the firſt who had broken the Peace, and given juſt cauſe to the Chriſtians to provide all cautions imaginable for their ſafety; Yet I know not why, nor wherefore, there wanted not certain perſons in the Court either emulous of Serini's Glory, or zealous of the Emperors Intereſt, who interpreted the activeneſs, and forward heat of this Count to be like fire to enflame the Fuel of Controverſie between the two Empires; yet certainly we cannot but meritoriouſly applaud the Heroick Spirit of this Prince, who was provident of his Countries ſafety, watchful of the Enemies Motion, ſoon touched with the ſenſe of the Mahometan infidelity, and in fine, a zealous Champion of the Chriſtian Cauſe.

The juſt commendation of Count Serini.

But now, with what Salve or Balſome ſoever the Italian, or Spaniſh Chirurgions of Politick Government, imagined to obduct a callous over the ſmarts or wounds of theſe differing States; the Breaches grew every day too wide to be drawn up, or cemented by artificial compliances, or verbal lenitives; for now the ſuccours promiſed by the Emperor were arrived in Tranſilvania, under the Command of Count Montecuculi, and joining with the Forces of Kemenius, formed ſuch a numerous, and well compoſed Army, as was judged not only ſufficient to contend for the intereſt of the Chriſtian Cauſe, but alſo for the entire deciſion of the Worlds Dominion: So that both Generals with an unanimous conſent, confident of Victory, agreed, not to expect the approach of Ali Paſha, but boldly to meet and provoke him to Battel.

The Emperor ſends Forces to Tranſilvania.

Ali the Turkiſh General perceiving the ſtrength and reſolution of the Chriſtians, thought it prudence for a while to detract from Engagement, and temper the uſual mettle of the Ottoman fury with cooler Counſels of advantage, which delays and opportunities of time would adminiſter: for obſerving that the Tranſilvanians were divided into Factions, he humoured the diſſenting party, by conſtituting Michael Apaſi their Prince; a perſon in the flower and ſtrength of his Age, of great parts and abilities; and one who violently affected the Principality, having but lately purchaſed his freedom from ſlavery. In this manner Apafi paſſing from his Priſon and Chains, to the glory and trouble of a Throne, poor Tranſilvania remained divided, and taking Arms againſt her ſelf, went daily working and contriving her own ruine. This hath always been the Maſter-piece of the Turkiſh Policy, and this diſunion amongſt Chriſtians hath availed the Ottoman Intereſt more than their Swords, and confirmed their obſtinacy in Religion with a Miracle, as if the diviſion of Chriſtian Princes (which in late Ages have fruſtrated the holy deſigns againſt this common Enemy) had been an effect of their Prayers, and a Conceſſion of Divine Providence to their daily Petitions. So now the Tranſilvanians being divided, great numbers of them revolted from Kemenius to Apafi, which not only weakned, but diſcouraged the Chriſtian Army with fear and confuſion; amidſt of which, Ali Paſha took his time to aſſault them, not far from Cladiopolis; and being aſſiſted by the advantagious conjuncture of the preſent opportunity, ſo wholly diſcomfited them, that he killed and took 50000 perſons, which was the Iſſue of the preſent union, and the excluſion of Kemenius, who was now forced to abandon Tranſilvania, and ſeek his refuge in Hungary.

Kemenius routed.

Howſoever Kemenius could not here reſt ſatisfied, but revolving in his mind certain ways to recover his Principality, obtained from Montecuculi ſome German Troops; with which, and with his own ſcattered Forces, which at length he had collected into a Body, he reſolved to try his Fortune once more with the Turks; and joining Battel with them, not far from Presburg, he fought with a reſolution becoming the deſperateneſs of his deſign; either that day to Die, or to Triumph. The Fortune of that days conflict remained a long time doubtful; ſo equal they ſeemed on both ſides to be in their Courage, in their Force, and in their Conduct, until at length the advantage of the Turks number prevailing, Kemenius was forced to a diſorderly retreat, and afterwards to a confuſed flight; in which, being by one of his own Soldiers knocked from his Horſe, was trampled under foot, & the greateſt part of his People remain'd a Sacrifice to the enraged Weapons of the Turks.

Kemenius a ſecond put time to flight

Apafi's party being greatly encouraged with this ſucceſs, joining with a body of the Turks, laid Siege to Claudiopolis, the Court of the Tranſilvanian Princes, now Gariſoned by German Soldiers, and Governed by David Retani, a right valiant and truſty Soldier, who omitting nothing which might conduce to the defence and maintenance of the Town, either by his care or valour, made many ſucceſsful Sallies upon the Enemy, and tired and wearied them out in their Siege; until at length General Schenidau then in Hungary, gathering what force he could, which were not above 6000 Men, marched with all haſte poſſible to the relief of Claudiopolis; the report of whoſe approach arriving the Turkiſh Camp before his Perſon, or Army, and the common rumour and fear augmenting much their number; the Turks were ſo terrifyed hereat, that in haſte and diſorder they forſook their Siege after three Months continuance; leaving great quantities of Victuals behind for want of Carriages, and Beaſts of burden. Schenidau having gained this ſucceſs and honour with ſo much facility, he reinforced the Gariſon, and returned with Triumph home; carrying with him great Booties of Cattle and other ſpoils of the Enemy. The defence of this place was accounted almoſt miraculous; for beſides that the Fortifications were after the Ancient Model, it was unprovided of Cannon and other warlike Ammunition; and therefore we are not to paſs by the Governour Retani without due Commendations; whoſe valiant and generous ſpirit, with courage equal to his diligence, knew how to fortify and to defend his Walls; For out of the Town Bells he founded his Artillery; he daily wearied the Enemy with Sallies, ſurpriſed one of their Batteries, which moſt annoyed the City; compoſed the Mutinies of the Citizens within; and in ſhort, againſt the Opinion of all, he defended and maintained it in the poſſeſſion and right of the Emperor.

Claudiopolis beſieged.

The Siege raiſed.

Claudiopolis being thus relieved, the Turks ſtomached inwardly the diſgrace, and yet thought it prudence for the preſent to diſſemble; and therefore upon ſome addreſſes made for Peace from Tranſilvania, and certain Propoſitions tendered by the German Reſident; the Vizier counterfeited his inclinations thereunto ſo far, that he prohibited all farther Acts of Hoſtility upon the Frontiers.

Notwithſtanding which, the rumour at this time running, of a Combination of all Chriſtendom againſt the Turk, with Men or Money, forwarded by the endeavours of the Pope, and the contrivances of Venice, encreaſed the former jealouſy, and cauſed the Skirmiſhes on the Frontiers to be more hot and frequent: And the Vizier being froward and cholerick, and by nature jealous; matters had immediately proceeded to an open rupture, had not the German Reſident, by his Moderation and Prudence, repreſented affairs in the ſmootheſt guiſe of Peace, and delayed the War rather than compoſed it; ſo that this whole Summer was ſpent in diſputes, meſſages, and debates on both ſides.

The Turks jealouſy.

The Vizier deſigning this War in his Eye, and deſirous to comply with the vagrant humour of his Maſter, who was weary of his Seraglio at Conſtantinople, reſolved to transfer the Turkiſh Court to Adrianople, ſo that toward the end of June they entered their Tents without the City. But before they could diſpoſe their affairs for to depart, the Plague, which is the Epidemical Diſeaſe of this Country, and the common diſtemper of the Summer Seaſon, began to break forth and diffuſe it ſelf through all parts of the City; that in a ſhort time the Keys of many Houſes were brought to the Grand Signior for want of Pretenders and Heirs ſurviving to poſſeſs them: In greater Houſes of Paſha's and others, where have been a Hundred and fifty perſons, ſcarce five have remained alive for burial of the others; what the fury of that Mortality might be, was beſt conjectured by the daily account was kept of the Corps carried out of the City, by the Gate only of Adrianople, which for ſome Weeks amounted (I ſpeak moderately) to Twelve or thirteen hundred a Day; it being obſerved amongſt the Turks, when above a Thouſand in a Day are carried forth Dead by that Gate, that then Prayers are to be made to Almighty God to withdraw that heavy judgment. At which time the Greek and Armenian Patriarchs are likewiſe deſired to offer up their Devotions, and intercede with God for mitigation of the Peſtilence; and the ſame Day in a Field called Okmaidan, do all aſſemble, though divided apart, to pray againſt the common Calamity, it not ſeeming vain to them, that every one ſhould call upon his God. Nor did the Plague rage only in the City, but the Ships and Turks Saykes were infected in parts remote on the Black Sea, and the Propontis, ſo that above a Hundred Sail were reported to be lodged at ſeveral Ports for want of Seamen to navigate them home. The Camp alſo where the Grand Signior, and Vizier remained, was not exempted from this common

A great Plague at Conſtantinople.

Contagion, for the neceſſary intercourſe between that and the City communicated the evil equal unto both, ſtrowing the ways with dead Bodies, in that manner as repreſented a paſſage conducting to a Cœmetery, or Charnel-houſe, rather than to a Martial Camp or Court of a Great Emperor. This mortality haſtned the Grand Signior with his Army and Attendances into a better Air, the Vizier was to follow a few days after, but before his departure he ſetled and conſtituted his Son Chimacam, or Governour of Conſtantinople. Things in this confuſion and haſte not being well provided for, the Grand Signiors reception at Adrianople cauſed him to prolong his Journey by taking a compaſs round by the Caſtles at the mouth of the Helleſpont, and from thence went to Dimotockum, where having lingered out eight or ten days more, he made a ſolemn entrance into Adrianople; which will for ſome years following be diſcourſed in this Hiſtory as the Seat of the Ottoman Empire.

The G. Viziers juſtice towards our Ambaſſador.

The time of this great Mortality was no ſeaſon for us to move in buſineſs or action, we and all other Chriſtians avoiding common converſation, every one conſulting his particular ſafety. Howſoever two buſineſſes brought our Lord Ambaſſador to Town from his Country Retirement. One was to obtain juſtice from the Vizier, on two miſcreant Turks who had committed a Robbery on his Page and Steward, as they were drinking at a Fountain near a place called Bauchaſarai, a Village inhabited by Greeks; the Steward by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe eſcaped, but the Page being ſickly and weak fell into their hands, and was grievouſly wounded by them. Complaints hereof being made to the Grand Vizier, he ſeemed much concerned at the evil treatment of the Ambaſſadors ſervants; and therefore ſent the Nayp of the Kadi of Galata to take notice, and write down the Wounds which the Page had received; and at the ſame time diſpatched Officers into all parts adjacent, to take the Thieves, and to examine, and torment the people in places where it might be ſuſpected only that they were harboured, and that nothing ſhould be neglected in order to this diſcovery. It is incredible with what diligence, ſeverity, and violence this command was executed, the people in the Villages where they had lodged or been, or but paſſed through, were all ſeized; and the men examined under the Cudgel, with Drubs on their feet; the men, women, and children of Baucha-ſarai were carried, and ſome of them in Chains, to our Ambaſſadors Houſe at Pera; and all the Countries round were ſo ill treated, that their common ſafety was concerned in the taking of theſe Thieves, and the allarum was by this time ſo far ſpread, that it was more preſſing and urgent than our Hue-and-Cry; in ſhort, one of the Thieves was taken; and he diſcovered the abode of his Companion, and both were brought to our Ambaſſadors Houſe, and there put into the Stocks, laden with Chains, and guarded by the Turkiſh Officers. The next day they were carried before the Stambol-Efendi, or Recorder of Conſtantinople, they confeſſed the fact, and Hoget or Sentence paſſed upon them, which by Law could reach no farther than to the Gallies; but being brought before the Vizier, he had a mind to ſtretch the Law, and their necks to a farther extent, and ſo without other demur calling the Hang man, ordered him to put Ropes about their necks, and to carry them to the Lord Ambaſſador, following his directions for their execution; and ſo accordingly one was hanged by the Fountain, and the other on a Tree at the entrance into the Village of Bauche-ſarai. This Exemplary juſtice raiſed the reverence, and fear of the Country-people towards our Ambaſſador unto that degree, that during the time of the Earl of Winchilſea, nothing of this nature ever paſſed again, but on the contrary, the Paiſants, and the people in the Countries round, honoured and feared him like one of their Paſha's, or great men.

The other buſineſs was of a different nature relating to the Emin, or Cuſtomer of Aleppo, who being diſmiſſed of his Employment was now come to Conſtantinople; before his departure from Aleppo, he had demanded of our Merchants there 16000 Dollars for Arrears of Cuſtom due to him, on Silk and other Goods; his pretence was falſe and unjuſt, however it being uſual for Turks upon every demand to gain an advantage, the matter was compounded with the Sum of 2500 Dollars, and ſo the Cuſtomer departed with an appearance of perfect ſatisfactation; notwithſtanding which coming to Conſtantinople he renewed his pretenſions again, and by the favour of the Reis-Efendi or Secretary of State, ſo proceeded in his buſineſs, that the Lord Ambaſſador was forced to make a ſecond compoſition with 2000 Dollars.

The Grand Signior and Vizier, as we ſaid before, being now at Adrianople, the Viziers Deputy, called by the name of the Caimacam, governed Conſtantinople, to whom our Ambaſſador, according to cuſtom made a viſit, preſenting him with eight Veſts.

Likewiſe in abſence of the Vizier, it being uſual for the Ambaſſador to make a Viſit to the Boſtangee-Baſhee, or Head of the Gardiners; his Excellency paſſed that Complement on him, and preſented him with four Veſts. This perſon though entitled Head-Gardiner, is yet of great power, making a conſiderable figure at Court; for he not only commands all the Gardiners belonging to the many Seraglio's of the Grand Signior, which are very conſiderable in number, but his Juriſdiction reaches all along the Boſphorus, and commands the Villages, Woods and Countries at a far diſtance, ſo that he may in Engliſh be compar'd to the chief Ranger.

Kuperlee ſends for his Son.

It was now towards the Winter, when this Vizier Kuperlee, finding himſelf mature with Age, and ready to fall like Autumn Fruit, ſent for his Son from Conſtantinople to bear a ſhare with him in the Burden of the Empire. This he did with the conſent of the Grand Signior, for he alledged, that being now feeble and decayed, he could not make his perſonal Addreſſes as formerly, nor attend at the Court to render his Majeſty an account of his Affairs; and therefore had need of ſo truſty a Meſſenger as his Son, to carry his advices and directions, and faithfully to communicate what he ſhould encharge to his Relation; all others being on ſome conſideration or other ſuſpected, and at leaſt Enemies to him, or to the Grand Signior. The Sultan accepting the propoſition and the Perſon, had often occaſions of diſcourſe and familiarity with the Son, called Ahmet, who deported himſelf with that faith and prudence in the management of all his Affairs, that the old Vizier had no great difficulty to procure a Grant of ſucceſſion for him in that Office: For though there were many obſtacles therein, as the abhorrency of the Turkiſh Policy from all hereditary ſucceſſion in places of truſt; and the Youth of his Perſon, not exceeding thirty two years of Age, and ſome emulous, powerful, and ancient Competitors, who hated the Father; Yet the old Fox had ſo ingratiated himſelf with his Maſter, for (to ſpeak truly) he had been the only inſtrument that had preſerved him and his Empire

Empire from falling into as many Diviſions as there are Paſhalicks, or Governments, that the Grand Signior gave credit to him as to an infallible Oracle, aſſuring him that before any other, who might either pretend Merit, Age, or Precedency, his Son ſhould be preferred to the Succeſſion. The old Man acknowledged the favour with all humility and thankfulneſs, declaring, that he had now ſerved his Majeſty faithfully for the ſpace of five years, a longer proportion than commonly Viziers had managed that Office, in ſuch tempeſtuous and diſtracted times, who either for their own offences, or want of Providence, or good Conduct, have made ſhipwrack of their own lives, and the Charge they piloted: But he had lived in the worſt of times, when the ſpirits of men with diſcontent were enflamed round about him, and threatned the ruine of their Prince and Empire; and yet had reduced things to compoſure, and to the obedience of the Ottoman Yoke, that now he that was the Sultan might incline his Head to reſt with ſecurity, and enjoy his paſtimes and pleaſures, without being interrupted by thoſe Conſpiracies, which deſtroyed his Father, and endangered him in his years of Infancy. And becauſe the continuance of his Security and Glory depended on the execution of certain Maximes, which he had framed to himſelf, he was chalking out to his Son ſuch undoubted Rules and Doctrines of Government, as would certainly tend to the glory and proſperity of the Empire, being abundantly ſatisfied that his Son was faithful, prudent, and active. But three things he particularly recommended to his Majeſty.

Rules given to the Grand Signior.

1. Never to give Ear to the Counſels and Advices of Women.
2. To amaſs what Treaſure he could poſſible into his Coffers, though with Oppreſſion, and impoveriſhment of his People.
3. To be continually on Horſe-back, and keep his Armies in conſtant Action.

Kuperlee dies.

On the 19th of October, Kuperlee having ended his days, whoſe Diſeaſe was Old Age, and a Gangrene in his Legs, his Son by Hatteſheriff, or the Grand Signior's Patent under his hand, taking the Seal, was conſtituted Vizier in the place of his Father, to the admiration and diſappointment of the graver Seniors, who were diſcontented, not only to perceive themſelves neglected, but that perſon alſo to ſupplant them, who was judged uncapable of the Office, according to the Canon, and ancient Precedents of this Government.

The Body of Kuperlee was tranſported to Conſtantinople, where in his life time he had erected a very ſtately and magnificent Structure, and his Monument over the Grave, or Vault, where he deſigned to be interred. In his life time he had filled it with Corn, which daily was diſtributed to the poor, and being emptied after his death, received his Corps, over which a ſmall Moſch was endowed with Oyl for Lamps, and maintenance of certain Taliſmans and Softaes, to make Prayers and Offerings for his Soul.

Paſha of Magnaſia cut off.

The Father being thus interred, Ahmet his Son began to contrive his own eſtabliſhment, and to ſettle his Greatneſs on the foundation of his Fathers Rules of Policy, from whom not to degenerate in cruelty of Nature, or leave his Legacies unpaid to thoſe he had proſcribed, he in the firſt place ſacrificed the Blood of the Paſha of Magnaſia to his Fathers Ghoſt, with ſome other petty attendences; ſo that the World perceived that they had changed the Vizier, but not his tyranny, or at leaſt the ſame ſpirit of the Father ſeemed to be renewed, tranſmitted again into the Perſon of the Son. But more difficult it was to obtain the like ſucceſs againſt Mortaza, the Paſha of Babylon, and the Kayah-begh, or Lieutenant General of the Janiſaries, who were long before (as we have ſaid) marked out for deſtruction by his Father. For the firſt was the moſt powerful Paſha of all Aſia, vigilant, and active, and had done and merited great rewards from his Maſter, and particularly in decoying, and cutting off the Head of the Grand Rebel Aſan Paſha, who dared the Sultan at the Gates of his Seraglio; but underſtanding the ill will of the Houſe of Kuperlee againſt him, ſtood always on his Guard, lodging without the Wall of the City, and under the protection of his Arms and Souldiers, who were greatly affected to the generoſity of his Perſon; ſo that, though many attempts were made upon him, and that Officers, or Executioners came from the Court, openly tendring from the Sultan the Preſent of a Sword, and Veſt of Sables, the uſual Signals of the Ottoman Grace, but privately bringing a Bowſtring, or a Halter; yet they were all entertained at a diſtance, and returned again with the ſame diſſimulation they had uſed in their feigned Addreſſes. In like manner the Kayah-begh, an ancient, prudent, and experienced Commander, beloved by the Souldiery, and ſecured by the Priviledge of his Office, (for a Kayah-begh cannot be cut off during his Command, without infringement of the honour and order of the Janiſaries) preſerved ſtill his Station, and Command in deſpight of the Viziers hate and endeavours. But what could not be done by meer virtue of the abſolute Power, was effected under the appearance of honour and favour of the Sultan, who by his Royal Commiſſion, having made him Paſha of Damaſcus, he was at the ſame inſtant deprived of his Military Power and Priviledge, and lay now naked and expoſed to the Arbitrary Pleaſure and will of his Adverſary. Nor could his prayers or tears incline the Grand Signiors mind to reverſe his Order, who, together with the Vizier, rather inforced it with the ſpecious pretext of Favour and Grace for his former merits, and with commendation of his Abilities agreeable to the importance of ſo conſiderable a Government, encreaſed the juſt ſuſpicion of Solyman, (for ſo the Kayah-begh was called) not being ignorant of the Turkiſh Proverb, A Kayah-begh is like a Fiſh in the Water, which out of its Element immediately dies. Howſoever, ut finis omnium cum dominante, grates agit, he acknowledges the favour of his Maſter, and gave thanks for it, according to the Duty of a good Subject, who ought to acquieſce in the ſentence of his Prince, which, though never ſo full of ſeverity, ought to be believed, and called Clemency. The Vizier now haſted Solyman Paſha to depart with all expedition, not allowing him above Four or Five days time to make preparation for ſo long a Journey, which otherwiſe he would have prolonged, as one, like the reſt of Mankind, deſirous to protract the thread of Life, imagining that in his journey, at ſome diſtance, where his Death might be moſt obſcure, and leaſt noted, the Edict of the Grand Signior might overtake him, and find a Grave for him in ſome ſolitary Deſert, or unfrequented Mountain. Wherefore he made one Day an Addreſs to the Vizier, under pretence of taking his laſt farewel, and freely acquainted him with his apprehenſion and his fears, deſiring that he would deal as frankly with him, in letting him know the utmoſt of his Fate, for that now he was in his hand, and was ſo good a Proficient in the Mahometan Religion, as to oppoſe nothing which was his Deſtiny, or inconſiſtent with the Decree of the Sultan. The Vizier reverencing the Years, and pitying the Condition of ſo worthy a Commander, abaſed ſolely by his Power, bid him be of good cheer, aſſuring him of his Life, ſo long as he acted nothing contrary unto his, which he confirmed by Vows, and all imaginable Proteſtations, encouraging him to proceed forward to his Government with thoſe cheerful Words and Aſſurances, that Solyman Paſha taking his farewel with more eaſe of mind, and confidence of Life, departed Adrianople in three days after his deſignment to the new Office: But not many days Journey had he advanced into Aſia, before the Grand Signiors and Viziers Commands overtook him, altering his deſign for Damaſcus, and inſtead thereof ordered him a Pilgrimage unto Mecha, and exile into the remote and deſert parts of Arabia, until he ſhould be thought worthy to be recalled by that power which baniſhed him. In like manner ſome few days after, the Mufti being on a Friday ſeated in his place, in the Moſch of Sultan Selim (a very noble and famous Fabrick) and attending there the Grand Signiors entrance, that he might begin his Prayers, was unexpectedly whiſpered in the Ear, that he ſhould retire and give place to another Mufti; which immediately he obeyed, and in four hours departed Adrianople, being baniſhed to Gallipoli, for his Friendſhip (as was ſuppoſed) to Solyman Paſha, and for not paſſing the Fetfa for his Death, according to the will and deſire of the Grand Signior.

He is ſent away.

During the Tranſaction of theſe affairs in divers parts, the Wars againſt the Venetians were carried on faintly; the Gallies had no other deſign, or employment, than to tranſport recruits of Men and Ammunition to Canea, that ſo the Turks might rather keep the ground that they had gained in that Iſland, than add thereunto by new Conqueſts, until ſuch time as that being freed from other Wars, they might have leiſure and opportunity to attend unto that alone. Accordingly the Captain Paſha ſet forth at the uſual Seaſon from Conſtantinople; and arrived at Scio with twenty three Gallies, beſides his own called the Baſtard-Gally, or Admiral; the advice of which, coming to the Captain-General of the Venetians, he haſtned thither with all his Fleet to beſiege him in the Port: but this ſeeming after ſome days a tedious work, and what might loſe too much time; he reſolved to depart from thence, and ſo leaving a ſufficient Guard before the Port, he ſet Sail with two Galleaſſes, thirteen light Gallies, and ſeven Auxiliaries for the Coaſt of Rhodes; where his Brigantines adviſed, that the remainder of the Turkiſh Fleet were Anchored, and were taking aboard two thouſand Soldiers for reinforcing Canea; but before the Venetians could arrive, intelligence was given them by the way, that the Turks were looſed from Rhodes, and were Anchored under the Iſland of Patmos; wherefore altering their courſe, they ſteered for Nio, and there watering their Veſſels, ſailed near to Nixia, where the Van-guard diſcovered five and thirty Gallies of the Enemy, which had made prize of a Tartana laden with Proviſions deſigned for the Venetian Fleet, and having taken out her lading, had ſet her on fire. The Venetians having their Enemy in their Eye, gave them chaſe until the Evening, when the Night coming on, put an end to the purſuit: but keeping their courſe towards Candia, they had ſight again of them the next Morning, and coming nearer, the Turkiſh Admiral put forth his Flag of Defiance, as if he intended to come to a Battel; but the Wind blowing hard, and the Sea increaſing, both Fleets were ſeparated until the Morning; when the Venetians diſcovered certain of the Enemies Gallies to Leeward of Milo, where bearing down before the Wind upon them, five of them ran aſhore; one was ſunk, and four were taken by the Venetian and Malteſe Gallies, three of which fighting with great Courage and Valour, killed divers brave Cavaliers of one and the other Country. The men which ran the Gallies aſhore at Milo, did it with deſign to ſecure themſelves in that ſmall Fort which the Turks poſſeſſed in that Iſland; but they were not able to withſtand the valour of the Venetians, who having firſt recovered the Cannon of the Gallies which were ran aſhore, with their rigging, and what elſe was uſeful, they ſet the Hulls on Fire; and immediately entering the Port, the Captain-General landed two hundred ſelect men, and veterane Soldiers to beſiege the Fortreſs, giving Orders to one Manolacchi Macchiotti, who was well acquainted with the Turkiſh Language, to ſummon them to a Treaty, the which they readily accepted, and were received to quarter at diſcretion of the General; the next Morning they were brought down to the Sea-Coaſt to the number of about nine hundred, amongſt which there was a Janizar-Aga, a Bey of Rhodes, and three of Conſtantinople, beſides Captains, and other perſons of condition and quality. Theſe Priſoners being divided into ſeveral Gallies and Ships, the Venetians departed, and cruiſing about the Coaſt of Candia, to hinder the importation of all ſuccours, they encountered with Antonio Priuli, with a good Squadron of Veſſels under his Command.

THE HISTORY OF Sultan Mahomet IV. THE XIII. EMPEROUR OF THE TURKS.

The Second BOOK.

Anno Chriſti, 1662. Hegeira, 1073.

AT the beginning of this Year the People of Algier ſent Meſſengers and Preſents to the Grand Signiors Court, then at Adrianople, complaining againſt the Actions His Majeſties Fleet, under the Command of the Earl of Sandwich, had done againſt their Town and Caſtles, pretending thoſe Forts to be the Grand Signiors, and the Affront offered to him, as willing to intereſt him in thier Quarrels and Piracies. And that thier Addreſſes might be more graciouſly received, they brought with them certain Preſents, which tho in former times were Yearly, were now only as their Affairs required, and on this occaſion were doubled. for beſides their Preſents to the Miniſters and Officers of State; they brought to the Grand Signior a Ship made in Silver, beſet with Emrods, Rubies, and other Stones; fourteen young and hanſom Boys, and a Neger Eunuch for the Seraglio. But the Earl of Winchelſea, His Majeſties Embaſſador there Reſident, being then at Court, had ſo well prepoſſeſſed the Vizier with the Ground and Reaſons for the War, that the complaints of Algier were judged in no wiſe touching the Ottoman Intereſt, or the breach of Peace, any Impeachment of the good Correſpondence and Friendſhip which then intervened between the King of England and the Grand Signior. But their Preſumption to ſearch Engliſh Ships, and take out Strangers Goods, was objected as an Argument of the [illegible] and Rebellion, contrary to the Grand Signiors Capitulations, which alſo was aggravated by their ill Treatment of the Grand Signiors Paſha, whom they had beaten, impriſoned, and caſt out of all Power and Authority; which ſevere Reprehenſions ſo terrified and diſcouraged them, that they not only deſiſted from their Pretenſions againſt the Engliſh, but began to fear, leſt the Power and Intereſt of the Ambaſſador at Court, ſhould contrive ſome miſchief to their own Perſons.

The Gr. Signior perſwaded to return to Conſtantinople.

Soon after this the Vizier eſteeming it neceſſary towards his better eſtabliſhment to gratifie the City of Conſtantinople, and the Grandees of the Empire, by the Grand Signiors return to his Imperial Seat, prevailed with him, (as a matter wholly neceſſary) to adorn and comfort that place by his Preſence; for now he began to declare a kind of abhorrency to it, in regard the memory of thoſe Rebellions which were nouriſhed in that place, to the Deſtruction of his Father, and to the great hazard and narrow eſcape afterwards of himſelf, had taken that Impreſſion on his Fancy, that the Chamber of the Seraglio appeared melancholly and diſmal, and the Walks of his Garden ſolitary, and the noiſe of the Rooks and Daws amongſt his Trees, were like the croakings of Ravens or unlucky Birds. Howſoever the Vizier had ſo far entered into his Affection and Eſteem, that his Perſwaſions were ſtronger than his own abſolute Dominion; and prevailed ſo with him againſt the force of his own Fancy, that about the Equinoctial he began his Journey towards Conſtantinople, to the great Joy and Satiſfaction of his People: But by the way lingring out his time in Hunting and other Paſtimes of the Woods and Fields; it was the 30*th* of March before he made his Entry, for never was Prince ſo great a Nimrod, ſo unwearied a Huntſman as this; never was he at quiet, but continually in the Fields on Horſeback, riſing ſometimes at Midnight, to ride up the Mountains, that he might more early diſcover the Sun in the Morning; by which extravagant courſe of Life, he wearied out his Court and Attendants, who began to believe the amorous humour of the Father more ſupportable, than the wandring Vagaries, and reſtleſs Spirit of the Son. But not only were his Huntings tedious to his Court, but troubleſome and expenſive to the whole Country, which were all ſummoned in whereſoever he came, and ſometimes thirty or forty thouſand men appointed to beat the Woods for three or four days, carrying before them the compaſs of a days Journey about, incloſing all the Game and wild Beaſts within that Circuit, which on the day of the Hunt, the Grand Signior kills and deſtroys with Dogs, Guns, or any other way, with abundance of noiſe and confuſion; which Paſtime, tho lawful in it ſelf, and commendable enough in ſo great a Prince, yet the frequent uſe of it, was a burden and an oppreſſion to his People, whilſt in the Winter they paſſed many cold Nights in the Woods, and being unuſed to that hardſhip, many of them paid for their Emperors Paſtime with their own lives.

The Gr. Signiors extravagant Hunting.

The Vizier endeavours to eſtabliſh himſelf.

The Grand Signior being now at Conſtantinople, the Vizier judged not himſelf ſo well fixed in his Government, but that through the Malice of his powerful Enemies, who were familiar to the Grand Signiors Ear, he was then in danger to be ſhaken; the principal of which was Kuzlir Aga, or chief Eunuch of the Women of the Seraglio, who by means of the Valede, or Queen Mother, was ill-affected to him, being both inclined to prefer ſome Favourites of their own, for the Diminution and Eclipſe of the Viziers Power, one whereof was the Teſterdar Paſha, or Lord Treaſurer, placed in Office againſt the Viziers Approbation, which the Vizier underſtanding, made ſhort Work with him, depriving him of his Office, commanded him in a few hours to quit Conſtantinople.

But the Queen Mother, and Kuzlir Aga reſenting this Affront to their Favourite, reſolved to even ſcores in a piece of the like Nature: Whereſore they obtained for the Viziers Kahya, or Steward, the Paſhalick of Darbiquier, a rich and honourable Government, not for any diſaffection or hatred they had unto him, but only to deprive the Vizier of the Counſel and Aſſiſtance of ſo knowing and faithful a Servant; for he was a Perſon, who by his own Eſtate and Friends had raiſed the Houſe of Kuperlee, having in the time of his Poverty and Meanneſs lent him that Sum of Money, which gave him the firſt Riſe to his Richeſs and Authority; for Recompence and Intereſt of which, old Kuperlee made him his Steward, and ſhared to him his Honours and Proſperity; in which deporting himſelf towards all People with the ſame modeſty and evenneſs of Temper which he uſed in his former Condition, he procured no Enemies to his own Perſon, and ſuch as hated the Intereſt he ſerved, only wiſhing him diſobliged from it, ſo as to be able to diſpenſe their Malice on the Vizier, without concerning him in his Maſters ruin. This conſideration moved the angry Lady, and the envious Eunuch to vex their Adverſary by the removal of his moſt faithful Creature and Servant.

Mahomet Kahya now Paſha of Darbiquier, after a reaſonable and convenient time allowed him for his Preparations, being very rich, ſet forward towards his Goverment, with a very noble and numerous Retinue, having amongſt the reſt five hundred Perſons young, well mounted, and well armed; which notwithſtanding were not ſo ſtrong, but before they were advanced many days Journey into Aſia, were encountred by a greater force of bold and deſperate Robbers, who engaging with him, killed two hundred of his People on the place, rifled his Baggage, and conſtrained the Paſha himſelf to fly to the next City. This ſtrange and audacious Robbery produced many Commands and Orders for Seizure and Suppreſſion of Theives in the leſſer Aſia. And becauſe the cuſtom is, that ſomething muſt be done in Compliance with the Imperial Commands, many poor innocent Men were taken in the Fields and Mountains, and perhaps without any other Crime againſt them, than that they were not maſters of a thouſand Aſpers to bribe the Officers, were for want thereof ſent as Thieves to the Port, where without further Conviction or Tryal they were executed.

A notable Robbery.

The Vizier being thus weakned by the removal of his faithfulleſt Friend, his Condition was given over as deſperate by the generality of the World, and ſeveral appearances of Troubles ariſing from the Eaſtern and Weſtern parts, gave occaſion to the Queen Mother, and her Party, to diſparage his Abilities in the eſteem of the Sultan: Wherefore they exhorted him to imitate the Example of his Renowned Predeceſſors, who made uſe of their Viziers only to eaſe them from the troubleſom part of their Government, but did not entirely throw off the Knowledg and Privity of the important Tranſactions and State Affairs in the whole Empire. This Leſſon awakened the Grand Signior a little, ſo that he declined ſome days his Sports abroad, and Exerciſe on Horſe-back, and inſtead thereof paſſed much of his time in a Chiosk, or Garden-houſe on the Wall of the Seraglio, juſt oppoſite to the Viziers Gate, where his chief Buſineſs and Concernment was to obſerve ſuch as went in, or came out; and when at any time he eſpied thoſe enter, remarkable for their Attendance, or difference of Habit, he would ſend to know of the Vizier, what occaſion drew thoſe People thither, what their Buſineſs was, and the like, by which he gave himſelf that Satiſfaction as to believe that he had now found the true way of inſpecting his Affairs, and taking care of his Empire. The Vizier was not inſenſible from whence this humour of the Gr. Signior proceeded, nor ignorant what ill Conſequences ſuch petty matters might produce; wherefore he reſolved, if poſſible, to reconcile the favour and good will of the Valede, or Queen Mother, but all his Addreſſes (it ſeems) were returned fruitleſs; ſo difficult was it to appeaſe the Malice of a feminine Spirit; and this malice She ſo ill concealed, that it was often ſaid by Turks of Quality and Judgment, That the Great Viziers Mother, who entertained a Familiarity with Spirits, as they believed, had by their Enchantments procured the Office of Vizier for her Husband and Son ſucceſſively, and prevailed ſtill to preſerve her Son in the favour of his Maſter, yet could not by force of Magick get Power or Dominion over the Valede; No Spells, it ſeems, had virtue enough to qualifie the Spirit of that angry Juno. Some hereupon judged, that the Vizier might 1662. might have thoughts to make Reſignation of his Office, and to content himſelf with ſome Paſhalick of a higher and more eminent Degree; but Apprehenſions and Jealouſies of their Dangers, and his own natural Ambition, ſoon ſtifled thoſe Conſiderations, reſolving to continue his Charge in Oppoſition to all the Difficulties and Dangers he might encounter. And perhaps he gave himſelf the ſame Counſel which the Vitellian Soldiers did to their General. Nihil atrocius eventurum, quam in quod ſponte ruant, moriendum victis, moriendum deditis; id ſolum referre, noviſſimum Spiritum, per ludibrium & contumelias effundant, an per Virtutem. Men who muſt dye, whether they yield or are conquered by force, have the ſame Fate; all the difference is, that the one dies with Valour and Reputation, the other with Reproach and Cowardice. But to execute this ſtout Counſel with Prudence and Wiſdom he conceived it neceſſary, if poſſible, to reconcile the ſincere Friendſhip of Samozade, the Reis Effendi, or Chief Secretary of State, a Perſon the beſt practiſed of any, in the Affairs and Nogotiations of the Ottoman Empire, and one much in the Eſteem and Favour of the Queen Mother, and in order thereunto treats him with more Familiarity and Condeſcenſion than was ordinary, or by many judged agreeable to the Greatneſs of a Grand Vizier; for always when he came into his Preſence, he aroſe up, calling him ſecretly Father, Tutor and Companion, in ſupporting the Burden of the weighty Government, and ſuch other Compellations, as the Grand Signior vouchſafed only to the Vizier: for tho this Reis Effendi was of the greateſt Abilities, and this preſent Vizier the moſt youthful and unexperienced of later Times, yet it may be accounted one ſpecial mark and token of his Prudence, in knowing how to elect ſo uſeful a Friend, and of his Policy in procuring his ſincere faithfulneſs towards him, and making him really his own. To which end he converſed much with him, communicated all his thoughts, freely demanded his advice, received his private Entertainments, and in fine, was wanting in no points of affable Courteſy and Compliance, whereby he might create him his own, contenting for ſome time himſelf with the name of Vizier, tho the other as one, who beſt knew how to manage it, enjoyed the Power.

Tacit. Lib. Hiſt. 3.

The Chief Officers of the Seraglio, inſtigated by the Queen Mother to diminiſh ſomething the Power of the Vizier, put often the Grand Signior in mind, as a matter agreeable to his Dignity, to have a regard to his Government, which cauſed him more frequently than his humour ſerved, to betake himſelf to his Choisk over againſt the Viziers Gate, to make his uſual Obſervations; and perceiving ſome Chriſtians to enter the Court with red Calpacks or Caps, and yellow Shooes (prohibited to Chriſtians by orders of inferior Magiſtrates, but never until now thought worthy the Imperal Obſervance) immediately called for the Subaſhee or Conſtable of Conſtantinople, and from the Window commanded him with great Fury to enter the Viziers Court, and ſuch Chriſtians as he ſhould find there with yellow Shooes and red Caps he ſhould firſt beat, and then ſend uncovered and barefooted home. The Subaſhee armed with a Power in this matter as high as the Viziers, entered the Houſe without Complement or Licence, and encountring firſt the Kapikahya's or Agents of Moldavia and Valachia negotiating the Affairs of their Prince and Country, he rudely layed them down, and without Reſpect to their Perſons or Office, beat them on the Feet, tore off their red Stockins and Caps, and ſent them home with their Heads and Feet bare, derided by the People, and lamenting the Affliction of that Tyranny to which they were ſubjected. This inhumane Treatment of Perſons in a manner ſacred, was ſeconded by publick Proclamations, ſtrictly prohibiting all Chriſtians from wearing red Caps, yellow Shooes, ſcarlet Veſts, and the like; and Janizaries from the uſe of Hanjars or Daggers, and ſilk Turbants, upon pain of Death; which Order was ſo ſtrictly enjoyned, that the Corners of every Street were furniſhed with Officers to obſerve, and puniſh ſuch as were found to offend. The Grand Signior himſelf judged alſo the Execution of this Order of that importance, as to deſerve his own proper Care and Inſpection; wherefore walking abroad, as his manner was, in diſguiſe, with his Executioner at hand, encountred in the Streets an unfortunate Bridegroom, an Armenian, who that day, on priviledge of his Eſpouſals, had adventured to dreſs himſelf with yellow leathern Soks: nothing was, or could have time to be pleaded in his behalf, before the fatal Blow was ſtruck, which ſent him to his Grave inſtead of his Nupital Bed. This fury continued ſome few days with much rigour, and ſtrict obſervation, but afterwards growing cold again, all care was neglected, happening herein, as commonly it doth in all things, which have no other foundation than humour and fancy.

The Gr. Signiors ſevere Prohibition of yellow ſhoes, and red Calpacks to Chriſtians.

But this inſpection into petty matters did not ſo much diſturb the thoughts of the Vizier, as did the power and greatneſs of Mortaza the Paſha of Babylon, by the Turks called Bagdat, a perſon of an undaunted Courage, and greate Conduct, whom he had hitherto ſuffered to live, contrary to the true knowledge of his intereſt, and the Rules his Father had left him: wherefore he reſolved to renew his deſign and attempts againſt his Life; one I remember was in December of the paſt Year, when in our journey to Adrianople, we met a Meſſenger on the way, who amongſt other Diſcourſes informed us, that he was then going to Bablyon for confirmation of Mortaza, and as a teſtimony of the G. Signiors favour and good will towards him, he carried him a Sword, and a Veſt of Sables: we immediatly, and that truly, gueſſed for what Preſent the Sword was ſent; for in ſome Months after the Chaous-baſhee, or chief of the Purſuivants, returned without delivery of his Preſent. For the wiſe Mortaza was ſo juſtly Jealous, that he would not ſo much as admit him to his Preſence, but returned him again with his Sword and Sables for thoſe who were more eaſy and credulous, and who believe to dye by Command of the Sultan to be Martyrdom, and the only Crown of all their Merits and Deſerts: and knowing that he could not long ſubſiſt in Oppoſition to ſo great an Enemy; he contracted an Alliance by Marriage with a Daughter of one of the Gordean, or Curdean Princes, and in Dowry had one of the ſtrongeſt Forts of thoſe Mountains delivered into his hands.

The Vizier ſeeks to cut of Mortaza the Paſha of Babylon.

The Vizier finding himſelf thus foiled in his occult Artifices, began publickly to profeſs his Enmity; and therefore in the firſt place perſwaded the Grand Signior, that the long continuance of Mortaza in that Government, beyond the uſual term, ſo Opulent and Powerful, and of a Spirit ſo Ambitious and Rebellious, could not but prove dangerous to himſelf, and in time give him Confidence of Competition for the whole Empire; which hazard to prevent with moſt prudence and advantage, (there being a preſent occaſion of good Soldiers for relief of Candia) Mortaza and his Complices could not be better beſtowed than upon that Employment. The Grand Signior readily conſented to his Counſel, being naturally very apprehenſive of Danger, and in his place conſtituted the Aga, or General of the Janizaries, poſting him away with all ſpeed poſſible to his Government; who did not run ſo faſt in his Journey, but that the advices of the coming of a new Paſha, arrived timely the Ears of Mortaza, who judging it an unequal match to contend with the whole Empire, gave wayto his Succeſſor, but withal, kept himſelf ſo on his Guard, that his Adverſary could not reach his Head, and ſend it as the firſt-fruits and Tribute of his new Office. For yielding up his command as in an honourable manner of Retreat, he gave out, that with his Army (reported to conſiſt of Forty thouſand Men) he was on his March to Candia, but ſoon after his deſign was diſcovered to be otherwiſe; for believing his own Force unable to contend with his Maſters, he retired with his richeſs,and ſome ofthoſe moſt faithful to him, unto his Fort on the Mountains, and to the Protection and Country of the King of the Curdi, whoſe Daughter he had Married, and remained in Epectation of time and opportunity, to take his revenge on the Vizier, hoping that with time this ſtorm would blow over,and that the Beams of his Princes Favour would again ſhine upon him. Theſe Curdi are called by ſome Writers Cordiæi, from whence the Province had the name of Gordiene, bordering on Aſſyria, the Kingdom once of Zabienus, who ſiding with Lucullus againſt Tigranes King of Armenia, was by Tigranes murdered with his Wiſe and Children. Theſe People inhabit the Mountain Amanus, dividing Syria from Cilicia, which by reaſon of the difficult acceſs thereunto, was never yet ſubjected to the Ottoman Yoke; they are ſaid in former times to have worſhipped a black Dog, and dare not ſpeak ill of the Devil, not for love, but fear. But ſome report, that have lately been amongſt them, that they have left off that helliſh Superſtition, and embrace a certain ſort of Religion mixed with Chriſtianity and Turciſm; but yet without Baptiſm or Circumciſion. In brief, they are a bad ſort of groſs People at the beſt, contenting themſelves with little Religion, addicted to Blood and Robberies. Theſe Curdi or Gordeenes,being a people retired, keep within their Mountains, are ſhy in their Converſation and Diſcourſe, and afford us little ſubject, or opportunity of knowing with any Satisfaction, their Religion or Manners; but from ſuch of our Country-men, as have lately entertained Society with them, we have this account. They are ſeated on thoſe Mountains, as we have ſaid before, which of old are called Cordiæi or Gordiai, beginning near Aleppo, but running out as far as Perſia; they make ſhew of the Turkiſh Religion for fear, but have in reality another of their own, which permits them to eat Swines Fleſh, and drink Wine, as the Druſes and Kalbeenes; Bacon being eſteemed by them a particular Cordial, or Reſtorative for the Sick. The chief Country and City of thoſe near Aleppo, is called Jeumee, where they have a Convent of twelve Prieſts with a Superior over them,and another of the like ſort near Moſul or Nineveth. The two Chiefs of theſe Monaſteries meet at fixed times to conſult for the good of the Common-weal.Their Devotions are private in a Cave; they tell us of but one Book, which contains both their Law and their Rituals; being asked what they thought of our Saviour, they anſwered, he was their Breath, and their Soul; at the name of Mahomet they Spit, and with Nicodemus his Circumſpection and Aſſurance of Secrecy, they declared, themſelves and Chriſtians the ſame, which they would make appear ſo ſoon as they were delivered from their fear of Bondage to the Turk. They ſay that they worſhip God, and will not curſe the Devil, to which no Force or Power can compel them; partly, perhaps becauſe they have heard of our Saviours Precept, Bleſs, and Curſe not; but rather, becauſe they hold, that the Devil and his Followers ſhall one day be reſtored to their former ſeats of Bleſſedneſs and Dignity. When their Prieſts are together, and Wine brought in amongſt them, the Superior makes a ſign for Silence, and afterwards a ſhort Admonition, that Wine is the Blood of God. I have heard that a Capuchin Fryer was once invited amongſt them, with Promiſe to give him a ſight of their Book of Rituals, and being come to Jeumee, was detained a day or two in a Cave, on pretence that the other Superior of Moſul was then amongſt them, who being a ſevere Perſon, if he knew of his being there, would certainly put him to Death, as one who came to alter their Religion; upon which Suſpicion the Capuchin forgetting his Curioſity, fled for ſafety, with all ſpeed poſſible. Their Prieſts are ſaid to be Grave,wearing black throughout; their Garments plaited or quilted; the Veſtures of the Commonalty are agreeable to Mountainiers, whoſe Natures are Rough and Boiſterous,addicted to Blood and Robbery, the common Vice of thoſe People. I have heard, that the Son of a Gourdeene Widow being killed by ſome of that Country, She aſſembled her neareſt Kindred, and required them to bring her the Windpipe of the Murderer, which when they had done, She together with her Friends, eat it in Revenge. In fine, their Religion may have ſome ſmall Reliques of Chriſtianity, but mixt with the dregs of other Religions. 'Tis poſſible they may be of the Manichee Race. Their Opinion of the Devils Reſtoration, was once held in part by Origen: that of Wine (that it is the Blood of God) was the Heatheniſh conceit of the Egyptian Prieſts. Their whole Nation, if well united, may compoſe an Army of thirty or forty thouſand Men.

But to return to our purpoſe. The news of the Flight of Mortaza to this Ignoble Prince, troubled the Grand Signior, who ſtill retained ſome Impreſſions of kindneſs to his Perſon, remembring his Generoſity, Valour, and former Deſerts, the memory of which was encreaſed alſo by the Friends of Mortaza, who wanted not in the Court to repreſent them with ſome Compaſſion, arguing that his flight was not of Contumacy or Contempt to his Maſters Protection, but an effect of natural Preſervation; which worked ſo far on the Grand Signior, that he immediately ſent for the Vizier to enquire of him the State and Condition of Mortaza. The Vizier to defend himſelf, and make good what before he had counſelled his Maſter, aggravated his Adverſary's Crimes, and his Diſobedience and Flight to an inconſiderable King; with which, and ſome other light Excuſes and Perſwaſions, that the removal of ſuch a Perſon was agreeable to the preſent State of Affairs, and conducing to his own Security, eaſily pacified the Mind and Affections of the Grand Signior; but no ſooner was he returned to his Houſe, but advice was given him, that the Emaum of Mortaza, or his Prieſt or Chaplain, was then at Conſtantinople, whom the Vizier immediatly ſent for, and without any Plea or Indictment, ſtruck off his Head, and threw his Body into the Sea,on pretence that he was ſent thither,as a Spy for his Maſter,and to give Intelligence,and a beginning to Rebellion: Theſe were his colours and allegations for his deſerved Death; for Governours though never ſo wicked and ſo abſolute, and that have no need to render any other cauſe to the World of their actions, than their own will, yet eſteem it neceſſary to act under the ſpecious guiſe of juſtice, and in the good opinion of the multitude. The Aga of Babylon encountred the ſame Fortune; for Mortaza giving place, he thought it fit for himſelf to do the like; reſolving for Conſtantinople, but being intercepted in his Journey by the new Paſha, his Head was ſtruck off, and his Journey ſhortned.

But that which again renewed the trouble and fears of the Vizier, was a report that the late Kahya-begh degraded at Adrianople, was ſecretly returned to the City, and lived concealed, giving ſuch Orders to the Janizaries as tended to Mutiny and Inſurrection, and that the pretences and reports of his being gone to Damaſcus, and thence in his holy Pilgrimage to Mecha, were but all falſe ſtories to conceal his Reſidence at Conſtantinople. This ſet the Vizier all on fire, and made him tremble with the thoughts of it; wherefore ſearch was made for him day and night, but not found; for in reality he was gone on his deſigned Journey, only it was the misfortune of his Kahya, or Steward, as before it was of Mortaza's Emaum, to fall into the Viziers hands, who being beaten to confeſs where his Maſter was, died afterwards of the blows.

But notwithſtanding that Mortaza was fled, yet the Vizier laid not aſide his fears and thoughts concerning him, not knowing how ſoon he might be recalled home, and ſeated in his place; of which various Examples are extant in Turkiſh Hiſtory; and therefore he ſent orders to Mahomet Paſha, his late Kahya, now Paſha of Darbiquier, as General (with the knowledge and conſent of the Grand Signior) and to the Paſhaws of Aleppo, Erzirum and others near adjacent, to prepare and aſſemble what Force was neceſſary to conſtrain the King of the Curdi, to ſurrender Mortaza into their hands: But whilſt theſe matters were in agitation, ſome unexpected troubles in Georgia diverted their Arms, and held them for ſome time in ſuſpenſe, not knowing what the iſſue might be. The Original and Ground thereof was this: After Sultan Solyman had taken Erzirum, it was agreed in the Capitulations between the Turks and Perſians, that of the ſeven Provinces of Georgia (anciently called Iberia, but now as ſuppoſed to have received the Denomination from St. George, the Cappadocian Martyr, there had in great eſteem and reverence) three ſhould be tributaries to the Turk, and three to the Perſian, all govern'd by Achic-baſh as head and ſupream Prince, to whom the Seventh ſhould alſo be ſubjeſted, without acknowledgment to either; in payment of which Tribute, they continued moſt willingly, leſt for default thereof, the importation of Salt, of which their Provinces afford none, ſhould be hindred either from the Turkiſh, or Perſian Dominion. And now it happened that Achic-baſh dying, his Wife married again, who to gratifie her new Lover, was contented to have the eyes of her Son put out, who was the lawful Heir to the Government. This Fact was ſo hainouſly received by the Princes of the three Provinces under the Perſian, that with common conſent, they elected one to ſucceed Achic-baſh, and extorted the power out of the hands of the Amorous Traitor. The Princes of the three Provinces under the Turk alarm'd hereat, made inſurrection, reſolving rather than any Foreigner, to ſet up one of the Kindred of Achic-baſh, which the Perſian Provinces better underſtanding, approved likewiſe, and for confirmation, and maintenance of their choice, aſſembled an Army of Threeſcore thouſand men. The Paſhaws tending towards Curdi, were ſurprized in their March with the news of theſe diſturbances in Georgia, and not rightly apprehending the cauſes of theſe ſudden commotions, gave an arreſt to the progreſs of their Arms, inclining towards the parts of Georgia, to be in a readineſs to ſuppreſs all deſigns againſt the Ottoman Dominions, ſo that the thoughts of War againſt the Curdi was for ſome time laid aſide. The news of theſe troubles did alſo alarm the Port, with which alſo came a report, That ſix hundred Tents of the Kuzilbaſhees (which are the beſt ſort of Perſian Horſemen) were pitched nigh the Confines of the Grand Signiors Territories; ſo that Orders were diſpatched to the aforeſaid Paſhaws to watch the motion and iſſue of thoſe Affairs, but thoſe ſtorms blowing over by the eſtabliſhment of Achic-baſh, the Turkiſh Forces proceeded on their firſt deſign againſt Mortaza, marching to the paſs of the Country of the Curdi, which is very ſteep, aſperous and rough. The whole Kingdom being, as it were, one Mountain of dangerous and difficult acceſs, hath hitherto preſerved the Inhabitants from the Ottomon Subjection. The entrance thereunto being ſtrong by Nature, is alſo fortified with ſeveral Caſtles, the chief of which, poſſeſſed by Mortaza, is called Zizri, and the People there abouts Zezidi. The Turkiſh Army being arrived at this paſs, Mahomet, the Paſha of Darbiquier, appointed General, as we have ſaid before, ordered five hundred of his ſelect men to enter within the paſs, which the Curdi perceiving, with little oppoſition, put to flight, being ſo commanded by the General; the unadviſed Curdi eagerly purſuing the enemy, left the paſs naked, and undefended, ſuppoſing their whole victory and ſucceſs to conſiſt in the Rout of thoſe few: Whereupon the Turkiſh Army wiſely poſſeſſed the paſs, and got between the Curdi, and their place of Retreat, and laying the Siege to the Caſtle, required them either to ſurrender themſelves, or elſe Mortaza and his Complices into their hands.

The Provinces of Georgia in diſturbance.

The Turks Stratagem againſt the Curdi.

The Curdi perceiving themſelves thus hardly beſet, and in a manner defrauded, their Gariſon which poſſeſſed the paſs without the Confines, the Enemy gotten poſſeſſion of the Gate which opened to their Country, their Caſtles beſieged, and in danger to be gained, and an inlet made to an Inundation by their Enemies, cauſed them to requeſt a three days truce for Conſultation, which being granted, they began to conſider, whether it were better to hazard the welfare of their Country in a dangerous War, of which the Turks having already compaſſed the paſſage, had made half the Conqueſt; or to ſurrender up Mortaza to his own King, one in whom they had no part, no intereſt, nor relation. The latter Counſel was moſt generally pleaſing; wherefore they ſeized Mortaza, promiſing at firſt to conduct him through the Mountains to the Perſians; but afterwards being on Horſe-back, and about a Mile diſtant from the Camp, they bound his hands behind him, and with his Steward, the Maſter of his Horſe, and a Page, delivered him into the hands of the Turks, who immediately ſtruck off their heads, and ſent them to Conſtantinople, where for three or four days they lay before the Door of the Divan, with Inſcriptions on them whoſe they were, and afterwards were thrown into the Sea.

The ſurrender of Mortaza into the Turks hands, and his death.

1662. And thus ended this famous Mortaza, who had in like caſes, by order of this Viziers Father, been an active Executioner of other Paſhaws, and now included in the ſame Fate, by means of the Son, being proſcribed (as we have ſaid before) by Teſtament, and the moſt likely of any Paſha in the Empire to ſtand in competition for the Office of Vizier.

The Vizier upon this ſucceſs began to ſhew a more cheerful Countenance than formerly, ſuſpecting leſs of danger upon removal of ſo ſuſpicious an Enemy. And truly it was now hard to ſay where in the whole Empire was a generous, bold, or ambitious ſpirit remaining, who had Reputation and Authority enough to attempt a priority, ſuch havock was made by this Viziers Father of all hopeful and daring diſpoſitions, and ſuch an Addition made to the ſlaughter by this man in preſent Office, that whether mens ſpirits were vanquiſhed, and cowed with former Examples, or that the Age really afforded not ſuch Heroes, it is hard to ſay: None now appearing other than obſequious to this Vizier, and to fear, and court him.

The Vizier having thus ſucceſsfully contrived his Eſtabliſhment, and ſecurity at home, had time to confirm it by his Wars abroad, well judging that foreign Wars allay Civil Diſſentions, and the Proſperity thereof doth both produce reputation and terrour of his Perſon amongſt his Enemies, as well as reconcile affections, and increaſe Authority amongſt his ſubjects at home. Wherefore he meditated on a War againſt the Emperor, and was glad to embrace the occaſion from the late Diſturbances made in Tranſilvania by Kemenius, as we have related in the former Year. But yet like a crafty Politician, who looketh one way, and ſteers another; ſo the Vizier, that he might the better lull the Germans into a ſleep, and apprehenſions of ſecurity, he diſſembled his inclinations to Peace, and to hearken to ſuch propoſitions as were tendered him by the German Reſident, namely, that the Fort of Serini ſhould be demoliſhed; being built againſt the intention, and without the knowledge or conſent of his Imperial Maſter; that the Gariſons of Zeckelhid, Coloſwar, and other places ſhould be removed, with other overtures, and the faireſt Propoſitions imaginable, which might give the Turks ſatisfaction, and by ſome means or other reconcile the differences, if poſſible. To which counſel the Emperor was the rather inclinable, in regard that a Treaty at that time was on foot between the French King, and the Duke of Lorain for Alſatia, and that the reſult might prove prejudicial to the Empire, ſhould he at the ſame time be engaged in a War againſt the Turk, whilſt as dangerous a friend as the other was an Enemy, crept eaſily into a ſuſpected Neighbourhood. But the other Chriſtian Princes, eſpecially Rome, and the Allies, engaged in the Venetian Quarrel, perceiving the Emperor to detract from his reſolutions of War, upon this ſuſpicion, endeavoured to clear him from all jealouſie in reference to the French deſigns, and for better evidence thereof, had their own engagements ſeconded by Proteſtations from that King, not only not to moleſt the Empire during this War, but to afford him conſiderable aid and aſſiſtance both in Men, and Money. Theſe Negotiations and incitements to a War, encouraged the Emperor, and the German Princes in that manner, that whilſt the Turks expected the return of the Currier from Vienna, as it were with an Olive Branch of Peace, and Confirmation of all Articles, which before were eſteemed to be concluded, and agreed; the Scene was wholly changed, and the Letters contained new demands and propoſitions, and in fine, made all doubtful and unſatisfactory. The Turks penetrating rightly into this Affair, preſſed hard to have a ſpeedy Peace, or War; wherefore the Reis Effendi, or Secretary of State, did at a private Conference with the German Miniſter in name of the G. Signior, and in few words declare, That three months were allotted to demoliſh the Fort built by the Count Serini, and for coming of an extraordinary Ambaſſador to confirm the Articles: Notwithſtanding which, the Grand Signior unmindful of the time, and of the Conditions he had given, and prefixed for Peace, ordered the Vizier immediately to prepare for the War, declaring that he would in Perſon accompany him in part of his March, and remove his Court to Adrianople; for this being a Country, champian, and plain, full of Game of all ſorts, ſo drew the heart and delight of the Grand Signior, that his Seraglio at Conſtantinople ſeemed as a Cage, or Priſon, in reſpect of thoſe deſired Plains of Thrace: His Women were no paſtime or recreation to him, in whoſe Apartments he ſpent little time: For this exceſſive humour in Hunting made him daily to preſs the Vizier to depart for Adrianople, not that he had ſo real a deſire to the War, as he had to his Game; which gave occaſion to that ordinary Saying amongſt the Turks, That the Grand Signior had left ſome Hares behind him at Adrianople, and would return to ſeek them. At length the Vizier not longer able to reſiſt his importunity without his diſpleaſure, ſummon'd a Council of all the Viziers of the Bench, where alſo the Janiſar Aga was preſent, to conſult concerning the time of their departure, at which they unanimouſly concluded, that for divers Reaſons, it was moſt neceſſary to defer this expedition until the next Spring. First, Becauſe that three months time were already given to the Emperor for ſending his Extraordinary Ambaſſador. Secondly, Becauſe in ſo ſhort a time, Proviſions could not be ſent into thoſe Parts for relief of the Camp. Thirdly, Becauſe the Souldiers which were abroad could not have timely notice to repair to their Colours. Fourthly, Becauſe many Souldiers had begun to rebuild their houſes deſtroyed by the late Fires, which by the Spring they might ſee finiſhed. And laſtly, That the Summer being now almoſt ſpent, was not ſo fit for action, as the Spring, which gives new life and blood to men, as well as ſap and moiſture unto Vegetables. Theſe Reaſons being repreſented with all humility to the Grand Signior, he ſeemed to reſt ſatisfied, and his heat of viſiting Adrianople for the preſent allayed. And in the mean time, that the deſign againſt Germany might be the more covertly carried, it was given out that the preparations were intended againſt the Venetian Territories in Dalmatia, (viz.) Zara, Sebenico, and Cataro, and Proclamation was made that all Souldiers ſhould prepare themſelves for the Wars againſt the next Spring. In which Interim no accident intervening which might bring matters to an accommodation and better underſtanding, the daily Skirmiſhes on the Frontiers made the Controverſie every day more difficult to be reconciled, and the breach the wider. The Count Serini alſo proceeded in finiſhing the Fortification he had lately raiſed near Caniſia; and the other Commanders of the Ceſarean Army ſeeing the great progreſs of the [illegible] in Tranſilvania, ſecured Claudiopolis, Sor[illegible]

1662. The Reaſon why the Turks deferred the War with the German.

The ſad Condition of Tranſilvania.

Sechilbid, Clewar, alias Coloſwar, and Betlem, with ſome other Towns and Fortreſſes. The Turks on the other ſide, under the Command of Ali Paſha, penetrate into the very Center of Tranſilvania, and conceiving a jealouſie of War from the paſſages before mentioned, loſt no time to take their advantages, ſo that the Paſha of Varadin not contenting himſelf with that Country, and limits formerly preſcribed for maintenance of his Fortreſs, adjoined to his Juriſdiction what Villages and Towns he thought fit, the whilſt the poor Prince Michael Apafi, though made by the Turks, durſt not lift a hand, or interpoſe the leaſt Obſtacle or Impediment to his quiet progreſs, or peaceable poſſeſſion, which ſo harraſſed the People of the Country, and wrought that miſery and deſtruction therein, that the Prince, deprived of his power in Government, and diſabled by oppreſſion to pay his Annual Tribute, had no hopes of redreſs, but from the aſſiſtance of Divine Providence, governing the hearts of Chriſtians and Turks to compaſſionate the miſery of his Country. Wherefore he craved the aſſiſtance of the Emperor, and of the King of Poland, acquainting other Chriſtian Princes more remote of the ſad eſtate of the Chriſtian Cauſe; he ſent alſo his Ambaſſadors to the Port with moſt ſubmiſſive Letters to the Vizier, complaining againſt the Paſha of Varadin, and craving his Commands for retirement of his Army, within their due and ancient bounds. Letters were alſo directed to the Publick Repreſentatives of Chriſtian Princes reſiding at Conſtantinople, one of which was directed to the Earl of Winchelſea, his Majeſties Ambaſſador, which being that which may conduce to the more full underſtanding of the preſent deplorable Condition of Tranſilvania, I thought fit to be here mentioned.

The Prince of Tranſilvania's Letter to His Majeſties Ambaſſador.

Excellentiſſime Domine, & Amice obſervandiſſime,

In Engliſh thus.

Moſt Excellent Lord, and moſt worthy Friend,

‘THe Miſeries of Tranſilvania, with which for many years, by the juſt Judgment of God, we have been afflicted, are manifeſt to all the Chriſtian World; nor can we but confeſs, how between two moſt Potent Monarchs, our Principality is ſo daily ſtraitned, that unleſs through the extraordinary Mercy of God, we obtain ſome relief, we believe not our ſelves longer able to ſubſiſt. But to come nearer to our Buſineſs. The Moſt Potent Emperor, by his own Ambaſſadors, and ours now lately returned, hath promiſed us his moſt Gracious Protection; yet notwithſtanding, the Paſha of Varadin not content with the Towns and Villages appropriated unto his Caſtle, hath entered into the very middle of Tranſilvania, and hath compelled, for fear of death, thoſe Provinces entirely to yield themſelves, which never before were belonging to his Fortreſſes, which being taken away, it is impoſſible for the Principality of Tranſilvania longer to ſubſiſt, and pay its annual Tribute; wherefore we are conſtrained again to beſeech the moſt Potent Emperor, and the Supream Vizier, as alſo we confidently deſire your Excellency, in that manner which your Excellency judges moſt convenient, to be aſſiſtant to our Agent, and with your Authority to countenance our Cauſe, in which your Excelleney will not only perform a matter beneficial to Tranſilvania, but to all Chriſtendom, and oblige us for ever with the Bonds of friendſhip; and praying for all happineſs of Life and Proſperity to your Excellency, we remain your undoubted Friend.

Tour Excellencies
Loving Friend,
Michael Apafi.

This Letter was received by His Majeſties Ambaſſador with that humanity as was agreeable to his Noble Nature; and with that ſenſe of the Chriſtian Cauſe as became a Religious Miniſter of the Faith's Defender, and an Anſwer returned thereunto full of affectionate Piety and Compaſſion. But it was feared that the time was elapſed, and the Diſeaſe proceeded too far to admit a gentle Cure; for it could not probably be expected, that the Vizier ſhould, upon fair words or perſwaſions, or by the force of paſſionate and Rhetorical expreſſions, be induced to let ſlip the 1662. fair opportunity of an intire and total ſubjection of Tranſilvania. And the truth is, herein lay the ground of the great Quarral between theſe two Emperors; for ever ſince the Defeat of Chimianus (or as the Tranſilvanians call him Kemenius) the Turk ſwallowing in his thoughts the intire ſubjection of that Country, deſigned to reduce it to the Government of a Paſha, rather than of a Chriſtian Prince, though elected at the Ottomon Port; and in order thereunto, advanced beyond the Limits of the ancient bounds, and pitched his Camp in the very Bowels of the Country. Theſe proceedings giving matter of jealouſie to all the Captains of the bordering Chriſtians; the Count Serini firſt haſtned the finiſhing of his Fort, as much as was poſſible; and next, according to his example, the Imperialiſts in all parts of the Borders fortified their Towns and Caſtles, and reinforced their Gariſons; which was anſwered by the Turks in the like preparations. And thus mutual fears and jealouſies effected that ill Correſpondence, in which the State of Affairs then remained.

And ſince Tranſilvania is the preſent Scene of Action, it will not be much from our purpoſe to digreſs a little in declaring the ſtate of that miſerable Principality, and by what ways and means the Turks encreaſed their Tribute, and encroached on their Liberties; the which Relation I received from one of the Tranſilvanian Agents, to this effect.

A Hiſtory of Tranſilvanian Miſery.

In the time of Sultan Solyman, Tranſilvania was governed by her own Laws, and her natural Prince, paying then only Thirty Thouſand Dollars of yearly Tribute. After which Ali Paſha taking Varadin on the Frontiers, had ſome part of the Country alloted him for maintenance of his Gariſon, and at that time ſolemnly ſwore, That beyond thoſe Limits allotted to Varadin, the Turks ſhould not farther enter into Tranſilvania, but that Oath being little regarded, they have ſince that time poſſeſſed themſelves of ſix Provinces, (viz.) Bichar, Doboka, Halnock, Colos, in which is Claudiopolis, and of the beſt part of Zarand. Nor were the Turks ſatisfied herewith, but in the year 1658. the Vizier Kuperlee entered Tranſilvania, and by force of Arms took the ſtrong Town of Janova, and demanded the Surrender of Lugas and Karanſebes into his hands. Nor could the allegations of the Oath of Sultan Solyman, or of Ali Paſha, or any other perſwaſions or ſubmiſſion induce him to moderate any part of his ſevere demands, until firſt having miſerably deſtroyed the whole Country, and ſatiated himſelf with blood, he was contented, upon the ſad and humble ſupplication of the Ambaſſador from that Prince, to withdraw his Army out of Tranſilvania, on condition that Fifty thouſand Dollars of yearly Tribute ſhould be added to the former Thirty thouſand, and that Lugas and Karanſebes ſhould be wholly abandoned by the native Inhabitants, and deliverd into poſſeſſion of the Turk: And as a mark of his abſolute Dominion over that Country, he forced one Acbacius Barcley, employed before as Ambaſſador to him, to take on him the Government, threating that if he accepted not of the Charge, he would inveſt a Carter in the Principality: Notwithſtanding all this Treatment; and though the Tranſilvanians comply'd with all the propoſitions offered them by the Turk, yet not long after the Tartar Han paſſed twice through the Country, miſerably harraſſing, ſpoiling, and killing, or making Captives all he met, whoſe departure alſo from this Country was purchaſed with a conſiderable Sum of Money. And this was the ſtate of the miſery of Tranſilvania, when the troubles raiſed by Ragotzki and Kemenius added to the other diſcontents, and adminiſtred farther occaſion to the enſuing War.

But whilſt the thoughts of the Ottoman Court were intent on their preparation for the next years War in Hungary, advice came that the Turkiſh Fleet, conſiſting of Seventeen Ships, and Thirty ſeven Saiques, lately departed from Conſtantinople bound for Alexandria in Ægypt, and convoyed by ſix Gallies, which met them at Scio, very rich with Money, and other goods, (whoſe returns are yearly for the moſt part made in Sugar, Coffee, Rice, and other Commodities) were encountred near Rhodes by the Venetian Armata, and ſuch ruine and prize made of them, that of the Threeſcore Sail, Twenty eight Saiques & 4 Ships were ſunk and taken: (viz.) 18 Saiques taken, & 10 burnt, 3 Ships taken, and one burnt, and thereon Two hundred and ſeventy Slaves, among which there were of note, Arnaut Aſan Aga, Eunuch of the Seraglio, Mahomet Aga, Baſcut Agaſey of Grand Cairo, and Emin Reis, Captain of a Ship. When this news arrived, I happened to be at the Viziers Court, and perceived a ſtrange diſturbance and alteration in the faces of all then preſent; but more particularly the Grand Signior ſeemed to be heated with fury, and preſent reſolution of revenge; ſo that he had almoſt forgotten his deſigns againſt the Emperor; and quitting his paſtime in Hunting, he began to talk of tranſporting his Arms into Dalmatia, and thereupon ſent Orders to one Beco a Begh of the Morea to cauſe a ſurvey of the High-ways, Paſſages, and Bridges towards Dalmatia, as if he had intended immediately to march, and either to defer his Hungarian War, or wage both at the ſame time. But his graver, and more ſober Council moderated his heat with Reaſon, knowing that the deſigns of Princes, though never ſo abſolute, muſt be ſubject to times and ſeaſons, until their Powers can extend to Omnipotency, which never yet could exceed the abilities of a mortal man, though ſome have affected Divine Honours, and by Flatterers have been ranked after death in the number of the Gods. The Venetians loſt Seventy men only, or thereabouts, and amongſt them Giacomo Semitecolo, a noble Venetian, with other Braves and Souldiers of Fortune. The Turks horribly touched with this loſs and diſgrace, eſpecially the Grand Signior, who had an intereſt in the Caravana had a mind to vent ſome of their fury on Signior Ballarino, the Venetian Miniſter to the Port, like thoſe (as we ſay) who cannot beat the Horſe, will beat the Saddle; ſo that they intended to impriſon him again in ſome dark Cell, or obſcure retirement, of which, or of ſome other rigor Signior Ballarino was ſo ſenſible, that he wrote this enſuing Letter to the Senator Nicolo Contarini, which may ſerve to explain the anguiſh and ſorrowful apprehenſions of his Soul.

T[illegible] F[illegible] co[illegible] netian.

If my Mind were capable of Comfort, I could not in the midſt of ſo much anguiſh entertain a more efficacious Motive thereunto, than thoſe obliging Expreſſions which your Excellency uſes towards me, who like a Terreſtrial Deity is pleaſed to protect me. But alas, I am too much overwhelmed with Grief to diſcover any Subject which may cauſe me to dry my Tears. I find no ſhelter againſt that Storm which I foreſaw. Nor is it ſufficient for me to diſcover the Tempeſt before it arrives: It is 1662. not ſufficient in this darkneſs to loſe my Sleep, diſturb my Quiet, tire my Body, debilitate my Health by a ſlender Diet, whilſt toſſed in the Boſom of an inexorable Element, I am denied the enjoyment of a ray of Light. I hold the Helm of the Ship as direct as I can, but the adverſe Waves of my Fortune drive me into the midſt of thoſe Storms where I apprehend the greateſt Dangers: I am here in the midſt of the Sea, which is the Neſt of Extravagancies, the grand belief of unthought of Accidents, the ſpacious Theatre of Tragedies, a fierce Giant, a horrible Monſter, who with gentle Opiates endeavours to lull aſleep, and lead thoſe to Deſtruction who have too great a confidence in their own Strength. I reproach my ſelf for not having been able to make it ſufficiently underſtood, how one ſtroke of adverſe Fortune is capable to put all into Danger, who are imbarked in the ſame Veſſel; And as little able am I to inculcate into the minds of Men, that whilſt the Waves of the vaſt Sea are ſmooth and calm, the nearer is the raging of the Waters, and the fury of a Tempeſt. It was therefore neceſſary that there ſhould have been ſome more skilful Pilot than my ſelf to conduct this Veſſel. I was long ſince acquainted with my Imperfections, and therefore called aloud for the aſſiſtance of an abler Pilot, to direct me in this tempeſtuous Region; but ſince I was not heard, I gloried at leaſt to be alone in this Gulf, that being ſwallowed up by a final Ruin, my Martyrdom may be a means to ſave the reſt. Rains and Lightnings do not affright me, but rather ſerve to quench that fire of Diſdain which I conceive againſt my ſelf, for not knowing how to perform better, and ſerve to enlighten me daily to find out that Compaſs or Cart which may direct me to a courſe or path of Security. I fear Thunders and Tempeſts, becauſe the violence of one, and the hardneſs of the other is able to render a cold Sweat mixed with Blood altogether unprofitable. This miſerable School, tho of eleven Years continuance, conſtrains me to ſtudy the Diſpoſition of the Stars, the Signs in the Air, the Ebbings and Flowings of the Waters, concealed Rocks, the Dangers of a long Voyage, and the neceſſity of recovering a Port. I have ſtudied indeed, but I fear I have not well learned this profound Diſcipline; for where there is the greateſt urgency, there I have gathered the leaſt Fruit; for ſince the Aſpect of the Spheres are become more inauſpicious, I am doubtful that I ſhall ſee the Ship beaten with ſwelling Surges, nnd being full of Water, it will be ſo far from being eaſed by thoſe opportune Remedies which I bring, that it will rather be encreaſed by my Tears. God grant by his miraculous Providence, the Tranquillity which we deſire, and which by humune means will be difficult to obtain. I had not the underſtanding to take Opportunity by the Foretop when She preſented her ſelf unto me with gentle and benign Appearance, ſhowing me the means to ſave 1662 this floating Veſſel, and ſpare our inſidious rewards. For this Reaſon my dejected, but not conquered mind, makes my very Bowels feel an unuſual anguiſh of an over-troubled Eſtate. May it pleaſe the Divine pity, that theſe my Afflictions may prove the Off-ſpring of my own vileneſs, but not the means of my Ruin. I truſt therein, I confeſs, and yet frail hope, amidſt this Gulf of Sin, induces me to expect doubtful Succeſſes; Yet certainly I will endeavour to avoid a ſhipwrack on theſe Rocks of Deſpair; And ſo imploring the Patronage of your Excellency here on Earth, I confirm my ſelf. From Pera of Conſtantinople the 19 of December, 1662.

This Letter ſeems to be wrote in the ſtile of a deſpairing Perſon; yet if it be well conſidered, the meaning is no other than what the Iſſue of Affairs ſome years afterwards did evidence; and his Intentions were no other than to deſcribe the ill nature of the Turkiſh Miniſters, and their obſtinacy of continuing a War, until they had wearied out the Venetians into an Humour of ſurrendring the whole Iſland of Candia unto them. I had the Honour to be well acquainted with the Perſon of Signior Ballarino, and I always eſteemed him in his external Behaviour accompliſhed with the Exceſſes of Italian Civility; he was endued with great fluency of Language, both in Diſcourſe and Writing; he was Jealous, Acute and Wary; and in ſhort, was a proper Miniſter for that Republick, well practiced and verſed in the manner of Treaty with the Turkiſh Court. He at firſt was ſent from Venice to Conſtantinople in quality of Secretary to the Excellentiſſimo Capello, Procurator of St. Mark, a Perſon eminent for his Office, and the ſeveral great employments which he had exerciſed in that State; he was ſincere, and of a generous Soul; his comely Looks, and grave Habit ſpoke him to be a Gentleman, and a Senator. In ſhort, he was ſo well eſtemeed of at Venice, that he was thought worthy to be imployed in this Embaſſy to the Grand Signior, which is commonly granted to Perſons after they have run through all Services of the Commonwealth, as a Conſummation of their Honours and Richeſs. This Gentleman then had the misfortune to be inveſted in this Honour in the worſt of Times, when the War was broke forth, and being thereby expoſed to their cruelty, he was put into Priſon, where paſſing for ſome time a Life of Sorrow and Sadneſs, he fell into a Melancholly, which repreſented all things to him in the blackeſt manner; ſo that, I know not why his fancy ſuggeſted to him, that he was not only miſerable in his Impriſonment and Reſtraint amongſt the Turks, but that he was fallen alſo into diſgrace, and diſpleaſure of his Prince at home. I will not ſay that Signior Ballarino did nouriſh the Operation of this black humour in him; but I have heard that he did not adminiſter that comfort to him, as might ſerve to diſpel the thickneſs of that Vapour which obſcured the generous temper of his Soul. In ſhort, he gave ſuch way to this melancholly, that he laid violent hands upon himſelf (as we have ſaid before); but afterwards by the Care of his Friends and Servants, being cured of his wounds, he lived ſome years after, by his Sorrows and Repentance for it, to give Satisſaction to God and the World. Howſoever, the Senate being informed thereof, and judging this Act to be the effect of a violent Phrenſy, appointed ed Ballarino to take on himſelf the intire management of Affairs, reſerving only the Title and Honour to Signior Capello. Ballarino now manageing all Affairs, Capello looked on himſelf as neglected and laid aſide, howſoever comported his Condition with Submiſſion and Gentleneſs, never openly reſenting the Honours of Ballarino, or to ſee him preferred before himſelf; Howſoever, ſecretly nouriſhing an inward Diſcontent, his robuſtious Nature, upwards of eighty years of Age, was forced to give way to its final Diſſolution; and falling Sick, he ſent to the Earl of Winchelſea, then Ambaſſador for his Majeſty at Conſtantinople, to acquaint him of his Diſtemper, deſiring him to ſend me, who was then his Secretary, unto him. At theſe Summons I was eaſily perſwaded to go, having always had his Perſon in great Reverence; and being come to his Bed ſide, he raiſed himſelf upon his Pillows, and embracing me in his Arms, I fancied my ſelf to receive the Benediction of one of the Ancient Patriarchs. He began with a weak Voice to ſay to me, Sir, I am near my end, expecting every Minute to render up my laſt Breath, and therefore as a dying man, I deſire of your Maſter, the Ambaſſador, that ſo ſoon as I am dead, he would be pleaſed to deliver this poor Carcaſs of mine from under the covering of this accurſed Roof. For Anſwer whereunto I did not ſtand to expoſtulate the Reaſons with him, well knowing the cauſe of his diſcontent; but that I would communicate his deſires to my Lord Ambaſſador, and ſpeedily return with my Anſwer to him. Accordingly I departed from him, and quickly brought from my Lord a Promiſe to endeavour his utmoſt to comply with his requeſt; at which he ſeemed to be much ſatisfied, and commanded his Servants then preſent, eſpecially one called Sig. Tomaſo Gobbato, his great confident, to be Witneſſes thereof. The next day he expired his laſt Breath, and the day following his Body being embalmed, his bowels were buried, and the Funeral Rites performed with ſuch order and decency as was ſeemly in a Country where he lived rather like a Priſoner than an Ambaſſador. All things being thus prepared, the Earl of Winchelſea, according to the Will of the Deceaſed, ſent for his Body, already embalmed, which was immediately without oppoſition or ſcruple ſent to his houſe; where it remained for ſome months, in expectation of a conveyance for Venice. At length a Dutch ſhip, being bound from Conſtantinople thither, it was deſigned that the Body ſhould be thereon imbarked; but I know not for what reaſon, the Cuſtomer refuſed to ſuffer it to paſs; though it may well and rationally be conjectured, That Ballarino, who was ſenſibly touched to have the care of the Body of his Maſter, his Countryman and Colleague taken from him, did with Preſents prevail with the Cuſtomer to put difficulties in the way, which he ſuppoſed might vex thoſe who were thought worthy of this employment. This oppoſition being made, and not to be overcome without much Money, it was contrived that the Ship departing ſhould attend the Corps at Tenedos, which was without the command of the Caſtles; and the Body being divided from the Legs, was packed up in a But of Cavear, and ſo ſent down by a boat with Licence of the Cuſtomer, as a parcel of Goods and Merchandice; and ſo ſafely arriving aboard, the Corps were ſeparated from their adjuncts; and being laid decently in a Coffin, covered with a Pall of black Velvet, with Scutcheons, and other ornaments appertaining to the Funerals of ſuch great Perſonages, it arrived ſafely at Venice, where it was interred with the uſual ceremonies, in the Tomb of the Anceſtors of that Ancient Family.

1662.

The Zeal of a Turkiſh Preacher.

But the heads and thoughts of theſe Governours were not ſo employed in their preparations of War, but that the Vizier could lend an ear to the ſuggeſtions of ſome malicious Phariſees, who, under pretence of Religion, informed him, That the Chriſtian Churches, burnt down in Conſtantinople and Galata by thoſe dreadful Fires in the year 1660, were again re-edified againſt his command, and the Law of the Turks, which allows the reparation of Churches, and continuance of ſuch which were found ſtanding when Mohometaniſm was introduced; but not to erect new, or rebuild what are either by time, fire, or other accidents fallen to ruine. And being farther informed, that though thoſe Churches were reſtored under the notion of Dwellings, or Ware-houſes, yet ſecretly ſerved for Celebration of Divine Service, and thereby his Decrees and Edicts were fruſtrated and diſappointed: Wherefore, furiouſly tranſported with a Mahometan Zeal, commanded immediately that the Authors of thoſe Buildings ſhould be impriſoned, the Churches themſelves levelled to the Foundation, and the ground whereon they ſtood confiſcated to the Grand Signior. This action, though naturally agreeable to the diſpoſition of the Vizier, who was a perfect Turk, zealous in execution of all points of the Mahometan Law, being educated after the ſevereſt ſort of Profeſſors, and one of thoſe whom they called Soſtaes; yet he was chiefly prompted unto this, and to a greater abhorrency of Chriſtianity, by one Vanni Effendi, a Shegh, or Preacher, one who was as inveterate and malicious to the Chriſtian Religion, as any Enthuſiaſt or Fanatick is to the Rites of our Church and Religion. And thus we may ſee how troubleſom Hypocriſie and Puritaniſm are in all places where they gain a Superiority; for this Preacher not contented only to ruine the Chriſtian Churches, but perſwaded the Vizier that the terrible Fires in Conſtantinople and Galata in the year 1660, and the laſt years unparallel'd Peſtilence, and the inconſiderable advance of the Turks on the Chriſtians for ſome years, were ſo many parts of Divine Judgments thrown on the Muſſulmen or Believers, in vengeance of their too much Licence given to the Chriſtian Religion, permitting Wine to be ſold within the Walls of Conſtantinople, which polluted the Imperial City, & enſnared the faithful by temptation to what was unlawful: Wherefore a command was iſſued, That no Wine ſhould be henceforth ſold within the Walls of the City. And it was farther intended, that Greeks & Armenians, & all other Chriſtians, who had Dwellings or Poſſeſſions within the Walls of the City, ſhould within Forty days ſell thoſe habitations, and depart; which otherwiſe ſhould be confiſcated to the Grand Signior; but God who ſupports the Faithful in Tryals of Perſecution, moderated this Decree, and reſerved ſtill this Church in the midſt of Infidels; not ſuffering this City to loſe the Name nor Religion of that holy Emperor, who both erected and chriſtned it; as alſo to preſerve moſt of the Churches, which though again uncovered, yet were redeemed for Money from the poſſeſſion of the Turks. Nor was the Mohometan Zeal ſatisfied in Demoliſhment of the Churches themſelves, unleſs it vented part of its fury againſt the poor Workmen, which for their hire and days Wages erected them; ſuch as Greek Labourers, Maſons, and Carpenters, who were all beaten and impriſoned But it happening at that time that the Queen Mother building a ſumptuous Moſch, and having occaſion of many Labourers and Artiſts to forward ſo vaſt a Work, ſent to the Maimarbaſhee (who is 1662. the Maſter work-man, or Cape, over all ſuch who are employed in Building) to ſupply ſuch a number of Carpenters, Maſons, and others, as were convenient to carry on that Fabrick with expedition; who readily replyed, That he would provide all that was poſſible, but could not promiſe a ſufficient number, unleſs thoſe Greeks were ſet at liberty, who were impriſoned by the Grand Vizier for building the Chriſtian Churches; which anſwer being reported again to the Queen Mother, ſhe interceded with the Vizier in their behalf, who being glad of any occaſion to gratifie ſo great a Lady, immediately releaſed them, without any fine or reward, which he deſigned to obtain for their liberty. Howſoever the Vizier not well brooking ſuch an indignity (as he ſuppoſed) put upon him by ſo mean a Slave, as the Maimarbaſhee, dealt with ſome of the impriſoned Labourers to accuſe him, as the Author and Licenſer of building the Chriſtian Churches. The Greeks eaſily enough perſwaded to pleaſe ſo great a Perſonage, accuſed him accordingly, whoſe Evidence, though nor paſſable againſt a Turk by the Mahometan Law, yet ſerved the Viziers revenge for the preſent, who immediately commanded his head to be ſtruck off, and his Eſtate confiſcated; which was reported to conſiſt of Two thouſand Purſes of Money, every Purſe importing Five hundred Dollars, then found actually in his Houſe, which, if true, is a ſtrange Wealth for ſo ordinary a Perſon. But by this, and by many other inſtances, we may perceive that there is no People in the World more covetous and deſirous to amaſs Wealth than the Turks, nor none more uncertain to enjoy it.

The Viziers revenge on the Cape of the Builders.

About this time the French Merchants in the Levant, having adviſed his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty that the Turks were ſenſible that the affront to the Perſon of Monſieur la Haye, his Ambaſſador, was contrary to the Law of Nations, and ſuch an injury as could not but provoke the Choler of ſo puiſſant a Prince to a juſt revenge; and knowing that his Majeſty being powerful at Sea, was able to extend his Arms to the utmoſt Confines of his Empire, whilſt the interpoſition of other Countries limited the Turks march by Land, and their ignorance and inability in Marine Affairs rendred them uncapable to arrive thoſe Banks of France, which the Sea waſhes: Theſe Conſiderations the French Merchants having perſwaded the King to be the thoughts of the Grand Signior, and that he deſired the continuance of the Peace and Traffick with France, and as an evidence of his remorſe and diſpleaſure for the injury to Monſieur la Haye, the Father, his Majeſty was contented in ſatisfaction thereof to redreſs this injurious tranſgreſſion of the Law of Nations, by ſome extraordinary marks of favour and honour to the Perſon of Monſieur la Haye the Son; that ſo exceeding the uſual method and rule of Ceremony towards this Ambaſſador at his arrival, the World might be convinced of the real affection, and hearty deſire the Grand Signior had to renew his Peace, and preſerve his Commerce with France. This is ſuppoſed to be what the Merchants of Marſeille and Lyons, governed by the Intereſt of their Trade, ſuggeſted to their King, to induce him to ſend an Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople; for at this time Monſieur Roboli, a Merchant, remained only as Conſul or Agent for the Affairs of Commerce. Things thus repreſented at the French Court, the King diſpatched away two Gentlemen to Conſtantinople with Letters to the Grand Signior and Vizier, and one to the Sieur Roboli, the Agent, declaring that if the Turk would make amends for the laſt Affront done to the Ambaſſador, by ſome ſignal notes of Honour in the abuſed Perſon of Monſieur la Haye, the Son, he would then condeſcend to confirm the Ancient League and Amity. The Letters tranſlated out of the French Tongue, were as followeth. 1662.

Meſſengers from France to introduce a new Ambaſſador.

To Our Dear and Well Beloved le Sieur Roboli, Agent for Our Affairs at Conſtantinople.

By the King.

Dear, and Well Beloved,

The Inclination We have to continue that Amity with the Emperor of the Turks, which hath remained ſo long between Us, and Our Empires, and maintain the ancient Alliances, hath cauſed Us to write to Him, and his Great Vizier, to know the Entertainment and Reception that they will give to the Sieur de la Haye, the Son, in ſatisfaction of the violence exerciſed before on his own Perſon, and the Perſon of the Sieur de la Haye, the Father, our Ambaſſador, againſt the Law of Nations. We write to You this Letter, to give you Order to conduct and preſent before the Vizier, the Secretaries du Preſſoir, and Fontain, which We have ſent to carry him our Diſpatches, and return with the Anſwers, which you ſhall ſolicite without loſs of time, the which you ſhall bring your ſelf, in caſe they be not agreeable to that reſolution we have taken not to receive any ſatisfaction, but in the Perſon of the ſaid Sieur de la Haye, the Son, which is due to Us, for that Inſolency and Affront which hath been done them. Willing alſo notwithſtanding, that before you depart, you aſſemble the French Merchants in Conſtantinople together, that they may chuſe amongſt themſelves one for their Chief; but if the Anſwers be ſuch as We have cauſe to expect, We approve that you remain in the Station where you are, in Quality of Our Agent, until the arrival of the ſaid Monſieur de la Haye, and that you ſend them by the ſaid Secretaries du Preſſoir, and Fontain, of which you ſhall not fail, for ſo is Our Pleaſure.

To the Moſt Illuſtrious and Magnificent Lord, the Chief Vizier of the Sublime Port of the Grand Signior.

Moſt Illuſtrious and Magnificent Lord,

A*Lthough the Indignity offered to the Perſon of the* Sieur de le Haye Venteley, Our Ambaſſador, and to his Son, which We have deſigned to the ſame Charge, have touched Vs as far as becomes a victorious Prince, who holds the firſt rank over Chriſtian Kings, and who hath under his Power one of the moſt warlike Nations of the World; Notwithſtanding after being informed, that the diſgrace which the ſaid Gentlemen have incurred, hath proceeded rather from malice, and the ill Offices of ſome Perſons, who have endeavoured to diſturb, by this ill Treatment of them, the good Correſpondence which hath been between Vs, than from any deſign on the Grand Signiors part to offend Vs; and that on the contrary, there continues in His will an intention to maintain the Ancient Friendſhip which remains between Our Eſtates and People after ſo many Ages. We being not deſirous to eſtrange Our ſelves, ſhall ſend an Embaſſador in ordinary to his high Port, and having caſt our Eyes upon the ſaid Sieur de la Haye, the Son, We are much inclined to diſpatch him for this employment; but as We deſire to be aſſur'd of the good reception that ſhall be made him, We give You advice of Our intentions by this Letter; that according to the deſire You have teſtified of the continuance of Our friendſhip, and Our Ancient Alliances with His Highneſs, ſhall pray God to have You, Moſt Illuſtrious and Magnificent Lord, in His holy and worthy Protection.

The King of France his Letter to the Grand Signior.

To the moſt High, moſt Excellent, moſt Puiſſant, moſt Magnanimous, and Invincible Prince, the Great Emperor of the Muſſulmans, Sultan Mahomet, in whom all Honour and Virtue abound. Our moſt dear and perfect Friend.

M*oſt High, moſt Excellent, moſt Puiſſant, moſt Magnanimous, and Invincible Prince, the Grand Signior, Emperor of the Muſſulmans,* Sultan Mahomet, in whom all Honour and Vertue abound. Our moſt dear and perfect Friend. May God encreaſe Your Greatneſs and Majeſty with a happy end. We have not known how to impute the ill uſage, which hath been offered to the Perſon of the Sieur de la Haye, our Ambaſſador, and to his Son, deſigned by Vs to the ſame employment, to any cauſes and motions in Your Highneſs, but rather to the Inſtigation of ſome People which would trouble that good Correſpondence, which hath been ſo long eſtabliſhed between Vs, and our Empires. And as we have cauſe to believe that Your Highneſs deſires much to continue this friendſhip and good underſtanding, upon what hath been wrote Vs on Your Part; and to concur with You herein, we deſire much likewiſe to continue to maintain an Ambaſſador at Your High Port, in place of the ſaid Sieur de la Haye. And ſince We have none of Our People that is more intelligent than the Sieur de la Haye, the Son, in what concerns the Affairs and Functions of this Embaſſy; We have elected him for this employment, to which we We ſhall willingly diſpatch him, if We may be aſſured of the good uſage and kind reception which ſhall be given him. This is that which We expect from Your Highneſs, reſerving a more particular information to be ſent by the Sieur de la Haye, the Son, of the good Correſpondence which We deſire always to have and maintain with You. And hereupon We pray God, That You may be moſt High, &c. as above, in his Holy and Worthy Protection.

tire Amity and good Correſpondence. Certainly Your Majeſty knows, that the Augmentation, and daily Encreaſe of that Amity, proceeds from the protection and honourable Obſervance of Conditions and Capitulations between both Parties. By the Grace of the Moſt High GOD, the Sublime and Imperial Port of the moſt Happy, moſt Puiſſant, moſt Valorous, moſt Magnificent, and moſt Strong Emperor, Support of the Muſſulmans, My Lord, whoſe Arms God proſper with double Force, is always open for our Friends, and others, without any Obſtacle, as all the World knows, and particularly for Your Majeſty, Who is our Friend, and hath been long in Amity with the moſt Serene Ottoman *Family, whom God eſtabliſh until the day of the Ballance. The Poor Hamet Paſha.

The Vizier ſtiles himſelf, The Poor, in reſpect to the Greatneſs of his Maſter.

In Anſwer to the Kings Letters, the Grand Signior made no reply, but only by his Vizier, by reaſon that in all the Ancient Turkiſh Regiſters and Archives, there was no example found, that the Grand Signior ever wrote to any King, who had not an Ambaſſador actually reſident at his Port. But this Negotiation about a French Ambaſſador took not effect, until ſome time after, in which other Letters and Meſſages intervened, as will appear by the following ſequel of this Hiſtory.

It was now towards the beginning of Winter, when the Seaſon of the Year compelled the Turkiſh Fleet of Gallies to return according to cuſtom, to the Port of Conſtantinople. The whole Summer before, they had for the moſt part paſſed in ſome Harbour or Creek amongſt the Greek Iſlands, having afforded nothing of Convoy or ſuccour towards the ſafe Conduct of the Fleet of Grand Cairo, but ſuffered them to fall into the hands of the Enemy, as before mentioned, and indeed for ſeveral years the Marine Affairs of the Turks have always gone decaying in Fame and Force; and the preparations of the Armata every Spring, have been of Form and Courſe, rather than with hopes of ſucceſs correſpondent to the expence. In their return home, near Conſtantinople they encountred a fierce ſtorm, ſo that three Gallies were caſt away at Ponte Piccolo, (by the Turks called Cucuccheckmage, about four Leagues diſtant from Conſtantinople.) Howſoever the Weather clearing, the remainder of the Fleet got into Port, entring with Joy, with Vollies of great and ſmall Shot, with Streamers flying, Pipes ſounding, and all other ſorts of their Country Muſick, bringing with great Oſtentation a ſmall Flyboat, which had been a Legornese Man of War, taken by them as ſhe was cruiſing ſingly in the Arches of Pelago; which was brought in with ſo much Ceremony uſed in toaing her into Port, decking her with Streamers and Pendants, with ſuch ſigns of Victory and Triumph, as if they had led Captive the whole Venetian Armata. But I muſt not omit the relation of what befel one of the Beghs Gallies, deſigned, with the reſt, to rendezvous at Conſtantinople, whilſt ſhe loitered amongſt ſmall Iſles in the Gulf of Nicomedia. It was a Gally, the Commander of which had newly received as the Portion of his Wife, being a Young man lately married, who entertained great thoughts of raiſing his Fortunes by the ſpoils and prize he was to make. At theſe Iſles ſeveral of the Officers, and * Levents went on ſhore; where whilſt they entertained themſelves with Wine and merriment; the Slaves made an inſurrection in the Gally, ſeized the Captain, cut off his Head, and threw his Body into the Sea; and ſo becoming Maſters of the Veſſel, weighed Anchor, and ſet ſail. Thoſe on the ſhore admiring at the unexpected departure of the Gally, accompanied her with their Eyes and wonder as far as they could perceive her in ſight, but obſerving her to ſteer a different courſe from the Port, to which they were deſigned, ſuſpected much of the truth of what had ſucceeded; wherefore taking their Boat immediately, they haſtned to Conſtantinople to give advice of what had paſſed, that (if poſſible) Orders might timely arrive the Caſtles on the Helleſpont, which might obſtruct their farther paſſage. But alas! the poor Slaves were ſo diſmayed with their own action, and ſo tranſported with a ſlaviſh fear and apprehenſion of what might ſucced, ſhould their eſcape not be effected; that they knew not what courſe to ſteer: All things ſeemed to contradict their liberty, the Wind proved contrary, their Spirits dejected, their underſtandings void of counſel and contrivance; ſo that wandring three or four days in the Propontis, at laſt ran their Gally aſhoar on the Aſian ſide, near Palermo, from whence they were brought back to Conſtantinople, and there by ſentence of the Captain Paſha, fourteen of them had their Legs and Arms broken, and ſo ſuffered to die in that torture, and afterwards their Bodies were thrown into the

The Preparations for the German War.

Though the Turks have their Affairs but ill managed at Sea, and their ſucceſs accordingly fortunate; yet their preparation for Land ſervices are more expedite, and executed with that ſecreſy and ſpeed, that oftentimes Armies are brought into the Field, before it is ſo much as rumoured by common Mouths that any deſigns are in agitation: For though it was now Winter, yet the deſign againſt Germany went forward, Forces were daily ſent to the Frontiers, Cannon, and Ammunition for War, tranſported by way of the black Sea, and the Danube. Orders iſſued out to the Princes of Moldavia and Valachia to repair their Wharſs and Keys along the River, for the more convenient landing of Men and Ammunition, and to rebuild their Bridges for the more commodious paſſage of the Tartars; that Horſes ſhould be provided againſt the next Spring, for drawing all Carriages of Ammunition, and Proviſions; their Magazines ſtored with quantities of Bread, and Rice, their Fields well ſtocked with Sheep, and other Cattel, and that no neceſſaries be wanting which concern the victualling, or ſuſtenance of a Camp. The Tartars were appointed to have in a readineſs a Hundred thouſand Horſemen, to make Incurſions on the Frontiers; likewiſe the Paſhaws of Darbiquier, Aleppo, Caramania, and Anatolia received their orders; and ſeven and twenty Letters, accompanied with as many Veſts, after the Turkiſh manner, were ſent to as many Paſhaws of the Empire, to diſpoſe the ſtrength of their Countries in a Warlike poſture, ſo as to march when the Grand Signiors Commands ſhould require them to attend his deſigns: And that the occaſion of the War might appear the more juſtifiable, it was reſolved, That no Acts of Hoſtility, or other Breaches of Peace ſhould be pretended, than the Fort built by the Count Serini, being a matter really againſt the Articles of the laſt Peace; the Demoliſhment whereof, the Ottomon Force intended to make the principal end of their firſt Enterprize, in which if they encountred any oppoſition from the Emperor, the Cauſe of their War would be then the more plauſible; for as yet the Emperour had not fully declared his approbation of that Work, raiſed by Serini, as agreeable to his Aſſent, or Pleaſure. On the other ſide with no leſs caution and labour did the Chriſtians endeavour to ſecure their Frontiers, by raiſing their Militia, and reinforcing their Gariſons, and eſpecially to perfect the new Fort near Caniſia, which, as it was thought ſo conſiderable, as to countervail the inconveniencies and miſeries of a War, ſo the Turk thought it neither honourable, nor ſecure, until he had ſeen it razed, and levelled with the ground.

An Accident diſpoſing the Chriſtian Affairs to a peace with the Turk.

All things thus growing black and ſtormy round about, that nothing ſeemed leſs probable, and it may be ſaid, leſs poſſible, than an accommodation; behold, on a ſudden, an Accident fell out at Rome, from whence this War with the Turks received its life and heat, which becalmed much of the fury and ſtorm on the Chriſtian Confines, and inclined matters in Germany towards propoſitions of Peace, fearing that Italy, who had begotten this War, was not able (as things ſtood) to contribute towards its maintenance and ſupport. The occaſion was this. It happened that in the ſtreets of Rome the French Ambaſſadours Coach was aſſaulted by the Corſi Natves of the Iſle of Corſica, which are of the Popes Guard, the Page killed at the Boot of the Coach, and the Ambaſſadors Lady wounded; whether this barbarous act was deſigned againſt the Perſon of the Ambaſſador by any Perſons of Eminency, or malice of the People, is little to the purpoſe I have now in hand; only the King took this Affront ſo heinouſly, that for the preſent no acknowledgments or ſatisfaction the Pope could make, could allay his juſt reſentment, or any thing be imagined poſſible to expiate this indignity, beſides a VVar. This News of this Diviſion between the Son, and the ſpiritual Father, filled all the Miniſters of Conſtantinople with much Joy, and with ſubject of Laughter, and expectation of the Event, judging now that their daily Prayers for the Diſcord of the Chriſtian Princes amongſt themſelves, were heard and granted, ſince they had ſo far availed, as to diſunite the very Oeconomy of Chriſtendom. And now they imagined that this difference would have a forcible influence on their Affairs in Hungary, and either incline the Emperor ſpeedily to a Peace, or otherwiſe to undertake a War on diſadvantageous terms. Things had an iſſue accordingly, for in a few Weeks after, advice came by Poſt from Ali Paſha, then at Temiſwar, that is Salam-Chaous, called Chuſaein, who had long ſince been ſent to Vienna, with more diſtinct Demands of what the Turks propoſed, and being ſuppoſed, through his long ſtay, to be detained a Priſoner, was again returned, and with him had brought the Baron of Goez, as Internuncio, ſent to Ali Paſha, to receive a more particular Imſormation of the Turks propoſitions, for that the Emperor pretended, he was not as yet throughly ſatisfied therein. And thus matters, beyond all expectation, began to incline to an agreement, in regard that Rome being now in danger her ſelf, not by the Turks, but by the Chriſtians, held her ſelf uncapable to adminiſter that Fuel to the Fire of War which ſhe had promiſed; ſo that the League treated there beginning to fail, the Emperor grew faint, and the Princes cold, in their Preparations, wiſhing ſome Courſe could be effected, which might bring matters to an accommodation. Such were the Diſcourſes and imaginations of the Turks; in which condition we leave the ſtate of Affairs until the beginning of the next year; and in the mean time it may not be from our purpoſe, nor tedious to the Reader, to record what befel this year moſt remarkable to the Engliſh Nation, and their Trade in Turky, which alſo may be beneficial, by inſtruction of paſt examples, to ſuch who ſhall for the future be concerned in the Traffick and Buſineſs of the Levant.

The Baron of Gowez ſent to Ali Paſha.

What Remarkable accidents beſel the ENGLISH Nation, and their Trade this Year in TURKEY.

THE Meſſengers from Algier, as before related, having promiſed better Obedience for the future to the Commands of the Grand Signior, obtained a new Paſha for their City, and Country thereunto belonging; who before his departure, was enjoyned by the Grand Signior to diſpoſe Affairs with the Earl of Winchelſea, his Majeſties Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople, as might demonſtrate his diſpoſitions towards a Peace, and his deſire that the Algerines ſhould do the like, and accept of that Clauſe in the Articles, prohibiting the ſearch of Engliſh Ships, either for their own or Strangers Goods. The place appointed for the meeting between the Embaſſador and the Paſha, was a certain Chiosk, or Garden houſe, belonging to an Eunuch, the Aga of a Seraglio at Pera; where both parties being met, the Paſha declared that the Grand Signiors deſires were, That a Peace ſhould be concluded on the Ancient Capitulations, and that by him theſe Orders were to be carried unto Algier, from whence he was adviſed, that the Algerines were ready to accept thoſe Articles, if one of his Majeſties Ships ſingly appeared about the Treaty; ſo that the World might not eſteem their condeſcenſion to proceed from Force and Compulſion. Hereof Advices being ſent into England, a Peace enſued in ſome Months after; but what faith theſe Infidels kept will be related in the Sequel of this Story; the Memory of which is engraven with the Point of a Diamond, and the Loſſes which enſued thereupon to the Exchange at London, deſerve a particular Treatiſe, which in the mean time many Families retain in a ſad remembrance.

In May, Advice was brought to the Lord Ambaſſador, how that the Ann, a Frigat of his Majeſties Royal Navy, commanded by Captain Jonas Pool, which had convoyed the general Ships to Symrna, in her paſſage homewards ſtopped at the Morea, and came to an Anchor near a place in that Country, called the Black Mountain, commodious to Wood and Water in; to which end were landed threeſcore men, armed with Swords and Firelocks; theſe made havock of the Woods on all ſides, loading their Boats away as faſt as they could, and not only ſo, but ſet great Trees on Fire, which in that dry Seaſon of the Year diſperſed it ſelf far and wide; which being ſeen at a diſtance in the Night, alarmed the People of the Country, ſo that the Begh, or Governor came down with ſome Force to diſcover the matter, ſuppoſing that ſome Malteſes, or Venetians might be landed. At the approach of this Body of Turks, our Men quitted the Woods, and ſhifted away as faſt as they could to their Boats, of which Thirty eight eſcaped, the reſt falling ſhort were intercepted by the Turks, and Eleven of them were killed, and Eleven taken Captives; and of the Turks, two Aga's, and Two or Three others had the fortune to fall by ſome Musket-ſhot from our men, whilſt in this confuſion they endeavoured to defend themſelves. On the news hereof, our Lord Ambaſſador repreſented the whole matter to the Vizier, declaring, That it was lawful according to our Capitulations, to take refreſhments, and ſupply our wants in any part of the Grand Signiors Dominions; and that therefore he demanded Juſtice on the Begh of the Morea, and reſtitution of the Captives. But the Vizier underſtanding that ſome Turks were killed in the skirmiſh, lent not ſo ready an ear to theſe Complaints; howſoever, to be acquitted of the Ambaſſadors ſolicitations, referred the buſineſs to the Examination and Juſtice of the Captain Paſha: But it falling out that at that time the Conſul and Merchants at Smyrna had an unhappy difference with the Captain Paſha, (which ſhall in the next place be related) was the Cauſe that all Applications to his Favour and Juſtice were ſuſpended, and a ſlow progreſs made towards obtaining the liberty of thoſe poor unfortunate men. Howſoever, ſome months after it happened that the Begh of the Morea being removed from that Government, and coming to Conſtantinople with his whole Eſtate, brought with him the Eleven Engliſhmen, which he had taken, and offered them to ſale unto the Ambaſſador, who conſidering that they were Engliſhmen, and ſuch as had been enſlaved in actual Service of their King, he eſteemed himſelf obliged both in Charity and Honour to redeem them. But the Caſe appeared too foul to demand their Liberty by ſtrength of the Capitulations; for beſides that, the cutting Wood in places inhabited without permiſſion, is a Robbery and a Crime in its ſelf, not to be maintained by the Law of Nations, the killing of a principal Aga, and wounding others, might ſufficiently warrant the Turks, without any Breach of Peace, to detain theſe men as lawful Captives: Wherefore the Lord Ambaſſador deeming it unſeemly, that thoſe who had ſerved in his Majeſties Navy ſhould be condemned to the Turkiſh Gallies, diſburſed Fourteen hundred Lion Dollars, which was demanded for them, which was afterwards repay'd him by his Majeſty, and having cloathed, and provided them with neceſſaries for their Voyage, conveyed them with the firſt occaſions into England.

The difference between the Engliſh Nation, and the Captain Paſha which impeded the Liberty, for ſome time, of theſe Captives, had its Original at Smyrna, where ſome Engliſh Merchants making Collation one Evening in a Garden were aſſaulted and beaten by certain drunken * Levents, belonging to a Gally then in Port, in whoſe Company was a Portuguez Slave. The News hereof flying to the Frank Street, put all the Neighbourhood into an uproar, ſo that divers People with ſuch Weapons as came next to hand, in a fury went in purſuit of the Levents, and unhappily meeting one, drew him into the Engliſh Conſuls houſe, where they treated him with ſuch blows as abated much of the heat and fumes of his Wine; during which diſturbance and confuſion, the Portuguez Slave found an opportunity to make his eſcape. The Conſul knowing it ſome advantage in Turky to complain firſt, ſent to the Kadi, giving him to underſtand the ill uſage of Four of his Merchants (whoſe names he gave in writing) by the unruly Levents, whilſt they innocently, and without injury to any, divertiſed themſelves in a Garden; to which, for the preſent, little more was given in anſwer, than that on a farther examination of the Buſineſs, the Conſul ſhould receive Juſtice. In the mean time the Turk, who had been beaten in the Conſuls Houſe, reſolved not to leave the Gate till he had received ſatisfaction for his blows; and the others that were his Comrades demanded their Slave from the Engliſh, which was loſt, by whoſe means and aſſiſtance (as they pretend) he had made his Eſcape. The matter came now to high Demands on both ſides, which the Kadi, either not being deſirous, or not ſufficient Authority to compound, the Gally departed without any agreement, and the complaint was carried by the Turks to the Captain Paſha, who then being with his Fleet at Mytiline, with little other thoughts or buſineſs, was glad of this occaſion to get Money, and therefore ſuddenly returned the Gally again, with Orders to bring before him the Four Merchants, whoſe names he particularized, to make anſwer to their accuſation of having beaten his Levents, and contrived the eſcape of the ſlave. The Conſul and Merchants being affrighted by this Meſſage, and Command of ſo great a Perſonage, endeavoured with Money to accommodate the Buſineſs, by force of which it was at length taken up, coſting in all the ſumm of Two thouſand ſeven hundred Dollars, or thereabouts. The which paſſage 1662. may ſerve for an example to ſuch as live in Turky, that all troubles of this nature are beſt compounded for at firſt; for at the beginning nothing more was demanded than the price of the Slave, & of the broken pate of the Levent: But being ſuffered to come under the Cognizance of powerful and covetous Tyrants; as there is no fathoming their unſatiable deſires, ſo there is no proſpect into what inconvenient dangers ſuch Affairs will involve, and entagle themſelves.

The Vizier's Edict, againſt Dollars of ſix Drams.

As Turky hath been ſeldom or never without having falſe Money currant, ſo the beſt ſort of Silver hath been ſo clipped by the Jews, Armenians, Merchants, and others; that the Dollar was brought at Conſtantinople to ſix Drams, and at Smyrna to ſeven, which made great confuſion in the Trade of theſe Countries. Wherefore the Vizier as he had already given proof and teſtimony to the World of his ſtrict obſervance, and adherence to the Mahometan Law, ſo he was deſirous to appear highly careful and ſenſible of the Publick intereſt: And therefore as the moſt neceſſary work, he began with the Dollars of ſix Drams, proclaiming that they ſhould no longer paſs in payments, and that thoſe in whoſe hands they were found, delivering them into the Mint, ſhould receive a. 80 in return of every ſuch Dollar, by which means the Mint would advance a Fourth on every Dollar, eſteeming every Dram worth Fourteen Aſpers, and that for the preſent no Dollar being currant under ſeven Drams, it might afterwards be brought to Lyons, and Dollars of nine Drams; which regulation, though at firſt grievous to ſome particular perſons, would afterwards redound to the common advanrage and benefit of Trade. To forward which Deſign the Grand Signior, and Queen Mother ſent all their Dollars of ſix Drams to be new coined into Aſpers at the Mint, ſo likewiſe did the Vizier, intending to be very ſtrict in prohibition of that Money. But a while after it happened that the Treaſurer of the Viziers Steward having occaſion to pay Monies, either for his own or his Maſters account, forced ſome Bags of Six Drams on thoſe to whom payment was to be made; the Receivers denied to accept them; but he being a powerful man, and very urgent, forced the Mony upon them, with which laden, as they had received them, they went directly to the Vizier, acquainting him that they were deſirous to obey his Commands, as to the ſix Dram Dollars, but his Stewards Treaſurer had forced on them that ſort of Money, which if it was his pleaſure that they ſhould ſtill paſs, they were contented to receive; if not, they deſired him to give Command for their payment in other Money. The Vizier being highly enraged, that the firſt Violation of his Commands ſhould begin in his own Family, immediately ordered, without farther proof or proceſs, that the Offenders Head ſhould be ſtruck off, and his body thrown into the Sea; which Sentence was executed in the ſame hour for example and terror of others, and to expiate the crime, and take away the ſcandal from the Fountain of Juſtice, whoſe ſtreams can never be eſteemed to run clear when the ſource is corrupted. In like manner the Overſeer of the Mint was ſtrangled, and Emir Paſha, formerly Paſha of Grand Cairo, was baniſhed to the Iſle of Lemnos, for making the Coin of Aſpers 5 per Cent. worſe than their true value.

Merchants of Aleppo.

The Merchants at Aleppo, being far from the Court, are more ſubject to troubleſom Avanias than others, who are nearer to the Head or Fountain, from whence Juſtice ſhould proceed as may appear by many examples, 1662. and particularly by an accident which fell out there this year. For it happened, that a Janiſary which ſerved the Engliſh Nation, riding abroad with ſome of the Merchants, for want of heed, or the unrulineſs of his Horſe, chanced to hurt a Youth playing in the ſtreets. Whereupon the Merchants, and the Janiſary, not to ſuffer this buſineſs to come within the knowledge of the Cities Officers, immediately for ſome Money quieted the complaints, and ſtopped the farther demands of the Father; and to make the buſineſs more ſecure, cauſed the Father to make Hoget before the Kadi, that he was well ſatisfied, and remained without farther pretence, either on the Merchant, or the Janiſary, for the hurt which his Child had received. But the Paſha, who had for a long time attentively watched an opportunity to extort Money from the Engliſh, was reſolved not to let paſs this fair occaſion; and therefore ſent to demand from the Conſul thoſe Merchants, which he called Acceſſories to this miſchief, and the Aſſaſſinates of a Muſſulman. The Conſul appearing in Perſon before the Paſha, denied to deliver up the Merchants, being guiltleſs of any crime; and that for hurt to the Child, the Father had received full ſatisfaction from the Janiſary, and given a diſcharge before the Kadi. Howſoever this reaſon would not pacifie the Paſha, who could acknowledge no other argument available than a Sum of Money; and therefore in proſecution of his deſign produced Ten falſe Witneſſes, that the Child was dead of its hurt, and that Engliſh men had done the miſchief. The Conſul had now no other anſwer than a flat denial; for the Paſha had forced by threats the Hoget from the Janiſary, and perſiſting with conſtancy in defence of his Merchants, the Paſha confined him for an hours time in a Chamber of his Houſe, and beat, and impriſoned his Druggerman. The Conſul afterwards returned home; and perceiving a difference between the Paſha and the Mufti, purchaſed the favour of the Mufti on his ſide, and procured from him an Hoget of the ſeveral proceedings in this buſineſs, which was diſpatched away with all expedition to Conſtantinople, that a redreſs of this injury might be obtained from the Superiour Power. Whilſt the Lord Ambaſſador in due manner reſented this breach of Capitulations, and prepared to make his complaints to the Vizier, it happened that certain Chriſtians of Aleppo, from whom the Paſha had forced 18000 Dollars by unjuſt extortion, were then at Court ſolliciting the reſtauration of their right. The Ambaſſador judging this a convenient and opportune preparation to prepoſſeſs the mind of the Vizier with a true apprehenſion of the injuſtice of this Paſha, encouraged and pricked forward theſe abuſed and oppreſſed Chriſtians in their complaints; and the next day preſented his Memorial to the Vizier, containing all the particulars of the late paſſages at Aleppo: Which with the other Crimes alledged the Day before, ſo moved the mind of the Vizier, that he promiſed the Ambaſſador to ſend a Kapugibaſhee of the Grand Signior to enquire into the Truth of theſe Allegations; and that he might be ſatisfied of his real intentions to do him juſtice, he adviſed him to ſend a Meſſenger in company with this Officer, who might witneſs the reality of his proceedings. The Kapugibaſhee being in this manner diſpatched, and arriving at Aleppo, made the Paſha refund the Money he had unjuſtly taken from the poor oppreſſed Chriſtians of that Country; in which good action my Lord Ambaſſador had been an uſeful inſtrument, having encouraged the Agents

1663. of thoſe Chriſtians at Conſtantinople, counſelled them what Courſe to take, and introduced them by his Chief Interpreter to the Preſence of the Vizier, for which he received the thanks of the Greek and Armenian Patriarchs, who gratefully acknowledged to the Engliſh Conſul at Aleppo, how much they were engaged to the charity and favour of the Engliſh Ambaſſador: But whilſt all mens eyes were in expectation what farther proceedings were deſigned againſt the Paſha in favour of the Engliſh, the Officer denied to have received any inſtructions therein, and ſo returned to Conſtantinople without taking notice of the Engliſh Concernment. The Ambaſſador judging himſelf herein ſlighted, ſent to the Viziers Kahya to know the myſtery of this neglect; for the Vizier and himſelf having pawned his word and promiſes to do him juſtice againſt the Paſha of Aleppo, it ſeemed ſtrange that his aſſurances ſhould vaniſh into nothing; and that he ſo meanly eſteemed his Quality and Office, as to diſparage it with ſo much diſrepute and contempt as muſt neceſſarily beſal him, ſhould this Paſha eſcape without exemplary puniſhment; for then the World might with reaſon believe his Applications of no prevalency, and his Merchants fear the inſufficiency of his protection. To which the Kahya anſwered, That it was true, that the Kapugibaſhee was not inſtructed in the Concernments of the Engliſh, in regard a more ſolemn and eminent piece of Juſtice was deſigned for the Ambaſſador, than any that could be performed by the Kapugibaſhee, and that in twenty or thirty days at fartheſt, the Paſha ſhould be deprived of his Office. The next day following the Kahya adviſed that the Hatteſheriff, or Imperial Command for depoſing of the Paſha, was ſigned, and that old Mahomet Paſha of Darbiquier was conſtituted in his place; which News was highly pleaſing to the Lord Ambaſſador, in regard he had been an ancient Friend to the Engliſh, under whom he preſaged to our Nation at Aleppo all ſecurity and contentment.

Reflections on the Premiſes.

By which Story it is obſervable, That though the Supream Officers amongſt the Turks are willing to ſatisfie Chriſtian Ambaſſadors reſident with them, in the Care they have of their Welfare, and maintenance of their Capitulations; yet are not deſirous to publiſh to their own People the puniſhment of their Grand Officers, at the inſtigation or for the concernment of a Chriſtian: And that tho the Turks are apprehended amongſt us for a People of great Morality, and ſingleneſs in their Dealings; yet it is obſervable in this, as well as in other their actions, that they have double Tongues and Faces, and know how to act with as fine a Thread, and plauſible pretences, as are accuſtomary in the moſt politick and refined Courts of Italy.

Anno Chriſti 1663. Hegeira 1074.

THE Baron of Goez, which at the end of the laſt Year arrived at Buda with ſeveral overtures of Peace, had ſo far proceeded in his Treaty with Ali Paſha of Buda, that all Articles ſeemed almoſt concluded, and ſcarce any difficulty to remain, unleſs the Surrender of Zekelhyd on the Confines of Hungary; which alſo was afterwards accommodated by Agreement, That the City ſhould be reſigned into the hands of the Prince of Tranſilvania, as the moſt equal Condition between the Emperor and the Turk. So that, matters thus ſeeming to be compoſed, all People talked of Peace with Germany, and that the force and miſeries of Wars were to be turned 1663. upon Dalmatia: And though the Turks had no deſign leſs in their thoughts than this, or any intentions towards a Peace, as will be proved by the Sequel; howſoever, the German Miniſters, as men credulous of what they deſire, gave the Peace for certainly concluded, in which conceit the Turks ſo humoured and indulged their fancy, that they perſwaded Prince Portia, the Chief Miniſter of State to the Emperor, in that manner of the reality of their intentions, that he neglected the neceſſary Proviſions and Preparations of War. And though he was often adviſed by the Reſident at the Ottoman Port, that all theſe Demonſtrations of Peace were only Artifices of the Turk, to delude the Emperors Council; yet ſo tenacious was he of this Opinion, that though it be but common reaſon, and the vulgar Rule of Policy for a Prince to arm, and ſuſpect his Neighbour, who puts himſelf into a Warlike poſture; yet this Great Perſonage, though in other things profoundly wiſe, and circumſpect, was ſo deluded, that he replyed to the Reſidents Advices to this effect, That it was the Office of a prudent and experienced Miniſter to diſcover with diligence the reſolution of the Cabinet Councils of Princes, and not to give ear or credit to what is the common Voice or vogue of the Vulgar.

The Turks with words deceive the German Miniſters.

The Spring drawing near, the Vizier prepared all things for action, nominating and appointing ſuch, who in his abſence were to ſupply the Offices of State: Iſhmael Paſha, then Paſha of Buda, was deſigned for Chimacam, or Governour of Conſtantinople, and Muſtapha Paſha, Captain Paſha, Brother in Law to the Grand Vizier by Marriage of his Siſter (and now the preſent Vizier) was made Chimacam at Adrianople, near the Perſon of the Grand Signior. All other preparations for War went forwards, Thirty pieces of Cannon from Scutari, and fifty from the Seraglio, moſt of a vaſt bigneſs and weight, which had ſerved in the taking of Babylon, with great ſtore of Ammunition and Proviſions of War, were tranſported up the Danube to Belgrade, and the Princes of Moldavia, and Valachia, had now Commands ſent them to quicken their diligence in making their preparations of War, and in providing Sheep, Beef, Rice, and all ſorts of Victuals for ſupply of the Camp; and general Proclamation was made in all places, That all Soldiers, who received one Aſper of pay from the Gr. Signior, were to prepare themſelves for the War.

About the middle of February the Horſe Tail was ſet forth at the Viziers Gate; (which is the uſual ſignal of the Camps motion within the ſpace of a Month) ſo that none may excuſe himſelf from the War for want of due and timely intimation. And though the time for departure nearly approached, yet the Grand Signior was ſo impatient, that he would ſcarce expect until the Equinoctial, which was the Term formerly appointed and publiſhed for this expedition; reſolving ſometimes to proceed before, and leave the Vizier to follow him, letting fall words often, That ſuch as loved and honoured him would keep him company. But this haſty reſolution, and eager deſire of his Journey, the Vizier, Mufti, and others of his Counſellours, did moderate, perſwading him to a little longer patience: to which, though with ſome difficulty, he aſſented; yet he could not forbear from his Horſes back, and conſtant exerciſes abroad, nor could he be induced to take one Nights repoſe longer in his great Seraglio at Conſtantinople, but lodged at Daout Paſha, a ſmall Palace about four miles diſtant from Conſtantinople. Which extravagant manner of living moſt People attritributed to his wandring humour, and delights in hunting, riding, and ſuch like exerciſes, having his ſole pleaſure in the Woods and Fields: But others, who judged with better Foundation, did conceive, That the Grand Signiors choice of other places of Reſidence rather than his Imperial Seraglio, proceeded not ſo much from his own unſetled humour, and courſe of living, as from an apprehenſion of ſome Deſigns, and mutinous Treaſons of the Janiſaries againſt him: For to ſpeak the truth, ſince the death of Kuperlee, the Militia began again to be corrupted; and if we may believe the opinion of the moſt principal Turks, the Vizier undertook this War to employ the buſie ſpirits of the Soldiery, which began to grow reſty and inſolent through idleneſs, and by that means ſecure his own life, and eſtabliſh his Condition and Fortune.

The Equinoctial being come, the Grand Signior would not have one days longer patience; for though the Seaſon was wet and rainny, yet the Tents were pitched; and though the Wind was ſo violent and forcible as overturned almoſt the whole Camp, yet no difficulties and inconveniencies of Weather could give one hour of intermiſſion to the Sultans deſires: Wherefore on the Ninth of this Month, the Grand Signior departed from Conſtantinople, attended with his Court, his principal Officers of State, and with what part of his Army was then a in readineſs to march. The magnificence of the ſhow they made, was according to the uſual Solemnity, yet worthy the ſight of a Stranger, and perhaps not incurious to the Reader in its Relation.

March.

The Cavalcade which the Gr. Signior made when he departed from Conſtantinople.

Firſt, marched with a ſingular Gravity, the ſeveral and diſtinct Orders of Civil and Military Officers in their proper Habits and Capariſons, the Santones in their wild dreſs followed by the Emirs, or ſuch as are of the Kindred of their falſe Prophet; the Great Vizier and Mufti rode in rank together, the Vizier on the left hand, the moſt honourable place amongſt the Soldiery, being the ſide to which the Sword is girt, as the right is of greateſt eſteem amongſt ſuch as are of the Law, being that hand which guides the Pen: The Trappings of the Viziers Horſe were plated with Gold, and before him were carried three Horſe-tails, called in Turkiſh (Tugh,) and behind him came about Three hundred and fifty Pages, all Young men well mounted, and armed with Jacks and Coats of Male: Next followed the Minions of the Court, or Seraglio, (viz.) the Paicks with Caps of beaten Gold, and embroidered Coats, the Solacks with Feathers, armed with Bows and Arrows; theſe two laſt are of the higheſt degree of Lacqueys, which more nearly attend the Perſon of the Grand Signior; theſe were followed by Nine led Horſes of the Grand Signior, richly adorned with precious Stones, and Bucklers all covered with Jewels of an unknown value. Immediately before the Perſon of the Grand Signior was led a Camel carrying the Alcoran in a Cheſt covered with cloth of gold: The Gr. Signior himſelf was clothed in a Veſt of cloth of gold lined with a Sable incomparably black, held up from the ſides of his Horſe by four Pages; his Perſon was followed with great numbers of Eunuchs, and Pages with long red Caps wrought with Gold about the head, carrying Lances and Mails, with two Locks, one on each ſide of their Head, which are worn by ſuch only as are of the Royal Chamber: After theſe crowded great numbers of Servants, with the chief Comp. of Saphees, commanded by the Selictor Aga, in number about 1800. And in this manner and order they marched to their Tents.

The richneſs of Turkiſh Tents.

*In Turkiſh Pec-dén.

The Tents were raiſed on a ſmall Hill, as may be judged about Four Miles diſtant from Conſtantinople, and about Two Thouſand in number ranged at that time without order, only the Grand Signior's ſeemed to be in the midſt, and to over-top all the reſt, well worthy obſervation, coſting (as was reported) One hundred and eighty thouſand Dollars, richly embroidered in the inſide with Gold, and ſupported by Pillars plated with Gold. Within the * Walls of this Tent (as I may ſo call them) were all ſorts of Offices belonging to the Seraglio, all Retirements and Apartments for the Pages, Chiosks or Summer-houſes for pleaſure; and though I could not get admittance to view the innermoſt Rooms and Chambers, yet by the outward and more common places of reſort, I could make a gueſs at the richeſs and greatneſs of the reſt, being ſumptuous beyond compariſon of any in uſe amongſt the Chriſtian Princes. On the right hand hereof was pitched the Grand Viziers Tent, exceedingly rich and lofty; and had I not ſeen that of the Sultans before it, I ſhould have judged it the beſt that my eyes had ſeen. The oſtentation and magnificence of this Empire being evidenced in nothing more than in the richeſs of their Pavilions, ſumptuous beyond the fixed Palaces of Princes, erected with Marble and Mortar.

The Turks begin their march.

On the Sixteenth of this Month the Aga of the Janiſaries firſt raiſed his Tents, and began his march; the next day followed the Grand Signior, Vizier, and other Officers, and Spahees. At which time all Aſia was full of Soldiers flocking from all parts of the East, as from Aleppo, Damaſcus, Arabia, Erzirum, and Babylon: So that for a long time Boats and Barks were continually imployed to ferry the Souldiery from Scutari into Europe: And the High-ways, Villages, and all parts of the Road towards Adrianople were filled with Soldiers, as if all Aſia had iſſued out to devour and inhabit the German Poſſeſſions. And for greater expedition in the march of the Army, Proclamation was made of a general Rendezvous at Sophia at the * Biram, then within Three weeks time, where they deſigned to ſoil their Horſe, and refreſh themſelves before they fell in earneſt to their buſineſs. But before the Grand Vizier departed from Adrianople to proſecute a War in Hungary againſt the Emperor, he called Signior Ballarino to his preſence, as if he would treat with him of matters tending to an adjuſtment with Venice; when at the ſame time he had 20000 men in a readineſs at Scutari to march into Dalmatia, and to joyn with other Forces in Boſna and Croatia; but this diſſimulation and appearance of Treaty ſerved only to diſcover on what Terms a Peace might be obtained, in caſe Affairs in Hungary ſhould be ſo preſſing as to require an application ſolely of Arms to that Country.

* The Turks Feaſt.

Not only had Signior Ballarino Affairs of publick trouble, but likewiſe ſomething touched him of private concernment in his own Family; where the Turks, I know not upon what information coming to ſearch, found in his Houſe two figures, one of a man, and the other of a woman made of Linen cloth, ſtuffed with Wool and Cotton; the which were interpreted by the Turks to be Images of Sorcery and Inchantment; one repreſenting the Grand Signior, and the other his Mother, were deſigned in a ſecret manner, by thruſting Needles and Pins into thoſe parts, where the Heart and Liver is, to cauſe thoſe whom they repreſent to dye with macerations and conſumptions, according to the Inchantment of Medea. In jecur urget acus. And this ſuſpicion was augmented by the reports of the Neighbourhood, who hearing the Prieſt often recite his Litany, and ſing Evening-ſong, avouched that they conſtantly over-heard the Charms muttered in ſuch forms as are uſed by Magicians and Sorcerers: Wherefore deſigning to take the Prieſt, who was the Father Provincial of St. Francis, and puniſh him for his Witchcraft, the good man fairly fled, and kept himſelf out of harms way, until Signior Ballarino could quiet the minds of the Turks by ſome Art, which he more forcibly practiſed upon them by a ſtronger charm of Money and Preſents than that which was the ſubject of their complaint.

In the mean time all fears and dangers of Candia vaniſhed, becauſe the Turks bent their Forces and chief of their ſtrength againſt their Enemies at Land: To provide againſt which, the Senate of Venice ſent into Dalmatia the Baron Spaar for General, with many other Officers under him, namely the Marqueſs Maculani, Count Ettore Albano, Carlo Martinengo, and Roverelli, Count of Caudes, the Cavalier Grimaldi, Echenfelt, and others. Into Friuli, Franciſco Moroſini was diſpatched in quality of Proveditor General with ſupream Power and Authority, and in this manner all matters were as well provided and ſecured by Land, as they were by Sea.

The Biram chanced to happen out this Year towards the end of April, by which time the Vizier, and moſt of his Army, aſſembled according to Proclamation at Sophia; where having continued ſome time, and conſulted well in what manner to put their deſigns in execution, they proceeded in their March towards Buda, and the Confines of Hungary; but in the way the Vizier was encountred by a Meſſenger from the Emperor, offering all reaſonable Propoſitions of Peace, if poſſibly a ſtop might be given to the farther progreſs of that vaſt and formidable Army. All matters were propoſed which probably might give ſatisfaction; the Fort of Count Serini (the grand Eye-ſore of the Turks) was proffered to be demoliſhed, with other Conditions which before the March of the Army were never propoſed or demanded. But the Vizier gave little ear to theſe fair Overtures, but proceeded forwards in his Demands, as he did in his March: Requiring now, not the demoliſhment of the Fort, but the Surrender of it entirely with all the Strength, Artillery, and Ammunition into the hands of the Grand Signior. Had this condition been granted, it is probable the deſires and pretenſions of the Turks would not have ſtopped here, but have riſen, as the ſpirits of their Enemies had condeſcended, and exceeded all the hopes and advantage which they imagined probable and feaſible to be obtained by the War. Wherefore this Meſſage proving fruitleſs, the Bringer of it was permitted Licence to return into Germany: But the Reſident was refuſed diſmiſſion, being detained in the Turkiſh Camp, as an Inſtrument to mediate a Peace, when both ſides ſhould grow weary of the War.

The Coſſacks infeſt the Tartars.

About this time the Tartars were greatly infeſted by the Coſſacks, who were then very formidable and ſtrong, approaching near the City of Oſac, the Key and chief Fortreſs of Tartary, under the Commann of a Fiſherman of the Boriſthenes, who having had great ſucceſſes, and collected a conſiderable ſum of Money, became a dangerous Enemy: By Sea alſo they commanded abſolutely, roving uncontrouled, having a Fleet of Saykes and Gallies near an hundred and fifty Sail, againſt whom the Tartar Han or King of Tartary craved of the Grand Signior forty ſail of Gallies that year to oppoſe them. But this Force of the Coſſacks was ſoon abated; for it pleaſed God, that paſſing out of the Palus Mæotis through the narrow paſſage of Colchos into the Black Sea, the beſt part of this Fleet ſuffered ſhipwrack; with which they were ſo diſmayed, that the twelve ſail of Gallies (which was the whole Force the Turks could ſpare this year for that Sea) gave a check to the remainder, and forced them again to the Banks of the Boriſthenes. The reſt of the Turkiſh Fleet, conſiſting, together with the Beys Gallies, in all but of thirty Sail, departed from Conſtantinople, with deſign rather to make ſome appearance of a Fleet, and a noiſe amongſt their own people, and collect the Contributions of the Iſles in the Archipelago, than out of hopes of effecting any thing againſt the Venetians; and ſo it ſucceeded; for this Fleet remained the whole Summer at Mytilene, not daring to appear abroad for fear of the Enemy.

The Tartar unwilling to go to the War.

Though the Tartars were ſo hardly beſet by the Coſſacks, yet their danger at home was not a ſufficient excuſe to diſingage them from their aſſiſtance in the War of Hungary. For the Vizier marching towards the Frontiers, ſent one Meſſenger after the other to haſten the Tartar Han with all ſpeed poſſible to the Wars. But the Tartars ſeeming not ſo willing, or ſo ready as the Turks expected, more poſitive commands, and ſevere threats, were diſpatched than before, that laying aſide all excuſes or delays, they ſhould with all the Force of their Country attend in this preſent War againſt the Emperor, or otherwiſe the Tartar Han was to be deprived of his Government, and his Son conſtituted in his place. Theſe ſevere menaces reduced the Tartar to great ſtraits; fearful he was to diſpleaſe the Sultan, not knowing what ill conſequences might proceed from thence; but more apprehenſive he was of the approaches of the Coſſacks, and of the diſpleaſure of his own People, who were reſolved to ſee this fire of War extinguiſhed in their own homes, before they would attend the deſigns, or ſatisfie the Luſts of a ſtranger Prince. In this Dilemma the Tartar Han finding himſelf, made uſe of fair words and promiſes, ingaging his word, That after the harveſt was paſt, no obſtacle ſhould prevent his compliance with the Sultans expectations; for at preſent it was impoſſible, in regard that ſhould their People at this ſeaſon be diverted from gathering the harveſt, the Corn and Fruit would remain on the ground, and ſo occaſion a Famine and deſtruction of their Country. And herein the Tartar had ſome reaſon; for theſe People go not to the Wars, as other Nations, who leave a ſufficient number behind to cultivate their Country, and perform all other Offices and Imployments in a Common-wealth: But theſe making their chief livelihood and ſubſiſtence on the prey and robberies they make on their Neighbours, as many as reſolve to eat Bread and live, who are men not old or impotent, able to bear Arms, betake themſelves to their Horſe and Bow; ſo that when their Army is abroad, their Towns and Villages are only inhabited, and defended by their Women. But the Turk whoſe deſires are never ſatisfied with reaſons, or withſtood by words, or with any thing beſides the execution of his Commands, diſpatched another Meſſage more full of threats and reſolution than formerly, carried by the Embrahor, or Maſter of the G. Signiors Horſe, menacing nothing but Fire, and Sword, and Deſtruction to the Han and his Country, if he longer delayed to perform his Duty. But by this time the Harveſt being almoſt gathered, and their fears againſt the Coſſacks partly extinguiſhed, the Tartar promiſed with all expedition an Army of Seventy Thouſand men, under the Conduct of the Prince his eldeſt Son, who whilſt they were putting themſelves in order, and aſſembling for the War; reports were murmured, as if the Turks were in a Treaty of Peace with the Emperoor, and matters in a fair likelihood of compoſure: At this news the common Souldiers amongſt the Tartars were not a little ſtartled, fearing that they who are free Booters, and have no other pay than their purchaſe, ſhould by ſuch a Treaty be forced to return empty; and therefore before they would proceed, ſent to adviſe the Sultan of theſe their fears; ſupplicating him, that if he ſhould think fit to conclude a Peace, and ſo oblige them to return into their own Country, that he would not take it amiſs, if upon their march home, they ſhould make themſelves good upon his Subjects of Moldavia and Valachia, whoſe perſons and Eſtates they reſolved to carry with them, as a juſt prey and recompence for their loſs of time and labour. The Sultan who ſets a ſmall value on the Lives and Eſtates of his Chriſtian Subjects, judged this Propoſition but reaſonable, ſo long as upon theſe terms he might obtain the benefit of the Tartars aſſiſtance, who are the beſt Horſe to forage, deſtroy, and make deſolate a Country.
